Eretria (e-rē'tri-a). In ancient geography, a city on the island of Euboea, Greece, about 29 miles N of Athens. It was a rival of Chalcis, was destroyed (490 B.C.) by the Persians, and was afterward rebuilt. An ancient theater has been excavated on its site by the American School at Athens. The cavea (auditorium) is supported on an artificial embankment. It was divided by radial stairways into 11 cunei (blocks of seats), and is 266 feet in diameter. The orchestra, 81½ feet in diameter, presents a highly important feature, here first recognized, in an underground passage leading from its center to the interior of the stage structure.

Ereuthalion (er-ū-thā'li-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), an Arcadian who fought as the champion of the Arcadians, wielding the iron mace of Areithōūs, in a single combat to decide a struggle between the Arcadians and Pylians. Nestor, who was his opponent in the duel, killed him. Nestor recalled his conquest of Ereuthalion in his youth as he regretted his age in the siege of Troy.

Ergane (ēr'gā-nē). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Worker." As patroness of the useful and decorative arts the Athenians were the first to give her this name. The cock was sacred to Athena Ergane, and sanctuaries of Athena Ergane were erected in many places.

Erginus (er-jī'nus). According to some mythographers, a son of Clymenus, king of the Minyans in Orchomenus. Others say he was a son of Poseidon. In the course of the games for Poseidon at Onchestus, Clymenus was killed by a Theban. Erginus, who succeeded his father as king, forthwith attacked and conquered Thebes, and imposed a tribute of 100 head of cattle yearly for 20 years. Heracles met the heralds who were on their way to collect the cattle, and cut off their ears and noses, which he threaded on cords and hung around their necks. He then bound their hands behind their backs and sent them back to Erginus. Erginus again attacked the Thebans in retaliation for this outrage, but this time Heracles aided the Thebans. He routed Erginus, scattered his army, and forced the people of Orchomenus to pay double the tribute which Erginus had been exacting from the Thebans. Some say Erginus was killed in this battle. Others say he survived the defeat and later joined the Argonauts on their journey to Colchis. In his old age he followed the advice of an oracle and married a young wife who bore him the famous builders, Agamedes and Trophonius.

Erginus. A river of Thrace. Nearby is the rock of Sarpedon to which Boreas carried Orithyia when he carried her off from the banks of the Ilissus River.

Eriboea (er-i-bē'a). In Greek mythology, a wife of Aloeus and the stepmother of Ephialtes and Otus. Her stepsons imprisoned Ares in a bronze vessel and hid him in her house. Hermes tricked her into releasing him.

Erichthonius (er-ik-thō'ni-us). In Greek mythology, a son sprung from the seed of Hephaestus which fell on Gaea. Gaea abandoned him and Athena took the infant, who was half human and half serpent, put him in a chest, and gave him to the daughters of Cecrops, king of Athens, to guard. She gave them strict instructions not to open the chest. Ultimately, of course, their curiosity got the better of them. They opened the chest and when they saw the child with a serpent's tail for legs they were maddened with fear and leaped to their deaths from the Acropolis. A white crow brought Athena the news of the death of Agraalos and her two daughters. Athena was so saddened by the news she changed the crow's color from white to black and henceforth banished crows from the Acropolis. She put Erichthonius in her aegis and reared him herself. Some say she gave him the power to restore the dead to life by presenting him with two drops of the blood of the Gorgon Medusa. When he later became king of Athens he established the worship of Athena there. He invented the four-horse chariot and later was identified with the constellation Auriga on this account. The royal family of Athens claimed descent from Erichthonius, as well as from Erechtheus, with whom he is sometimes confused.

Erichthonius. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Dardanus. He succeeded to his father's kingdom in what later, from Erichthonius' son Tros, came to be known as the Troad.

Eridanus (ē-rid'a-nus). A large mythical river in northern Europe, later identified with the Rhone, or, usually, with the Po. According to legend, it had its source in the Elysian Fields of the Underworld. Its waters still steam from receiving blazing Phaëthon, a youth who fell into them when he failed successfully to drive the chariot of Helios across the sky and was felled by a thunderbolt of Zeus to save the world from burning up. Along its banks the Heliades, sisters of Phaëthon, were turned into poplar trees as they grieved for their fallen brother.

Eridanus. [Also: Fluvius, the River.] The ancient southern constellation of the River. It is situated south of Taurus, and contains the star Achernar, or Acanar, of the first magnitude.

Erigone (ē-rig'ō-nē). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Icarius of Athens. When her father was slain by peasants, made drunk by wine he had given them, his dog led her to his grave. Stricken with grief, she prepared to hang herself from the pine tree under which the peasants had buried him. She prayed that all Athenian daughters would suffer a death similar to hers until Icarius was avenged. When Athenian maidens began to be found swinging from trees, an oracle explained that this came about in answer to Erigone's prayer. The Athenians found the peasants who had murdered Icarius and killed them, extinguishing the curse.

Erigone. In Greek legend, a daughter of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. According to some accounts, it was she who brought Orestes to trial for the murder of her mother and father, before the Areopagus. When Orestes was acquitted she hanged herself.

Erinna (ē-rin'a). Greek poetess, born at Rhodes or Telos probably in the middle of the 4th century B.C. She died at the age of 19. Fragments of the poem by which she is best known, The Spindle, survive, of the original 300 hexameters. The poem was written in memory of her friend Baucis, described girlhood experiences shared with her, and lamented her death. Of her other writings only a few epigrams are extant.

Erinyes (e-rin'i-ēz). Female divinities, aveng-

ers of iniquity, who live in Erebus and are older than Zeus and the Olympians. According to Hesiod, they are daughters of Gaea (Earth), sprung from the blood of Uranus when he was mutilated by his son Cronus. According to others, they are the children of Night and Darkness. The Erinyes are monstrous hags; coiling serpents stream from their dogs' heads, wings sprout from their black bodies, and in their hands they carry bronze scourges to attack their victims. They hunt down offenders, make them mad, and punish them in Tartarus. In later times the number of the Erinyes was limited to three: Alecto (Unresting), Megaera (Jealous), and Tisiphone (Avenger). The Erinyes are not vindictive; their punishments are impartial and impersonal; crimes, or other offenses, must be avenged to satisfy the souls of the dead whose representatives they are and who have called on them for vengeance. Orestes, who slew his mother, is hounded by the Erinyes, even though his act was fully in consonance with what he was required to do: he had killed his mother to avenge his father. But the Erinyes, called on by Clytemnestra's soul, demanded payment for his crime. Athena, goddess of law and order as well as of wisdom, came to the defense of Orestes. She persuaded the Erinyes to let him stand trial before the Areopagus. In the trial the vote of the judges was evenly divided, whereupon Athena cast her vote in favor of Orestes and broke the tie. The Erinyes bitterly protested the trial and the verdict. If now, they said, a confessed murderer was to go free they would lose all authority as avenging deities. They threatened to put a blight on Athens if the verdict was not reversed. Athena cajoled them. She promised that the Athenians would honor them with offerings of first fruits and sacrifices. She invited them to take up their residence in a grotto on the Acropolis and receive their honors from the Athenians. In return for these honors the Erinyes were to promise prosperity for the land, ships, and marriages of the Athenians. The Erinyes accepted Athena's proposal, agreed to the promises she exacted from them, and were led away by torchlight procession to their new home in the grotto on the Acropolis, which henceforth became a shrine and a sanctuary. After this they were honored by the Athenians as the "Solemn Ones," their rites were performed in silence, and acquitted murderers sacrificed black victims to them. Other places in Greece had altars of the Solemn Ones. At Phyla, in Attica, sheep were sacrificed to them, and libations of honey were poured. Here flowers were worn at their processions instead of the myrtle wreaths that symbolize the Underworld. The Erinyes are also called the Eumenides. Some say this name, meaning "the Kind Ones," was given to them by Orestes, and some say the name was given to them because it was considered dangerous to mention them by the name Erinyes. And some say only three of the Erinyes agreed to Athena's proposal to cease hounding Orestes and make their home in the grotto on the Acropolis. They say that the other Erinyes, whose number varies, continued to pursue Orestes, and it was not until he had gone to Tauris and fetched the image of Artemis there that he was freed from their scourging. The Roman name for the Erinyes was Furiae or Dirae.

Erinys (e-rin'is, e-rī'nīs). An epithet of Demeter. The Thelpusians of Arcadia said that when Demeter was searching for Persephone she came to their land. Poseidon pursued her and she transformed herself into a mare to escape him. Poseidon then transformed himself into a stallion and ravished her as she grazed among the herds of Oncus. Demeter was so enraged that the Thelpusians gave her the name Erinys (Fury) and set up an image of Demeter Erinys in her temple.

Eriopis (er-i-ō'pis). Named by Homer as the wife of Oileus and the mother of Ajax the Less.

Eriphyle (er-i-fi'lē). In Greek legend, the wife of the seer Amphiaraus and the sister of Adrastus, king of Argos. She was the mother of Alcmaeon and Amphilochus. In a quarrel between Amphiaraus and Adrastus she intervened to prevent them from injuring each other, and made them each promise to abide by her decision in any future dispute which might arise between them. When Adrastus proposed to march on Thebes to restore his son-in-law, Polynices, to the throne, he asked the help of Amphiaraus in the expedition. Amphiaraus, refused, because he knew all would perish except Adrastus. Polynices learned of the agreement between Adrastus and Amphiaraus to allow Eriphyle to settle any disputes between them. He gave Eriphyle the necklace of Harmonia which he had brought with him from Thebes and begged her to compel Amphiaraus to accompany the expedition. Eriphyle accepted the bribe, although Amphiaraus had forbidden her to accept any presents from Polynices, and persuaded her husband to accompany Adrastus to Thebes. As Amphiaraus had foreseen, the expedition ended in disaster; only Adrastus survived it. Ten years later the Epigoni, as the sons of the original Seven against Thebes were called, proposed to march against Thebes to avenge their fathers, and sought Alcmaeon as their leader. Alcmaeon was reluctant to go. He argued the matter with his brother Amphilochus and they agreed to let their mother decide it. Once again Eriphyle was bribed, this time by Thersander, son of Polynices, who gave her the robe of Harmonia, which had been given to Harmonia as a wedding gift by Athena. She advised Alcmaeon to lead the new expedition. The Epigoni were successful and captured Thebes. On his return Alcmaeon learned that Eriphyle's acceptance of the bribe of the necklace had caused his father's death, and that her acceptance of the robe might have caused his own. He consulted the oracle of Delphi and then killed Eriphyle, some say with the help of Amphilochus. As she was dying, Eriphyle uttered a curse: she called on all the lands of Greece and Asia to deny a home to her murderers.

Eris (ē'ris, er'is). [Latin: Discordia.] According to some accounts, a daughter of Zeus and Hera, and the twin of Ares. Others say she was a daughter of Nyx. She is the goddess of discord who stirs up strife by spreading rumors and by inciting men to jealousy. The most famous example of how Eris roused jealousy concerns the Apple of Discord. In revenge for not having been invited to the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, she threw among the guests a golden apple bearing the inscription "To the Fairest." A dispute arose among Aphrodite, Hera, and Athena concerning the apple, whereupon Zeus ordered Hermes to take the goddesses to Mount Gargarus, to the shepherd Paris, who should decide the dispute. He awarded the apple to Aphrodite, who in return assisted him in carrying off the beautiful Helen from Sparta, thus giving rise to the Trojan War.

Eros (ē'ros, er'os). In Greek mythology, the god of love. Some say he was born from a silver egg laid by Nyx, that he set the world in motion, and was the first of the gods. According to Hesiod he is the offspring of Chaos, coeval with Earth and Tartarus, and the companion of Aphrodite; in later myths he is the youngest of the gods, son of Aphrodite and Ares, Hermes, or Zeus, represented as a beautiful winged boy, armed by Zeus with bow and arrows, or flaming torch. In the older view he was regarded as one of the creative powers of nature, the principle of union among the diverse elements of the world, more especially as the power of sensual love, and also of devoted friendship. In the later legend he is characterized as a beautiful, wild, mischievous, irresponsible, and irresistible boy, who shoots his arrows of desire at random, without regard for former commitments or future welfare of those whose hearts he wantonly sets on fire. Although he was never given a place among the 12 Olympians, the gods had not the smallest compunction about employing him to further their own ends. For example, he was bribed by Aphrodite, at the request of Hera and Athena, to cause Medea to fall so madly in love with Jason that she betrayed her father and her country for his sake. Nor were the gods themselves immune to his arrows. He was worshiped at Thespieae in Boeotia, where a festival, the Erotidia or Erotia, was celebrated every five years in his honor. His brother is Anteros, the god of mutual love or the avenging god who punishes those who do not return love. The Romans identified Eros with Cupid or Amor, and the later Greeks adopted the Roman concept of a plural Eros.

Erulus (er'ū-lus). Named in the Aeneid as a son of Feronia, a goddess who presided over woods and orchards. He was a king in Italy. Because of gifts from his mother of three sets of equipment and three lives, Evander, a Trojan who had come to Italy before the Trojan War, had to kill him three times. Evander succeeded in doing this, all in the same day.

Erycina (er-i-sī'nə). Epithet of 'Aphrodite or Venus. It comes from Mount Eryx in Sicily where her cult was established, according to various sources, by a legendary king named Eryx, by Aeneas, or by the Phoenicians. It was as Aphrodite Erycina that her worship was introduced to Rome c220 B.C.

Erymanthian Boar (er-i-man'thi-an). In Greek legend, a savage boar that roamed the slopes of Mount Erymanthus and ravaged the countryside. One of Heracles' labors for Eurystheus was to bring it alive to Mycenae. He drove it into a snow drift, captured it and carried it back to Mycenae slung across his shoulders. The scene, when Eurystheus, in terror of Heracles arriving with the still struggling boar, takes refuge in a large pithos or storage jar, whose lid he raises cautiously to follow the course of events, amused Greek artists and appears frequently in vase-painting and sculptured metopes.

Erymanthus (er-i-man'thus). [Also: Olonos.] Mountain peak on the border of Arcadia and Achaia, Greece. It was named after a son of Apollo who was blinded by Aphrodite because he saw the goddess bathing. It was the haunt of the Erymanthian Boar. The mountain was sacred to Artemis.

Erysichthon (er-i-sik'thon). In Greek mythology, a Thessalonian who cut down the trees in a grove sacred to Demeter. According to some accounts, when his servants refused to obey his order to cut down the tallest tree, he seized the ax and cut the tree himself. Some say the blood of the hamadryad who inhabited the tree flowed out and that her voice warned Erysichthon that Demeter would surely punish him. Others say that Demeter herself, in the guise of the priest of the grove, appeared and told him not to cut down the trees. In both cases he persisted in spite of warnings. Demeter punished him by sending Famine to embrace him, and from that time forward he could never eat enough to satisfy his hunger. He sold everything he had to buy food. Ultimately, he sold his daughter, Mestra. She, like some of the sea-gods, had the power of changing her shape at will, and as fast as she was sold she changed her form and returned to her father. She was then sold again, in this way providing an unending means of obtaining money for his insatiable hunger. But Famine grew ever more ravenous and at last Erysichthon turned upon his own body and devoured himself.

Erythea (er-i-thē'a). A legendary island far to the west beyond the Mediterranean Sea. It was the home of Geryon and his famous cattle. Heracles slew Geryon and took the cattle back to Hellas as one of his labors for Eurystheus. The island was also known as one where Helius kept one of his herds.

Erytheis (er-i-thē'is) or Erytheia (-thī'a). In Greek mythology, one of the Hesperides who guarded the Golden Apples. At the approach of the Argonauts she transformed herself into an elm tree on the banks of the Tritonian Lake. See Hesperides.

Erythrae (er'i-thrē). In ancient geography, an Ionian city in Asia Minor, situated opposite the island of Chios. According to legend, it was founded by Erythrus, son of Rhadamanthys of Crete, and named for him. Lycians and Carians joined the Cretan settlers, and soon their city was further enlarged by the arrival of some Pamphylians who had wandered there with Calchas the seer after the fall of Troy. Some time later Cleopus, son of Codrus, the legendary king of Athens, attacked the city with a band of

Euboean and Boeotian colonists and secured control of it. There was a famous sanctuary of Heracles at Erythrae. According to some accounts, an image of Heracles, riding on a wooden raft, floated to a cape midway between Erythrae and Chios. The men of both places were most anxious to obtain the image, and strove mightily to pull it ashore but to no avail; they couldn't move it. A blind fisherman, one Phormio, had a vision that if the women of Erythrae would cut off their hair and make a rope of it the raft bearing the image could be pulled ashore. The women of Erythrae refused to cut off their hair, but the Thracian women who were in the city, both free and slave, volunteered to give their hair. The rope was made and the raft was then easily drawn ashore. A sanctuary of Heracles was raised in which the image was set, but only Thracian women were admitted to it. The rope of hair was also put in the sanctuary, and, it is said, that Phormio recovered his sight. Erythrae was called "The Crimson City" because of the purple dye obtained there by Tyrian traders.

Erythraean Sea (er-i-thrē'an). [Latin, Mare Erythraeum, also Mare Rubrum, meaning "Red Sea."] In ancient geography, a name given to the Arabian Sea, or to the Indian Ocean including the Red Sea and Persian Gulf.

Eryx (e'riks). According to mythology, a son of Butes, the Argonaut, and Aphrodite, and thus half-brother of Aeneas. He was in the habit of challenging strangers to box with him. If he won, his reward was to slay his opponent. Upon challenging Heracles he was defeated and killed, and buried on the mountain which henceforth bore his name.

Eryx. A mountain on the NW coast of Sicily. Butes, the Argonaut, was rescued by Aphrodite when he had leaped into the sea in answer to the Sirens' song, and was carried to this mountain by her. The mountain was named for the son of Butes and Aphrodite. Acestes, the Trojan, settled near this mountain, and it was on its slopes that Aeneas founded a shrine to Idalian Venus (Aphrodite) when he visited Acestes the second time, and divided his followers, leaving those who were tired of wandering to settle down with Acestes at the foot of Mount Eryx.

Eryx. [Modern name, Erice; formerly, Monte

San Ciuliano.] Town on the island of Sicily, situated on a mountain 2465 feet high, overlooking the Tyrrhenian Sea. It was colonized by Phoenicians, later occupied by Greeks, captured (278 B.C.) by Pyrrhus, and was the base of the Carthaginian army under Hamilcar Barca in the First Punic War. The central seat of the cult of the goddess Venus (Greek, Aphrodite), it had a temple of which the ruins may still be seen. Fortification walls, some having Phoenician inscriptions, are also preserved.

Esquiline Hill (es'kwi-lin, -lin). [Latin, Mons Esquilinus.] Central hill of the three which form the E side of the group of Seven Hills of ancient Rome. It lies between the Viminal on the N and the Caelian on the S, and E of the Palatine. It is divided from E to W by a depression. On the part to the N, called the Mons Cespicius, stands the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore; on that to the S, the Mons Oppius, rise the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli and the Baths of Titus. Here, too, were the houses of Horace, Vergil, and Propertius. Between the Esquiline and the Palatine stands the Flavian Amphitheater ("Colosseum").

Eteocles (ē-tē'ō-klēz). In Greek legend, a son of Oedipus and Jocasta. When Oedipus learned that he had killed his own father and produced children by his own mother he blinded himself in despair. According to some accounts, his sons Eteocles and Polynices shut him away to hide the shame of their family; others say they banished him. Still others say his sons gave him a slave's portion of a sacrificial victim. For one of these reasons Oedipus laid a curse on his sons: that they should divide their inheritance by the sword. After Oedipus left Thebes Eteocles and Polynices agreed to rule the kingdom by turns. Eteocles, being the elder, was first to rule. When his term was ended he refused to give up the throne, on the grounds of Polynices' violent character, and banished him. Polynices fled to Argos and enlisted the aid of Adrastus to lead an expedition against Thebes to recover the throne. This was the famous, ill-fated expedition of the Seven against Thebes. Eteocles mustered his forces within the city to meet the attack. He assigned one Theban chieftain to each of the seven gates of Thebes actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ġ as d or j, š as s or sh, ṭ as t or ch, z as z or zh.

which were being attacked by the seven leaders of the enemy forces. When only three of the attacking Argives remained, the others having been killed, Eteocles and Polynices met in single combat to decide which should have the throne. They fought furiously and in the end slew each other, thus carrying out the curse which Oedipus had laid on his sons. The attackers then fled and Thebes was safe. Creon, uncle of Eteocles, succeeded to the throne. He commanded that Eteocles, as the valiant defender of the city, be given full funeral honors. But as for Polynices, who had treacherously attacked his home city, Creon commanded that his body be flung outside the walls to become the prey of scavenger birds.

Eteoclus (ē-tē'ō-klus). In Greek legend, an Argive, the son of Iphis. According to some accounts, he was one of the Seven against Thebes and perished in the attack on the city.

Ethiopia (ē-thi-ō'pi-a). [Also: Aethiopia, Axumite Kingdom.] In ancient geography, a country S of Egypt, corresponding to the kingdom of Meroe, from the neighborhood of Khartoum N to Egypt. In a more extended sense it comprised Nubia, the N part of modern Ethiopia, Sennar, and Kordofan. It was closely connected with Egypt. Conquered by Egyptian kings of the XIIth Dynasty, lost in the period of the Hyksos, and reconquered under the XVIIIth Dynasty, it remained with Egypt until after the XXth Dynasty. An Ethiopian founded the XXVth Egyptian Dynasty. The Greeks visited the country in the middle 7th century B.C. and gradually extended their relations with the inhabitants. In the 1st century A.D. a powerful Ethiopian state, with Axum as its capital, arose and remained powerful until far into the Byzantine era.

Etna (et'nā). [Italian, Monte Etna, (Sicilian) Mongibello.] Chief mountain in Sicily, and the highest volcano in Europe, situated in the E part of the island. Elevation, about 10,758 feet. See Aetna.

Etruria (ē-trō'ri-a). In ancient geography, a division of Italy which extended along the Mediterranean, and was separated from Umbria, the Sabine territory, and Latium by the Tiber, and from Liguria by the Apennines. It nearly corresponds to modern Tuscany. It contained a confederation of 12 cities. The Etruscans developed as a great naval power, influential in N and C Italy, and had possessions on the Po and in Campania. Etruscan kings ruled at an early time at Rome (probably until c500 B.C.). The Etruscans were defeated by Syracuse in a naval battle in 474 B.C., and suffered from the invasion of the Gauls c400 B.C. Veii was lost to Rome in 396 B.C. Defeat by Rome at the Vadimonian Lake in 283 B.C. was followed by the fall of Tarquinii and the other Etrurian cities. In the Aeneid, Etruria is named as a land whose people were in rebellion against the cruelty of Mezentius, a former ruler. He was given asylum by Turnus and the Etrurians were up in arms and massed for war to recover Mezentius, but a seer had told them they must wait for a foreign commander. For this reason they welcomed Aeneas when he appealed to them for aid in his war against Turnus, and joined with him.

Etruscans (ē-trus'kanz). [Also: Etrurians.]

The people of ancient Etruria, a region in Italy corresponding to what is now Tuscany and part of Umbria. Exactly who or what these people were has never been satisfactorily determined. Their inscriptions have never been completely deciphered; only the proper names emerge with certainty; and their language still defies sure classification. It was entirely different from the language of their predecessors in the region. That it is not Indo-European is the consensus to date; the alphabet resembles the Greek and Phoenician. Several theories as to the origin of the Etruscans have been advanced: 1) the Greek historian Dionysius of Halicarnassus thought that they were the original inhabitants of Italy; 2) Herodotus said that during a famine in Lydia the current king divided his people into two groups, one group to remain in Lydia, the other to emigrate under the leadership of his son Tyrrhenus. The emigrants went first to Smyrna to build ships, and from there to the land of the Umbrians, where they settled, built towns, and called themselves Tyrrhenians; 3) Livy proposed that they came from invading Alpine peoples, probably the Rhaetians. The most recent specialists in Etruscan ethnology and archeology corroborate Herodotus, insofar as it is now believed that the Etruscans entered Italy in the 9th century B.C. from the sea, were probably from Asia Minor, subdued the Umbrians, and built a number of fortified towns which were eventually unified into a powerful state. That they came from the north is now a discredited theory, because archaeologists are satisfied that they entered Italy from the sea and that the northernmost of their settlements were the latest to be founded. Flinders Petrie believed in their Asiatic origin because their weights were unlike those in use throughout the Mediterranean region, but seemed related to those of India.

A new era of culture began with them, the most advanced in Italy before Roman arms overwhelmed it. The Etruscans were skilled ironworkers and bronze-workers, active traders, and their products were sought and bought not only by the Greeks, but even trickled into the area of what is now Germany, France, and Spain through the trade routes and passes. The Etruscans imported as assiduously as they exported, and many an "Etruscan" objet d'art has since been proved to be an imported piece of Greek workmanship. The greatest similarity between Etruscan and Greek art, however, lies in the fact that both arts derived from the same Eastern sources. The Etruscan peculiarity of style, reflecting both Asiatic and Egyptian influence, distinguishes their early productions; later Greek influence predominates and finally supersedes their own. The Etruscans are especially noted for their characteristic polygonal town walls (sometimes called Cyclopean) and their cupolaed sepulchers (also called tower-tombs). The sepulcher paintings depict a high level of life: banquets, dancers, musicians, races, wrestling matches, hunting scenes. Silver and gold objects and carved gems were found in the tombs, where the findings also reveal that these people were advanced in dentistry (artificial teeth, gold crowns, etc., bear testimony to this). They are much noted also for their black bochero pottery and terra-cotta vases and figurines. Of their twelve cities Tarquinii (modern Tarquinia) is noted for its tombs and tomb paintings. Caere (modern Cervetri) is noted for its necropolis; Veii (modern Veio) for its sculptures. Vetulonia is famous as one of the oldest Etruscan settlements. Clusium (modern Chiusi) was the stronghold of the king Lars Porsena, and is noted for its tombs. Cosa, Volterra, Perugia were among the other cities. By the 6th century B.C. the Etruscans had crossed the Apennines and founded Felsina (now Bologna). By the 5th century B.C. their expansion, power, and civilization was at its height. The Greeks repeatedly tried to curb Etruscan expansion and power, but it was the Romans who finally first halted them in the 5th century B.C. They became weakened by Gallic invasions, and after the Romans captured Veii (396 B.C.) the rest of the cities succumbed. Etruscan culture made its mark on Roman culture during the first two centuries of the Roman hold, throughout Latium especially. But as the Roman powers strengthened, Etruscan civilization weakened, and by the 1st century B.C. had disappeared.

Euaechme (ū-ēk'mē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Megareus, king of Megara. Alcathous won her for his wife by slaying a lion. She was the mother of Periboea.

Euboea (ū-bē'ā). [Modern Greek, Evvoia; Italian, Negroponte; Turkish, Egripo; sometimes in English, Negropont.] Largest island belonging to Greece, in the Aegean Sea. It lies E of Phocis, Boeotia, and Attica, from which it is separated by the strait of Euripus. It is traversed by mountains, Delphi reaching the height of 5725 feet. The chief towns in ancient times were Chalcis and Eretria. It was subdued by Athens after the Persian wars. Length, about 98 miles; greatest width, about 30 miles.

Euboea. In ancient geography, a Greek city of Sicily, situated on the coast N of Syracuse. The city was abandoned after most of its inhabitants were moved to Syracuse by the tyrant Gelon (485 B.C.), and its exact location is now uncertain.

Eubuleus (ū-bū'lē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Trochilus, priest of Argos who fled to Eleusis. He was the brother of Triptolemus and, some say, of Eumolpus, a shepherd. Some say Eubuleus was an oracular swineherd (his name means "good counsel"). He was feeding his animals in the fields one day when suddenly the earth parted and engulfed one of his swine. Almost at once a chariot drawn by black horses appeared, and before it too disappeared into the chasm, Eubuleus saw in the chariot a girl tightly clasped in the arms of a stranger. Eubuleus told Triptolemus of this sight, and he in turn gave the information to Demeter when she came searching for her lost daughter Persephone. In commemoration of the service of Eubuleus to Demeter live swine were hurled into a chasm in his honor at the festival of the Thesmophoria at Eleusis.

Eubulides (ū-bū'li-dēz). Greek philosopher of the Megarian school. He was born in Miletus and was active in the 4th century B.C. He wrote a satire against Aristotle and is said to have taught Demosthenes oratory and the art of disputation.

Eubulus (ū-bū'lus). Athenian statesman; fl. middle of the 4th century B.C. He was in charge of the Theoric Fund from 354 to perhaps 346 B.C. This fund consisted originally of surplus revenues of the state that were devoted to religious purposes, such as paying for the seats of the poor at the dramatic festivals. By the time of Eubulus the manager of the Theoric Fund was in effect the financial minister of Athens. Eubulus filled the office extremely ably. At a time when Athens was weak and the power of Macedon was growing Eubulus favored a policy of peace with Philip II of Macedon. Nevertheless, he sent a force to rescue the Phocians when Philip defeated them (351 B.C.) and prepared to march through the Pass of Thermopylae. Philip withdrew. Eubulus was an opponent of Demosthenes, who continually urged the Athenians to destroy Philip before his power became too great. After the fall of Olynthus (348 B.C.) which the Athenians had not arrived in time to save, Eubulus was compelled by the pressure of public opinion to send envoys to the cities of the Peloponnese for the purpose of organizing united resistance to Philip. In this case Eubulus acted against his own policy, which continued to be one of peace with Philip, the effort to organize resistance failed, and he bluntly told the Athenians they must accept Philip's terms for peace (346 B.C.). A peace was made, but because of the inflammatory speeches of Demosthenes against the envoys who had agreed to it Eubulus lost some of his influence.

Eubulus. Greek Middle Comedy poet of the early 4th century B.C. He wrote mythological burlesques or parodies of tragedies. Fragments of the 100 or more pieces attributed to him survive.

Euchenor (ū-kē'nôr). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Corinthian, the son of the seer, Polyidus. On learning from his father that he would die worn out by affliction if he stayed home, or be overcome by the Trojans if he went to war, he chose to join the Greeks in the war against Troy. His father's prophecy was fulfilled: he was slain by Paris.

Euchidas (ū'ki-das). According to Plutarch, a Plataean runner. After the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), the oracle at Delphi commanded that all the fires of Greece, which had been polluted by the barbarians (Persians), must be extinguished, and new fires kindled from the sacred fire at Delphi. The Plataeans extinguished their fires and sent Euchidas to Delphi to fetch new fire. He ran to Delphi, purified himself, put a laurel crown on his head, took fire from the sacred altar and returned with it to Plataea on the same day. Arrived at Plataea, having covered a journey of 1000 furlongs (125 miles) in one day, he saluted his companions, delivered the fire, and fell dead. The Plataeans buried him in the temple of Artemis Eucleia.

Euclid (ū'klid). Greek mathematician and physicist, active at Alexandria, c323-285 B.C. His systematization of the mathematical knowledge of his time remains to this day a basis for the teaching of elementary geometry. Despite the tremendous importance of this contribution, very little is definitely known about the man himself. He was probably trained in the Academy at Athens after the time of Plato, but several decades before the time of Archimedes. An Alexandrian scholar of the period has written that he was unassuming and of a notably mild temper, although by no means servile (according to one account, when he was asked by the reigning Egyptian king if there was not some easier way than his to learn geometry, he replied: "There is no royal road to geometry"). The type of man suggested by this fragmentary information is surely no humble slave, but a true scientist, and this conjecture is supported by the fact that much of the material in the 13 books of The Elements was probably original with him, and that the work as a whole is a synthesis of the highest order in the elaboration of which there is clear evidence of considerable genius. The formulation of the postulates (and more particularly, of the fifth postulate) was due to Euclid alone (and the many attempts since to prove the fifth postulate is an indirect tribute, surely, to his wisdom). In addition to this, Euclid discovered the earliest theorems of the theory of numbers (leaving aside some undatable Pythagorean knowledge) and fundamental principles of geometrical optics (including laws of reflection and propagation of light in straight lines).

Euclid's best-known work is, of course, The Elements, in 13 books (of which the first six are the ones chiefly used in introductory geometry). The translation of this, with commentary, by Thomas L. Heath (3 vols., 1908) is generally considered by historians of science to be not only the best one now existing in English, but one of the best ever to be made in any language. Among Euclid's other works are The Pseudaria (which are now lost, but are known to have been exercises in elementary geometry), The Data (also exercises, but in its modern form showing some deviation from that with which Euclid's contemporaries were familiar), The Porisms (three books which are now, and very unfortunately, no longer extant, but are known to have dealt with higher geometry), The Phaenomena (a treatise on astronomy or, more precisely, on spherical geometry), The Optics (although attribution of this to Euclid has been disputed by some authorities), and probably also various writings on musical theory.

Euclid of Megara (meg'a-ra). Greek philosopher, born probably in Megara, in the middle of the 5th century B.C. He was a friend and disciple of Socrates and the founder of the Megarian school. He tried unsuccessfully to combine Eleatic monism with Socrates' ethical teaching.

Eudemus of Rhodes (ū-dē'mus; rōdz). Greek philosopher of the 4th century B.C. He was a friend and student of Aristotle. He wrote on astronomy and mathematics, but only fragments of his works have come down to us. He edited the Metaphysics of Aristotle and his Physics, and is believed to have edited Eudemian Ethics, which is intended to be a summary of Aristotle's lectures on ethics rather than an original work. Eudemus interprets his master's doctrines theologically, making reason a divine element in man's nature. Some of his lost works, quoted by later writers, are histories of arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy, and treatises on logic and rhetoric.

Eudorus (ū-dōr'us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Polymela and Hermes, and a foster son of Echeclus who later married Polymela. He was a commander of the Myrmidons and accompanied Patroclus when Achilles gave Patroclus permission to join the battle against the Trojans.

Eudoxus of Cnidus (ū-dok'sus; nī'dus). Greek astronomer, geometer, and physician. He was born c409 B.C. and died c356 B.C. He is said to have been the first to introduce the use of the celestial globe into Greece, to have improved the approximation of the length of the year, and to have adduced the fact that the altitude of the stars changes with the latitude as a proof of the sphericity of the earth.

Eudoxus of Cyzicus (siz'i-kus). Greek navigator, born at Cyzicus, in Asia Minor, and active in the late 2nd century B.C. He was in the service of Ptolemy Euergetes II of Egypt, for whom, after 146 B.C., he made two voyages to explore the Arabian Sea. He later went to Cádiz, after leaving the Egyptian king, to lead an expedition to circumnavigate Africa. According to Strabo, he traveled southward along the west African coast, after which all trace of him is lost.

Euemerus (ū-ē'mēr-us, ū-em'er-us). See Euhemerus.

Eugaeon (ū-jē'on). An Ionian chronicler from the island of Samos, active in the latter part of the 6th century B.C.

Eugammon (ū'gā-mon). Greek cyclic poet of Cyrene, who was active c566 B.C. He was the author of the Telegonia, which tells how Telegonus, son of Circe and Odysseus, sailed off in search of his father, unwittingly killed him, and married Penelope. He took Penelope and Telemachus to Circe's island, where they were made immortal by the enchantress. In Eugammon's work Telemachus marries Circe and Telegonus marries Penelope.

Euhemerus (ū-hē'mēr-us, ū-hem'ēr-us). [Also: Euemerus, Evemerus.] Greek mythographer of the second half of the 4th century B.C. He wrote a travel novel, the Sacred History, in which he gave a rationalistic explanation of current mythology. Euhemerus claimed that mythology was simply human history distorted, that the gods were originally men whose exploits had been twisted and magnified with time, and that the events of mythology could be explained as historical occurrences. He found a tomb in Crete bearing the inscription "Zeus, son of Cronos," which seemed to him to support his theory that the gods were only mortals who had come to be worshiped for their deeds by their superstitious or, in some cases, grateful, fellow mortals. Euhemerism, as this approach to mythology is still called, still finds its occasional supporters. At the time Euhemerus propounded his theory he was simply extending the current skeptical-scientific approach to matters which until that time had been accepted without question.

Euippe (ū-ip'ē). According to legend, a daughter of Daunus, king of Daunia in Italy. She married Diomedes, who came to her father's kingdom after the Trojan War.

Euippe. A name given to the mare into which Thea, daughter of Chiron the centaur, was transformed by Poseidon, in order to escape her father's wrath when she was about to bear a child by Aeolus. See Thea.

Eumaeus (ū-mē'us). In the Odyssey, the faithful swineherd of Odysseus. When Odysseus appeared to him, disguised as a beggar, he welcomed him and told him of his longing for the return of his gentle master. In the battle against the suitors of Penelope, Eumaeus aided Odysseus, who had by that time revealed his true identity.

Eumedes (ū-mē'dēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan herald and a man of great wealth. He had one son Dolon, and five daughters. Dolon was slain in the Trojan War.

Eumedes. A Trojan follower of Aeneas. Named in the Aeneid as the son of Dolon, famed in the Iliad as a Trojan spy who was captured and slain by Diomedes and Odysseus. Eumedes was slain by Turnus in the war with the Latins.

Eumelus (ū-mē'lus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Admetus and Alcestis and the grandson of Pheres. He was a leader of Thessalians in the Trojan War, and the possessor of remarkable horses. In the chariot race celebrating the funeral games for Patroclus Athena, who wanted Diomedes to win, shattered the yoke of Eumelus' chariot, causing it to veer sharply and hurling Eumelus to the ground. Diomedes won.

Eumelus. In the Aeneid, a Trojan who accompanied Aeneas on the flight from Troy. It was he who brought the news to Aeneas that the women had set the ships afire while the men were celebrating funeral games for Anchises in Sicily.

Eumelus. Greek epic poet of Corinth, who lived probably about the middle of the 8th century B.C. He was a member of the noble family of the Bacchiadae and is reputed to have been the author of a chronicle of Corinth, a Europia (about Dionysus), and works on Medea, the war of the Titans, and Hades, but all his works have been lost. He is sometimes spoken of as "the Corinthian Homer."

Eumenes (ū'mē-nēz). Secretary to Philip of Macedon and to Alexander the Great and one of the successors of Alexander the Great. He was born at Cardia, Thrace, c361 B.C.; and was put to death in Gabiene, Elymaïs (Elam), 316 B.C. He controlled Cappadocia, Pontus, and Paphlagonia and in the struggle for power among the Diadochi, or successors, he sided with Perdiccas against Antipater, Antigonius I, Ptolemy I, and Craterus. He defeated Craterus in 321 B.C., was defeated by Antigonius, and was betrayed by his soldiers to Antigonius. He kept the diary, the Royal Journal, of Alexander the Great which he perhaps published after Alexander's death.

Eumenes II. King of Pergamum 197-c159 B.C.; died c159 B.C. He was the eldest son of Attalus I, whom he succeeded. He cultivated the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Antiochus the Great. He was present in person at the decisive battle of Magnesia (189 B.C.), and, on the restoration of peace, was rewarded by the addition of the Thracian Chersonese, Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia to his kingdom.

He was a patron of learning, and founded at Pergamum one of the famous libraries of antiquity.

Eumenides (ū-men'i-dēz). Euphemistic name, meaning "the gracious (or kindly) ones," for the Erinyes in Greek mythology.

Eumenides, The. A drama by Aeschylus, the third in his Oresteian trilogy which won first prize in 458 B.C. In it the end of the curse on the House of Atreus and the establishment by Athena of a new order of justice founded on law rather than vengeance is treated.

The first scene is before the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Curtains conceal the shrine. The priestess invokes the gods and enters the shrine. She shrieks with terror and immediately reappears. She describes the loathsome Furies and the blood-stained suppliant she has found within and, horrified at this pollution of the shrine, withdraws. The curtains of the shrine are parted and reveal Orestes sitting by the altar and the black-robed Furies asleep on the floor. But now the shining figure of Apollo, flanked by Hermes, is also seen in the shrine. Apollo assures Orestes that he is his constant guardian. Although the Furies will continue to pursue him, he tells Orestes to take advantage of their present slumber to fly to the temple of Athena in Athens. There he must ask the goddess for a trial. He himself, who first commanded Orestes to slay his mother, will be his defender and will secure his deliverance from the avenging Furies. Orestes departs, under the protection of Hermes. The ghost of Clytemnestra now comes and accuses the Furies, to whom she had so often made libations, of allowing Orestes to escape. She exhorts them to awaken and pursue him, to hunt him to death for his crime in killing her, his mother, and so win honor for her in the Underworld. As the Furies rouse themselves the ghost of Clytemnestra vanishes. They see that Orestes has escaped and accuse Apollo, whom they call a younger god, of riding roughshod over the privileges of the older gods in order to save a matricide. The young gods have polluted the old justice. Orestes has sinned and must be hunted to death for it. Apollo enters and orders the Furies out of his shrine. They remind him that it is their duty and their high office to hound matricides. He asks why they didn't hound Clytemnestra for the murder of Agamemnon. That was different, they answer, Clytemnestra was not the blood kin of Agamemnon. Apollo scorns this argument as an insult to the divine marriage of Hera and Zeus, as well as to the power of Aphrodite. He accuses them of injustice in persecuting Orestes and showing leniency to his mother. Athena must judge the case, he says. The Furies answer that they will never let Orestes go, and never give up their duty and privilege of hounding the guilty.

In a new scene, a year later, Orestes enters the temple of Athena in Athens and kneels before the image of the goddess. The Furies, having tracked him down, follow him in. Nothing can save him, they say. Whoever has broken the law of reverence due to parent, god, or guest must pay the inexorable penalty. Orestes says he has long since been purified, with drops of blood and pure water poured over his hands by many friends. He calls to Athena, wherever she may be, to come in divine authority and save his soul. The Furies repeat that neither Apollo nor Athena can save him. They never trouble the man whose hands are clean, they say, but they relentlessly claim the price in blood from one who has stained his hands with blood. This was the right they had held since the time of their birth. They have no concern with immortals, but any mortal who sins will inevitably suffer at their hands. This is the divine law. Athena enters and asks why they have come. The chorus tells her they are the Furies, and that no murderer can ever find rest from their pursuit. Orestes says he has killed his mother at the command of Apollo, to avenge his father. He will leave it to the goddess to judge whether what he did was right. Athena decrees that such a serious case must be decided by the wisest citizens, and goes to the city to fetch them. The Furies are enraged that the old law and justice are being overthrown by the new gods. Henceforth, they avow, the fear which keeps men from murder will disappear if sinners are allowed to appeal to a court. The judges assemble. Athena establishes the court, admonishes the judges to reverence their oath to give justice, and opens the trial. The Furies testify first. They establish that Orestes, on the advice of Apollo, killed his mother with a sword. Clytemnestra was not punished by them for the murder of Agamemnon because he was not of her own blood—that is the law. Orestes cannot refute their evidence and calls on Apollo to defend him. The god testifies that he acted on the authority of Zeus, the supreme authority, in giving Orestes the oracle which commanded him to kill his mother; that a warrior king's death by a woman's treachery does not compare with the death of an adulterous, murdering wife; that a mother is not a true parent in the same sense as a father because she only nourishes a seed, and he points to Athena herself as proof that a mother is not necessary. In the end he promises that Orestes, whom he has sent as a suppliant to Athena, will become a faithful ally of Athens. (Apollo's weak arguments are thus further undermined by an out-and-out bribe. The Furies have at least traditional law on their side. But their idea of vengeance on the sinner coupled with the gods' injunction that a father's blood must be avenged has put Orestes into a horrible dilemma from which there seems to be no escape.) Athena proclaims that the court she has established here on the Areopagus shall henceforth constitute a judicial council to try every case of homicide that occurs in Athens. She exhorts the judges not to taint pure laws with expediency, and commands them to establish a bulwark of law to strengthen the state. She announces that in case of a tie in the vote of the 12 judges she will vote for Orestes who has been purged of his guilt through suffering. The Furies threaten dire consequences on Athens if they lose the case, but when the votes are counted it is found that they are even. Athena breaks the tie as she had said she would and Orestes is acquitted. He expresses his deep gratitude to Athena, promises eternal loyalty and friendship to Athens, and joyously departs. The Furies rage: the new gods have robbed the old of their due; they will cast a blight on Athens. Athena says the trial was fair, the even vote represents no dishonor or defeat for the Furies. She persuades them to make their home in Athens, which she prophesies will become glorious and add glory to them with the honor the people will accord them. The Furies relent and now promise great blessings on Athens. They are led to a cave on the Acropolis by a great procession which has gathered to escort them to their new home. Henceforth they will be known as the dread and kindly powers who love and guard Athens. (The fear that keeps men from wrong-doing has not been destroyed by this change in the Furies, but a judicial procedure has been substituted for the personal vengeance which had brought generations of the House of Atreus to their doom.)

Eumolpus (ū-mol'pus). A priestly bard, reputed founder of the Eleusinian mysteries. According to the tale, he was the son of Chione, granddaughter of King Erechtheus of Athens, and Poseidon. In fear of her father's anger if he discovered she was the mother of a son, Chione cast her infant into the sea, but he was watched over by Poseidon and washed ashore in Libya. There he was brought up by Benthesisicyme, a daughter of Poseidon and Amphitrite. She gave him one of her daughters in marriage when he grew up, but when he fell in love with another of her daughters she banished him to Thrace. There he plotted against the king, Tegyrus, and, having been discovered, was compelled to flee to Eleusis. In Eleusis he became the first priest of the rites of Demeter and Dionysus, and initiated Heracles into the Mysteries of Demeter and Persephone. Being highly skilled on the lyre and flute—he won the flute contest at the funeral games for Pelias—he taught the musical arts to Heracles also. He is said to have written hymns and to have discovered the art of cultivating trees and vines. The upright life he led in Eleusis caused King Tegyrus to forgive him for his earlier conspiracy, and he made Eumolpus the heir to his throne. When war broke out between Eleusis and Athens, Eumolpus, who had by now inherited the throne of Thrace, led a band of Thracians against Athens and claimed the throne for himself as Poseidon's son. In the war the Athenians, under Ion, won and the Eleusinians, by the treaty of peace which was then concluded, became subject to Athens in all respects except that they retained control of the sacred Mysteries of Eleusis. Eumolpus was slain in battle by his great-grandfather Erechtheus, and was succeeded as priest of Demeter by his son. To avenge the slaying of Eumolpus,

Poseidon hurled his trident at Erechtheus and killed him, or, as some say, he appealed to Zeus to slay him with his thunderbolt. The family of the Eumolpidae were hereditary priests of Demeter at Eleusis.

Eumolpus. In Greek mythology, a flute-player of Colonaë. He swore that Tenes, son of King Cynus, had made improper advances to Phylome, wife of Cynus and step-mother of Tenes. The evidence he presented was a lie, and when later Cynus learned that he had sworn falsely he ordered Eumolpus to be killed. Because of Eumolpus, no flute-player was ever allowed to set foot in the sacred precincts of the temple on the island of Tenedos.

Euneus (ū-nē'us). In Greek legend, a son of Jason and Hypsipyle. He lived in Lemnos, where his brother Thoas was king. He and Thoas rescued their mother, who had been sold into slavery by the Lemnian women, from Lycurgus of Nemea. When Lycaon, Priam's son, was captured by Achilles, Euneus bought him for a silver bowl. Later, Euneus supplied the Greeks at Troy with wine from Lemnos.

Eunomia (ū-nō'mi-ā). One of the Horae, goddesses of the seasons and of nature. She was Order.

Eunomus (ū-nō-mus) or Ennomus (en'ō-). In Greek legend, a youth in the household of Oeneus, father of Deianira. Heracles cuffed him for carelessness when he was pouring water over the hero's hands before a feast. The blow was heavier than Heracles intended and killed the lad. In remorse, Heracles took Deianira and went into exile at Trachis.

Eupatridae (ū-pat'ri-dē). The landowning aristocracy in ancient Athens (Attica), as distinguished from the Georgi, or peasants, and the Demiurgi, or artisans. On the abolition of royalty they found themselves in exclusive possession of political rights. Their privilege was gradually curtailed, notably by Solon (594 B.C.) and Cleisthenes (509 B.C.), until in the time of Pericles Athens was transformed into a pure democracy.

Euphemus (ū-fē'mus). In Greek legend, a son of Poseidon and Europa (daughter of Tityus). From his father he had the gift of being able to skim across the sea so swiftly his feet were hardly dampened. He was a member of the Calydonian Hunt and went from Taenarus to join Jason on the expedition of the Argo to Colchis. He released the dove which prepared the way for the Argo through the Symplegades (Clashing Rocks). When the Argonauts were driven to the Tritonian Lake in Libya, Euphemus persuaded Triton to help them back to the sea. Triton gave him a clod of earth as a guest-gift, and because of this the descendants of Euphemus gained sovereignty over Libya. Euphemus, either in obedience to a dream or on the advice of Medea, cast it into the sea and the island of Calliste (Thera), afterward the home of his son, rose from it. Battus, who was born there, later founded Cyrene in Libya.

Euphorbus (ū-fôr'bus). In Greek legend, a Trojan, the son of Panthous. According to some accounts it was he who killed Protesilaus, the first Greek to leap ashore at Troy. It was he, too, who was the first to wound Patroclus when he attacked the walls of Troy and was stunned by a blow from Apollo. Immediately afterward Hector delivered the death blow to Patroclus, and in the struggle for possession of his body Euphorbus was slain by Menelaus and stripped of his armor. Menelaus dedicated the shield of the brave Euphorbus in the temple of Hera, near Mycenae. Pythagoras, who expounded the theory of metempsychosis, professed to be animated by the soul of Euphorbus, who in his turn was animated by the soul of the Argonautic herald and son of Hermes, Aethalides.

Euphorion (ū-fō'ri-on). According to some accounts, a son of Helen and Achilles, born after Achilles became a shade on the Islands of the Blest. He fled from Zeus, who loved him, and was slain by a thunderbolt.

Euphorion. Greek poet who lived in the middle of the 5th century B.C. He was the son of the tragedian Aeschylus. After his father's death, according to Suidas, he exhibited some of his unproduced works and won four prizes. Tragedies from his own hand were also produced with some success, so much so that he is said to have defeated Sophocles and Euripides in 431 B.C.

Euphorion. Greek poet and writer. He was born c276 B.C., at Chalcis in Euboea, and died in Syria, where he was librarian at the court of Antiochus the Great, c200 B.C. He wrote epics, elegies, and epigrams on many subjects, including mythology and history, and, with Callimachus and Philetas, was one of the chief exponents of the Greek elegy in the Alexandrian manner. This literary style, of great beauty and learning, greatly influenced later Roman poets. Only scanty fragments of his work survive.

Euphranor (ū-frā'nôr). Greek painter and sculptor in bronze and marble. He was born near Corinth, Greece, and was active in the middle of the 4th century B.C. His treatises on symmetry and color were much used by Pliny in the compilation of the 35th book of his Natural History. Lucian ranks his sculpture with that of Phidias, Alcámenes, and Myron, and his painting with that of Apelles, Parrhasius, and Aëtion. One of his most celebrated statues was of Paris, the lover of Helen.

Euphrates (ū-frā'tēz). [Arabic, Al Furat; Armenian, Yeprad; Assyrian, Purattu; Hebrew, Perath; Turkish, Frat; Old Persian, Ufrates.] Great Mesopotamian river which has its origin in the Armenian mountains in NE Turkey. It is formed from the East Euphrates (Murad-Su), which rises NE of Erzurum, and a branch rising NW of Lake Van. The united river then makes a wide circuit W, breaks through the mountain chain of the Taurus, enters the terrace region at Birecik, and turns in a meandering course toward the Tigris. In the neighborhood of Baghdad these two rivers approach one another, and there the Babylonian canal system begins. In its lower course, below the site of Babylon, the Euphrates has changed its bed, shifting more and more westward. According to notices in classical authors, confirmed by the inscriptions, it came in ancient times nearer Sippara (Sepharvaim, modern Abu-Habba) and Erech (modern Warka) than now; and it did not empty into the sea, united with the Tigris, through the Shatt el-Arab, as at present. As late as the time of Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) and his successors, the twin rivers flowed separately into the Persian Gulf, which extended then at least as far as the ancient city of Eridu, known to have been a seaport. Babylon has been rightly termed "the gift of Euphrates and Tigris." The soil is formed from the alluvial deposits of these rivers, and this formation still continues. During the winter months the Euphrates has but little water in its bed; but in the spring, and especially toward the summer solstice, it swells by the melting of the snow of the mountains, which often causes disastrous floods.

Euphronius (ū-frō'ni-us). Celebrated Athenian potter and vase-painter in the red-figure style, active at the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 5th centuries B.C. Five vessels signed by him as the painter and twelve signed by him as the potter are extant. A calyx crater (Louvre) signed by him as the painter shows Heracles wrestling Antaeus. The inside of a kylix (Munich), c510 B.C., is decorated with a figure of a youthful horseman. Inscribed near the figure of the young rider is the name Leagus. Heracles slaying the triple-bodied Geryon is shown on one side of the outside of the cup, and the cattle of Geryon on the other. An inscription reads, "Chachrylion made, Euphronius painted." Another red-figured vessel by Euphronius (British Museum) shows Eurystheus taking refuge in his brazen vessel as Heracles attempts to deliver the Erymanthian boar to him. The exploits of Heracles and Theseus were favorite subjects in the paintings of Euphronius, and on the whole he favored the larger vessels—craters and amphorae—for his heroic subjects. It may be that Euphronius gave up painting for potting, for the vessels signed by him as potter are of somewhat later date than those signed by him as painter. The paintings on these vessels have been assigned to Onesimus, the Panaetius Painter, and the Pistoxenus Painter. Fifty-nine cups have been attributed to Onesimus, some of which were thrown by Euphronius. Of the 41 vessels attributed to the Panaetius Painter, six were signed by Euphronius as potter. They include a kylix (Louvre) with a scene showing Theseus and Amphitrite under the sea, whither Theseus had gone to recover King Minos' ring. Eighteen works have been attributed to the Pistoxenus Painter, most of whose work comes somewhat after the time of Euphronius. One of the loveliest of these, in technique and feeling, is a white-ground cup interior (British Museum) showing Aphrodite riding a goose.

Another of his masterpieces is a cup (Athens) showing the death of Orpheus.

Euploia (ū-ploi'a). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of the sea, meaning "Fair Voyage," or "Giver of Prosperous Voyages."

Eupolemia (ū'pō-lē-mī'a). According to some accounts, a daughter of Myrmidon of Phthia, and the mother, by Hermes, of the Argonaut Aethalides.

Eupolis (ū'pō-lis). Greek comic poet, born at Athens c445 B.C. He and his great contemporary and rival, Aristophanes, were among the first to give artistic form to the Old Comedy. They shaped the hitherto isolated farcical fragments into a plot and toned down or abolished the phallic element in Old Comedy. Their influence caused Comedy to develop rapidly. Eupolis is said to have presented his first piece at the age of 17, and to have won seven victories in his lifetime. He wrote political comedy, as did Aristophanes, in which he attacked, with graceful satire, the leaders of his day. According to some accounts, he drowned (411 B.C.) in the Hellespont in the course of a battle, and his death was said to have led to a ruling that professional poets would henceforth be exempt from military service. The titles and fragments of 15 of his pieces remain.

Eupompus (ū-pom'pus). Greek painter, born at Sicyon, Greece, and active in the 4th century B.C. He was the founder of the so-called Sicyonian school of painting. The work of Eupompus and his successor Pamphilus was to introduce the characteristics of Doric sculpture into painting.

Euripides (ū-rip'i-dēz). Athenian dramatic poet; with Aeschylus and Sophocles one of the great triad of Greek tragic writers. According to one tradition he was born on the Greek island of Salamis, whence his parents had fled from Athens on the invasion of Xerxes, on the very day of the great battle and victory of Salamis, 480 B.C. Others say he was born in a village of Attica, perhaps as early as 484 B.C. He died in Macedonia, 406 B.C. He was the son of Mnesarchus, of a middle-class, land-holding family. The comic poets claimed that Cleito, his mother, was a greengrocer, and that moreover her greens were bad. This was a goad they invented to plague Euripides, who appears to have had an exceptionally close relation with his mother, for she was actually of a noble family. Because his parents had received an oracle that he would win crowns of victory he was given careful gymnastic training as a youth, and did indeed win athletic victories at Athens and Eleusis. As a young man he served in the army in the frontier forts. He also held a position in the ceremonies of worship of Delphian Apollo. He was a disciple of Anaxagoras, the natural philosopher who was a friend of Pericles and was later banished from Athens for impiety, and studied rhetoric under Prodicus and Protagoras, the foremost Sophists of his day. He enjoyed a lifelong friendship with Socrates, of whom it was said that he never went to the theater except to see a play of Euripides. The influence of his sophistic training, which consisted of a search for "wisdom" (sophia, wisdom), and a rationalistic approach to religion, politics, and society, accounts to some extent for the highly intellectual quality characteristic of his work. The comic poets, for whom he was a ceaselessly interesting target, claimed that he divorced his first wife because of her sluttishness and took a second who was no better. The fact seems to be that he married once only, lived harmoniously with his wife, and had three sons by her. In his working adult life he avoided society and political life, withdrew to his estate on Salamis, and there, in a cave looking out over the sea, produced his dramas. About 408 B.C., harried at home as a traitor because he opposed the war party, and as dangerous because he questioned the traditional religious beliefs, and even suspected of immorality because of the speeches he put into the mouths of the characters in his plays, he left Athens and went into voluntary exile. He went first to Magnesia, near Ephesus in Asia Minor, where he had once served in an official post. Then, by invitation, he went to the court of King Archelaus of Macedonia. There he moved in the congenial company of Agathon the tragedian, Timotheus the musician, Zeuxis the painter, and perhaps Thucydides the historian. After 18 months he died (406

B.C.) at the Macedonian court (according to doubtful tradition being torn to pieces by a pack of hounds set upon him by two rival poets, Arrhidaeus and Crateuas), and was buried with great pomp by Archelaus, who refused a request of the Athenians for his remains.

The number of works produced by Euripides is variously given as 75, 78, and 92. Of these, 18 are extant in relatively complete form; a 19th, Rhesus, is sometimes attributed to him, and fragments of about 60 others are extant. In his lifetime he was awarded the first prize in dramatic contests four times. After his death his son produced Iphigenia in Aulis (405 B.C.), and it was awarded first prize. In 455 B.C. he presented his first tetralogy, fragments of which remain. It included Peliades, about the daughters of Pelias who slew their father, duped by Medea into thinking that by their action they would restore his lost youth. In 442 or 441 B.C. he won his first victory with a play now unknown. The other early works, of unknown date, were Cyclops, the only complete satyr-play to have survived, and Rhesus. The latter is generally considered to be spurious, but may have been an early play by Euripides that was worked over by later writers. It treats an incident from the Iliad, in which Rhesus, a Thracian chieftain, is murdered by Odysseus and Diomedes. Besides Cyclops, his extant works are: Alcestis (438 B.C.), Medea (431 B.C.), Hippolytus (428 B.C.), Andromache, Hecuba (425 B.C.), The Suppliant Women (c420 B.C.), The Children of Heracles (430 B.C.?), The Madness of Heracles (c416 B.C.), Ion (between 413 and 408 B.C.), The Trojan Women (c415 B.C.), Electra (c413 B.C.), Iphigenia in Tauris, Helen (c412 B.C.), The Phoenician Maidens (c409 B.C.), Orestes (408 B.C.), Iphigenia in Aulis (produced 405 B.C.), and The Bacchae (also produced after his death, 405 B.C.). (See separate entries under these titles.) All the works are based on myths or the heroes of legend, as was required of the dramas presented at the religious festivals. In his subject matter, therefore, Euripides was limited, but in his treatment of it he struck out in all directions. He departed from tradition by applying a realistic attitude to material hitherto sanctified by tradition. He adhered to the form but did violence to the content in a manner that jolted his audience. Alcestis took the place of the usual satyr-play in a tetralogy which included the lost plays the Cressae (Cretan Women), Alcmaeon in Psophis, and Telephus. It treats the legend of Admetus, who can avoid death only if he finds someone who is willing to die in his place. An appeal to his aged parents, already near death, is unavailing. Only his devoted wife Alcestis is willing to make the sacrifice. As a satyr-play Alcestis has its moments of humor, as in the antics of the drunken Heracles, but Euripides threw it out of perspective for the Athenians by pointing out the utter selfishness and egotism of Admetus in allowing his wife to die for him. Medea has been called one of the greatest masterpieces of Greek tragedy. It portrays the awful revenge Medea takes on Jason when, after she had saved him from the death her father had plotted and betrayed her home and her country for his sake, he announces that he is going to abandon her to marry the daughter of the king of Corinth. Medea's revenge is to bring death to his intended wife and her father, and to slay her own and Jason's children. The tragedy has been variously characterized as an example of the lengths to which love betrayed will drive a woman, and as an example of the havoc that is wrought in a so-called civilized society by a passion that is immune to civilizing influences. At the same time, Jason, traditionally regarded as a great hero, appears as a pompous, calculating, despicable hypocrite. Hippolytus, which won first prize, tells of Phaedra's love for her husband's son Hippolytus, and the death and disaster it brought in its train. It advances the thesis that single-minded devotion to one principle can be ruinous, as was Hippolytus' devotion to the chaste goddess Artemis and his denial of the power of Aphrodite. The date of the Andromache is unknown, but it is thought to have been produced about the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, as a political play aimed at the Spartans. In it Andromache, princess of Troy and widow of Hector, appears as the concubine of Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, the slayer of her husband. Hermione, daughter of Helen and Menelaus and the wife of Neoptolemus, seeks to destroy Andromache and her son by Neoptolemus, on the ground that Andromache has bewitched her and caused her to be childless. The Spartans, Hermione and Menelaus, speak scornfully of the Trojans as barbarians, but by their own words convict themselves of barbarity. Hecuba describes the transformation of the noble queen of Troy into a maddened beast through suffering. The Children of Heracles, a patriotic drama, is about a war that Athens, as a humane and enlightened city, undertook to protect the rights of suppliants. In another patriotic drama, The Suppliant Women, Athens again appears as the champion of the oppressed. Here the suppliants are the mothers of those who fell in the Expedition of the Seven against Thebes. The Thebans defied all the laws of warfare and religion by refusing permission to the Argives to recover the bodies of their dead for burial. The Argive women appealed to the Athenians who, at the cost of war to themselves, recovered the bodies of the fallen, gave them honorable burial, and upheld the sanctity of the law. The play was looked upon as a plea for peace with Sparta and for alliance with Argos. In The Madness of Heracles, Athens, personified by Theseus, again is shown in an idealized light: Theseus refuses to deny his aid and sympathy to Heracles after the latter has, in a fit of madness sent by the gods, slain his wife and children. Instead, Theseus persuades him not to commit suicide, encourages him to shoulder the burden the gods have laid on him, and offers him a home in Athens, refuge of the oppressed. About 415 B.C., when the Athenians, with high hopes, had sent out an expedition to take Syracuse, Euripides produced the Trojan Women, probably one of the most powerful anti-war plays ever written. It portrays the capture of Troy, one of the proudest moments of Greek legendary history, in such a manner as to make it crystal-clear that though the conquered are miserable, the conquerors, brutalized by war, are despicable. It speaks volumes for the enlightened state of the Athenians that such a play could have been produced at all at such a time. Iphigenia in Tauris is a romantic exercise that tells of Iphigenia, serving as a priestess of Artemis at Tauris. Preparing for the sacrifice to the goddess of two Greeks who have been captured, she discovers that one of them is her brother Orestes. In joyous reunion they plan to flee Tauris with the ancient image of the goddess Orestes has come to fetch. With the help of Athena they escape and return to Greece. In Helen, Euripides adopts the story of Stesichorus that it was not Helen at all who was carried off to Troy by Paris, but a phantom Helen, sent by the gods. Electra treats the same material as was used by Aeschylus in his The Choëphoroe and by Sophocles in his Electra, but the emphasis of Euripides is entirely different. His Electra is a twisted character who has no natural outlet for her passions and has channeled them all into hatred of her mother, a hatred that she justifies on the ground that her murdered father must be avenged, and that she persuades her brother Orestes to share. The Phoenician Women, named for the chorus, centers on the moment in the Oedipus legend when his sons Polynices and Eteocles, through lust for power, kill each other. Orestes was the last play Euripides produced in Athens. The melodramatic sequence of events involving Electra, Orestes, Menelaus, Helen, and Hermione, defies capsule description. Two of the three plays which Euripides wrote in Macedon survive. Iphigenia in Aulis is about the trick by which Iphigenia is brought to Aulis to be sacrificed and bring favorable winds for the Greeks waiting to sail to Troy, and the specious reasoning by which Agamemnon is persuaded that he has no choice but to sacrifice his daughter, who is, however, spirited away by the gods at the last moment. The last play, The Bacchae, shows Pentheus, king of Thebes, denying the godhead of Dionysus, a new god for whom there is no tradition. For his obstinacy and doubt Dionysus causes him to be slain by his mother.

Euripides speaks to each age according to its condition. The manner of his speech, his poetry, is eternal. In his own time he was the most celebrated of the Greek poets. Yet he was not loved as Sophocles had been. The Athenians admired his poetry but rebelled when he goaded them with new concepts. With his rationalistic approach to traditional religion he seemed blasphemous, as in Ion, in which the god of light and justice is depicted as a ravisher who abandons not only his victim but, seemingly, his own son, and is too craven to appear in his own defense when the son and mother are reunited. Nothing about the play inspired reverence for the god. Hecuba prays to whatever force there is in the universe, having been abandoned by her gods. Heracles, in The Madness of Heracles, openly doubts the old tales of the gods. Euripides' close friend, Protagoras, once read his book on theology in Euripides' house. The first sentence of the book was, "In regard to the gods I cannot know that they exist, nor yet that they do not exist, for many things hinder such knowledge—the obscurity of the matter, and the shortness of human life." Euripides might have said the same, for his attitude was not one of blasphemy, or denial of the gods, nor was it a supine acceptance of traditional beliefs. It was rather, as a good sophist, one of seeking for a principle that would embrace humanity and divinity on somewhat more equal terms than appeared in the popular religion. Almost without exception his plays end with a comment to the effect that the ways of the gods are mysterious. It is not certain that such comment was irony. On the other hand, his last play, The Bacchae, shows Pentheus perishing for his denial of a new god that he could not understand, and seems to say that there is not necessarily a rationalistic explanation for all the forces that are loose in the universe; that sometimes man must accept without understanding. A characteristic of his own humanity was his championship of the weak and silent. Any number of instances can be cited where it is a shepherd, servant, slave, or messenger who makes the reasonable and just comment, and shows himself to be far superior in qualities of the soul and spirit to the men who are in positions of power over him. This was taken as an extreme of democracy by his contemporaries, and aroused their distrust. He showed kings and leaders far too often in rags, as Telephus in the lost play of that name, and Menelaus in Helen, as if to indicate the unworthiness and destined end of those who were customarily in positions of leadership. The other large class of weak and silent defended by Euripides was the women. His contemporaries considered him a woman-hater. Aristophanes' comedy, Thesmophoriazusae, is largely devoted to the schemes of the women in their annual festival to be revenged on Euripides for portraying them so unpleasantly in his plays. Modern critics consider that he often took up the cudgels on behalf of women; that he understood their problems and was sympathetic to them. Medea, driven to barbarism through passion and pride, yet points up the condition of virtual slavery in which women of Athens lived at that time, and can cry out about the suffering, incomparably greater than that endured in battle, that a woman experiences in bearing a child. Phaedra, consumed by a love she neither sought nor wanted, is more sympathetic than Hippolytus with his unrealistic purity. The virgin martyrs—Iphigenia, Macaria (Children of Heracles), Polyxena (Hecuba), are idealized maidens who could sublimate themselves and their lives in a higher cause. The results of the irresistible power of sex were taken for granted in the myths and legends. Euripides investigated the power itself, as in Medea and Phaedra, women in the grip of passion who escaped their frustration by plunging into disaster. A lost play, Aeolus, dealt with the sons and daughters of Aeolus who innocently married each other and were condemned. Another lost play, Chrysippus, had for its subject the abnormal relation between men and boys which, though accepted in fact, had not hitherto been considered as a fit subject for drama with the emphasis on sex rather than on the nobility of the relationship. Euripides would not ignore the heartlessness of the state vis-à-vis the individual. In Iphigenia in Aulis, Agamemnon as a father recoils at the idea of sacrificing his daughter, but as a commander of men on the business of the state, he orders her death; in Hecuba, as a man he would spare the Trojan queen further sufferings, but as a leader responsible for the safe return of the Greeks he adds to it by ordering the sacrifice of Polyxena on Achilles' tomb.

Two technical devices were much employed by Euripides. One was the Prologue, which served the double purpose of explaining the events that led up to the moment when the drama opened and provided a quiet base from which the intensity of the drama rose. The second device was the Deus ex machina. The technique here was to have a god or goddess appear at the end of the play to explain, reconcile, command, or prophesy. To a modern audience the appearance of the divinity seems awkwardly contrived and a great letdown. To the ancients such a letdown was desirable as a release from the tension of the drama, and as evidence of completion.

Euripides was the product and mirror of his age. His contemporaries were not quite ready to accept the clear portrait of their doubts, problems, and nascent individualism that he presented to them. He served as a model for dramatists for the next six centuries. Aristotle called him "the most tragic of poets," but complained that his plays were not well-made. Critics are virtually unanimous in acknowledging his intellectualism, his interest in dissecting and propounding an idea rather than in producing an architecturally perfect drama. His comment has timeless validity. His lines were often quoted, his language endlessly imitated, his lyricism never equalled.

Eurippa (ū-rip'ā). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "delighting in horses." Odysseus lost his mares and searched for them throughout Greece. He found them at a place in Arcadia, and there raised a sanctuary of Artemis Eurippa.

Euripus (ū-rī'pus) or Euripos (-pos.). Narrowest portion of the channel between the island of Euboea and the mainland of Greece. It was near here, at Aulis, that Agamemnon's fleet en route to Troy was stormbound and Iphigenia was sacrificed. The strait is remarkable for the force of its current and its frequent changes of direction in response to the tides. Its width at the narrowest part (opposite Chalcis) is about 120 feet.

Europa (ū-rō'pā) or Europe (-pē). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Agenor, king of Tyre, and Telephassa. She was the sister of Cadmus, Phoenix, Cilix, Thasus, and Phineus. Zeus fell in love with her and sent Hermes to lure her to the seashore. Hermes did as he was bid, and one day as she was playing with her maidens on the shore near Tyre, Zeus transformed himself into a white bull with golden horns and approached her. Europa was charmed by the creature's beauty, and, as he appeared gentle, decked his horns with wreaths of flowers. When the bull knelt before her she climbed on his back. Instantly Zeus plunged into the sea and carried the maiden on his back to Crete. There Europa bore three sons to Zeus: Minos, Rhadamanthys, and Sarpedon. When Zeus left Europa she married Asterius, the king of Crete, and since he had no children, he adopted Europa's three sons and made them his heirs. But some say that it was Greeks from Crete who raided the Phoenician shores and carried off the king's daughter, and that this was one of the causes of the ancient enmity between Greece and Asia, which culminated in the Persian Wars.

Europa or Europe. Epithet of Demeter. Some say Demeter was the nurse of Trophonius, and there was a sanctuary of Demeter Europa (Broad-faced) in the grove of Trophonius at Lebadaia.

donia, in honor of which several cities founded by the Seleucids in Asia were named. (JJ)

Europus (Dura), often called Dura-Europus. A town founded c300 B.C., probably by Seleucus I, on the right bank of the middle Euphrates, as a military colony. It became an agricultural market and district administrative center of local importance, prospered, and was heavily fortified, to be held in turn by the Parthians and the Romans, and taken by siege and destroyed by the Sassanian king Sapor c256 A.D. Identified in 1921, it was excavated by the Belgian scholar Franz Cumont in 1922-23 and by a Yale University expedition, 1928-1937. The remarkable fortifications belong probably to the second century B.C. The planning is in regular rectangular blocks, entire blocks being devoted to temples, market, or private houses. The Temple of the Palmyrene Gods, built into a corner of the fortification walls, preserved mural paintings of extraordinary interest. In the dryness of the soil, wood, leather, wool, felt, paper, cordage, and other substances usually considered perishable are preserved, and Dura-Europus has yielded important and unique documents on parchment, vellum, and papyrus, including contracts and legal codes in Greek and the military records of the 3rd century A.D. Roman garrison, in Latin. Dura-Europus has also yielded hundreds of inscriptions in Greek, Latin, and dialects of Semitic, of which a gratifyingly large number contain exact dates; a horoscope scratched on a house wall, with other evidence, made possible the reconstruction of the enneadecateris or nineteen-year lunisolar calendar cycle adopted by the Seleucids and widely employed in Asia. The nomenclature of the parchments, papyri, and inscriptions indicates a mixed population descended from the Macedonian and Greek troops of the garrison and the native community. Dura-Europus has also provided a very early Christian chapel, with wall paintings illustrating scenes from the New Testament, an unprecedented synagogue with wall paintings from the Old Testament, a shrine of the soldiers' god Mithras, and many other places of cult. The reconstruction of the events of the final siege by Sapor, not recorded in the literary sources, is a masterwork of archaeological exploration and deduction. (JJ)

Eurotas (ū-rō'tas). In mythology, son of Myles and grandson of Lelex. He ascended the throne of Laconia after the great flood, and drained the marshes caused by the flood by constructing a trench to the sea. He named the river so formed after himself. Some say he had no son of his own and left his kingdom to Lacedaemon, the son of Taygete and Zeus, and gave him his daughter Sparta for wife. And some say that in a war with the Athenians he was warned to wait until the full of the moon to commence the battle. He ignored the warning and suffered a disastrous defeat. In humiliation at this defeat he leaped into the river in Laconia, and according to some, this was why the river came to be known by his name.

Eurotas. [Modern name, Iri, Iris] In ancient geography, a river in Laconia, Greece, flowing into the Mediterranean about 25 miles SE of Sparta.

Eurus (ū'rus). The east wind.

Euryale (ū-rī'a-lē). A Gorgon, one of the daughters of Ceto and Phorcys. See Gorgons.

Euryalus (ū-rī'a-lus). In Greek legend, a son of Mecisteus of Argos. He was one of the Epigoni who successfully attacked Thebes, and he accompanied Jason on the expedition of the Argonauts. As a leader of Argives he accompanied Diomedes to Troy, where he slew many Trojans. Although a skilled boxer, he was defeated by Epeus in the boxing match during the funeral games for Patroclus.

Euryalus. In the Aeneid, a son of Opheltes. He fought at Troy and accompanied Aeneas in the flight to Italy. Euryalus was the beloved young friend of Nisus. In the war with the Rutulians in Italy, Aeneas left his camp to go for aid. The garrison was attacked and besieged. Euryalus and Nisus volunteered to try to get through the enemy lines in order to warn Aeneas. During the night the two friends slipped out of the camp. As they went through the ranks of the sleeping enemy they took the opportunity to kill many of them. Euryalus seized the plumed helmet of one of his victims and put it on his own head. This brought disaster, for the light from a watch fire flickered on the shining helmet and aroused a dozing sentry who gave the alarm. Nisus and Euryalus were separated in the ensuing mêlée, and Euryalus was slain. His head was cut off and impaled on a spear, and the Rutulians triumphantly paraded it before the walls of the beleaguered Trojan camp the next day.

Eurybates (ū-rī'ba-tēz). In the Odyssey, a companion of Odysseus who accompanied him to Troy. When Odysseus returned to Ithaca after the Trojan War and his ten years' wanderings, he went to his own palace disguised as a beggar and talked to his wife Penelope. She did not know him, as he had planned, but wanting to assure her that Odysseus still lived, he proved he had seen Odysseus by speaking of Eurybates, who had gone with him to Troy.

Eurybia (ū-ri'bī'a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pontus and Gaea. By the Titan Crius she was the mother of Astræus, Pallas, and Perses.

Eurybiades (ū-ri-bī'a-dēz). Leader of the Spartan naval contingent during the Persian War; fl. 5th century B.C. Although the Athenians furnished the most ships in the war against the Persian invaders, the Spartans and the other Greek forces refused to serve under an Athenian commander. Eurybiades was appointed commander of the united fleet of the allied Greek states, with the consent of the Athenians. Aided by furious storms, he defeated the Persians in the naval battle of Artemisium, off the N end of Euboea, 480 B.C. The Persian army swept on down through Thessaly and occupied Attica. The Greek allies of Athens wished to withdraw to the Isthmus of Corinth and there make their defense against the oncoming Persians. Themistocles persuaded Eurybiades not to withdraw to the Isthmus, but to meet the Persians in the narrow waters between the island of Salamis and the mainland, where the Greek ships would have the advantage of maneuver over the heavier Persian ships. Eurybiades was obliged to accept the strategy of Themistocles when he learned that the Greek fleet in the waters of Salamis had been blockaded by the Persians. The victory the Greeks under Eurybiades won at Salamis (480 B.C.) was decisive.

Euryclea (ū-ri-klē'a) or Euryclia (-klī'a). According to Homer (Odyssey), a daughter of Ops. She was the nurse and attendant of Telemachus, son of Odysseus, and helped him secretly to prepare for his voyage to Pylus in quest of news of his father. She promised not to tell his mother until he was well on his way. When Odysseus returned to Ithaca, disguised as a beggar, Euryclea, who had also been his nurse, thought the beggar bore a strong resemblance to Odysseus. She was ordered by Penelope to wash the beggar's feet, and as she did so she recognized an old scar on his leg and knew that the beggar was in fact Odysseus. At his hissed command—and especially in view of the fact that his hands were clasping her throat—she did not reveal his identity. Later, when he had destroyed the suitors, she told him which of his serving women and men had been loyal to him during his long absence.

Eurydamas (ū-rid'a-mas). In Greek legend, an Argonaut, who went from Ctymene, near the Xynian Lake, to join Jason on the expedition for the Golden Fleece.

Eurydamas. In Homeric legend (Iliad), an aged Trojan dream-interpreter and diviner. His sons Abas and Polyidus were slain by Diomedes.

Eurydice (ū-rid'i-sē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Adrastus. She was the wife of Ilus and the mother of Laomedon.

Eurydice. In Greek mythology, the beloved wife of Orpheus. Aristæus attacked her and as she fled from him she stepped on a snake, was bitten by it, and died. The bees of Aristæus died as a punishment to him. Orpheus, overwhelmed with grief at the loss of Eurydice, descended to Tartarus in an effort to bring her back. This was granted on a condition that Orpheus lead the way, and not look back at her until they reached daylight. They had almost reached safety when in his anxiety Orpheus looked back and Eurydice's shade was snatched away forever. Some say he was ultimately reunited with her in Tartarus and that they could be seen strolling hand in hand in the Elysian Fields. See Orpheus.

Eurydice. Named by some as the wife of Acrisius and the mother of Danaë. She was the sister of Hyacinthus. But others say Danaë's mother was Aganippe. Another Eurydice, the daughter of Pelops and Hippodamia, is named by some as the mother of Alcmena and the grandmother of Heracles.

Eurydice. Wife of Amyntas II, king of Macedonia; fl. 4th century B.C. She was the mother of Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip II of Macedon. She supported one of the Macedonian nobles, Ptolemy of Alorus, who rebelled against her son Alexander who had succeeded his father as king. Ptolemy murdered Alexander and married Eurydice.

Eurydice. Macedonian princess; daughter of Perdiccas III of Macedonia, and cousin of Alexander the Great.

Euryganeia (ū-ri-gā'ni-a, ū'ri-ga-nī'a). According to some accounts of the legend, a daughter of King Hyperphas. Some say that Jocasta did not bear children to Oedipus. They say his sons Polynices and Eteocles were the children of Euryganeia. A painting by Onasias at Plataea depicted Euryganeia grieving because her sons fought each other.

Eurylochus (ū-ril'ō-kus.) In the Odyssey, one of the companions of Odysseus on the voyage home from Troy. He led the group who went to Circe's palace but, suspecting a trick, he did not enter it with the others. As a result of his prudence he was able to return to Odysseus and inform him that his men had been turned into swine by Circe. Later in the voyage when Odysseus and his companions were stranded on the island of the Sun (Trinacria), Eurylochus persuaded the men, during an absence of Odysseus, to disobey his commands and to kill and eat the cattle of the Sun—which they had been expressly warned not to do by Circe and Odysseus. Eurylochus' argument for disregarding the warnings was that they might as well die as a result of the anger of a god as from starvation. They ate the cattle and they were later all destroyed, except Odysseus, in a great storm.

Eurylochus. Spartan commander in the Peloponnesian War; he besieged Naupactus, 426 B.C., and was driven off by the Athenian general Demosthenes. He was slain the same year in a battle near the Gulf of Ambracia.

Eurymachus (ū-rim'a-kus). In the Odyssey, a son of Polybus and a suitor of Penelope during the absence of Odysseus. He told Telemachus to command his mother to return to her father's house and choose among the suitors, otherwise they would stay and eat up his substance. He pretended to Penelope that he would protect Telemachus, while actually secretly planning to kill him. Eurymachus mocked Odysseus when he returned to Ithaca disguised as a beggar, but when after the death of Antinous, Odysseus revealed himself, Eurymachus blamed the ill-treatment of Telemachus and Odysseus (in his disguise as a beggar) on Antinous, and begged Odysseus to spare the other suitors. Odysseus killed him.

Eurymede (ū-rim'e-dē) or Eurymeda (-dā). According to some accounts, the wife of Glaucus and the mother of Bellerophon.

Eurymedon (ū-rim'e-don). A name for Perseus, meaning "Wide-ruling," given to him by his mother.

Eurymedon. Athenian general in the Peloponnesian War; killed near Syracuse, 413 B.C. As commander of an Athenian fleet, he was at Corcyra, 427 B.C., during the revolution in which the democrats there overthrew the oligarchs. He took no steps to prevent the excesses on that occasion and the oligarchs were massacred, except for about 200 who escaped to the fortress of Istone. Two years later he commanded a fleet that helped the Corcyraean democrats besiege the fortress of Istone. The besieged oligarchs at last surrendered, on condition that the Athenians be allowed to decide their fate. This condition being granted, the oligarchs marched out from the fortress, whereupon the Corcyraeans brutally murdered them in the courtyard where they were assembled. Eurymedon made no effort to save them. In 413 B.C. he sailed to Sicily as co-commander of a force to rescue the expeditionary force sent out under Nicias to take Syracuse. He was slain in the fighting at Syracuse (413 B.C.), in which the Athenians were annihilated.

Eurymedon. [Modern Turkish name, Köprü, formerly also Capri-Su.] In ancient geography, a river in Pisidia and Pamphylia, Asia Minor, flowing from the Taurus Mountains generally S into the Mediterranean about 25 miles E of what is now Antalya, Turkey. Near its mouth, in 466 or 465 B.C., the Greeks under the Athenian general Cimon defeated the Persian fleet and army.

Eurynome (ū-rin'ō-mē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus or of Chaos. She and Ophion, whom she created from the wind, were the first rulers on Olympus according to some accounts, but she yielded her power to Rhea (Ophion yielded his to Cronus), and fell into the sea. She was the mother by Zeus of the three Graces, or Charites. Homer names Eurynome one of the ocean nymphs who helped Thetis to save Hephaestus when Hera hurled him out of heaven.

Eurypontidae (ū-ri-pon'ti-dē). Descendants of Eurypont, grandson of Procles, the junior of the two royal houses of Sparta.

Eurypylus (ū-rip'i-lus.) In Greek legend, a son of Telephus and Astyoche, and the nephew of Priam. His mother, bribed with a golden vine, sent him to Troy near the end of the war in command of a group of Myrians. He fought valiantly, slaying, according to some accounts, the Greek surgeon Machaon, and being at last slain himself by Neoptolemus, son of Achilles.

Eurypylus. In Greek legend, a son of Euaimon, and a leader of the Thessalians at Troy. As a former suitor of Helen he fought valiantly at Troy, and was one of several to accept Hector's challenge to single combat, but was eliminated in the drawing of lots. He went to the aid of Telamonian Ajax when the latter, stunned and wounded, was compelled to withdraw from the fighting. In defending Ajax he slew Apisaon, and was himself wounded by Paris as he bent to strip Apisaon of his armor. Patroclus tended his wound, and was convinced by Eurypylus that he should join the Greeks and fight against the Trojans even if Achilles still refused to aid his beleaguered countrymen. After the war Eurypylus received a chest as his part of the spoils of victory. Some say Aeneas abandoned the chest when he fled from Troy; others say Cassandra left it to be a curse to whatever Greek found it. Inside it was an image of Dionysus, made by Hephaestus and given to Dardanus by Zeus. When Eurypylus opened the chest he was driven mad by the image. In an interval of sanity he went to Delphi to inquire concerning his malady. The priestess told him to find a people making a strange sacrifice and to settle there. Eventually he came to Aroë, later a part of Patrae, where he found the people sacrificing a youth and a maiden to Artemis, to propitiate the goddess for the crime of Comaetho and Melanippus, who had polluted her shrine. Eurypylus understood that this was the strange sacrifice indicated by the priestess. The people of the town recognized him as a leader an oracle had said would come to them and made him their king. Henceforward Eurypylus recovered his sanity and the people of Patrae ceased to make human sacrifices. The tomb of Eurypylus is in Patrae, and ever after the people of the city sacrificed to him as a hero at the festival of Dionysus, and the city flourished.

Eurysaces (ū-ris'a-kēz). In Greek legend, a son of Telamonian Ajax and the captive princess Tecmessa. His name means "Broad" or "Thick Shield." When Ajax was about to kill himself he directed that his armor be buried with him, all except his shield, for which Eurysaces was named and which was of seven thicknesses of bull's hide, which he left to his son.

Eurysthenes (ū-ris'thē-nēz). In Spartan legend, a son of Aristodemus. He was the twin of Procles. Their father died in their infancy and the Lacedaemonians wished to make one of the sons their king, but did not know which one was the older. On the advice of the oracle at Delphi, both Eurysthenes and Procles were made kings, to reign together, and for this reason, it is said, Sparta henceforth had two kings. By watching their mother as she tended to her twin sons the Spartans decided that Eurysthenes was the first-born and accorded him more honor than Procles, thus his line was the senior line of the two Spartan royal houses. But some say that Aristodemus had died before the Heraclidae (descendants of Heracles) had successfully invaded the Peloponnesus to win back the land their ancestor Heracles had left in trust for them. The brothers of Aristodemus—Temenus and Cresphontes—took his sons, Eurysthenes and Procles with them when they made their successful invasion. After their conquest of the Peloponnesus they decided to divide it between them by lot. The sons of Aristodemus drew Laconia as their share. After the lot-drawing, the Heraclidae set up three altars to Zeus Patrous (Paternal) and on the altar of each a sign appeared. On the altar of Procles and Eurysthenes there was a serpent. The seer interpreted this to mean that their people would be terrible in attack. Eurysthenes was succeeded by his son Agis, and from him was sprung the royal family of the Agids, or Agidae. His descendant, Cleomenes III, who reigned c235–219 B.C., was the last king of Sparta.

Eurystheus (ū-ris'thē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Nicippe and Sthenelus, king of Mycenae, and a descendant of Perseus. Thanks to Hera's activities in delaying the birth of Heracles and causing Eurystheus to be born two months ahead of time, he profited by Zeus' vow that the first child born to the house of Perseus would become ruler of Argos and the descendants of Perseus. Zeus could not withdraw his vow, and Eurystheus became king, but Hera agreed that after Heracles had performed whatever labors Eurystheus should demand of him, he would become immortal. It was thus that Eurystheus became the master of Heracles. When Heracles had carried out twelve great labors he returned to Mycenae, but Eurystheus, who was absolutely terrified of him, banished him from Argos, claiming he was a threat to the throne. When Heracles had been taken to live among the gods, Eurystheus banished his children from all Hellas, lest they grow up and seize his throne. Only Athens dared defy Eurystheus and offer protection to the Heraclidae. In the war which followed Eurystheus was captured by Hyllus, Heracles' son, and killed. According to some accounts, Hyllus cut off his head and Alcmena, mother of Heracles, gouged out his eyes. Others say the Athenians would have spared Eurystheus, but yielded to Alcmena's demand for his death.

Eurytion (ū-rit'i-on). In Greek mythology, a centaur who fought with Heracles on Mount Pholus and fled when Heracles overcame the centaurs there. Heracles later killed him for attacking the daughter of King Dexamenus at her marriage feast. Another centaur, also named Eurytion, was killed by Theseus and Pirithous because he attacked Hippodamia, the bride of Pirithous, at the wedding feast. This second centaur is sometimes called Eurytus.

Eurytion. According to the Aeneid, a brother of Pandarus, the famous Trojan archer. He was one of the companions of Aeneas on the flight from Troy. In the funeral games honoring Anchises in Italy, he took part in the archery contest. When the cord which held the target, a dove, to a pole was severed by a previous contestant, Eurytion transfixed the dove as it fluttered away.

Eurytion. In Greek legend, an adopted son of Actor, king of Phthia. He purified Peleus for the murder of his half-brother Phocus. He took part in the Calydonian Boar Hunt and was accidentally slain by the spear of Peleus.

Eurytion. In Greek mythology, a son of Ares. He was the giant herdsman who guarded the cattle of Geryon, and he was slain by Heracles, who felled him with his club, when Heracles went to fetch the cattle as one of his labors for Eurystheus.

Eurytus (ū'ri-tus). In Greek legend, the son of Melaneus of Thessaly. He was a king of Oechalia, and a famous archer who had been taught by Apollo, and who in his turn had taught Heracles. He promised his daughter, Iole, to whoever could defeat him in an archery contest. Heracles easily won the contest, but Eurytus, fearing a recurrence of Heracles' madness, refused to give him his daughter and banished him from his palace. Heracles thereupon raised an army and marched against him. He slew Eurytus and some of his sons, and took Iole captive. Eurytus' bow finally fell into the hands of Odysseus, who used it to kill Penelope's suitors. In another account, Eurytus challenged Apollo to an archery contest and the god, angered by his presumption, caused his early death.

Eurytus. In Greek legend, a son of Augeas, king of the Epeans. Heracles attacked Eurytus near Cleonae, as he was going to attend a festival, and killed him in revenge on Augeas, who had not honored his agreement to pay Heracles for cleaning the Augean stables.

Eurytus. A son of Actor and Molione. See Moliones.

Eurytus. In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle he was knocked down by the thyrsus of Dionysus and killed by Heracles.

Euterpe (ū-tér'pē). One of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She is the muse of music, a divinity of joy and pleasure, the patroness of flute-players. She invented the double flute, and favored rather the wild and simple melodies of primitive peoples than the more finished art of music, and was associated more with Dionysus than with Apollo. She is usually represented as a maiden crowned with flowers, having a flute in her hand, or with various musical instruments about her. According to some accounts she was the mother of the Thracian Rhesus by the river-god of the Strymon River. See Muses.

Euthydemus (ū-thi-dē'mus). Dialogue of Plato, the narration by Socrates of a conversation which took place at the Lyceum between himself, the sophists Euthydemus and Dionysodorus, Crito, Clinias, and Ctesippus. Its theme is virtue and instruction in virtue, and it is a satire upon the Sophists and the older philosophies.

DANCING SATYR
Red-figured Greek amphora, Euthydemus,

Euthymides (ū-thim'i-dēz). Celebrated Attic vase-painter, active at the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 5th centuries B.C. Six vases with his signature as painter are extant. An amphora (Munich) c510 B.C., in the red-figure style, shows three dancing satyrs on one side, and is notable for the successful foreshortening of the partly turned bodies of the satyrs. On this side Euthymides, a contemporary, and perhaps a friendly rival, of Euphronius, inscribed a remark to the effect that Euphronius could never have painted anything like it. On the other side he painted Hector putting on his armor in the presence of Priam and Hecuba. On this side the inscription reads "Euthymides, son of Polios, painted." Another red-figured amphora (Munich) shows Theseus carrying off Corone. Other figures are identified by inscribed names as Helen, Pirithous, and Heres.

Euxine (ūk'sin) Sea. The Black Sea, in Latin, Pontus Euxinus. Inland sea between SE Europe and W Asia, bordered on the N and E by Scythia, on the S by Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia, and on the W by Thrace, communicating with the Mediterranean by the Bosphorus, the Propontis (Sea of Marmora), and the Hellespont (Dardanelles). The word means "hospitable, friendly to strangers." It had also been called the Axine ("unfriendly"), presumably in reference to the hostile tribes living on its shores, or to its frequent savage storms; but this may have resulted from the operation of folk etymology on a non-Greek term. A late writer says that it was Heracles who changed the name, from Axine to Euxine, because he was hospitably received by the tribes who dwelt there. According to legend, the voyage of the Argonauts (13th century B.C.?) was the first Greek exploration of the Euxine. Scholars, seeking for the Trojan War a more cogent issue than the abduction of Helen, have suggested that the war was fought to end Troy's control and taxation of commercial traffic between the Euxine and the Aegean via the Hellespont. Between 800 and 600 B.C. Ionian Greeks explored the entire coastline and established numerous colonies. In the 6th and 4th centuries B.C. the Crimea, under Scythian domination, produced surplus wheat which was shipped in substantial quantities to the Aegean, particularly to Athens. In Roman times it was still regarded as frontier country; as a punishment only slightly preferable to death, Ovid was ordered to exile at Tomis, modern Constanza. The establishment at Constantinople of the eastern capital of the Roman empire intensified commerce throughout the lands bordering the Euxine, accelerating the advance of civilization and urbanization. Length, about 740 miles; greatest width, about 390 miles; estimated area, 168,500 square miles. (JJ)

Evadne (ē-vad'nē). In Greek legend, the wife of Capaneus, an Argive chieftain who was one of the Seven against Thebes and perished there. When his body was recovered from Thebes by Theseus and the Athenians it was placed on a funeral pyre for funeral honors. Evadne leaped into the flames, as she preferred death with one she loved to life by herself.

Evadne. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Poseidon and the nymph Pitana. She was reared by Aepytus, son of Elatus. Apollo loved her and she bore him a son, Iamus.

Evadne. In Greek legend, a daughter of Pelias, king of Iolcus. Under Medea's direction, she and her sister cut up their sleeping father and boiled the pieces in a cauldron, under the impression that this would make him young again as Medea had promised. But Medea had promised falsely, and Pelias was dead. When Jason took control of Iolcus he overlooked Evadne's crime of patricide, which was committed in innocence, and found a husband for her in the son of the king of the Phocians.

Evagoras (ē-vag'ō-ras). King of Salamis, in Cyprus (c435-374 B.C.). He claimed descent from Teucer, the half-brother of Telamonian Ajax who came to Cyprus and founded Salamis after the Trojan War. The descendants of Teucer ruled Salamis for centuries and then lost the throne to the Phoenicians. Evagoras won it back by his own courage and enterprise. He was said to be a wise and moderate ruler, who encouraged and revived Greek culture in his kingdom. After the defeat of the Athenians at Aegospotami (405 B.C.), Conon, one of the Athenian admirals who escaped, found hospitality and protection at his court, and he took part in the battle of Cnidus (394 B.C.) in which the Spartans were defeated by a Phoenician and Persian fleet under the command of Conon. Because of his friendship for Athens he was made a citizen and his statue was erected in Athens beside that of Conon. He had been a tributary of the Great King of Persia, but as his own power grew in Cyprus, and was extended to the coast of Asia Minor the Persians waged war on him as on a rebellious subject (c389 B.C.). For the next ten years he resisted the Persians. After a serious defeat at sea he withdrew to Salamis and endured siege, which he resisted so stubbornly that the Persians offered to raise it if he would pay tribute to Persia, "as a slave to his master." Evagoras refused the terms but finally agreed to pay tribute, only, however, as one king to another, and the siege was raised. The Athenians had at first helped him by sending ten ships, but with the signing of the King's Peace (386 B.C.), by which Cyprus was acknowledged as a Persian tributary, the Athenians ceased to support him, and he had carried on his war alone. He was slain (374 B.C.) by the eunuch of a man who had been forced to flee for plotting against him. The story is that the eunuch, left in charge of the beautiful daughter of the exile, told both Evagoras and his son of the loveliness of the girl and arranged appointments for each of them separately. Neither the father nor the son knew of the other's appointment. Each arrived at the stated times and each was slain by the eunuch, who thus avenged his master.

Evander (ē-van'dēr). According to legend, a son of Hermes (Mercury) and the prophetic nymph Carmenta. His people were Arcadians, descended from Pallas, and migrated with him from Greece to Italy before the Trojan War. Destiny guided him to the spot where he built the town of Pallanteum, named for his ancestor, which gave its name to the Palatine Hill, when the glorious city of Rome afterward occupied the site of Evander's humble town. Evander had met Anchises, before he left Troy, and had received a quiver of Lycian arrows and other gifts from him. Thus, he welcomed Anchises' son when Aeneas arrived in Italy. In the Aeneid, Evander advised Aeneas to seek the help of the Etruscans in his war against Turnus. He told Aeneas that the Etruscans, already enraged against Turnus, were massed and ready for war but had been told by a seer to await a foreign commander. As he sent his only son Pallas to fight at Aeneas' side, Evander prayed to live if Pallas was destined to return safely; otherwise he asked the gods to let him die. In the war Pallas was killed. Evander, though grief-stricken, was proud that he had died gloriously and in the service of a noble commander. He asked the death of Turnus as vengeance. Evander is said to have introduced the worship of Pan (Faunus) into Italy, and Pan may be identical with Faunus. Some scholars believe that he is a native Italian deity to whom the Italians attached Greek attributes in order to have a link with the admired Greek world.

Evemerus (ē-vē'mēr-us, ē-vem'er-us). See Euhemerus.

Evenus (ē-vē'nus). In Greek mythology, a son of Ares, and father, by Alcippe, of Marpessa. He wanted his daughter to remain a virgin and therefore challenged all her suitors to a chariot race with him, with the understanding that the first one to defeat him would win Marpessa. Whoever raced and lost had his head cut off and nailed to the walls of Evenus' palace. When Idas defeated him, with the help of winged horses provided by his father Poseidon, Evenus killed his horses and flung himself into the river which from that time on bore his name.

Evenus. [Modern name, Fidaris, Fidhari.]

In ancient geography, a river in Aetolia, Greece, flowing into the Gulf of Patras (or Calydon) about seven miles SE of what is now Missolonghi.

Everes (ēv'er-ēz, ē-vē'rēz). In mythology, the father of the seer Tiresias by the nymph Chariclo.

Evius (ē'vi-us). An epithet of Dionysus, derived from the bacchantes' cry, "Evoë."

Evripos (ev'rē-pōs). See Euripus and Chalcis.

Exekias (ek-sē'ki-as). [Also: Execias.] Attic potter and painter in the black-figure style, active c550-525 B.C. He painted amphorae, craters, cups, and other vessels. Among his extant works are an amphora in the Vatican, showing Achilles and Ajax playing checkers, signed by him as both potter and painter; an amphora (Berlin), signed by him, showing the Dioscuri at home with Leda and Tyn-dareus; and a signed eye cup (Munich). The outside of the cup has two large eyes flanked by warriors near the handles; the inside shows Dionysus floating in a vine-swathed boat. The date of this cup, which is inscribed "Exekias made," is c540 B.C.

—F—

Fabia gens (fā'bi-a). In ancient Rome, a patrician clan or house, possibly of Sabine origin, which traced its descent from Hercules and the Arcadian Evander. Its family names under the republic were Ambustus, Buteo, Dorso, Labeo, Licinus, Maximus, Pictor, and Vibulanus.

Fabius Maximus (fā'bi-us mak'si-mus), Quintus. [Surnamed Rullianus.] Roman general; died c290 B.C. While he was master of the horse he defeated the Samnites (325 B.C.). In spite of the victory he was degraded because in waging the battle he had disobeyed orders, and he was compelled to leave Rome for a time. He afterward became consul a number of times, the first time in 322 B.C. He was named dictator (315) and suffered defeat at the hands of the Samnites. In 310 he defeated the Etruscans.

As consul in 295 B.C. he distinguished himself in the third war against the Samnites, over whom and their allies he gained the decisive victory of Sentinum (295 B.C.).

Fabius Maximus, Quintus. [Surnamed Cunctator, meaning "the Delayer."] Roman general; died 203 B.C. He traced his descent from Hercules and a nymph, the parents of Fabius, founder of the Fabian family. Besides the well-known epithet, Cunctator, he was also surnamed Verrucosus, from a wart growing on his lip, and Ovicula (Lambkin), because he was so gentle as a child. Because he was deliberate and cautious as a youth some thought he was rather stupid. He trained himself for war, recognizing the menace of Carthage, and for oratory so that he could persuade the Romans to follow him in their own interest. He became consul for the first time in 233 B.C., when by a victory over the Ligurians he obtained the honor of a triumph. In 230 B.C. he was censor, and in 228 he held the office of consul for the second time. In 218 B.C. he was at the head of the legation sent by the Roman Senate to Carthage to demand reparation for the attack on Saguntum. According to the story, he held up a fold of his toga and asked the Carthaginians whether they chose peace or war. The Carthaginians indicated that it was a matter of indifference to them. Fabius then dropped his toga and said, "Then take war." In the same year Hannibal came into Italy and was victorious at the Trebia. Reports of ominous portents added to the fears of the Romans: shields sweated blood, grain cut at Antium was found to have blood on it, fiery stones fell from the heavens. Fabius, in opposition to the consul Caius Flaminius, advised the Romans to let Hannibal exhaust himself, far from his base and with no allies in Italy. Flaminius was undaunted by the portents, ordered the tribunes to call out the armies, and was disastrously defeated at Lake Trasimenus (217 B.C.). News of the defeat threw Rome into a turmoil, and Fabius was chosen dictator a second time by the people. He surrounded the office with all the pomp and ceremony of which it was capable in order to impress the Romans with his power and make them submissive. He called on the people to honor and propitiate the gods, whose anger, he said, at the neglect and scorn of religious rites had caused the defeat; he consulted the Sibylline Books, and vowed sacrifices and festivals to the gods. All this was intended to encourage a belief in the Romans that the gods would bring them victory. But he, according to Plutarch, "put all his hopes of victory in himself, believing that heaven bestowed success by reason of wisdom and valor, and turned his attention to Hannibal." His strategy was to weaken the Carthaginians by numerous skirmishes which hit at stragglers and scouts, while at the same time keeping clear of the main body of Hannibal's troops, and at all events to avoid pitched battles (whence his name Cunctator, "Delayer"). His strategy was criticized by his soldiers, by the Romans, and by the enemy as well, who scorned him for a coward. Only Hannibal realized how wise he was, and determined to force him into an engagement. Among Fabius' own commanders was Minucius, his master of horse, who was seditious in his criticism of Fabius. When, having been trapped at Casilinum, on the Volturnus river, the Carthaginian not only escaped but spared the acres of Fabius when he burned the surrounding fields (to make it appear that Fabius was in collusion with him), the abuse of Fabius became violent. Fabius was summoned to Rome to assist in sacrifices and put his army in charge of Minucius, with orders not to give battle or engage the enemy. Minucius disobeyed and won a minor victory which was greatly exaggerated in Rome, whereupon he was, in a most unusual step, made co-dictator with Fabius. Rather than rotate the command, Fabius divided his forces with Minucius. Hannibal lured Minucius into battle. Fabius saw that his colleague was being destroyed. He exclaimed, "Hercules! How much sooner than I expected, but later than his own rash eagerness demanded, has Minucius destroyed himself!" Then he took the field and rescued Minucius, who publicly proclaimed his mistake, thanked Fabius, and put himself once more under his command. At the end of six months Fabius put down his office of dictator, as prescribed by law, and the war was again conducted by consuls—Paulus Aemilius and Terentius Varro succeeding him in command. At the outset they followed the policy of Fabius. But Varro boasted that he would conquer the enemy in a day, collected a force of 80,000 men, engaged Hannibal at Cannae (216 B.C.), and was defeated with frightful losses. Rome was almost defenseless, but Hannibal did not follow up his victory by marching on the city. In their terror and confusion the Romans again looked to Fabius, and he became consul for the third time (215 B.C., and again in 214). He limited the period of mourning and the offering of sacrifices in order to conceal to some degree the extent of the Roman losses, sent envoys to the oracle of Delphi, and when Varro returned saw that he was welcomed at Rome without recrimination. Two armies were sent out: one under Fabius, who now came to be called the "Shield of Rome," and the other under the daring and swift-moving Claudius Marcellus, Rome's sword. In spite of his victories and the Italian cities that had gone over to him after the victory of Cannae, Hannibal's army was exhausting itself on foreign soil. He almost lured Fabius into battle, but unfavorable auspices prevented Fabius from beginning operations, and he was saved. In 209 B.C. Fabius became consul for the fifth time and won Tarentum, thanks to the treachery of some Bruttians in the city. Rather than acknowledge that his victory was won by betrayal instead of arms, he put the Bruttians who had made it possible to the sword, killed many Tarentines, sold others into slavery, and plundered the city. Among the spoils was a statue of Hercules, which he sent to Rome and had set up near a statue of himself. The loss of Tarentum, which he had held for three years, was a great blow to Hannibal and won a great triumph for Fabius. Nevertheless, the Carthaginians were still in Italy. In 205 B.C. Scipio became consul and proposed to carry the war to Carthage. Whether from jealousy or from some other reason, Fabius did all he could to hinder and oppose him, but Scipio's view prevailed. The threat to Carthage forced Hannibal's recall from Italy and Fabius died (203 B.C.) before Hannibal's defeat in Africa by Scipio.

Fabius Pictor, Caius (pik'tor, -tôr). Early Roman painter, active c300 B.C. He was of the Fabian gens, and to judge by a passage in Cicero, the cognomen Pictor ("the Painter") was given him not in admiration, but in disapprobation of a man of such lineage engaging in such an occupation as painting. There is a record of only one of his works, the decoration (c304 B.C.) of the temple of Salus on the Quirinal, which probably depicted a Roman victory over the Samnites. There is no record of any Roman painting prior to this. These decorations perished when the temple of Salus was destroyed by fire in the time of the emperor Claudius.

Fabius Pictor, Quintus. Roman annalist. He served in the Gallic war in 225 B.C., as also in the Second Punic War, and was sent to Delphi, after the battle of Cannae in 216 B.C., to consult the oracle as to how the Roman state could propitiate the gods. He was the author of a history of Rome, written in Greek, including the period of the Second Punic War. This history, which is now lost, was highly esteemed by the ancients.

Fabricius Luscinus (fa-brish'us lu-sī'nus), Caius. Roman consul (282 B.C. and 278 B.C.), general, diplomat, and censor (275 B.C.); died c250 B.C. He was an envoy to King Pyrrhus in 280 B.C. to arrange for the ransom of Roman prisoners. Pyrrhus is said to have attempted to bribe him but Fabricius, poor as he was, refused the offers, much to the admiration of the king. He was noted for his incorruptibility, austerity and poverty. In the Aeneid Anchises pointed out the spirit of Fabricius, "princely in his poverty," waiting in the Underworld to be born, when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld to learn about the future of his race and empire.

Faesulae (fē'sū-lē). [Modern name, Fiesole.] An ancient Etruscan town in C Italy, about three miles NE of Florence. It became an ally of Rome, to which it adhered during the campaigns of Hannibal. Stilicho defeated an army of Gothic invaders here in 406 A.D. Beautifully located on a hill above Florence, it is one of the oldest bishoprics in Tuscany, rich in monuments from ancient times, the Middle Ages, and the Renaissance period. It has Etruscan and Roman remains, among them baths and an amphitheater.

Falerian (fa-lir'i-an). See Faliscan.

Falerii (fa-lir'i-i). [Also: Falerium Vetus; modern name, Civita Castellana.] Town in Latium, about 27 miles N of Rome. According to some accounts it was founded by Halesus, either a bastard son or a companion of Agamemnon, who fled from Mycenae when Agamemnon was murdered, founded Falerii and taught its inhabitants the Mysteries of Hera. The town belonged to the Etruscan Confederation and was destroyed (241 B.C.) by the Romans.

Falerium Novum. Town in Latium, three miles NW of Falerium Vetus (Falerii), established by the Romans c240 B.C., where the inhabitants of Falerium Vetus were resettled after the destruction of their city by the Romans in 241 B.C. It has interesting and well-preserved fortifications in ashlar tufa, with arched gates ("Porta di Giove" and "Porta del Bove"), and remains of a theater and amphitheater. In mediaeval times, the inhabitants abandoned Falerium Novum and moved back to Falerium Vetus, now Civit  Castellana. (JJ)

Falernus Ager (fa-l r nus     r). In ancient geography, a fertile territory in Campania, Italy, situated N of the Volturnus, from 20 to 25 miles N of Naples. It was celebrated for its wines.

Faliscan (fa-lis kan). [Also: Falerian.] Ancient Italic language of the Falisci or Faliscans. It is a dialect related to Latin, and now known only from inscriptions, glosses, and proper names.

Falisci (fa-lis  ). [Also: Faliscans.] Italic people, inhabitants of Falerium Vetus or Falerii (modern, Civit  Castellana) in ancient Etruria. They spoke a dialect closely akin to Latin. Falerii was considered a member of the Etruscan League from the 5th century B.C. on; it was subjugated by the Romans in 241 B.C. Some older authorities have thought that the group might have been of Sabine origin.

Faliscus (fa-lis  kus), Gratius. See Gratius Faliscus.

Famagusta (f -m -g s  t ). [Also: Famagosta; Latin, Fama Augusta.] See Arsino , city of Cyprus.

Fanum Fortunae (f  num f  r-t  n ). [Modern name, Fano.] In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, situated on the Adriatic Sea near the mouth of the Metaurus River. There was a temple of Fortune there, from which the town took its name. There was also a temple of Jupiter and one of Augustus. The town was held by Julius Caesar in 49 B.C.; Augustus later sent a colony there and built a wall around the town. The architect Vitruvius describes a basilica which he said was built at Fanum from his designs. Parts of the wall and a triumphal arch dedicated to Augustus remain.

Farnese Bacchus (f  r-n  z  bak  s). Greek torso of the 4th century B.C., in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. It is of the school of Praxiteles.

Farnese Bull. A copy of a large group of Greek sculpture of the Trallian school (1st century B.C.), in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. It represents the chastisement of Dirce by her stepsons for her treatment of their mother, Antiope, by binding her to the horns of a bull. It is much restored, but is considered very remarkable for its composition and execution. It was discovered in the Baths of Caracalla in 1546 in a mutilated condition and was initially restored under the supervision of Michelangelo and later by the Milanese sculptor Bianchi.

Farnese Flora (f    r ). Ancient statue in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. The goddess holds her Ionian tunic with her right hand as she steps forward, the motif being a familiar one in archaic statues of Venus. The figure is considered remarkable for its grace, despite its height of 11   feet.

Farnese Heracles (her  -kl  z) or Hercules (her  -k  l  z). Greek statue in the Museo Nazionale at Naples executed by Glycon of Athens. The demigod is represented undraped, leaning on his club. The bearded head is somewhat small, and the muscular development prodigious. The statue, which is a copy of a Heracles by Lysippus, dates from the early empire (1st century B.C.).

Farnese Homer (h    m  r). Ancient bust in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. Admirable in execution and remarkable for the profound intellectuality of its expression, it is perhaps the finest example of its familiar type, which is that universally associated with Homer.

Farnese Juno (j    n ). Colossal antique bust of Juno (Hera), in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. The expression is one of calm repose, high and unbending. The hair is bound with a simple fillet. It has been demonstrated that this bust is probably a copy of a Hera made by Polyclitus (c423 B.C.) for the temple at Argos.

Farnese Minerva (mi-n  r  v ). Greek statue of Pallas (Athena Parthenos), found at Velletri, Italy, and now in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. The type is that of the great statue of the Parthenon. The goddess wears the Attic helmet with a sphinx and two figures of Pegasus, and the aegis on her breast. The arms are restored; the right is extended to hold the Victory, and the left raised to sustain the spear.

Fasces (fas  z). In Roman antiquity, bundles of rods, usually of elm or birch, with an ax bound in with them, the blade projecting. They were borne by lictors before the superior Roman magistrates as a badge of their power over life and limb. The magistrates lowered the fasces in the presence of the popular assembly to signify that it had the sovereign power. Officials of different rank were entitled to a varying number of fasces, and officials of a lower rank saluted those of a higher rank by lowering the fasces. When a magistrate died his fasces, along with his arms, were carried reversed behind his bier. The adoption of the fasces as the symbol of the authoritarian political movement organized in Italy by Mussolini led to the use of such terms as "fascism," "fascist," and "fascist party," and imitative developments in Spain, Germany, Argentina, and elsewhere.

Fasti (fas'ti). Roman calendars listing for each month those days which were feast days, market days, administrative days, and others. The list of the dies fasti was for a long time accessible only to the patricians. This put all others at a great disadvantage because the courts sat and certain proceedings of the state could be undertaken only on the dies fasti. Days when the courts were closed and certain business could not be done were called dies nefasti. In 304 B.C. the list was published and thereafter made available to all.

Fasti. Poetical Roman calendar, by Ovid, in six books. In it, Ovid describes, and attempts to explain, the origins and ceremonies connected with certain Roman festivals. It was Ovid's intention to compose 12 books, one for each month of the Roman year; at the time of his banishment to Tomis on the Euxine, in 8 A.D., he had completed the first six books, which have come down to us. Apparently his drafts and fragments from the other six books were destroyed. (JJ)

Fasti Capitolini (kap'i-tō-lī'ni). Marble tablets containing a register of the Roman consuls and other chief magistrates of certain years. They were excavated at Rome in 1546 or 1547, and preserved in the Capitol, whence their name.

Fates (fāts). In Roman mythology, the three goddesses of destiny who preordained the course and outcome of every human life. Their Latin name, Fata, is the plural of fatum, meaning an unalterable decree of the gods, hence, fate. Because they functioned at every human birth, they became identified with the Moerae, three goddesses of Greek religion who are also called Fates. This identification gave rise to the development of the three Roman Parcae, or Fates, from the original Roman birth-goddess, Parca.

Faun (fôn). In Roman mythology, one of a class of demigods or rural deities, sometimes confounded with satyrs. The form of the fauns was originally human, but with a short goat's tail, pointed ears, and small horns; later they were represented with the hind legs of a goat, thus taking the type of the Greek Pan.

Faun of Praxiteles (prak-sit'el-ēz). Ancient Greek statue by Praxiteles, the finest surviving copy of which is in the Capitoline Museum at Rome. The youth leans on a tree stump, nude except for a panther skin over the shoulder. The face betrays his animal kinship by little except the unusual hollow in the nose and the slightly pointed ears.

Faunus (fôn'us). Ancient Italian god of forests and wild life, an agricultural and pastoral fertility deity who later became identified with the Greek Pan. He had two annual festivals, in December and February, called Faunalia, accompanied by libations of milk and wine, sacrifice of goats, and the performance of games. In the Roman mythology, he figures as the brother, father, or consort of Bona Dea. In ancient legend, Faunus was a son of Picus, grandson of Saturn. He was a Latin king and the father of Latinus. There was an oracle of Faunus, in the city founded by Latinus, which instructed Latinus to wed his daughter Lavinia to a stranger. It was for this reason that Latinus refused the suit of Turnus for his daughter's hand, and accepted that of Aeneas. Faunus taught the Latin peoples their agriculture and religion.

Fausta (fôs'ta), Cornelia. Daughter of the Roman dictator L. Cornelius Sulla by his fourth wife, Caecilia Metella; born c88 B.C. She married at an early age C. Memmius, by whom she was divorced. In 55 B.C., she married T. Annius Milo. She was notorious for her conjugal infidelity. The historian Sallust is said to have been one of her paramours.

Faustulus (fôs'tū-lus). In Roman mythology, the shepherd who found the abandoned twin infants Romulus and Remus, took them home, and with his wife fostered them until they reached manhood.

Favonius (fa-vō'ni-us). In Roman mythology, actor; up, lûte, pûll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; đ as d or j, š as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z as z or zh.

the gentle west wind, bringer of spring and the rebirth of vegetation, hence regarded as auspicious: identified with Zephyr.

Felix (fē'liks). Surname of Sulla, Lucius Cornelius.

Felix, Antonius. Roman procurator of Judea, 1st century A.D. He was a freedman of Antonia, mother of the emperor Claudius I, and was the brother of the latter's favorite, the freedman Pallas. He was appointed procurator of Judea c55 A.D., and governed his province from Caesarea, whither Saint Paul was sent to him for trial after his arrest at Jerusalem (Acts, xxiii. 23, 24). He married Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I and wife of Azizus, king of Emesa, whom he induced her to desert, and procured the assassination of the high priest Jonathan, who had offended him by unpalatable advice. He was recalled c60 A.D., and was saved from the consequences of his tyranny and extortion by the intercession of his brother with the emperor Nero.

Ferentinum (fe-ren-ti'num). [Modern name, Ferentino.] In ancient geography, an important town of the Hernici, situated about 48 miles SE of Rome. It was captured by the Romans in 364 B.C., and its inhabitants were given the citizenship after 195 B.C. The town was located on a hill and was strongly fortified. The powerful walls, polygonal masonry repaired in ashlar, survive in almost their entire extent, as do several gates, including the famous Porta Sanguinaria, or Bloody Gate, an arched postern gate, and an interesting corbelled sally port.

Ferentum (fe-ren'tum). [Modern name, Ferento.] Ruined city in C Italy, about 5½ miles N of Viterbo. It contains extensive Etruscan, Roman, and medieval remains which have been excavated. The ancient theater is of particular interest. Ferentum was the birthplace of the emperor Otho.

Feronia (fē-rō'ni-a). An ancient Italian goddess, presiding over woods and orchards. In later Roman mythology she was regarded especially as the patroness of freedmen. Her most celebrated shrine was at the foot of Mount Soracte in Etruria. In the Aeneid, she is named as the mother of Erulus (q.v.), to whom she gave three sets of weapons and three separate lives.

Fescennia (fe-sen'i-a). A Tuscan city on the Tiber. Its people were allies of Turnus, the Rutulian, in the war against Aeneas in Latium.

Fescennine Verses or Songs (fes'ē-nīn, -nin). Ancient Roman popular verses or songs: so named, according to Festus, from Fescennia in southern Etruria. They were recited or sung at rustic merrymakings, and especially at popular harvest festivals.

Festus (fes'tus), Sextus Pompeius. Latin scholar and lexicographer, active perhaps in the middle of the 2nd century A.D. He epitomized (in 20 books, of which half is extant) a glossary of Latin words and phrases entitled De Verborum Significatu, by Verrius Flaccus, which is now lost.

Ficoroni Cist (fē-kō-rō'nē). Cylindrical bronze box found near Palestrina, Italy, in 1745, and acquired by the Museo Kircheriano at Rome. It is important because its incised decoration, representing the victory of Polydeuces (Pollux) over Amycus, is one of the finest surviving examples of Greek line drawing. The box is over 1½ feet high, and rests on three feet; the handle of the cover is formed by a group consisting of Bacchus and two satyrs.

Fidenae (fi-dē'nē). In ancient geography, a town of the Sabines in Latium, situated on the Tiber River about five miles NE of Rome. Anchises predicted the founding of this town to Aeneas when the latter visited his father in the Underworld.

Fidentia (fi-den'shi-a, -sha). [Modern name, Fidenza; formerly Borgo San Donnino.] In ancient geography, a town on the Via Aemilia, in N Italy, about 14 miles NW of the city of Parma. It was the site of a victory of Metellus Pius over Carbo, the leader of the Marian faction, in 82 B.C.

Fides (fi'dēz). The Roman personification and goddess of faith or fidelity, commonly represented as a matron wearing a wreath of olive or laurel leaves, and having in her hand ears of corn or a basket of fruit. The temple of Fides on the Palatine Hill in Rome was a meeting place for the Senate and a depository of international documents. In connection with sacrifices to Fides, the right hand was bound in a white cloth to indicate that honor dwelt in the right hand.

Fields of Mourning. In the Aeneid, a region in the Underworld inhabited by the souls of unhappy lovers who had committed suicide. On his visit to the Underworld, Aeneas saw Dido in the Fields of Mourning and tried to speak to her, but she turned her head aside and ignored him.

Firmum (fēr'mum). [Modern name, Fermo.]

In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, situated on a hill overlooking the Adriatic Sea. It was founded as a Roman colony, 264 B.C. Remains of a Roman amphitheater and of the ancient walls may be seen.

First Triumvirate. See Triumvirate, First.

Flaccus (fla'kus), Caius Valerius. See Valerius Flaccus, Caius.

Flaccus, Quintus Fulvius. Roman soldier and statesman; fl. 3rd century B.C. He was consul in 237, 224, 212, and 209 B.C., censor in 231, pontifex maximus in 216, and urban praetor in 215 B.C. During his third consulship he won an important victory at Beneventum over the Carthaginians under Hanno. He laid siege to Capua, occupied by the Carthaginians, and though compelled to go to Rome, where Hannibal had caused a diversion, he returned and freed Capua from the invaders.

Flaccus, Marcus Fulvius. Roman politician, grandnephew of Quintus Fulvius Flaccus; fl. 2nd century B.C. After the death of Tiberius Gracchus (133 B.C.), of whom he had been a strong supporter, Flaccus took his place in the commission appointed for the redistribution of the land. He was consul, 125 B.C., and proposed that the allies of Rome be granted the citizenship. His proposal was rejected by the Senate, by whom he was considered a dangerous "democrat." He was sent out of Rome on the excuse of protecting the Massilians, allies of Rome, against the Ligurians. Successful in this, he returned to Rome in triumph, but left again (122 B.C.) to go to Carthage with Caius Gracchus to found a colony. He was killed in Rome in 121 B.C., at the same time as Caius Gracchus was killed.

Flamen (flā'men). A Latin word, possibly meaning "he who burns the sacrifices." In Roman antiquity the flamen was a priest devoted to the service of one particular deity. Originally there were three priests thus named: the flamen Dialis, consecrated to Jupiter; the flamen Martialis, sacred to Mars; and the flamen Quirinalis, who superintended the rites of Quirinus (Romulus). The number was gradually increased to 15, but the original three retained priority in point of rank, being styled maiores, and elected from among the patricians, while the other 12, called minores, were elected from the plebeians. They held their office for life and could only be removed under special conditions. They were freed of all the responsibilities of civic life and took no part in politics. Their characteristic dress included the white conical cap called the apex. This was made from the hide of a sacrificed animal and had an olive branch and a woolen thread at its peak. The flamines wore their caps at all times out of doors. The flamen Dialis, as the priest of Jupiter, was dedicated with his wife and children to the god. He had to be chosen from parents who followed the old patrician form of marriage, in which an offering of a cake was made to Jupiter in the presence of the priest and the flamen Dialis, with ten witnesses. He must be married himself, and if his wife died he resigned his office. Certain prohibitions were attached to the office. He was not allowed to leave his home at night; he was not permitted to view any one at work, therefore the lictor who preceded him called on all to stop their toil as he approached; he was forbidden to look upon armed men, or to touch any unclean thing, and if he did so he must resign. Because he was also forbidden to see or have about him anything in the shape of a chain, the fastenings of his robe, which must have been woven by his wife, were clasps. The flamen Dialis also had certain privileges, such as a seat in the Senate and the services of a lictor and heralds. The duties of the flamines were to offer daily sacrifices. For the flamen Dialis every day was a holy day, on which he must wear his ceremonial dress and carry the sacrificial knife. The wife of the flamen Dialis was a priestess of Juno and had certain insignia. She wore a purple fillet woven through her hair, covered her head with a veil, and wore a long woolen robe. She also carried a sacrificial knife. The flamines maiores drove to the Capitol in two-horse chariots on the 1st of October and there offered sacrifice to Fides Publica, the Roman personification of the honor of the people.

Flaminian Way (flā-min'i-ān). [Latin, Via Flaminia.] One of the oldest and most famous highways of ancient Rome. It was 209 miles long, extended from Rome to Ariminum (Rimini), and was built by the censor Caius Flaminius in 220 B.C. Its superintendence was held to be so honorable an office that Augustus himself assumed it in 27 B.C., as Julius Caesar had been curator of the Appian Way. Augustus restored it through its entire extent, in commemoration of which triumphal arches were erected to him over the road at Ariminum and at Rome; the arch at the former place still exists. Much of the old pavement survives, together with many tombs by the roadside.

Flaminius (flam-i-ni'nus), Titus Quintius (or Quinctius). Roman general and statesman; born c230 B.C.; died c174 B.C. He was consul in 198 B.C., defeated Philip V of Macedon at Cynoscephalae in 197, and proclaimed, at the Isthmian Games at Corinth, the freedom of Greece from Macedonian rule in 196 B.C. In 195 B.C. he defeated Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, and returned (194) to Rome in triumph. He was sent (192 B.C.) on a diplomatic mission to Greece and succeeded in rallying the wavering Greek states to the Roman side against Antiochus III of Syria. He negotiated with Bithynia for the surrender of Hannibal who had sought asylum there, but Hannibal committed suicide (183 B.C.) before any conclusion was reached.

Flaminius (flā-min'i-us), Caius. Roman general and politician; killed in battle 217 B.C. He was tribune of the people in 232 B.C., in which year he procured the passage of a law distributing the Ager Gallicus Picenus (an area along the Adriatic coast) among the plebeians, for which he won great popularity. He defeated the Insubres (near modern Milan) while consul in 223 B.C., and while censor in 220 B.C. constructed two celebrated public works which bore his name: the Circus Flaminius for the plebeians, and the Flaminian Way. He was made consul for the second time in 217 B.C., after Hannibal had invaded Italy. He disapproved of the policy advocated by Fabius Maximus, which was to wear Hannibal out by harassment rather than by engaging him in pitched battles. Numerous unfavorable portents frightened the Romans on the advent of Hannibal, but Flaminius scorned them. He ordered the tribunes to call out the army for the purpose of attacking Hannibal. When he sprang to his horse the animal trembled with fear and threw him. But even that ominous portent did not deter Flaminius. He met Hannibal at Lake Trasimenus (217 B.C.) in Tuscany. The opposing forces engaged in such a furious struggle that the occurrence of an earthquake in the midst of the battle is said to have gone unnoticed. The forces of Flaminius were nearly annihilated: 15,000 were slain and another 15,000 were taken prisoner. Flaminius, responsible for the disaster, fell in the battle. Hannibal sought his body, to give honorable burial to a valiant opponent, but it had disappeared.

Flaminius, Caius. Roman general; fl. 2nd century B.C.; son of Caius Flaminius (d. 217 B.C.). He served as quaestor under Scipio Africanus the Elder in Spain. He was elected praetor in 193 B.C., and obtained Hispania Citerior as his province. In 187 he became consul with M. Aemilius Lepidus, and in 181 B.C. he founded the colony of Aquileia near the head of the Adriatic Sea.

Flavian (flā'vi-ān) Amphitheater. Amphitheater at Rome, just SE of the Forum. It was begun by Vespasian (T. Flavius Sabinus) in 72 A.D. and completed in 80. For 400 years it was the seat of gladiatorial shows. The axes of this chief of amphitheaters are about 617 and 512 feet; of the arena, about 282 and 177 feet. The exterior was ornamented with four tiers of engaged columns with their entablatures, the lowest three enclosing arches, and the highest walled up, with square windows in every second intercolumniation. The material of the interior is stone, of the inner passages and vaults largely brick and concrete. The marble seats accommodated between 40,000 and 50,000 people. Sailors from the imperial fleet were detailed to handle the great awnings which protected the spectators from the burning sun. The interior was faced with marble. In the substructions there is a most elaborate system of chambers, passages, dens, and drains. Despite the enormous mass of the existing ruin, it is estimated that a large part (perhaps as much as two-thirds) has been carried away in the Middle Ages and later, for building material. The name Colosseum, not encountered in the literature before the 8th century A.D. but probably in popular use long before that, was derived from a colossal gilded bronze statue of Nero which once stood nearby.

Flavius (flā'vi-us), Cnaeus. Early writer on Roman law who was active in the 4th century B.C. He was the son of a freedman, and became secretary to Appius Claudius Caecus. In his time in Rome information as to the days on which cases might properly be pleaded (known as fasti) remained exclusively in the possession of the patricians. Flavius obtained possession of the forms pertaining to the law of practice, and a calendar of the days (fasti) on which cases could be pleaded. This information was invaluable to the plebeians, as any infraction of the forms, or any error in the day would automatically cause the loss of a case. Flavius published this vital information in a collection known as the Ius Civile Flavianum. He was afterward made a senator by Appius Claudius, and was elected curule aedile in 304 B.C.

Flood. In Greek mythology, the means which Zeus employed to destroy the wicked men of the Age of Iron. According to most accounts, only Deucalion, the son of Prometheus, and his wife Pyrrha were spared to create a new race of men. Other accounts say that Megarus, a son of Zeus, was warned by cranes and fled to Mount Gerania, which was not covered by the flood; also Cerambus was saved. The latter was changed into a beetle by nymphs and flew off to Mount Parnassus.

Flora (flō'ra). Ancient Italian goddess of flowers and spring, and perhaps of love. Her cult in later Roman religion was influenced by foreign rites; her festival, the Floralia, was celebrated from April 28 to May 1 with mummary and games and the type of license associated with all fertility festivals.

Florence (flor'ents). [Latin, Florientia; Italian, Fiorenza, now Firenze.] Ancient town in Tuscany, on the banks of the river Arnus (Arno), probably established in the 1st century B.C. as a Roman colony, traces of whose checkerboard plan and a few streets have survived. In the Middle Ages and Renaissance it was a center of intense creative activity. Driven by Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarch, Macchiavelli, and Galileo, and the artists Cimabue, Giotto, the della Robbias, Donatello, Botticelli, da Vinci, Michelangelo, Raphael, Cellini, and their hardly less distinguished pupils, Florence became the intellectual capital of Italy and the artistic capital of Europe. The Galleria degli Uffizi contains, in addition to splendid Florentine paintings, a major collection of Greek and Roman sculptures, and the archaeological museum holds important Etruscan, Greek, and Roman ceramics, bronzes, and some sculptures. (JJ)

Florus (flō'rus), Lucius Annaeus. Roman historian who was active at the beginning of the 2nd century A.D. He was the author of an abridgment of Roman history to the time of Augustus (Epitome de Gestis Romanorum), founded chiefly on Livy. By some scholars he has been identified with the rhetorician and poet P. Annius Florus.

Fons (fōnz). In Roman mythology, the god of springs. He was the son of Janus and Juturna. There was an altar to Fons on the Janiculum in Rome, and at the time of his festival, in October, fountains and springs were decorated with wreaths and garlands were thrown into their waters as offerings to him.

Formiae (fôr'mi-ē). [Modern name, Formia; formerly Mola di Gaeta.] Town in Latium, C Italy, situated on the Gulf of Caieta, about 44 miles NW of Neapolis (Naples). An ancient town of the Volsci, on the Appian Way, it became a Roman city with limited rights of citizenship in 322 B.C., and with full rights in 188 B.C. It was a summer resort of rich Romans from the time of the late republic; Cicero had a villa here. Remains of ancient Roman structures are still standing.

Fornax (fôr'naks). In Roman mythology, the goddess of grain and specifically, the goddess of ovens. Her festival, the Fornacalia, was celebrated in February on different days, one day for the state, and one each for the curiae (tribal divisions) of Rome.

Fortuna (fôr-tū'na). In Roman religion, the goddess of fortune and good luck, corresponding to the Greek Tyche. She was worshiped in Rome in many aspects: as goddess of chance or luck she was called Fors Fortuna; as goddess of women, Fortuna muliebris; as patron of newly-wedded girls, Fortuna virginensis; as goddess of virility in men, Fortuna virilis. She was also famous as Fortuna Redux whose festival, the Augustalia, was celebrated Oct. 3-12. She had oracular shrines at Antium and Praeneste. At Praeneste she was called Primigenia, and regarded as the oldest daughter of Jupiter.

Forum Appii (fō'rum ap'i-i). In ancient geography, a station on the Appian Way, about 40 miles SE of Rome.

Forum Boarium (fō'rum bō-ā'ri-um). Early cattle market of ancient Rome. It was bounded on the N by the area called the Velabrum, on the E by the Palatine Hill, on the S by the Aventine Hill at the extremity of the Circus Maximus, and on the W by the Tiber River. It is said that at an early date gladiatorial shows were given here, and that human sacrifices were made by burial alive.

Forum Holitorium (hō-li-tō'ri-um). Vegetable market of ancient Rome. It occupied the southern extremity of the Campus Martius, beneath the Capitoline Hill, stretching into the Velabrum, and separated from the Forum Boarium only by the Servian Wall. Of the 15 or more temples known to have stood in this district of Rome, three which stood side by side have been found incorporated into the later church of San Nicola in Carcere. It has been suggested that these temples were those dedicated to Spes (Hope), Juno Sospita, and Dis Pater or Janus; but no certain proof is available. (JJ)

Forum Julium (jō'li-um, jōl'yum). Earliest of the imperial forums of ancient Rome, designed to relieve the crowding of the Forum Romanum. It was begun by Julius Caesar (46 B.C.), and practically adjoined the northern side of the Forum Romanum at its eastern end. It was surrounded with porticoes, and its central area was occupied by a richly adorned peripteral temple of Venus Genetrix. Some finely arcaded and vaulted chambers of the enclosure exist near the southwest angle; they were probably offices for legal business.

Forum of Augustus (ô-gus'tus). Second of the imperial forums of ancient Rome; dedicated in 2 B.C. The existing remains include very impressive stretches of the enclosing wall, one of the entrance arches now called Arco de' Pantani, and some columns and walls of the temple of Mars Ultor.

Forum of Nerva (nēr'va). [Also: Forum Palladium, Forum Transitorium.] Fourth of the imperial forums of ancient Rome; built by Domitian and dedicated by Nerva in 97 A.D.

Forum of Trajan (trā'jan). Largest and the northernmost of the imperial forums of ancient Rome, adjoining the NW side of the Forum of Augustus, and lying between the northeastern declivity of the Capitoline Hill and the Quirinal. It consisted of three parts: 1) the forum proper, 2) the huge Basilica Ulpia, and 3) the temple of Trajan, with its colonnaded enclosure. Between the temple of Trajan and the Basilica Ulpia rises the column of Trajan, beneath which was the emperor's mausoleum. To create an area for this lavish monumental display, Trajan cut away a large ridge of tufa which extended from the Capitoline to the Quirinal. The forum was completed for Trajan by the architect Apollodorus of Damascus in 114 A.D.

Forum Pacis (pā'sis) or Forum of Vespasian (ves-pā'zhan). Third of the imperial forums of ancient Rome. It was the southernmost of the imperial forums, and lay behind the Basilica Aemilia, which fronted on the Forum Romanum. It was built to enclose the temple of peace which was dedicated by Vespasian in 75 A.D. in honor of the taking of Jerusalem, and is described by Pliny as one of the four finest buildings of Rome. In it were dedicated the spoils of the Jewish temple, represented on the Arch of Titus; and here too Vespasian placed the works of art taken by Nero from Delphi and other Greek cities. A massive stretch of the exterior wall of this forum still stands, near the western end of the basilica of Constantine, with a fine flat-arched doorway of travertine.

Forum Romanum (rō-mā'num). Famous Roman forum which from the time of the kings formed the political center of ancient Rome. Beginning in a hollow on the eastern slope of the Capitoline Hill, its long and comparatively narrow area stretched in a direction south of east beneath the northern declivity of the Palatine Hill. Its western end was occupied by the tabularium, or office of the archives, in front of which stood the temples of Concord and of Vespasian. On its southern side were the temple of Saturn, the Basilica Julia, the temples of Castor and Pollux and of Vesta, and on its northern side the arch of Septimius Severus, the Curia, the Basilica Aemilia, and the temples of Antoninus and Faustina and of Romulus. In the middle of the eastern part rose the temple and rostra of Julius Caesar. The more ancient and famous rostra from which Cicero spoke were at the western end. The area was neglected and abused during the Middle Ages and Renaissance and although it has been thoroughly excavated and painstakingly studied by generations of scholars, many difficult problems of topography remain unsolved.

Frentani (fren-tā'nī). Ancient Italian people related to the Samnites, dwelling along the Adriatic coast northwest of Apulia. They were subjugated by the Romans in 304 B.C.

Frigidus (frij'i-dus). [Also: Frigidus Fluvius.] In ancient geography, a small river in what is now NW Yugoslavia: noted for its coldness. In its valley Theodosius defeated the forces of Eugenius and Arbogast in 394 A.D.

Frogs, The. Comedy of Aristophanes, produced 405 B.C. and awarded the first prize. Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides having died, Dionysus is dissatisfied with the new poets who have come to take their place at his festivals. He decides to go to Hades and fetch Euripides back to earth. Disguised as Heracles, with a lion's skin, he goes to Hades with his servant, but immediately shows how unworthy he is of Heracles' mantle by exhibiting the utmost cowardice before the creatures of Hades. Frightened, he hands the lion's skin to his servant and pushes him forward. Relieved of his fears, he seizes the lion's skin and makes boasts—the passages are hilarious. In Hades Dionysus finds not only Euripides but also Sophocles, who has no desire to return to earth, and Aeschylus as well. He is embarrassed to have to choose between Euripides and Aeschylus. They each present their claims to be chosen. Dionysus seems about to choose Euripides, but at the last moment, on impulse, he selects Aeschylus. The play is named for the chorus, representing the frogs that lived in the marshes near Eleusis, where Dionysus passed on his way to Hades.

Frontinus (fron-tī'nus), Sextus Julius. Roman writer. He was born c30 A.D. and died c103. He fought in Britain and held public office under the emperors Vespasian, Nerva, and Trajan. Nerva appointed him superintendent of aqueducts. From experience gained in this post he wrote De Aquis Urbis Romae, an interesting history and description of the water supply of Rome, and the laws governing its use and maintenance. This work, published in the time of Trajan, survives. Also in the time of Trajan he served as augur and as consul. Among other of Frontinus' works still extant are: Strategemata, which describes instances of military strategy taken from Greek and Roman campaigns, and excerpts from a work on land surveying.

Fronto (fron'tō), Marcus Cornelius. Roman rhetorician and orator. He was born at Cirta c100 A.D., in Numidia, and died c166. By his eloquent oratory he earned the admiration of the emperors Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, and was put in charge of the education of the young Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. For a time (143) he served as consul, but ill health compelled him to give up this post. He corresponded with Marcus Aurelius and a collection of his letters, some in Greek, survives. Fronto was an advocate of a return to the more classic style of earlier Roman letters.

Frusino (frö'sē-nō). [Modern name, Frosinone.] In ancient geography, a town of the Hernici, in C Italy, about 53 miles SE of Rome. Conquered by the Romans in 304 B.C., it later became a colony of Rome.

Fucinus, Lacus (fū'si-nus lā'kus). [Modern name, Fucino, Lago di Fucino (or di Celano).] Former lake in C Italy, near the towns of Avezzano and Celano. Mentioned in the Aeneid as a limpid lake which wept for Umbro, a snake charmer who was killed by a Trojan in the war between Aeneas and the Rutulians under Turnus. It was drained by Prince Torlonia, who began the work in 1852. It had been partly drained in the reign of Claudius. It had no outlet, and measured about 37 miles in circumference.

Fulvia (ful'vi-ā). Roman matron, wife of Publius Clodius, then of Curio, and later of Mark Antony. She fomented a rising (the Perusine war) against Octavian in 41 B.C., in order to draw Antony away from Egypt and Cleopatra. By Clodius she was the mother of Claudia. When Fulvia was later married to Mark Antony, this daughter Claudia was given to Octavian (Augustus) in marriage in order to draw closer the two leading figures in Rome after the murder of Caesar. Augustus quarreled with Fulvia and divorced Claudia. Fulvia's son by Mark Antony, who fled to the image of the god Julius for sanctuary when Antony was defeated, was slain at Augustus' order. Fulvia died at Sicyon, Greece, in 40 B.C.

Fundi (fun'di). [Modern name, Fondi.] In ancient geography, a town of the Volsci, situated on the Appian Way, near the Gulf of Tarracina between Rome and Naples, Italy. Because the inhabitants granted the Romans safe passage through their territory they were given limited citizenship by the Romans (c388 B.C.). In 188 B.C. they received full citizenship. Parts of the ancient walls and gates remain.

Furculae Caudinae (fēr'kū-lē kô-dī'nē). Latin name of the Caudine Forks.

Furiae (fū'ri-ē) or Furies. In Roman mythology, goddesses adopted from the Erinyes of Greek mythology.

Gabii (gā'bi-i). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, situated about halfway between Rome and Praeneste at the foot of the Alban Hills; one of the oldest of the cities belonging to the Latin federation. It was a nameless site at the time when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld. Anchises pointed out to him the shade of the man waiting to be born who would found the city. According to Roman legend it was conquered by Tarquinius Superbus in the following manner: His youngest son, Sextus, presented himself before Gabii in the guise of a fugitive from his father's tyranny, and was received by the Gabines as their leader, whereupon Sextus sent to Rome for further instructions. The messenger found Tarquin in his garden. Without saying a word, the king knocked off the heads of the tallest poppies. The messenger returned to Sextus, who saw the meaning of the parable, and cut off the heads of the chief men of Gabii, which was then surrendered to Tarquin. The most notable remains of antiquity is the barnlike shell of a temple cella in the local tufa, dating most plausibly from the 2nd century B.C., perhaps of the temple of Juno of Gabii. Gabine tufa, lapis Gabinus, was quarried in substantial quantities for new construction at Rome.

Gabinian Law (gā-bin'i-an). [Latin, Lex Gabinia.] In Roman history: 1) Law passed in 67 B.C., by which Pompey was invested for three years with unlimited command over the whole Mediterranean and its coasts for 50 miles inland, and received unconditional control of the public treasuries of the provinces, for the purpose of conducting the war against the pirates. 2) Law passed in 58 B.C., which forbade loans of money at Rome to legations from foreign countries, the object of which was to prevent such legations from borrowing money to bribe the senators.

Gabinus (gā-bin'i-us), Aulus. Roman tribune (67 B.C.); died at Salona, in Dalmatia, c47 B.C. He proposed a law giving Pompey command against the pirates, for which reason the law was called the Gabinian Law. (See article immediately preceding.)

Gabrias (gā'bri-as). See Babrius.

Gadara (gad'a-ra). In ancient geography, a city of the Decapolis in Syria, situated about seven miles SE of the Sea of Galilee, probably the capital of Peraea; the modern village of Umm Qeis (Um Keis). It was rebuilt by Pompey. There are remains of a large Roman theater, not excavated in a hill but entirely built up of masonry on vaulted substructions and in good preservation, and of a smaller theater on the same site. Orthography has led the place to be associated with the parable of the Gadarene swine (the herd of swine into which demons were cast from two men and which then perished. Matt. viii. 28; Mark, v. 1; Luke, viii. 26). The textual variants (Gadarenes, Gerasenes, Gergesenes) in the several books have led some to believe that the miracle occurred either at Gadara or at Gerasa (modern Jerash, in Jordan), but modern scholarship identifies the scene with Kersa, a town on the E shore of the Sea of Galilee on the Wadi Samak, where the physical setting is more in consonance with the Biblical description than it is at either Gadara or Gerasa.

Gadeira (ga-dī'ra) or Gadira. The Greek name for Gades (q.v.). It was here that Heracles was believed to have stopped on his way to fetch the cattle of Geryon, and erected the Pillars of Heracles, one on the continent of Africa and one on the continent of Europe.

Gades (gā'dēz). [Phoenician, Gadir; Greek, Gadeira or Gadira.] In ancient geography, the remotest colony of the Phoenicians in the west. It was founded c1100 B.C. beyond Gibraltar at the NW extremity of an island, about 12 miles long, which lies off the W coast of Spain, and occupied almost exactly the same site as the modern city of Cádiz. It was the headquarters of the western commerce of the Phoenicians, and contained various temples of the Phoenician gods. The Carthaginians used Gades as a base for their conquest of Spain. It fell to the Romans in 206 B.C.

Gaea (jē'a). [Also: Gaia, Ge.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of the earth. Some say she was the child of Air and Day. Others say she was sprung directly from Chaos. She was the mother of Uranus (the sky-god), Pontus (a sea-god), and the mountains. She bore Uranus in her sleep and by him became the mother of the Hecatonchires, the Cyclopes, the Titans, and the Titanesses. Because Uranus hid the Cyclopes in Tartarus, Gaea plotted against him. She gave Cronus, one of the Titans, the sickle with which he cut off Uranus' genitals when all the Titans except Oceanus attacked their father. Drops of blood from this mutilation fell on Gaea and she bore the Erinyes and the Melic nymphs. Gaea prophesied that Cronus, who had deposed his father, would be dethroned himself by one of his children. When Cronus was later attacked by his son Zeus, Gaea advised Zeus to release the Cyclopes, who had again been imprisoned in Tartarus by Cronus. By her son Pontus, Gaea was the mother of Nereus, Phorcys, Thaumias, Eurybia, and Ceto. After the defeat of the Giants by Zeus, Gaea, enraged, lay with Tartarus and brought forth the monster Typhon. She is also said by some to have been the mother of Ladon, the dragon that guarded the golden apples of the Hesperides; of Antaeus, a king in Libya who was killed by Heracles; of Charybdis, the sea monster; of the 24 Giants born at Phlegra in Attica; and of the earth-born serpent-kings Erechtheus and Cecrops. Gaea was invoked as a witness to oaths. She was worshiped with the sacrifice of a black lamb and her priestesses drank bull's blood, considered to be deadly poison to ordinary mortals. She was honored as the mother of all, who nourishes her children and gives them rich blessings. She was also regarded as an Underworld deity who reclaims her children in the end. Her cults were very numerous. The earliest oracle at Olympia was hers, as was also the first oracle at Delphi. Some say Apollo stole the latter from her, but others say she gave it to the Titaness Phoebe and it was from her that Apollo got it. The Romans identified Gaea with their Tellus.

Gaeochus (ji-ē'ō-kus). Epithet of Poseidon, meaning "Earth-moving." See Ennosigaeus.

Gaeta (gā-ē'tā). See Caieta.

Gaetulia (jē-tū'li-a). In ancient geography, the land of the Gaetuli, mentioned in the Aeneid as a warlike tribe that threatened Dido and Carthage. It was a region in N Africa, S of Mauretania and Numidia, extending from the land of the Garamantes W to the Atlantic. The Gaetulians were subjected to Roman rule about the time of Christ.

Gaia (gā'a). See Gaea.

Gaius (gā'us). See Caius.

Galata (ga'la-tā). According to legend, a princess of Gaul, said to have been the ancestress of the Gauls of Alesia, and hence of all the Gallic race, by her brief union with Heracles. He passed through that region, and founded Alesia, on his journey to fetch the cattle of Geryon.

Galatea (gal-a-tē'a). In mythology, a sea-nymph, the daughter of Nereus and Doris, who frolicked on the shores of Sicily near Mount Aetna. She was loved by Polyphemus, the one-eyed Cyclops, who pursued her constantly, singing of his love for her and of the gifts he could offer her. But Galatea loved the handsome and youthful son of Faunus and a sea-nymph. He was Acis, and she gave him the love Polyphemus so ardently desired. One day as Polyphemus was playing love songs about Galatea on his shepherd's pipe, he chanced upon her, lying in the arms of Acis. In a rage he attacked them. Galatea plunged into the sea to escape, momentarily abandoning her lover, and Polyphemus hurled a huge stone at Acis and crushed him. Galatea, returning in search of Acis, caused the rock which covered him to crack open, and from the cleft the blood of Acis flowed out and was transformed into the river which bears his name.

Galatea. In mythology, a beautiful ivory statue, made by the sculptor Pygmalion, son of Belus, who lived on the island of Cyprus. He fell in love with his work of art and asked Aphrodite, at a festival in honor of the goddess, to give him a wife like the statue. Flames leaped up from the altar to show that the goddess had heard his plea, and when he returned home and kissed the statue it came to life. As the wife of Pygmalion, Galatea bore Paphus and Metharme.

Galatea. In Greek legend, Cretan mother of a daughter (called Leucippus) who brought the girl up disguised in boy's garments in order to deceive her husband who had ordered that the child be killed at birth if it were a girl. Eventually Galatea and Leucippus took refuge in the temple of Leto. Galatea prayed that her daughter might be changed into a boy, and the transformation took place. This same story is told by Ovid, in the Metamorphoses, of Telethusa, whose daughter Iphis was transformed by the help of Io to a young man.

Galatea. Character in Vergil's third eclogue. She hid herself among the willows in order to be followed. In literature, she is symbolic of coquetry.

Galatia (ga-lā'shā). In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, lying between Bithynia and Paphlagonia on the N, Pontus on the E, Cappadocia and Lycaonia on the S, and Phrygia on the W; originally a part of Phrygia and Cappadocia. It was conquered and settled by a Celtic people which crossed the Hellespont in 278 B.C. It was made a Roman province in 25 B.C. Theodosius subdivided it into Galatia Prima and Galatia Secunda. See also under Gaul.

Galba (gal'ba), Servius Sulpicius. Roman emperor (68-69). He was born c3 B.C. near Tarracina; died at Rome, Jan. 15, 69 A.D. The son of an aristocratic and ancient Roman house, he claimed descent from Jupiter on the one hand, and from Pasiphaë, wife of King Minos of Crete, on the other. Various omens foretold his future role as emperor. During the reign of Tiberius it was predicted that he would become emperor when he was an old man. Tiberius, who expected to be safely dead by that time, was unmoved by the prediction and did not interfere with Galba's career. He took part in public affairs and, though still under the legal age, was made praetor (20 A.D.). While holding that office he had charge of the Games, at which, it is said, he introduced the spectacle of tight-rope-walking elephants. He was next appointed governor of the province of Aquitania for a year, and in 33 served as consul for six months. Under Caligula he became governor of Greater Germany and acquitted himself well, raising the standard of discipline and repelling a barbarian raid into Gaul (39). When Caligula was murdered (41) Galba was urged to make himself emperor. He won the favor of Claudius by refusing, and served the emperor well. In 45 he was named proconsul of Africa for two years. He restored order there and won a great reputation for his justice. On his return to Rome he received great honors. Nevertheless, he went into virtual retirement, apparently in fear of his life for, according to Suetonius, he never went anywhere during this period without a second conveyance that carried 10,000 gold pieces—to tide him over in case sudden flight became necessary. In his retirement at Fundi he was offered the governorship of Hispania Tarraconensis (Tarragonian Spain) by the emperor Nero and accepted it (60). He at first set about administering his office with vigor. Then, lest he win the disfavor of Nero by winning too great renown as an administrator and thus appearing as a possible rival, he became less active and careless in his duties. Even so, Nero feared him and gave a secret order for his assassination. By chance Galba discovered it. Shortly afterward, revolt broke out in Gaul, and he joined the insurrection of Caius Julius Vindex (68), and declared himself governor of all Spain, in the name of the Roman Senate and the Roman people. He accepted the title of commander-in-chief, began to raise an army, and announced his rebellion against Nero. His acts, according to Suetonius, were supported by propitious omens: a ring with a stone, engraved with an image of Victory raising a trophy, was found in the city where he made his headquarters; a ship carrying arms, but with no living person aboard, drifted ashore at Tortosa. Just as it appeared that his rebellion might fail through defections and the death of Vindex, news came from Rome that Nero was dead and that the praetorians had revolted and come out in his favor. Galba at once assumed the title of Caesar, and cruelly punished those who had resisted his rebellion. Arrived at Rome he soon lost the support of the Senate and the moderates. He removed many traditional privileges and immunities, savagely punished innocent men and protected his infamous friends. His unpopularity at once became apparent; the army violently opposed him because he refused to carry out a promise of gifts to the soldiers. The people opposed him for his miserliness. The soldiers in Germany refused to swear allegiance to him. Thinking it was because he had no son (his wife and two sons had died and he had long refused to consider remarriage) he adopted Calpurnius Piso Frugi Licinianus as his successor. But Marcus Salvius Otho, an early supporter, had hoped to succeed him, and now organized a revolt among the praetorians and marched against Galba. On false news that the rebels had surrendered, Galba went out to meet them, and was attacked in the Forum. Some say he realized his attackers meant to kill him, and bared his throat to their swords. No one came forward to defend him. His body was left where he was slain. The remains of his mutilated body were eventually buried in his own garden.

Galen (gā'len). [Latin, Claudius Galenus.] Greek physician and philosophical writer, born at Pergamum, in Mysia, Asia Minor, c130 A.D. He died c200, greatly esteemed by his contemporaries. His father Nicon was a mathematician and an architect, who saw to it that his son was well-educated. He completed his studies in philosophy in his native city, and began studying medicine at about the age of 16, traveling and furthering his studies in Smyrna, Corinth, and Alexandria. He returned (157) to Pergamum and took the post of surgeon to the gladiators there for the purpose of increasing his knowledge by treating their many and varied wounds. He went (162) to Rome, where he lectured on anatomy and became a much-sought-after physician. After a few years he was compelled to leave Rome by the attacks of his rivals and traveled in Greece and Asia, returning to Pergamum in 169. From there he was summoned to Rome by the emperor Marcus Aurelius. The emperor wanted Galen to accompany him on his expedition against the Germans, but Galen did not go, remaining in Rome as the attending physician to the emperor's son Commodus. He worked at Rome for some time, and apparently eventually returned to Pergamum. Galen was a prolific writer and is credited with some 500 works, on medicine, logic, grammar, ethics, philosophy, and literature; he wrote on comedy and prepared commentaries on Plato and Aristotle. His medical writings included all branches of medicine: anatomy, physiology, pathology, pharmacology, and treatment, and were translated widely, into Arabic, Hebrew, and Syriac. So extensive were his writings, and so widely imitated, or rather so often were works falsely attributed to him, that Galen himself wrote a descriptive catalogue of his writings, De Propriis Libris. Some 100 treatises known to be, or considered, genuine are extant. Galen's work in medicine and physiology remained the standard for more than 1000 years until it was upset, in the 16th century and after, by the work of such men as Harvey. The reason for its long life was Galen's method of accurate observation; his facts, derived from experimental data, were accurate, but since his experiments were not performed on human beings, some inaccuracies were present.

of Sicily, declared that Galeus was their ancestor.

Galinthias (ga-lin'thi-as), or Galanthis (-this), or Galen (gā'len). In Greek mythology, a faithful handmaid of Heracles' mother Alcmena. Hera conspired with Ilithyia and the Moerae to delay the birth of Heracles for nine days and nights, the Moerae sitting outside the door with knees crossed and hands clasped in sympathetic magic. Galinthias, to help Alcmena end her long labor, mendaciously announced to the waiting goddesses that the birth had taken place. At this news they jumped up, uncrossing their legs and unclenching their hands, thus breaking the spell, and Heracles was born. Galinthias laughed at the goddesses she had tricked and Ilithyia seized her by the hair and changed her into a weasel and, according to some accounts, because she had lied about the birth of Heracles, she was condemned to bear her young through her mouth. Later Hecate pitied her and made her one of her handmaidens, and Heracles erected a shrine for her at Thebes.

Gallic Wars (gal'ik). Name usually applied to Julius Caesar's military campaigns while he was proconsul (58-51 B.C.) of Cisalpine and Transalpine Gaul. He repulsed the Helvetii as they came over the Alps, pursued them to Bibracte, where he defeated them, and then routed their king, Ariovistus. In 57 B.C. he subdued the Belgic tribes, and in 56 he defeated the Veneti. In 55 B.C. he threw back a German invasion and crossed the Rhine by erecting a bridge near Cologne. In 54 B.C. he invaded Britain for the second time, having previously landed in Kent, and in 53 B.C. he crushed a Belgian revolt, crossed the Alps in the dead of winter (regarded as one of his most brilliant exploits), and put down a dangerous revolt in Gaul, led by Vercingetorix. The campaigns are described fully in Caesar's Commentaries (Commentarii de Bello Gallico), one of the great classics of Latin literature, published in 51 B.C., in seven books (the eighth book being by Aulus Hirtius, one of Caesar's lieutenants).

Gallipoli (gal-ip'ō-lē). See Callipolis.

Gallipoli Peninsula. Modern name of the ancient Chersonesus Thracica, a long tongue of land between the Hellespont and the Gulf of Saros.

Gallus (gal'us). In mythology, a priest of Cybele who emasculated himself in the service of Cybele. From then on it was the usage that these priests should be eunuchs. Their worship consisted essentially of wild and boisterous rites and the name was associated with that of the river Gallus, in Phrygia, whose waters were fabled to make those who drank them mad.

Gallus (gal'us), Caius Asinius. Roman politician and writer, consul with C. Marcius Censorianus in 8 B.C. He married Vipsania, formerly wife of Tiberius. He was condemned to death by the Senate (30 A.D.), at the instigation of Tiberius, and died of starvation after an imprisonment of three years. He was a son of C. Asinius Pollio. His works, all of which are lost, included De Comparatione Patris et Ciceronis, to which the emperor Claudius replied in his defense of Cicero.

Gallus, Caius Cornelius. Roman poet, orator, general, and politician. He was born at Forum Julii (modern Fréjus), in Gaul, 69 or 66 B.C. He committed suicide in 26 B.C. He supported Octavian, commanded a part of his army at the battle of Actium in 31 B.C., pursued Antony to Egypt, and was made first prefect of Egypt in 30 B.C. He incurred the enmity of Augustus, was deprived of his post, and was exiled by the Senate. Virtually nothing of Gallus' poetry survives, but he was outstanding among the poets of his age for the development of the love elegy. Among others he is said to have influenced Vergil.

Gamelion (ga-mē'li-on). The seventh month of the Attic year. It consisted of 30 days, and corresponded to the latter half of January and the first part of February.

Ganges (gan'jēz). [Hindi, Ganga; also, in its upper course, Bhagirathi.] Sacred, and greatest, river of India. It rises (under the name of the Bhagirathi) in the Himalayas, near the Tibetan border, and is called the Ganges after its junction with the Alakanada. In its upper course it flows through gorges and mountain valleys, emerging onto its extensive plain at Hardwar. It flows SE across the largest and most densely peopled plain of India, finally emerging upon its great delta of 17,000 square miles where the main stream now enters the Meghna estuary of the Bay of Bengal. At various times it has followed numerous different courses in the delta region, which is traversed by many branching distributaries. Its chief tributaries are the Jumna, Ramganga, Gumti, Gogra, Gandak, Kosi, Atrai, Son, and Jamuna (the main stream of the Brahmaputra). The length of the main stream is 1557 miles. It was formerly navigable from Hardwar, and from Allahabad for larger vessels. It is no longer navigable because of the large amounts of water taken out for irrigation. On it are situated Calcutta, Patna, and many holy places, such as Benares, Allahabad, Hardwar, and Gangotri.

Ganymeda (gan-i-mē'da). Another name for Hebe, handmaiden of the gods. See Hebe.

Ganymede (gan'i-mēd) or Ganymedes (gan-i-mē'dēz). In Greek mythology, a beautiful Trojan youth, the son of Tros and Callirhoë. He was transferred to Olympus (according to Homer, by the gods; according to others, by the eagle of Zeus, or by Zeus himself in the form of an eagle, or by Eos, goddess of the dawn, from whom he was taken by Zeus), to become the cup-bearer of the gods, and became immortal. To compensate his father for the loss of his son, Zeus gave Tros a golden vine and two immortal horses which could run like the wind over water or standing grain. Ganymede supplanted Hebe in her function as cup-bearer, his presence in Olympus thus annoying Hera and giving the goddess another reason for hating the Trojans. Ganymede was later regarded as the genius of water, especially of the Nile, and he is represented in the Zodiac by the constellation Aquarius. In Latin the name appears as Catamitus, whence the English term catamite.

Garamas (ga'ra-mas). Another name for Amphithemis, son of Apollo and Acacallis. Also, according to the Libyans, the name of the first man born to Mother Earth.

Garden of the Hesperides. A legendary garden owned by Atlas, on Mount Atlas, either in Mauretania, in the land of the Hyperboreans, or on an island beyond the stream of ocean. In this garden grew the tree with the golden apples, gift to Hera from Mother Earth. It was guarded by the Hesperides, daughters of Atlas, hence the name.

Garganus (gär-gā'nus). A mountain in Apulia. In this mountainous region, according to the Aeneid, Diomedes built a city after he had been driven out of his home by his wife and her lover when he returned from the Trojan War. The region, a mountainous peninsula projecting into the Adriatic Sea, was later known as Monte Gargano; the highest point is Monte Calvo (3460 feet).

Gargaphia (gär-gā'fi-a), Vale of. In Greek mythology, the vale where Actaeon was torn to pieces by his own hounds, after being transformed into a stag in punishment for having seen Artemis bathing. It was used by Jonson as the scene of Cynthia's Revels.

Gargaron (gär'ga-ron), Mount. [Also: Mount Gargarus.] In ancient geography, the highest summit of Mount Ida, Mysia, in what is now NW Turkey.

Gasterocheires (gas'tér-ō-kī'rēz). In Greek mythology, seven gigantic Cyclopes, who went with Proetus from Lycia, when Proetus and his brother Acrisius divided the kingdom between them, and built the massive walls of Tiryns.

Gate of Italy (it'a-li). Gorge in the Italian Tyrol, in the valley of the Adige River near Rovereto, N Italy.

Gates of Dreams. In Latin mythology, two sets of gates in the Underworld. Through the gates made of horn pass the dreams that are to come true. Through the gates of ivory pass the dreams that are sent to deceive mortals.

Gaugamela (gô-ga-mē'la). In ancient geography, a place in Assyria, near the modern Mosul, the scene of Alexander's victory (331 B.C.) over Darius III of Persia (called the battle of Arbela).

Gaul (gôl). [French, Gaule; German, Gallien; Italian, Latin, and Portuguese, Gallia; Spanish, Galia.] In ancient geography, the country of the Gauls; in an inexact use, France. It was divided into Cisalpine Gaul and Transalpine Gaul, and is often taken as equivalent to Transalpine Gaul. The name Galatia was also sometimes used, specifically Celtic or Roman Galatia. In the later Roman Empire Gaul comprised the dioceses of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and corresponded to Spain, Portugal, a small strip of Morocco, France, Belgium, Switzerland, the Netherlands and Germany to the Rhine, England, Wales, and the S part of Scotland.

actor; up, lûte, pûll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ð as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

Gallia Citerior.] In ancient history, that part of Gaul lying on the S side of the Alps. It extended from the Alps S and E. A Roman colony was founded (282 B.C.) at Sena Gallica. Part of the country was reduced between the First and Second Punic Wars, Mediolanum (Milan) and Comum (Como) being captured, and the conquest was completed in 201–191 B.C. It was made a Roman province, and was incorporated (42 B.C.) with Italy.

Gaul, Cispadane. [Latin, Gallia Cispadana.] In ancient geography, the part of Cisalpine Gaul S of the Padus (Po) River.

Gaul, Transalpine. [Latin, Gallia Transalpina.] In ancient geography, that part of Gaul which lay beyond the Alps (that is, N and NW of the Alps from Rome). It comprised in the Roman period Narbonensis, Aquitania, Lugdunensis, and Belgica. Its ancient inhabitants were Gauls, Iberians, and Germans. Many remains of early inhabitants have been discovered, especially in the center of Gaul (Auvergne, and elsewhere). The Gallic antiquities are especially numerous in the N (Brittany). Some Greek colonies were planted in early times in the S. The Roman settlements were made first in the SE in the end of the 2nd century B.C. Gaul was thoroughly conquered (58–51 B.C.) by Julius Caesar. Augustus divided it into four provinces.

Gaul, Transpadane. [Latin, Gallia Transpadana.] In ancient geography, the part of Cisalpine Gaul N of the Padus (Po) River.

Gauls (gôlz). The people of ancient Gaul, described as tall and blond, and classified as Continental Celts. They included not only the Celtic Belgae, but numerous named tribes inhabiting Gaul and extending even into Galatia, Asia Minor, which was settled by them in the 3rd century B.C.

Gaumata (gô-mă'ta) or Gaumates (-têz). Median magus. See Smerdis, False.

Gaurus (gô'rus). [Modern name, Monte Barbaro.] In ancient geography, a mountain in Italy, about seven miles W of Neapolis (Naples). Here, c342 B.C., the Romans under Valerius Corvus defeated the Samnites.

Gaza (gă'za). [Also: Ghazze, Ghazzeh.] Sea-port and important trading place in SW Palestine, near the Mediterranean coast, about 50 miles SW of Jerusalem: one of the five chief cities of the ancient Philistines. The town was taken by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. after a two-months' siege.

Ge (jê). See Gaea.

Gedrosia (jê-drô'zha). In ancient geography, a country in Asia, corresponding nearly to the modern Baluchistan and SE Iran. It was bounded on the N by Drangiana and Arachosia, on the E by India, on the S by the Indian Ocean, and on the W by Carmania. It was a province of the Persian Empire, and voluntarily submitted to Alexander the Great when he passed the winter at nearby Seistan (330–329 B.C.). He made it a satrapy with its capital at Pura. On his return journey from India (325 B.C.), Alexander elected to march through the trackless deserts of coastal Gedrosia, to parallel the voyage of Nearchus along the coast. With little water and failing supplies, parched by the heat and exhausted by the shifting sands through which they marched, the army suffered great losses in the wastelands of Gedrosia. Some say the force was reduced to one-quarter its size; others say Alexander lost more men in the desert of Gedrosia to heat, thirst, and exhaustion, than he lost in all his campaigns.

Gegania gens (jê-gă'ni-a). In the history of ancient Rome, a patrician house or clan which traced its origin to the mythical Gyas, one of the companions of Aeneas. On the destruction of Alba by Tullus Hostilius it was transplanted to Rome, and rose to considerable distinction in the early period of the republic. Its only recorded cognomen was Macerinus.

Gela (jê'lă). [Former name, Terranova di Sicilia.] City on the S coast of the island of Sicily. Ancient Gela, on whose site the modern town is built, was founded (689 B.C.) by colonists from Crete under the leadership of Entimus, and by colonists from Rhodes under the leadership of Antiphemus, the two groups having united to found the city. The city, on a hill between the sea and a plain, was named for the nearby Gelas River, called "its own wild river." The Rhodians called the fortified citadel of the new city Lindii, after their own city of Lindus in Rhodes. The colonists adopted Dorian institutions in their new home. About 100 years after the founding of Gela, colonists from the city founded Acragas (Agrigentum), which became the second most important city of ancient Sicily. Under the tyrant Hippocrates (died 491 B.C.), Gela flourished and extended its power over Naxos, Zancle, Camarina, and other Greek cities of Sicily. Gelon, who succeeded Hippocrates as tyrant, won control over Syracuse. He moved his court and half the inhabitants of Gela to Syracuse, leaving his brother Hieron in charge of a greatly reduced Gela. Henceforth, Gela which had been the most powerful Greek city in Sicily, gave place to Syracuse. In 405 B.C. the Carthaginians attacked and laid siege to Gela. The inhabitants defended their walls courageously. They appealed to Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, for aid, and he did indeed march out with the apparent intention of helping them to drive off the Carthaginians. However, he seems to have betrayed them, and instead of helping them, he persuaded them to march out under cover of darkness and abandon their city. By the terms of a peace he afterward negotiated with Carthage, Gela fell to the Carthaginians, who destroyed it. Some of the inhabitants afterward moved back and rebuilt it, and it was fortified again by Timoleon in 338 B.C. In 312 B.C. Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse, massacred 4000 of the inhabitants in the course of a war with Carthage, and it was finally destroyed in 282 B.C. by the Mamertines, after which the few remaining inhabitants were transferred to a neighboring town. Remains of temples of the 6th and 5th centuries B.C. have been found at the site, and recent excavations have uncovered long stretches of the 4th century B.C. city walls, with superstructure of mud brick on a socle of carefully fitted ashlar stone masonry, a discovery of extraordinary importance for the history of military architecture. Smaller finds are tastefully displayed in the new museum.

Gelanor (jē-lā'nôr). In Greek legend, a king of Argos. Danaus landed in his kingdom and claimed his throne. Gelanor was persuaded to yield it peacefully to him by an omen: a wolf came boldly down from the hills and attacked a herd of cattle and killed the leading bull. The Argives interpreted this to mean that their leading bull, Gelanor, would be killed by the bold Danaus if he didn't give up his throne. Rather than suffer the fate of the bull, Gelanor gave up his throne.

Geleon (jel'e-on). According to Greek tradition, one of the four sons of Ion. One of the four ancient tribes of Athens was named for him. His brothers were Aegicores, Argades, and Hoples.

Gellius (jel'i-us), Aulus. Roman grammarian, born c123 A.D.; fl. in the 2nd century. After receiving an education in rhetoric at Rome he went to Athens to study philosophy. While there he became interested in the Greek writers and read widely in their works. On his return to Rome he wrote Noctes Atticae, based on the material he had read and studied in the long evenings in Athens. The work was in 20 books. Of the eighth book only chapter-headings and brief fragments survive. His work is valuable as a conscientious account of all that he could learn about archaic literature and language, laws, philosophy, and natural science.

Gelon (je'lon) or Gelo (je'lō). Tyrant of Gela (491 B.C.) and later of Syracuse (485 B.C.), in Sicily; died 478 B.C. He was the son of Deinomenes, a descendant of a noble and priestly family. In the wars against Naxos, Zancle, Leontini, and Syracuse carried on by Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, Gelon distinguished himself as a general of cavalry. On the death of Hippocrates (491 B.C.), Gelon offered his support to the sons of Hippocrates, but on gaining power from an unwilling people, he swept aside the sons of Hippocrates and made himself tyrant. In 485 B.C. the nobles of Syracuse, who had been driven out by the people, appealed to Gelon for aid. He used their appeal as a pretext for marching against Syracuse, won control of it and made himself master, not only of the common people but of the nobles who had appealed for his aid as well. Gelon moved his court and half the inhabitants of Gela to Syracuse, which possessed great natural advantages for defense and for shipping. He enlarged Syracuse to include a high promontory on the mainland as well as the island of Ortygia, which was the site of the original city, and enclosed both within one great wall from the sea on one side to the inner harbor on the other. A new agora was laid out close to the harbor near the wall and installations for shipping were constructed to utilize the geographical advantages of the enlarged city. To secure inhabitants for his enlarged city he razed the city of Camarina to the ground and moved its inhabitants to Syracuse. New citizens were also drawn from the cities of Megara, a northern neighbor of Syracuse, and Euboea, farther up the coast. The nobles from these places became citizens of Syracuse. The common people were sold into slavery. Gelon was himself of the noble class and, though tolerant of the whims of the populace, he preferred his own class and looked upon the commons as "a thankless neighbor." At his own court he was supported by his brothers Polyxalus and Hieron. Envoys from Athens and Sparta went to seek Gelon's aid in the war that Xerxes was preparing to wage on Greece. According to Herodotus, Gelon offered his assistance on condition that he be made commander of all the Greek forces, or, failing that, if he were made commander either of the land forces or of the fleet. Otherwise he would neither go himself nor send aid. He made this offer, he said, in spite of the fact that the Greeks had refused to help him against the Carthaginians. The Greeks could not accept his conditions and sailed home. As it happened, Gelon was fully engaged in Sicily. He was closely linked by ties of marriage to Theron, tyrant of Acragas. Theron quarreled with Terillus, tyrant of Himera, and drove him out. Terillus sought aid from the Carthaginians, who brought a vast army into Sicily under the command of Hamilcar, to recover Himera for Terillus. Theron besieged in Himera by the Carthaginians, appealed to Gelon for aid. Gelon immediately hastened to his rescue with a large force. By a stratagem he got some of his horsemen into the city. There they found Hamilcar sacrificing at the great altar of Poseidon. They captured and killed him, and set fire to his ships. When Gelon received the signal that they had been successful Gelon marched his army against the land forces of Hamilcar and, after a long and desperate struggle, won a complete victory (480 B.C.). The forces of the Carthaginians were annihilated. Some say this great victory of Gelon's over the Carthaginians fell on the same day as the victory of the Greeks over the Persians at Salamis. By the victory

Gelon repulsed for some time to come the encroachments of the Carthaginians in Sicily. He died 478 B.C., leaving instructions to his brother Polyxalus to marry his widow, Damarata, daughter of Theron, and to share the rule of Syracuse with another brother Hieron. Gelonus (je-lō'nus). According to Herodotus, a son of Heracles and a fabulous serpent-tailed woman of Scythia. His brothers were Scythes and Agathyrus. Because he failed to draw Heracles' bow and put on his girdle in a certain way, complying with Heracles' instructions, his mother sent him out of the land.

GEMINI

Pictured according to ancient descriptions

Gemini (jem'i-nī). The third sign of the zodiac—the Twins—which the sun enters about May 21. Also, a zodiacal constellation. It represents the two youths Castor and Pollux, sitting side by side. In the heads of the twins respectively are situated the two bright stars which go by their names—Castor to the west, a greenish star intermediate between the first and second magnitudes; and Pollux to the east, a full yellow star of the first magnitude.

Genetrix (jen'e-triks). An epithet of Venus, meaning "Mother," and applied to her as the mother of the Julian family through her son Aeneas, and thus of all the Romans.

Genetyllis (jen-ē-tīl'is). [Also: Gennaidēs.]

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

In Greek mythology, a goddess, protectress of births, a companion of Aphrodite. The name is also used as an epithet of Aphrodite and of Artemis. In the plural, Genetyllides, it is applied to a body of divinities presiding over childbirth, and attached to the train of Aphrodite.

Genius (jē'ni-us). In Roman mythology, the presiding divinity of a place, person, or thing; a deity attending the individual which determines his character, conduct, and destiny.

Gerania (jēr-ā'ni-ā). A mountain in Greece to which Megarus, a son of Zeus, fled when Zeus sent a flood to destroy wicked mankind. Deucalion and Pyrrha also survived the flood, but on Mount Parnassus.

Gerasa (jēr'a-sā). [Modern name, Jerash.] In ancient geography, a city of the Decapolis, in Palestine, about 56 miles NE of Jerusalem. The site contains many antiquities. The forum, which is oval and 300 feet long, is surrounded by a range of Ionic columns, many of which still stand with their entablature. From it extends a great colonnaded street, intersecting the entire city, and crossed at right angles by another. More than 100 columns still stand along the street. They seem to have formed a series of porticoes with galleries above. Among the remains are those of a great temple, the cella of which (66 by 78 feet) is in great part standing, together with many columns of the peristyle. A theater has 28 tiers of seats still remaining above ground, with one precincton (landing), to which vaulted passages give access. In the back wall of the precincton there are small chambers, perhaps boxes. A gallery surrounds the top of the cavea. A smaller theater on the same site is equally perfect and interesting. Gerasa was important in the early Christian period, and the early churches, incorporated in pagan temples and other structures, are important for understanding the development of church architecture and the history of the early church.

Gerania (jēr-ē'ni-ā). A Laconian town on the border of Messenia. It was formerly called Enope. Nestor lived here for a time, whence his epithet "Geranian Nestor." He either was brought up here in his childhood, or fled to this place when Pylus was captured by Heracles. To Gerania, Nestor brought the bones of Machaon, the physician, after the Trojan War, and at the tomb and sanctuary of Machaon in Gerenia, men were cured of diseases.

Gergovia (jēr-gō'vi-ā). In ancient geography, a Gallic town, situated in the region known today as the Plateau de Gergovie, S of what is now Clermont-Ferrand, France. Caesar besieged it (52 B.C.), and was defeated here by Vercingetorix. There are some relics on the site.

Germania (jēr-mā'ni-ā). In ancient geography, the region included between the Mare Germanicum (North Sea), Mare Suevicum (Baltic Sea), Vistula River, Ister (Danube) River, and Rhenus (Rhine) River (from near Mainz to near Emmerich); often extended to include certain territories W of the Rhenus. In the first sense it was never a part of the Roman Empire.

Germanicus (jēr-man'i-kus). See Claudius I. Germanicus. See Drusus, Nero Claudius.

Germanicus, Claudius Tiberius. Original name of Britannicus.

Germanicus Julius Caesar (sē'zār). Roman general, born 15 B.C.; died near Antioch, Oct. 9, 19 A.D. He was the son of Nero Claudius Drusus and Antonia the Younger, and was the nephew of the emperor Tiberius, by whom he was adopted. Germanicus was a noble example of the finest Roman traits: he was handsome, brave, kind, and possessed of a gift for winning the respect and devotion of his troops, his relatives, and the Roman people. He was skilled in Greek and Roman oratory and letters and translated Greek works into Latin. His modest manner of living endeared him to the common people. His care to make sacrifices at the tombs of famous men emphasized his own humility and piety. His personal qualities so endeared him to Augustus that the latter had considered, some say, making Germanicus his heir, but decided instead on Tiberius and ordered him to adopt Germanicus. Added to his other qualities was great military ability. While still under the legal age for such offices he served as quaestor and as consul. He was in Germany with his troops when news of the death of Augustus arrived (14 A.D.). His devoted troops would have proclaimed him emperor in place of Tiberius, but he was loyal and forbade them to do so. The Senate appointed him commander of the forces in Germany. He conducted three campaigns against the Germans (14–16 A.D.), and in the latter year defeated Arminius in a great battle on the Campus Idistavisus between what are now Minden and Hameln, Germany. His successes and his popularity roused the jealousy of Tiberius and he was recalled, but the wild acclamation of the crowd at the triumph he was awarded at Rome (17 A.D.) did nothing to dispel the fears and jealousy of Tiberius. In 18 A.D. he was placed in command of the forces in the East and went there to restore order. He defeated the king of Armenia and reduced Cappadocia to the status of a province. He was taken ill at Antioch and died there, 19 A.D. His body was found to be covered with dark splotches and poison was suspected. It was said that Cnaeus Piso, the governor of Syria, poisoned him at the request of Tiberius. When his body was cremated, some say, his heart was not consumed. This was considered confirmation that he had been poisoned, for a heart steeped in poison was thought to be proof against fire. When news of his death reached Rome the people were wild with grief: temples were stoned, altars were overturned, and heads of families threw the household gods into the streets. Even the barbarians, both those fighting among themselves and those fighting against Rome, ceased fighting to mourn him. Cnaeus Piso was condemned to death by the Senate when he returned to Rome. Germanicus was married to Agrippina, the daughter of Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, the daughter of Augustus. She bore him nine children, two of whom died in infancy and a third in early childhood. Of the remaining children who survived him, Agrippina the Younger became the mother of the emperor Nero; two other daughters, Drusilla and Livilla, led notoriously immoral lives; his two sons, Nero and Drusus, were executed as public enemies during the reign of Tiberius, and his third son, Caius, became the emperor Caligula.

Gerrha (jer'ā). [Also: Gerra.] In ancient geography, a city of Arabia Felix, situated on the Persian Gulf. It was important in the 7th and 6th centuries B.C., under the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians.

Geryon (jē'ri-on, ger'i-on) or Geryones (jē-rī'ō-nēz). In Greek mythology, a monster with three heads or three bodies and powerful wings, dwelling in the island of Erythea in the far west; son of Chrysaor and Callirrhoë. He possessed a large herd of red cattle guarded by Eurytion (his shepherd) and the two-headed dog Orthus. To carry away these cattle was the tenth labor of Heracles, which he successfully performed, after killing the shepherd, the dog, and Geryon himself. According to a later account, Chrysaor was a renowned king in Iberia, the father of three brave sons who were symbolized in the three-headed Geryon. When Heracles went there to steal the cattle the three sons headed three forces against him. Heracles separated them and killed Chrysaor's three sons.

Getae (jē'tē). Ancient tribal people formerly inhabiting Dacia, which corresponds approximately to what is now Rumania. They were so called by the Greeks; the Romans called them Daci.

Giants, Gigantes (ji-gan'tēz). In Greek mythology, an earth-born race which sprang from the blood of Uranus when he was mutilated by his son Cronus. From the drops of blood which fell on Phlegra in Attica, 24 sons were born to Gaea (Earth). They had the bodies of serpents and the heads of men. Gaea, and their own rage because Zeus had banished the Titans to Tartarus, inspired them to wage war on the gods. Armed with tree trunks and rocks, they attacked Olympus. The war was frightful. Hera prophesied that only a mortal, wearing a lion's skin and protected by a magic herb, would be able to slay the Giants. Zeus sent Athena to Heracles. While Eos, Helios, and Selene, as commanded by Zeus, ceased to pour their light on the world, Athena helped Heracles find the herb and brought him to the battle. The gods succeeded in wounding many of the Giants but only Heracles could deliver the death blow. Those Giants who were not killed on Olympus fled to Arcadia, near Trapezus, and there, attacked and wounded by the gods, were finished off by Heracles. According to ancient accounts the ground in the region still smoldered from the thunderbolts Zeus hurled at the Giants, and plowmen often turned up huge bones in their fields. Other accounts say the final stand of the Giants took place on the Phlegraean Plain, which borders the Bay of Naples near Cumae in Italy, and that they are buried under mountains there, where they rumble and explode from time to time as volcanos.

Gitiadas (ji-tī'ā-dās). Greek sculptor and architect who was active in the beginning of the 6th century B.C. Some say he constructed the bronze temple in which the bronze image of Athena was housed in Sparta, and for which reason she was called Athena Chalkioikos, "Of the Bronze House."

Glaucē (glō'sē). Another name for Creusa, daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. See Creusa.

Glaucē. In Greek legend, a daughter of Cychreus, king of Salamis. Telamon, who fled to Salamis after the death of his brother, Phocus, married her and succeeded her father as king of Salamis. She died and he married Periboea.

Glaucia (glō'shā). In Greek legend, a daughter of the Trojan river-god Scamander. When Heracles attacked Troy and sacked it Deimachus, one of his companions who had been Glaucia's lover, was killed. She sought protection and Heracles took her back to Hellas with him. She bore Deimachus' son, whom she named Scamander. Heracles later made him a king in Boeotia, where he renamed the Inachus River Scamander, after himself.

Glaucus (glō'kus). In Greek legend, a son of Hippolochus and grandson of Bellerophon. He was a captain of the Lycians, allies of Troy in the Trojan War, a valiant hero, and the close friend and cousin of Sarpedon. He met Diomedes face to face in combat, and in response to Diomedes' challenge, said that as a grandson of Bellerophon he would fight anyone. On learning of his ancestry Diomedes planted his spear in the ground. He recalled that his own grandfather, Oeneus, was a close friend of Bellerophon, and declared that the grandsons should continue the friendship. As an expression of the ancient friendship he gave his bronze armor to Glaucus. Glaucus, whose wits were addled by Zeus, gave his pure gold armor to Diomedes in return—the classic example of getting the worst of a bargain—and they parted friends. Glaucus accompanied Sarpedon at the siege of the fortifications surrounding the Greek ships and was wounded by Teucer. Later, although wounded, he called on Apollo to help him rescue Sarpedon's body, as his friend had asked with his last breath. Apollo heard his prayer and cured his wound. Glaucus then rallied the Trojans and with them defended Sarpedon's body until it was borne away by Apollo. Later, when fighting for possession of Achilles' body, Glaucus was slain by Telamonian Ajax. His body was rescued by Aeneas and taken to Troy, from whence it was borne to Lycia by Apollo, for funeral rites.

Glaucus. A fabled fisherman of Boeotia, one of the Argonauts. According to some accounts, he was a son of Poseidon, or of Anthedon, who saw a dead fish that was laid on a certain grass come back to life again. Glaucus ate some of the grass and, leaping into the sea, was transformed into a sea-god and became an attendant of Poseidon. Among many others, he loved the sea-nymph Scylla. Circe, or perhaps it was Amphitrite, who also loved Glaucus, changed Scylla into a hideous sea-monster out of jealousy that she had won Glaucus' love. Glaucus had the gift of prophecy, and is represented in the Aeneid as the father of Deiphobe, a priestess of Apollo and Trivia at Cumae—the Cumaeen Sibyl.

Glaucus. In Greek legend, a son of Minos, king of Crete, and Pasiphaë. While still a child he disappeared one day and could not be found. His parents at last consulted the oracle at Delphi and were told that whoever could give the best comparison concerning a heifer that changed its color three times a day would find that lost child. Polyidus, an Argive descendant of the seer Melampus, compared the changing colors of the heifer—from white to red to black—with a ripening mulberry, which follows the same color changes. Minos thereupon ordered him to find Glaucus and he at length did find him, drowned in a vat of honey. Minos then told him that since he had found the child he must now restore him to life, and locked him in a tomb with the dead child. As Polyidus, in despair, sat in the tomb, he saw a snake crawl into the crypt and approach the body of Glaucus. Polyidus killed it with his sword. Presently the serpent's mate crawled up and deposited a magic herb on the dead snake, whereupon the dead snake slowly came to life. Polyidus seized the herb and laid it on the body of Glaucus, where it had the same miraculous results. He and the restored Glaucus were released from the tomb and Minos, in his joy at finding his son alive, gave Polyidus rich gifts and asked him to teach the art of divination to Glaucus. Polyidus did as he was commanded, but just before he sailed from Crete to return home to Argos, he asked Glaucus to spit into his open mouth. Glaucus did so and immediately forgot all Polyidus had told him about divination. Apparently spitting into the mouth of the teacher was the time-tested way to make the pupil forget what his master had taught him.

Glaucus. In Greek legend, a son of Sisyphus and Merope. He lived near Thebes and was the father of Bellerophon. Glaucus refused to let his mares breed, on the theory that they were better racing horses if they did not breed, and so offended Aphrodite. She punished him by feeding his mares on a magic herb, hippomanes, which drove them mad. When Glaucus harnessed them to his chariot for the race at the funeral games for Pelias, they became frenzied, overthrew the chariot, and plunged Glaucus to the ground. They then tore their master to pieces and devoured his flesh.

Glaucus. According to Herodotus, a Spartan known for his justice and integrity. His reputation for honesty was so widespread that a man of Miletus came to him and asked him to keep a sum of money which he had brought with him. He gave Glaucus certain tokens, with instructions that he should turn over the money left in his keeping to those who would bring him matching tokens. Glaucus agreed to take care of his money and to give it to the bearers of matching tokens. Many years later the sons of the Milesian came to Glaucus. They brought with them

matching tokens, and asked for the money their father had deposited with him. Glaucus claimed he had no recollection at all of such a matter. However, he advised the Milesians to return after four months, in case his memory should be refreshed. The Milesians departed, convinced that they would never see their money. Glaucus went to the oracle at Delphi and asked whether he should swear he had never received the money and keep it. The priestess answered he might as well do as he wished, for those who keep their oaths die ultimately, even as do the false-swearers. But—the priestess warned Glaucus—the god of oaths has a son who would surely take vengeance on a perjurer by destroying all his offspring, whereas oath-keeping men leave flourishing offspring behind them. Glaucus, acknowledging the rebuke, instantly apologized to the priestess for asking such a question. However, the priestess replied that to entertain such a thought as perjury and to ask the oracle to confirm him in his plan was as bad as if he had actually done the deed, and the priestess sent him away. Glaucus recalled the Milesians and gave them their money. But the inevitable consequences foretold by the priestess because he had entertained the notion of perjury overtook him: not a single descendant of Glaucus survived in Sparta.

Glaucus. Greek sculptor in metals; fl. c6th century B.C. He lived at Chios but belonged to the Samian school of art. He is said to have been the inventor of the art of welding iron.

Glaucus of Rhegium (rē'ji-um). Greek writer of the late 5th century B.C. He wrote a book about poets in which he gave the names and dates of poets, described their styles, and what poets influenced them. He began his listing of poets with Orpheus who, he said, "admired nobody, because at that time there was nobody."

Glenus (glē'nus). According to Greek legend, a son of Heracles and Deianira.

Glessariae (glē-sā'ri-ē). In ancient geography, a chain of islands stretching from the Rhenus (Rhine) to the estuary of the Albis (Elbe), noted for the abundance of amber found there. They were sometimes called the Electrides after the islands in Greek legend, and also the Amber Islands.

Glycera (glis'e-rā). Name of several notorious Greek courtesans; in particular, a mistress of Menander, and a favorite of Horace.

Glycon of Athens (gli'kon, ath'enz). Greek sculptor; fl. about the 1st century B.C. He made the Farnese Hercules, which was found in the Baths of Caracalla in 1540 with an inscription by Glycon. It was probably executed in the 1st century B.C. and is a copy of a Heracles by Lysippus.

Gnomic Poets (nō-mik). Collective name applied to a group of Greek poets, active about the 6th century B.C., whose works are characterized by moral teachings and maxims on life. Although the list included in this title varies, the elegiac writers Solon, Theognis, Simonides of Ceos, and Phocylides are generally included.

Gnossus or Gnosus (nos'us). See Cnossus.

Gnosticism (nos'ti-sizm). A term applied to a religious philosophy of salvation, or rather a group of philosophies, widely spread throughout the Orient (Egypt, Syria, Persia) in the early centuries of the Christian era, growing out of the Hellenistic epistemologies but emphasizing the importance of divine revelation. Some Gnostics at first considered themselves members of the Christian community. They acknowledged the Godhead of Christ, but presently introduced elements of secrecy, mysticism, and superstition which proved incompatible with Christian theology; eventually they broke away to form a number of splinter sects. The most important were those established by Simon Magus, in Syria, and Manes (or Mani) in Persia. The latter founded the Manichaean sect which became indeed a distinct faith and in which Zoroastrian and Christian beliefs were fused. Voluminous Gnostic writings in Greek, Latin, Coptic, Syriac, and Armenian have survived, and a recent sensational find at Chenoboskion in Egypt yielded 13 bound codices containing some 40 new Gnostic texts. Gnosticism in its various manifestations lost ground before the spread of Christianity and Mohammedanism, but in Middle Asia Manichaeanism survived throughout most of the first millennium. (JJ)

Gobryas (gō'bri-as). Persian noble. He was one of the seven conspirators who, according to Herodotus, procured the death of Smerdis actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

the Magian (the False Smerdis) in 521 B.C. and raised Darius I to the throne.

Golden Age, The. According to Hesiod's account of the Creation, this was the period of the first race of men, who lived during the reign of Cronus. There were no women in the Golden Age. Men lived like gods. They knew neither sorrow nor toil, old age nor sickness. It was a period of patriarchal simplicity, when the earth yielded its fruits spontaneously and spring was eternal. When it was time for men to leave the earth, Death came gently and led them off in a peaceful sleep.

Golden Apples of the Hesperides. In Greek mythology, Gaea presented Hera with the tree which bore the golden apples as a wedding gift. The tree was planted in a garden in the remote West, on Mount Atlas in Mauretania, or in the land of the Hyperboreans, or perhaps on an island beyond the stream of Ocean. It was guarded by the Hesperides, daughters of Atlas, or of Hesperus, the evening star or the personification of the West or of sunset, and by the 100-headed, sleepless dragon Ladon. As one of his labors, Heracles fetched the golden apples to Eurystheus, but as it was unlawful for a mortal to possess the apples they were restored to the garden through the good offices of Athena. In one version Heracles prevails upon the giant Atlas, who holds the sky on his shoulders, to wade out across Ocean and fetch the apples for him while Heracles holds the sky in his stead. This incident is an occasional subject of Greek art, as on one of the metopes of the temple of Zeus at Olympia.

Golden Ass, The. [Alternative and original title, Metamorphoses.] Romance of a fantastic and satirical character, by Apuleius, written in the 2nd century A.D.; probably his earliest work. It was said to have imitated a portion of the dialogue, Lucius or the Ass, of Lucian. The best-known episode in it is that of Cupid and Psyche, which was taken from a popular legend or myth. Some of the adventures of Don Quixote and of Gil Blas are drawn from this source, and Boccaccio used many of the comic episodes. The author relates the story in his own person. His dabbling in magic results in his transformation into an ass, a form in which, however, he retains his human intelligence.

Golden Bough, The. The mistletoe. The Cumaean Sibyl told Aeneas to find the Golden Bough if he wished to visit the Underworld, for only with it in his possession would Charon allow him to pass the Styx. The Golden Bough would serve him as a passport to the Underworld as it was sacred to Proserpina (Persephone).

Golden Fleece, The. The fleece of pure gold taken from the winged ram which Hermes sent to snatch Phrixus and Helle away from the altar as they were about to be sacrificed. The ram flew with them to Colchis but as they crossed the Hellespont Helle fell into the sea which has since borne her name. Phrixus arrived safely in Colchis and sacrificed the ram, as instructed, to Zeus. The Fleece was hung up in Colchis and guarded by a dragon. It was recovered from King Aeëtes by the Argonautic expedition under Jason, with the help of Medea, the daughter of King Aeëtes. Modern travelers have reported that in the Caucasus gold dust is obtained by staking fleeces in the river gravels, which after some weeks are lifted out, dried and burned, leaving as residue the gold which had clung to the wool, and suggesting a possible origin for the oriental phase of the legend.

Golden Horn. Inlet of the Bosphorus, in European Turkey, forming the harbor of Istanbul, and separating Pera and Galata from the main part of Istanbul. Length, about five miles.

Golden House. Palace of Nero in Rome, which occupied the valley between the Palatine and Esquiline hills, and connected the palaces of the Caesars with the gardens of Maecenas. It was built after the great fire of 64 A.D., and was so large that it contained porticoes 2800 feet long and enclosed a lake where the Flavian Amphitheater ("Colosseum") now stands. The forecourt contained a colossus of Nero 120 feet high. The profuse splendor of this residence is described by Suetonius and Tacitus. It was further adorned by Otho, but the remains are scanty, as most of its site was restored to public use by the Flavian emperors, who built on it the Flavian Amphitheater and the baths of Titus.

Golden Mount, The. Name applied to the

fat, fâte, fâr, fâre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pîne; not, nôte, möve, nôr, Janiculum Hill of Rome with reference to its yellow sand composition.

Golden Verses. Greek verses attributed to the school of Pythagoras, a condensation of the morals drawn by earlier epics.

Gongylus (gon'ji-lus). Corinthian captain who reached Syracuse (414 B.C.) before Gylippus, and urged the Syracusans not to give up their resistance to the Athenians, and encouraged them with the news that help from Corinth and a Spartan general, Gylippus, were on the way. The Syracusans persisted in their resistance to Athens as he advised.

Gonippus (go-ni'pus) and Panormus (pa-nôr-mus). According to Pausanias, two Messenian youths who impersonated the Dioscuri. During the Second Messenian War with Sparta they dressed themselves in white tunics, purple cloaks and egg-shaped caps and rode into the Spartan camp, where a feast of the Dioscuri was being celebrated. The Spartans thought the gods had come among them and fell down and worshiped them. Gonippus and Panormus rode into their midst, slew many with their spears, and then galloped off to Andania. From that time forward the Dioscuri hated the Messenians and signally aided the Spartans in the war.

Good Fame or Good Repute. Goddess, usually identified with Artemis. There was an altar and an image of the goddess of Good Repute in the market-place of every town in Boeotia and Locris. An image of her was also in the market-place at Corinth.

Gordian Knot. A knot tied by Gordius in the cord that connected the pole and the yoke of the ox-cart in which he was riding when he or his son Midas was chosen king of Phrygia. It was so intricate as to defy all attempts to untie it; and the oracle of the temple in which the cart was preserved declared that whoever should succeed in undoing it would become master of Asia. Alexander the Great solved the difficulty by cutting the knot with his sword, and the oracle was fulfilled.

Gordium (gôr'di-um). In ancient geography, a town in N Galatia, Asia Minor, near the river Sangarius (Sakarya). It is noted as the capital of the Phrygian kingdom of the 8th and 7th centuries B.C. In the neighborhood are many large burial mounds, one of which, recently excavated by a University of Pennsylvania expedition, proved to contain an intact royal burial, one of the most important post-war archaeological discoveries. Also exhibited at Gordium was the intricate Gordian Knot, which Alexander solved by cutting through it with his sword. (JJ)

Gordius (gôr'di-us). According to tradition, a Phrygian peasant who became king. One day as he was driving his ox-cart a royal eagle settled on the pole and remained there as he drove along. He made for the city of Telmessus where there was a famous oracle, but as he came to the gate of the city he was met by a prophetic maiden who noted the eagle on the pole of the cart and told him to make sacrifices to Zeus at once. He consented to do so if she would marry him. She agreed to do this as soon as the sacrifices were made. In the meantime the king of Phrygia died, and the oracle told the Phrygians that their new king was approaching with his bride in an ox-cart. As the Phrygians debated in the market-place Gordius arrived in his ox-cart. The Phrygians, noting the eagle and the maiden, at once proclaimed him king. Gordius dedicated his cart, together with the yoke which was fixed to it with an intricate knot, to Zeus. It was afterward deposited in the temple at Gordium, a city founded by Gordius, and the oracle pronounced that he who could untie the knot joining the yoke and the ox-cart would become lord of all Asia. The cart and yoke were guarded in the temple for centuries. To this place came Alexander the Great. He looked at the knot, heard the oracular pronouncement concerning it, and with one stroke of his sword cut right through the knot.

Gorgias (gôr'ji-as). Greek rhetorician and sophist, born at Leontini, Sicily, c485 B.C. He lived to be about 100 years old and died at Larissa, in Thessaly, 376 B.C. In 427 B.C. he went to Athens to ask for aid for his native city against the Syracusans. His eloquence won him great esteem as well as success in the object of his journey, and he went home. Later he returned to Athens and traveled about Greece teaching the art of rhetoric. His object in his teaching was to train his disciples in the art of persuasion, so that they could speak effectively on any subject. He wrote a philosophical treatise in which he denied that positive knowledge is attainable; hence he confined himself to teaching oratory. Although he doubted if he could teach anything, claiming only that he was a good speaker, he won many disciples. He made speeches at Athens, Delphi, and Olympia, among others, which were published and by which the art of rhetoric was spread throughout Greece. Two exercises in rhetoric are extant which are attributed to him on doubtful grounds. One of Plato's Dialogues is named for him.

Gorgo (gôr'gō). Daughter and only child of Cleomenes, king of Sparta (c519-c487 B.C.). As a child she advised her father to send away the Samian who was trying to bribe him to go to the aid of Samos lest the Samian, who kept increasing his offer, corrupt her father. Gorgo married Leonidas, the half-brother of Cleomenes. It is said that before the outbreak of the Persian War Demaratus, co-king of Sparta who had been deposed by Cleomenes and had fled to Susa, sent a message warning the Spartans that Xerxes was preparing to march against Greece. He dared not send a message openly, so wrote it on a tablet which he then covered with wax. The tablet which the messenger presented to the Spartans thus appeared to be blank. Gorgo suggested that they scrape the wax off the tablet and they would surely find writing underneath. Her suggestion was acted upon and the message of warning from Demaratus was found.

Gorgoneion (gôr-gō-nī'on). A mask of the Gorgon or the head of Medusa as an attribute of Athena, who bore it on her breast in the midst of her aegis, and also on her shield.

Gorgons (gôr'gonz). In Greek mythology, three daughters of Ceto and Phorcys (whence they are called Phorcides) dwelling in the Western Ocean near Night and the Hesperides (in later mythology, in Libya). They had originally been beautiful maidens but were transformed into such horrible winged monsters, with coiling serpents for hair, brazen claws, and staring eyes, that all who looked upon them were turned to stone. Their names were Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa. Medusa, the only one of the three who was mortal, was slain by Perseus.

Gorgophone (gôr-gof'ō-nē). In Greek legend, the daughter of Perseus and Andromeda.

She married Perieres, king of Messenia and son of Aeolus, and had two sons: Aphareus and Leucippus. When Perieres died she married Oebalus, king of Sparta, and bore him two sons: Tyndareus and Icarius. According to some accounts, she was the first widow to remarry, as it was the custom up to then for women to commit suicide on the death of their husbands.

Gorgythion (gôr-jith'i-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, a son of Priam. He was slain by one of Teucer's arrows when Teucer was attempting to kill Hector.

Gortyna (gôr-tī'nā). [Also: Gortyn.] In ancient geography, an important Dorian city in S central Crete, near Mount Ida. According to legend, Zeus, in the form of a white bull, landed near here after swimming the sea with Europa on his back. Traditionally founded by Gortys, son of Rhadamanthys, Gortyna was an important center of Cretan civilization, second only to Cnossus. After the Roman conquest Gortyna replaced Cnossus as the leading city of Crete. It became the capital of the Roman province of Crete and Cyrenaica when the island was subdued by the Romans in 66 B.C. The famous Gortynian Code was discovered here in 1862 and 1884. Nearby are the remains of a temple of Pythian Apollo, the earliest parts of which date from the 7th century B.C., and a temple of Isis from the era of Greco-Roman civilization. Attached to the latter is a small crypt that seems to have played some part in the rites of initiation into the mysteries of Isis. Also at Gortyna are the remains of a basilica of St. Titus, companion of St. Paul, who brought Christianity to the island and became the first bishop of Gortyna. His grave is said to be nearby.

Gortynian Inscription (gôr-tin'i-an). An extensive and famous law code, found at Gortyna in Crete, a small part in 1862 and the rest in 1884. It dates from the 5th century B.C., although it contains references to laws of the 6th and 7th centuries B.C. It was inscribed, in the Cretan dialect of Greek, in ten great tables on a marble wall, in the "Boustrophedon" or "Ox-plough" script. In this script the first line is written from left to right, the succeeding line begins at the right and goes to the left, and so on, in the same manner as the ox draws the plow back and forth across a field. The Romans enclosed the wall on which the inscription appears in an arcade, where it may be seen today on the inner wall. The inscription is of great value as giving what is practically a code of early Greek civil law, prescribing in detail economic and social rules for the preservation of tribal estates and of the state, and, to a considerable extent, the procedures by which the laws were carried out.

Gortys (gôr'tis). According to some accounts, a son of Rhadamanthys of Crete. He inherited land in Crete from his father and the Cretan city of Gortyna is named for him. But some say Gortys was an Arcadian.

Gortys. In Greek legend, a son of Stymphalus. He was said to be the founder of the city of Gortys, in Arcadia, on the river of the same name. Also, a son of Tegeates of Arcadia. Some say this Gortys migrated voluntarily to Crete, and there founded the Cretan city of Gortyna; but the Cretans say Gortyna was founded by their own Gortys, son of Rhadamanthys.

Gournia (gôr'ni-a). In ancient geography, a town on the E end of the island of Crete. Remains uncovered on the site present the only extensive picture of a Minoan village, with private houses and a small palace, to be found on Crete.

Gracchus (grak'us). The distinctive cognomen of a branch of the Roman gens Sempronia: especially, the sons of Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio Africanus, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus (died 154 B.C.). They were: 1) Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, born 168 or 163 B.C. He married Claudia, daughter of Appius Claudius, and was the brother-in-law of Scipio Africanus Minor whom he accompanied in his expedition against Carthage (146 B.C.). He was appointed quaestor in 137 B.C., and as such served under the consul Caius Hostilius Mancinus in the Numantine war in Spain. He was elected tribune of the people for 133 B.C. At this period the class of independent farmers of small holdings was rapidly disappearing from Italy. The land was being absorbed by the great estates of the rich and cultivated by slave labor; and the peasantry were forced to seek refuge in the cities, especially Rome, where they swelled the ranks of the unemployed. Gracchus sought to bring about a greater subdivision of the land and to restore the class of independent farmers by reviving, with some modification, the Licinian law, passed in 367 B.C. but allowed to fall into abeyance, which limited the amount of public land that each citizen might occupy. His proposals were carried in the comitia tributa in spite of the opposition of his colleague, who was deposed. At the end of his term he tried, contrary to precedent, to secure reelection, and a disturbance arose in consequence, in which he and 300 of his followers were killed. 2) Caius Sempronius Gracchus, younger brother of Tiberius. He served under his brother-in-law Scipio Africanus Minor in Spain, and was quaestor in Sardinia from 126 to 123 B.C., when he was elected tribune of the people. He renewed the agrarian law passed by his brother Tiberius, and brought forward a series of resolutions seeking to undermine the existing aristocratic republican form of government, securing the support of the poorer plebeians of the capital by the regular distribution of grain at the expense of the state. He was reelected to the tribuneship in 122 B.C., but failed of election in 121 B.C., in consequence of the opposition among all classes to his project of extending the rights of citizenship to the Latins and Italians, and as the result of a campaign by the aristocratic party to discredit him by having one of their henchmen offer even more to the people than Gracchus did. He was killed in a disturbance which ensued in the city in 121 B.C. These two sons of Cornelia—the accomplished Roman woman who answered the boasts of a Roman matron about her jewels by pointing to her sons and saying, "These are my jewels"—were pointed out to Aeneas by Anchises when he visited the latter in the Underworld. Their spirits were awaiting to be born then and their illustrious future had already been decided, according to the Aeneid—which was, of course, written long after they had died.

Graces, The Three. In Roman mythology, the Gratae, personifications of grace and beauty. In Greek mythology, they are the Charites, daughters of Zeus. The names generally given to the Charites are Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. In Sparta and in Athens only two were recognized. They were worshiped at Athens, Messene, and elsewhere in Greece, but they had no cult in Rome. See Charites.

Graces, The Three. Antique undraped marble group preserved in the Opera del Duomo at Siena, Italy. It is the foundation of many of the Renaissance and modern representations of the subject.

Gradivus (grā-dī'vus). A Roman epithet of Mars, as the god of war.

Graeae (grē'ē). [Also: Graiae.] In Greek mythology, three daughters of Ceto and Phorcys. They were sea-goddesses, old from birth, having been born with gray hair. They had but one eye and one tooth between the three of them which they passed back and forth. They were the protectors of the Gorgons, and inhabited a plain in the farthest reaches of Libya, where the light of neither the sun nor the moon ever shone. Perseus visited them to learn where the Gorgon Medusa could be found, and compelled them to give him the information he sought by seizing their only eye and tooth. Their names were Dino, Enyo, and Pempredo.

Graecia (grē'shā), Magna. See Magna Graecia.

Graiae (grā'e, grī'ē). See Graeae.

Granicus (grā-nī'kus). A small river in Mysia, Asia Minor, flowing into the Propontis (the modern Sea of Marmara or Marmora). It was named by Homer as one of the rivers of the Troad which, after the Trojan War had ended, was diverted from its course by Apollo and Poseidon and sent against the wall which the Greeks had erected to protect their ships, to wash the wall into the sea. On its banks Alexander the Great won (334 B.C.) his first victory over the Persians. See Rhesus, river.

Gratae (grā'shi-ē). A Roman name for the Graces.

Gratation (grā'shi-on). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle Artemis wounded him with an arrow and Heracles killed him.

Gratius Faliscus (grā'shus, -shi-us, fā-lis'kus). Roman poet; fl. in the late 1st century B.C. He was the author of a poem on the chase and the management of hunting dogs, entitled Cynegetica, parts of which survive. He was called Faliscus because he claimed descent from the ancient Falisci.

Great Eleusinia (el-ū-sin'i-a). The chief annual festival in honor of Demeter and Persephone, celebrated at Athens and Eleusis in September and October.

Great Mother. In ancient mythologies, the goddess of birth and fertility: an almost worldwide concept. Cybele is the Great Mother of ancient Anatolia whose cult spread throughout the whole Mediterranean region. Ishtar was the ancient Babylonian and Assyrian Great Mother; the Sumerian Great Mother was Nana; the Phoenician was Astarte; the Egyptian was Isis. Anahita was the Great Mother of ancient Iranian religion. The Greeks identified Cybele with their Rhea, and later her cult became fused with those of Artemis and Aphrodite. The Romans identified her with Ops and Bona Dea, and later with Venus. The North American Indians also have their mother goddesses, Earth Mothers, Corn Mothers, and others, who are all nature and fertility deities. The ancient Peruvians had the concept; Pachamama was their great Mother Earth. Various other South American Indians also conceive of a great chief deity whom they regard as the common mother of all things. The concept is widespread in primitive African Negro religions. Surinam Negroes worship a Gro Mama, or Great Mother.

Greece (grēs). [Modern Greek, Ellas; ancient Greek, Hellas; Latin, Graecia.] In the widest sense the ancient name includes the Greek Colonies in Asia Minor, Sicily, Africa, and elsewhere; in its restricted and more usual meaning it is the peninsula S of the Cambrunian Mountains, with the neighboring islands. Peninsular Greece comprised Thessaly, Epirus, Central Greece (including Acarnania, Aetolia, Doris, Western Locris, Eastern Locris, Phocis, Boeotia, Attica, and Megaris), and the Peloponnesus (including Corinthia, Sicyonia, Phliasia, Achaea, Elis, Arcadia, Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia). The chief islands were Crete, Rhodes, Cos, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, Tenedos, Imbrus, Samothrace, Thasus, Lemnos, Scyrus, Euboea, Salamis, Aegina, the Cyclades, Thera, Cythera, and the Ionian Islands (including Zakynthos [Zante], Cephalonia, Ithaca, Leukas, Corcyra [Corfu], and others). Cyprus was sometimes included, and in later times Macedonia and Thrace. The following are some of the more important facts and incidents of ancient Greek history: Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus (c1100 B.C.); commencement of the hegemony of Sparta (6th century B.C.); Persian wars (500 to c449 B.C.); hegemony transferred to Athens (c477 B.C.); Peloponnesian War (431–404 B.C.); hegemony of Sparta (404–371 B.C.); of Thebes (371–362 B.C.); hegemony of Macedonia commenced 338 B.C.; rise of Aetolian League and renewal of Achaean League (c280 B.C.); independence of Greece proclaimed by Flamininus (196 B.C.); final subjection of Greece to Rome (146 B.C.); Greece made (in great part) into the Roman province of Achaea (27 B.C.). Later, Greece formed part of the Byzantine Empire.

Greek Religion. The religion of the Greeks is a composite of beliefs and practices of the original inhabitants (Pelasgians), the Achaeans and other northern invaders, and various people with whom contact was established at different times (Crete, Asia Minor, Egypt, etc.). A strong interplay of various elements is probably responsible for the failure of the Greek religion to become a unified logical system. In addition to gods worshiped throughout Greece, there were many deities and heroes whose shrines were the focal points for local cults. An outstanding feature of the religion is the fact that at the period of its greatest development in Classical Greece, we find innumerable aspects of earlier practices and aspects of ritual which suggest contradictory beliefs being followed at the same time. One explanation for the frequently immoral acts of the gods as related in mythology lies in syncretism, or the attempt to identify the Olympian gods with numerous local divinities of the earlier inhabitants with whom the invading Achaeans came into contact.

The Minoan civilization of Crete (c2500–1500 B.C.) and its counterpart or development at Mycenae (c1500–1100 B.C.) reveal practices and beliefs which influenced the later religion and which in some aspects persisted through the Classical period. Although it is impossible in all cases to separate with certainty those aspects which were brought to Greece before or during the earlier periods from those which had existed there previously, there is abundant evidence of extensive borrowing. Among these early aspects of the religion, we find evidences of animism, fetishism, totemism, tabus, human sacrifice, scapegoats, omens and oracles, local hero cults, and ghosts and spirits. Various myths have been explained, either partially or in full, on the basis of these early beliefs. An example may be found in the story of Theseus and the Minotaur. The Labrys (double-ax) is a prominent object in Cretan worship, and the Labyrinth, which is the home of the Minotaur, may be nothing more than “the place of the double-ax.” Nilsson believes that the tabus relating to childbirth and death are the basis for the later ideas of purity and impurity found in the Classical and Post-Classical periods. Among the chief concerns of this earlier period of religion appear to be the promotion of fertility and the appeasement of ghosts and spirits. These aspects persist throughout the Classical period and are an essential part of the worship of the chthonian or subterranean divinities.

The Homeric or Olympian gods are the most prominent feature of the Classical period. Although the Homeric poems in no sense are basically a religious work, their great authority during this period resulted in the acceptance of their presentation of the gods, who are the deities of the invading Achaeans. They are anthropomorphic with personalities which are more sharply defined than their functions. Athena and Ares are both concerned with war, but there is no mistaking their individual personalities. Herodotus states that "(Homer and Hesiod) are they who taught the Greeks of the descent of the gods, and gave to all their several names, and honors, and arts, and declared their outward form." Although this statement indicates the high esteem in which Homer was held during this period, it cannot be accepted literally. The 12 gods of the Olympian Pantheon have been shown to be of various origins. Zeus is the chief god of the invaders. Hera may have come from Ionia; she was the chief deity of Argos taken over by the Achaeans. Artemis and Athena appear to be of Minoan or Mycenaean origin. Dionysus (of little importance in Homer) and possibly Ares are derived from Thrace. Cyprus was the original home of Aphrodite, whereas Hestia, Demeter, and possibly Hermes are deities of the Pelasgians or primitive Aegean people. Apollo and Hephaestus are probably from Anatolia in Asia Minor. The origin of Poseidon is uncertain, but if he was a god of the Achaeans, he could not have been at first a god of the sea.

The Homeric poems were largely instrumental in defining the relationship between gods and humans in this period. The gulf between them was unbridgeable, and any attempt of a human to trespass on divine prerogatives was an act of hybris (arrogance) to be punished severely. In the Nekyia, Odysseus sees that the worst torments are visited in Tartarus upon humans, such as Tantalus, Sisyphus, and Ixion, who have offended the gods. Since immortality is an attribute of the gods, it follows that man cannot be immortal, and it is this aspect of the Olympian worship which may have been a factor in the persistence of earlier beliefs which held out a promise of immortal life. Although men could not criticize the gods whose actions might have appeared unjustified on occasion, the gods were not completely lawless and fickle. Zeus, in the first book of the Odyssey, is a god of righteousness and not the author of evil. Both in the Iliad and the Odyssey the right of the stranger to hospitable treatment is recognized as a law of the gods.

It was during the Classical period that the outward manifestations of the Greek religion assumed their most splendid form. Numerous temples were erected throughout Greece, and the efforts of the greatest architects and sculptors were devoted to them. In his Funeral Oration, Pericles gives an indication of the importance of the religious festivals to the Athenians. The maintenance of the temples and the furtherance of the Olympian religion was a function of the state, or polis. The religion did not require its adherents to subscribe to a set of beliefs or dogma. The individual fulfilled his function by participating in the public ceremony. There was little or no conception of the modern view of personal religion. As each cult had its own priests, there never was a unified priesthood to exert an undue influence. The festivals were joyous occasions, although it is possible to see in certain of them traces of earlier beliefs. Thus, in the Antheateria, the appeasing of spirits took place, but it was cloaked and overlaid by ritual of a later date.

A prominent feature of the religion was the Mysteries, which held a promise of immortality for the initiates. Of particular importance in this respect were the Eleusinian Mysteries and the cult of Orphism, in which sacred symbols were revealed and symbolic rites were performed. Orphism, which was an adaptation of the Dionysiac worship, was the earliest "book religion" in Greece, and placed great emphasis on a rebirth cycle. Its stress on purity throughout life is an indication of the turning of Greek thought toward the more modern view.

The decline of the polis with its ensuing problems caused the Greek philosophers to seek other answers. Although the pre-Socratics during the Classical period had evolved systems which required no gods, or gods completely at variance with those of Homer, the changing political and economic conditions during the 5th and 4th centuries B.C. hastened the process. The Sophists proclaimed that there were no absolute standards of morality and rejected divine establishment of laws. The various philosophical schools established ethical doctrines which could not be reconciled with the traditional Olympian worship. In many ways the maxims of the philosophers found their way into early Christian thought. (AH)

Griffins (grif'inz). In Greek mythology, fabulous monsters, sometimes called "the Hounds of Zeus." They were said to have been generated between the lion and the eagle, and to combine the head, front, and wings of an eagle with the body and hindquarters of a lion. Their duty was to guard the mines of gold and the river of gold which flowed in the region of the Hyperboreans from the one-eyed Arimaspi, who were always trying to steal it. The figure of the griffin is seen on ancient coins, and is borne in coat-armour. It is also a frequent motive in architectural decoration.

Grumentum (grö-men'tum). In ancient geography, a town in Lucania, S Italy, situated on the Aciris (now Agri) River near the modern Grumento Nova.

Grynaeus (grī-nē'us). An epithet of Apollo from the famous shrine and oracle of Apollo in Gryneum in Mysia.

Gryneum (grī-nē'um) or Grynea (grī-nē'a). In ancient geography, a small Aeolian city in Mysia, on the shore of the Aegean Sea. It was noted for a sanctuary and ancient oracle of Apollo, as well as a white marble temple, and a grove sacred to Apollo.

Gyas (jī'as). In the Aeneid, a Trojan who accompanied Aeneas on the flight from Troy. He commanded one of the ships of Aeneas' fleet. In the funeral games held for Anchises in Sicily, Gyas captained one of the boats; becoming impatient with his helmsman he tossed him overboard and took the helm himself, but it was too late. His boat came in third. He fought valiantly in the war against the Latins.

Gygaea (jī-jē'a) or Gyge (jī-jē). In the Iliad, a nymph of the lake in Lydia of the same name. She was the mother of Iphition, by Otrynteus.

Gyges (jī-jēz) or Gyes (jī-ēz). In Greek mythology, one of the Hecatonchires, the 100-handed giants who were the children of Uranus and Gaea. His brothers were Cottus and Briareus.

Gyges (gī-jēz, jī-). A king of Lydia (c685-c653 B.C.), and the founder of a new dynasty. Pressed by the Cimmerians, he invoked the help of Assurbanipal, and submitted to his supremacy. Afterward he allied himself with Psammetichus, king of Egypt, against Assyria, and seems to have fallen (c653 B.C.) in one of the repeated attacks of the Cimmerians, who were no longer checked by the Assyrian power. Plato's story is that Gyges, a shepherd of the king of Lydia, after a storm came upon a hollow, bronze horse in a chasm. Within the horse lay a corpse from which he took a magic ring which had the property of making the wearer invisible. Wearing the ring, Gyges killed the king, and thus became king himself. Herodotus tells still another story: Gyges was the trusted aide of Candaules who was king of Lydia and a descendant of Heracles. Candaules was madly in love with his wife and thought she was the most beautiful woman in the world. So carried away was he with the wonder of her beauty that he wished Gyges to see her naked, which was unlawful to do, so that his words might be confirmed by Gyges' eyes. He commanded Gyges to hide in the chamber where he and the queen slept and to behold her naked loveliness. Gyges was shocked at the idea but in the end obeyed his master as he valued his life above his honor. Candaules' wife entered the chamber, as Candaules had assured Gyges she would do, put off her clothes and went to bed, but out of the corner of her eye she saw Gyges hiding behind the door. She did not cry out or make any mention that she had seen him and Gyges slipped out of the room, as he thought, unobserved. The next day the queen sent for him. She informed him that she knew he had spied on her with her husband's aid, and had seen her naked which was unlawful. She now gave Gyges the choice of two alternatives: either he must kill Candaules and take her as his wife, that thus he would have looked on what was his own, or he must die himself, that only Candaules should have looked on what was his own. Gyges, who was truly loyal to his master, tried to appease her but the queen was immovable, and Gyges chose his own life rather than loyalty to the king. The queen gave him instructions for killing Candaules, in the very chamber where Gyges had spied on her. She gathered trusted friends to her support and Gyges slipped into Candaules' chamber at night and killed him as he slept. He then took the queen as his wife and declared himself king of Lydia. The Lydians were aroused to great wrath by the murder of their king and attacked Gyges, but as the attack was indecisive they agreed to consult the oracle at Delphi to learn whether Gyges should be allowed to reign. The priestess gave an answer favorable to Gyges and the Lydians accepted him as their king. Gyges sent rich offerings to Delphi, one of the earliest of the barbarians to do so, among them large amounts of silver and six golden goblets. In addition to confirming him as king, the priestess foretold that in the fifth generation the descendants of Gyges would suffer revenge at the hands of the descendants of Heracles. The king in the fifth generation was his descendant Croesus.

Gylippus (ji-lip'us). Spartan general; fl. 5th century B.C. He was a son of Cleandrides, who was expelled in 446 B.C. from Sparta after having been found guilty of taking bribes from the Athenians, exhibiting a weakness of character that his son apparently inherited. During the Peloponnesian War he was sent in 415 B.C. to help Syracuse against Athens. He defeated the Athenian forces in several engagements, compelling them to surrender (414-413 B.C.) with their generals, Nicias and Demosthenes. Later (404 B.C.), after the capture of Athens by Lysander, he was sent by that general to Sparta with the treasure taken in Athens, but he was unable to resist the temptation of unsewing the bags which contained large amounts of silver and of extracting from each bag a "considerable amount." He then sewed up the bags again and delivered them to the Spartan magistrates as he was ordered to do. Unfortunately, he did not know that each bag had in it a statement of its contents. When the bags were opened, his theft was discovered, and he was found guilty of having embezzled public funds and was sentenced to death. He managed to escape, fled the country, and died, like his father, in exile.

Gymnopaediae (jim-nō-pē'di-ē). Spartan festival, lasting several days. Spectacular feats of wrestling and choral dancing were performed by naked youths, accompanied by songs celebrating Spartan exploits.

Gynaecothoenas (jin'ē-kō-thē'nas). Epithet of Ares. Charillus, king of Sparta, deceived by an oracle invaded Tegea. The Tegean men fought valiantly and were just holding their own, when the Tegean women, who had taken up arms and lain in ambush, rushed out and drove back the Spartans, many of whom, including Charillus himself, were taken prisoner. After their victory, the Tegean women offered sacrifice to Ares on their own account, and gave the men no share in the meat of the victims; only the women ate of it. For this reason Ares was given the name "Gynaecothoenas" (Feasted by the Women).

Gythium (jith'i-um, ji-thi'um). [Modern name, Gytheion.] In ancient geography, a seaport in Laconia, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Laconia. According to tradition, when Heracles asked the priestess at Delphi how he could be cured of a sickness afflicting him she refused to answer. He seized the tripod from her and threatened to set up his own oracle. Apollo came to the rescue of his priestess and strove with Heracles. Zeus parted them and compelled them to compose their quarrel. After this Apollo and Heracles together founded the city of Gythium, where images of Apollo, Heracles, and Dionysus stood side by side in the market-place. Near Gythium is a stone on which Orestes is said to have sat to rest when he had been driven to madness by the Furies. As he sat on the stone his madness left him. Off the coast of Cythium is the island of Cranaë, where Helen first yielded in love to Paris after he had carried her off from Sparta. On the mainland opposite the island was a sanctuary of Aphrodite Migonitis (Uniter), but afterward Menelaus set up near the sanctuary an image of Thetis and the goddesses Praxidicae (Extracters of Justice).

Habrocomas and Anthia (hab-rō-kō'mas; an'-thi-a). See Abrocomes and Atheia.

Hades (hā'dēz). One of the 12 Olympian gods, he was the lord of the Underworld, feared alike by mortals and gods, as ruler of the dead and for his terrible justice. No soaring temples rose in the bright air of Greece in his honor, nor were festivals celebrated to glorify him. When mortals called on him they struck the earth with their hands and invoked him with oaths and curses. He reigned in a splendid palace, and, besides his function of governing the shades of the dead, he was the giver to mortals of all treasures derived from the earth and was given the name Pluto (Wealth). Hermes conducted the shades of the dead to his kingdom, and from there they never escaped. Hades took pride in the growth of his kingdom, and once complained to Zeus about Asclepius, who was raising the dead, that if he were allowed to continue this practice the population of the Underworld would not increase as it should.

Hades was the son of Cronus and Rhea. Like his sisters before him he was swallowed by Cronus as soon as he was born, and later was disgorged with them when Zeus, aided by Metis, tricked Cronus. In the war between Zeus and Cronus, Hades was given a cap of invisibility by the Cyclopes. (The cap symbolized the invisible world of which he was the ruler; the name Hades happens also to mean "the Unseen.") Wearing it, he crept into the presence of Cronus and stole his weapons. When Cronus was defeated, Hades, Zeus, and Poseidon drew lots from a helmet to see what regions of the universe each would control. By the lots Zeus was assigned to the heavens, Poseidon to the sea, and Hades to the Underworld. The earth was to remain open to all. Hades descended to his kingdom and seldom appeared thereafter on earth.

Some say that Aphrodite, queen of love, inspired love in the heart of Hades because she wished to show her power in the Underworld. He fell in love with Peresphone, daughter of Demeter and Zeus, and asked Zeus for her hand. Zeus did not like to deny his brother, nor did he want to cause suffering to Demeter, thus he took the position that he would not interfere in the matter. Hades took this as consent. In his golden chariot, drawn by four black horses, he arose through a cleft in the earth, swooped down on Persephone as she was gathering flowers in a meadow, and carried her back to the Underworld with him. Persephone was a most unwilling bride, and all the time she was in his kingdom she refused to eat. Demeter caused the earth to be barren until her daughter should be restored to her, and Zeus was compelled to send Hermes to Hades with a command to him to restore Persephone to her mother, otherwise the race of men would die and the gods would lose their rich sacrifices. Hades had no choice but to obey. However, before he sent Persephone off with Hermes, he reproached her and reminded her that it was no discreditable thing to be the wife of the lord of the Underworld, and he persuaded her to eat seven pomegranate seeds. For those who have eaten the food of the dead must return to the world of the dead. In this way he brought it about that Persephone was compelled to spend a portion of each year with him, as queen of the Underworld. Persephone bore him no children. She was a careful wife, and transformed the nymph Minthe, whom Hades would have seduced, into the fragrant mint plant. Again, when Hades was eyeing the nymph Leuce she was transformed into a white poplar tree, and thenceforward stood beside the Pool of Memory in the Underworld. Heracles, come here to seize the dog Cerberus, plucked the leaves of the poplar and made a wreath for his head. The leaves were black, the color of the Underworld, but the divine sweat of Heracles' brow as he labored with Cerberus bleached the leaves where they touched his skin, which is why one side of the leaves of the poplar gleams whitely, while the other side is dark. Heracles was one of few who succeeded in visiting the realm of Hades and escaping from it. As one of his labors for Eurystheus he was required to drag up the dog Cerberus from Tartarus. When he boldly demanded the dog, the god agreed to let him take it if he could do so without weapons. Heracles succeeded. While he was in Tartarus Heracles freed Theseus, who had gone there with Pirithous with the purpose of abducting Persephone. Hades had invited them to be seated when they made their arrogant demand for his wife, and as soon as they did so they found themselves bound fast to the Chairs of Forgetfulness. Heracles was able to wrench Theseus from his seat, but Pirithous had to be abandoned. Orpheus so charmed Queen Persephone and the shades of the dead that Hades agreed to allow him to take Eurydice, his dead wife, back to earth with him on condition that he not look back until he reached the upper air. Orpheus, in his anxiety, looked back too soon and Eurydice was lost forever. Some say that at the command of Zeus Hades came to earth to fetch Sisyphus, the greatest knave that ever lived, to Tartarus. Sisyphus persuaded Hades to try on a pair of golden handcuffs, once they were on Sisyphus locked them and kept Hades a prisoner. As long as Hades was a prisoner no one could die, not even the most grievously wounded. Ares came to the rescue and freed Hades. On another occasion when Hades visited the earth he took part in the war between Heracles and the Pylians. The god fought against Heracles, was wounded by him and was compelled to withdraw.

As he had no temples, he had very few names. The Greeks preferred not to think of him. The cypress and the narcissus were sacred to him. In art he is represented in a form kindred to that of Zeus and that of Poseidon, and bearing the staff or scepter of authority, sometimes in company with Persephone or the dog Cerberus. The Romans also called him Pluto, and identified him with their Dis or Orcus.

Hades. [More properly, The House of Hades.] The lower or subterranean world in which dwelt the spirits of the dead. Sometimes it was said to be situated in the west. The souls in Hades were believed to carry on there a counterpart of their material existence: those of the righteous without discomfort, amid the pale sweet blooms of asphodel, or even in pleasure, in the Elysian Fields; and those of the wicked amid various torments in Tartarus. Hades was surrounded by five rivers, of which the Styx (across which Charon ferried the souls of the buried dead) and Lethe (the river of forgetfulness) are the best known. The gates were guarded by the monstrous three-headed (sometimes 50-headed) dog Cerberus to prevent the shades from escaping to the upper world.

Hadrian (hā'dri-ān). [Also: Adrian; full Latin name, Publius Aelius Hadrianus.] Roman emperor (117-138 A.D.); nephew and ward of Trajan, whom he succeeded. He was born probably at Italica, in Hispania Baetica (near modern Seville, Spain), Jan. 24, 76 A.D.; died at Baiae, Italy, July 10, 138. He held several positions in various parts of the empire under Trajan, accompanying him in his campaigns. On the death of Trajan, it is said, he succeeded to the emperor's place through the slyness of Plotina, Trajan's wife, who announced Trajan's adoption of his nephew, then withheld news of Trajan's death until Hadrian could consolidate his position. Renouncing the policy of conquest, he abandoned the new provinces of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, and established the Euphrates as the eastern boundary of the empire. In 119 he began a progress through the provinces, in the course of which he began the construction of the wall that bears his name, designed to keep the Picts and the Scots out of Britain. He returned finally about 131, having visited Gaul, Germany, Britain, Spain, Mauretania, Parthia, Asia Minor, Athens, Sicily, Rome (for a year), Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt. He promulgated the Edictum perpetuum (c130), a collection of the edicts of the praetors by Salvius Julianus. This formed the groundwork for the Corpus juris of Justinian. In 132 a revolt was occasioned among the Jews by the planting of the Roman colony of Aelia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem, and the building of a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the Temple; the revolt, led by Bar Kochba, was suppressed in 135. Hadrian devoted himself to building and strengthening the position of the emperor. Through the Edictum, law-making by the praetors was ended; thereafter laws became a matter of senatorial confirmation of the suggestions of the emperor. He reduced taxes, provided for less arbitrary treatment of slaves, and fostered regulations to reduce immorality. His public works include the wall in Britain, similar structures in Germany, the Pantheons of Rome and Athens, and the temple of Olympian Zeus at Athens, as well as many other buildings in Rome and in the provinces. He was a patron of the arts and himself a poet; perhaps his most famous composition is the address to his soul, supposed to have been said on his deathbed, beginning: "Animula, vagula, blandula," (Little soul, evanescent, pleasant . . .). Hadrian's first choice as his successor, Lucius Ceionius Commodus, died Jan. 1, 138, and Hadrian then chose Antoninus (Antoninus Pius) on condition that Antoninus would adopt Commodus' son (later the emperor Commodus) and Antoninus' own nephew (later the emperor Marcus Aurelius).

Hadrian's Villa. Assemblage of ancient ruins, near Tivoli, perhaps the most impressive in Italy. It included the Greek and Latin theaters, so-called; an odeum, thermae (baths), a stadium, a palace, several temples, spacious structures for guards and attendants, and many subsidiary buildings and devices.

Of most of these there are extensive remains; and here were found many of the fine statues now in Roman museums.

Hadrian's Wall. A wall of defense for the Roman province of Britain, constructed by Hadrian between the Solway Firth and the mouth of the Tyne. The work has been ascribed to Severus and others, but was probably constructed under Hadrian alone.

Haedui (hed'ū-i, hē'dū-i). See Aedui.

Haemon (hē'mon). In Greek legend, the son of Creon, king of Thebes. He loved Antigone, daughter of Oedipus, but was ordered by his father to bury her alive because she had defied his order and built a pyre for the corpse of her brother Polynices. Haemon, according to some accounts, agreed to slay Antigone but secretly married her and hid her away. She later bore him a son which Creon recognized as her child because it bore the mark of a serpent, as did all the descendants of Cadmus. Creon again ordered her death, as well as that of the child, and when she was killed Haemon killed himself on her tomb. According to Sophocles, Antigone was killed immediately for her defiance of Creon and Haemon committed suicide on her tomb.

Haemonia (hē-mō'ni-a). An ancient name for Thessaly.

Haemus (hē'mus). In Greek mythology, a son of Boreas and Orithyia. He was a king in Thrace and the father, by Rhodope, of Hebrus. Haemus and Rhodope were so happy in their marriage that they assumed the names of Zeus and Hera. For their presumption, the gods transformed them into mountains, the peaks in the Balkans that bear their names. The whole range, now called the Balkan mountains, was once called the Haemus range.

Hageladas or Hagelaides (haj-e-lā'das). See Ageladas.

Hagios Elias (ä'yôs ē-lē'ās). [Also: Hagios Ilias, Mount Saint Elias.] Mountain summit in Greece, in the Taÿgetus range about 11 miles S of Sparta. It is the highest point in the Peloponnesus. Elevation, about 7903 feet.

Hagno (hag'nō). In Greek mythology, Arcadian nymph who, according to the Arcadians, was one of the nymphs who took care of the infant Zeus after he was born on Mount Lycaeus in Arcadia. A never-failing spring on the mountain was given her name. This spring had the wonderful property of bringing rain to a parched land. When there was a prolonged drought the priest prayed to its waters and made sacrifices. Then he lowered an evergreen oak branch to the surface of the water. When the water was stirred, a mist rose. This mist formed a cloud, drew other clouds to it, and caused rain to fall on the Arcadians.

Hagnon (hag'non). According to tradition, the Athenian founder of Amphipolis, in Macedonia. He was honored as a hero by the Amphipolitans. When the Spartan general Brasidas won Amphipolis, 424 B.C., the Amphipolitans were so charmed by him that after his death the monuments and honors of Hagnon were transferred to his name.

Halcyon (hal'si-on). An old and poetical name of the kingfisher. This bird was fabled to lay its eggs in nests that floated on the sea about the time of the winter solstice, and to have the power of charming the winds and waves during the period of incubation, so that the weather was then calm. The name comes from Alcyone, the wife of Ceyx, who was transformed into a kingfisher because of grief over the death of her husband, who died at sea. A dried kingfisher was regarded as protection from the thunderbolt of Zeus.

Halcyon Days. In Greek fancy, days of fine and calm weather about the winter solstice, when the halcyon (kingfisher) was believed to brood, especially the seven days before and as many after the winter solstice. They are named for Alcyone when, as a kingfisher, she hatches her eggs on the sea. In this period Zeus stills the sea for her safety and that of her young.

Halesus (hal'e-sus). In the Aeneid, a bastard son, or a companion, of Agamemnon. He fled from Mycenae to Italy when Agamemnon was murdered. In Latium he founded the town of Falerii and taught its inhabitants the Mysteries of Hera. Since he hated everything Trojan he gathered the warlike tribes of the Campania and went to the aid of Turnus in his war against Aeneas.

Halia (hal'i-a). A sea-goddess of Rhodes. By Poseidon she was the mother of six sons and a daughter, Rhode. They were brought up on the island of Rhodes, which takes its name from Halia's daughter. Aphrodite, who had been insulted by the six sons of Halia, inspired them with madness and they assaulted their mother. Poseidon hid them in the earth, where they became demons. Halia hurled herself into the sea and was deified as the sea-goddess Leucothea, according to some accounts, but this same story is told of Ino, the mother of Melicertes, and the same name is given to Ino after she became a sea-goddess. In the Iliad Halia is named as a Nereid.

Haliacmon (hal-i-ak'mon). [Modern name, Vistritsa.] In ancient geography, a river of Macedonia which empties into the Myrtoan Sea (Thermaic Gulf).

Haliartus (hal-i-ar'tus). In ancient geography, a city of Boeotia, Greece, situated on the S shore of Lake Copaïs, about 14 miles NW of Thebes, and under the shadow of Mount Tilphusius. Nearby it ran the Lophis River. According to some accounts, the stream once did not exist. The ruler of Haliartus went to the oracle at Delphi to inquire how he could get water for his city, and was told to kill the first man he met. The first man he met on his return was his son Lophis. He struck him with his sword, wounding but not killing him. The lad ran about wildly, and where drops of his blood fell water rose from the earth and became the stream afterwards called Lophis in his honor. At Haliartus there was also the spring of Tilphusa, where the seer Tiresias was buried, and there was a hero-shrine of Cecrops, the son of Pandion. Haliartus was important because of its location on the main route between N and S Greece. In the Persian War the inhabitants threw in their lot with the Greeks. The Persians overran the town and burned it (480 B.C.). In 395 B.C. the Spartan general Lysander was defeated and killed at Haliartus by the Thebans. The city was completely destroyed in 171 B.C. by the Romans, because it had favored the cause of Perseus, king of Macedonia.

Halicarnassus (hal'i-kär-nas'us). In ancient geography, a city in Caria, Asia Minor, situated on the island of Zephyria close to a promontory of the mainland. The island was eventually united to the mainland and the city extended to include both. It was colonized by Dorians from Troezen and perhaps Argos who came to the region, according to tradition, under the leadership of Anthes. The city was a member of the Dorian Hexapolis for a time, but was later excluded from the religious rites when the Halicarnassian Agasicles, in defiance of the laws, carried off to his own house the bronze tripod he had won at the games for Apollo. In the time of the Persian War it was ruled over by Artemisia, queen of Caria, who commanded her own ship in the Persian fleet that was defeated by the Greeks at Salamis (480 B.C.). Following the Persian War it was for a time a member of the Delian Confederacy. Later, by the Peace of Antalcidas (the "King's Peace"), it fell to Persia and was governed by satraps as part of Caria. Among these satraps was Mausolus, whose wife Artemisia built (352 B.C.) his tomb, the famous Mausoleum, celebrated as one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Scopas and other renowned sculptors of the time co-operated in the building of the tomb. It consisted of a quadrangular peristyle of Ionic columns on a high basement, above which rose a pyramid of 24 steps, supporting a quadriga (a chariot drawn by four horses), in which stood a huge statue of Mausolus. Important remains of the sculptured decoration are in the British Museum. In 334 B.C. Alexander the Great besieged the city, took it, and sacked it, and it never recovered its former importance. The city is famous also as the birthplace of the historians Herodotus and Dionysius. The site is now occupied by the Turkish town of Budrum.

Halicystae (hal-is'i-ē). [Modern name, Salemi.] Town on the island of Sicily, about 40 miles SW of Panormus. It was a Greek town originally, then came under Carthaginian influence, and submitted to the Romans in 262 B.C.

Halirrhothius (hal-i-rō'thi-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon. Ares killed him at the spring of Asclepius, claiming that he had attempted to violate Alcippe, the daughter of Ares. For the murder Ares was tried on the hill in Athens that henceforth came to be known as the Areopagus, and was acquitted.

Halitherses (hal-i-thér'sēz). In the Odyssey, an Ithacan seer who understood the flight of birds. When two eagles flew over the assembly gathered by Telemachus and suddenly began tearing at each other, Halitherses interpreted this to mean that Odysseus would return and tear the suitors of Penelope to pieces. For this reason he advised them to go home and leave the halls and fortunes of Odysseus in good state for their master's return.

Haloa (hā-lō'ā). An ancient Greek festival, celebrated in the month Poseideon (December-January), in honor of Demeter and Kore and Dionysus. The festival was held at Athens when the vines were cut and the new wine was tasted. It was also connected with the time of threshing. During the festival first fruits were carried from Athens to Eleusis, games and sports were held on the threshing-floors, and a procession in honor of Poseidon was held. The festival was under the presidency of women; a priestess offered the first fruits; no animal victim was offered in sacrifice. Some say the festival commemorated the death of Icarus, who introduced the vine into Attica. Women celebrated the festival alone. Phallic symbols were handled and the women exchanged all manner of crude and bawdy jests. At the end of the festival there was a great banquet, at which wine was served and various foods, the "gentle foods" given by Demeter, were eaten. Prohibited foods at the banquet were the pomegranate, in this case considered as a food for the dead, since the eating of it had drawn Persephone back to Hades for certain parts of the year. Apples, cocks, eggs, the red sea-mullet and certain other fishes were also prohibited. Cakes in the shape of the phallus were set upon the tables.

Halys (hā'lis). A river of Paphlagonia, about 800 miles long (the modern Kizil Irmak), the longest river in Asia Minor. Phineus directed the course of the Argonauts past it. It is famous for the defeat of Croesus, king of Lydia, brought about by his misinterpretation of the ambiguous oracle given him by the priestess of Delphi: "If Croesus passes over the Halys he will destroy a great empire."

Hamadryad (ham-ā-dri'ad). In Greek mythology, a wood-nymph supposed to live and die with the tree to which she was attached. The hamadryad is the presiding deity of the tree and shares in its joys and sorrows; whatever wounds the tree wounds the hamadryad.

Hamilcar (ham'il-kär, ha-mil'kär). Carthaginian general of the 5th century B.C. During the Persian War envoys of Xerxes went to Hamilcar and arranged with him an attack on the Greek settlements of Sicily, so that the latter could not, as requested by the homeland, send aid against the Persians. The occasion for the Carthaginian attack against Sicily was a quarrel between two Greek states there, in which the Greek tyrant of Himera was driven out of his city by the tyrant of Acragas and appealed to Hamilcar for aid. Hamilcar seized the opportunity to reduce Greek power in Sicily. He sailed with a huge armament to recover Himera and besieged the city (480 B.C.). He proposed to enlist the aid of the Greek gods to help defeat the Greeks in Sicily, but as he was unfamiliar with the forms and ceremonies, he sent to Selinus, a Greek city under Carthaginian dominion, requesting the people to send priests who could properly perform the ceremonies for a great sacrifice to Poseidon. Hamilcar's messenger to Selinus was intercepted by the forces of the tyrant of Acragas. They rode to the camp of Hamilcar on the appointed day and asked admittance as the men Hamilcar had sent for. The Carthaginians, unaware of the deception since all Greeks looked alike to them, admitted them to the camp by the sea. As Hamilcar stood waiting by the great altar of Poseidon he was overpowered and slain, and his ships were fired. The waiting Greek army, under the command of Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse, who had come to aid the tyrant of Acragas, received the signal that the trick had been successful and marched around the other side of the city where Hamilcar's land army was encamped and attacked it. After a desperate battle Gelon's forces were successful; Hamilcar's great force was utterly destroyed. The Carthaginians, unwilling to admit that Hamilcar was slain by a trick at the altar of the Greek god Poseidon, said that he stood throughout the hard-fought battle beside an altar of the Phoenician god, Baal, and that all day victims were hurled into the fire that blazed mightily. But when he saw his army in full retreat he offered himself as the greatest victim to his god; he leaped into the fire on the altar and was consumed in the flames.

Hamilcar Barca (or Barcas) (bär'ka, bär'kas). Carthaginian general, drowned in Spain, c229 B.C. He was the father of Hannibal; his surname Barca means "lightning." He held (247-244 B.C.) Mount Ercte (Monte Pellegrino), Sicily, against the Romans, transferred his troops and held (244-241 B.C.) Mount Eryx (Monte San Giuliano), and raided Roman positions as far as the mainland. At the end of the First Punic War in 241 B.C., he retired to Africa undefeated. There, his troops, their promised rewards being withheld by the Carthaginian government, revolted and Hamilcar was called to defeat them. He suppressed the rising of the mercenaries (241-238 B.C.), and became dictator of Carthage. He began (236 B.C.) the reduction of Spain to a Carthaginian province in order to have a base from which to strike at Rome, but was drowned while withdrawing from a siege.

Hannibal (han'i-bal). Carthaginian general, 5th century B.C., grandson of Hamilcar. His life was dominated by a desire to avenge the death (480 B.C.) of his grandfather at Himera, in Sicily. At an advanced age he persuaded Carthage to send a force to Sicily in reply to a request for aid from Segesta, a Greek city at war with Selinus. A great force was prepared and sailed to Sicily under command of Hannibal. The fleet reached Sicily, and the armed force marched to Selinus. Selinus had never been attacked in the 250 years since its founding and was completely unprepared to withstand the Carthaginians. Its inhabitants resisted valiantly but after nine days the city fell to Hannibal (410 B.C.), and it became the first Greek city in Sicily to be taken by the Carthaginians. Such military installations as existed were destroyed, its people were slaughtered or carried off into slavery, but the city itself was allowed to stand. Hannibal now set out to fulfill his real purpose in the expedition to Sicily, which was the destruction of Himera, the scene of his grandfather's defeat and death. He besieged Himera and breached its walls by means of mines. The defenders drove his soldiers out. Just at that time appeared a fleet of 25 ships, sent from Syracuse to relieve Himera. Hannibal spread abroad a rumor that he was going to attack Syracuse, and the commander of the Greek fleet, having heard the rumor and believing it to be true, immediately decided to withdraw. He offered to take the inhabitants of Himera to safety in his ships. About half of the inhabitants, all he had room for, boarded the ships and the fleet sailed. The remaining inhabitants continued desperate resistance to the Carthaginians. They maintained their resistance until the Syracusan fleet returned to rescue them, but just as it appeared the forces of Hannibal again breached the walls, poured into the town, and by the time the Greek ships reached the harbor, Himera was already in Hannibal's hands. It is said that on the very spot where his grandfather had been slain Hannibal sacrificed 3000 human victims to appease his shade and avenge him. Afterward he completely destroyed the city and left the spot barren. Hannibal then returned in triumph to Carthage. In 406 B.C. he again invaded Sicily at the head of a great force and laid siege to Acragas. Because the ground about the city was low and made the siege difficult, he decided to build a great causeway, from which height his forces could attack the fortifications more effectively. He plundered the neighboring cemeteries of their grave stones and tombs to get material for the causeway. It is said that when the tomb of Theron, former tyrant of Acragas, was being broken into it was struck by a thunderbolt and seers advised that it be spared. Before the causeway was finished plague broke out in Hannibal's camp; he fell victim to it and died. The Carthaginians decided that the gods were angry because of the desecration of the cemeteries. They sacrificed a boy to their god Moloch and then completed the causeway, without further disturbing the tombs.

Hannibal. The great Carthaginian general, eldest son of Hamilcar Barca; born 247 B.C.; committed suicide at Libyssa, Bithynia, probably 183 B.C. He was with his father in Spain after c238 and, at his father's request swore, at the age of nine, his enmity to Rome, which had defeated Carthage in the First Punic War (261–241 B.C.). Following Hamilcar Barca's death in 228 B.C. Hannibal's brother-in-law Hasdrubal succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain; Hasdrubal was assassinated in 221 B.C. and Hannibal was chosen leader of the army. He set about extending the Carthaginian domain in Spain and by 219 B.C. had reached the Ebro, controlling all of Spain south of that river except the city of Saguntum (modern Sagunto, near Valencia), an ally of Rome. Hannibal laid siege to the city, despite specific warnings from Rome that such action would lead to war, and in eight months took it. When the Carthaginian government would not repudiate his action by surrendering Hannibal to the Roman envoys, the Romans declared for war. Hannibal now conceived a daring plan and in the spring of 218 B.C. marched northward, crossed the Pyrenees, evaded a Roman force sent to intercept him, reached the Rhône, and in October, with snow already in the high passes, crossed the Alps into Italy. Only some 26,000 men survived the crossing (which was probably by way of the Little St. Bernard Pass) of about 35,000–40,000 that had started, yet this crossing of the Alps in late autumn, with supplies and with the Carthaginian war-elephants, is still considered perhaps the greatest military achievement in history. At the Ticinus River and again at the Trebia in December, Hannibal scored victories over the Romans and secured control of the Padus (Po) Valley. Reinforced by Gaulish tribesmen, he marched south in the spring of 217 B.C., crossed the Apennines, and at Lake Trasimene cut to pieces a Roman army under the command of the consul Caius Flaminius, who was killed in the battle. Rome now had no army capable of risking another defeat in the field and Fabius Maximus, who was appointed military dictator, dared not risk a general engagement. Hannibal decided against storming Rome itself and instead marched through Italy into Apulia, destroying as he went, but suffering the harrying attacks of Fabius, whose tactics won him the surname Cunctator ("Delayer"). Hannibal wintered on the Apulian plains and early the next summer (216 B.C.) faced the largest army Rome had ever put into the field, about 54,000 men at Cannae. Skillfully he encircled them, pushed one group in on another until the Roman position was confused, and then cut them to pieces with his cavalry; more than half the Roman force was killed. As a result of the victory, several Italian tribes came over to the Carthaginians, as did Capua, where Hannibal wintered in 216–215 B.C. Syracuse deserted the Roman cause and allied itself with Carthage; Philip V of Macedon became an ally, although he never did send material aid. Hannibal had now reached the peak of his power; Rome, in his eyes, was impregnable, and her nearer allies were not deserting her; his failure to attack Rome after Cannae, when she was probably helpless, has been criticized as his fatal mistake. He campaigned in southern Italy for several years, captured Tarentum in 213 B.C., and in 210 won a victory at Herdoniae, but the strain on his manpower was great. In 212 B.C. Syracuse, under siege for three years, fell to the Romans, and in 211 B.C. Capua, too, was captured and sacked, despite Hannibal's attacks on the surrounding Roman armies and a feint on Rome itself. Help was required from Carthage's armies elsewhere, and Hannibal's brother Hasdrubal, who had been fighting the Romans in Spain, crossed the Alps with a large force. But before Hannibal could reach him from the south Hasdrubal was defeated and killed at the Metaurus in 207 B.C. Hannibal took refuge in the mountains of Bruttii, where he maintained an unassailable position for some years. At last, with help not forthcoming, with Mago defeated in Liguria, and with Scipio advancing victoriously in Africa against Carthage itself, he was recalled to Carthage in 203 B.C. There he hastily put together an army of his veterans from Italy and a levy from the African tribes and met the Romans at Zama in 202 B.C.; the Carthaginian force was practically annihilated and Carthage had to make peace. To pay the resulting indemnity (Carthage also gave up all claims to the Mediterranean islands), Hannibal, appointed chief magistrate, reformed the financial structure of the Carthaginian state and thereby came into conflict with the oligarchy. But his methods succeeded and within a few years Carthage was not only paying the indemnity but was reestablishing itself as a Mediterranean power. Alarmed, Rome thereupon demanded that Carthage surrender Hannibal and he was forced to flee (c195 B.C.). He stayed in Syria for some time as a general with Antiochus III, but when Syria was defeated by the Romans he once again fled, to the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia. There the Romans again sought him and demanded his surrender by Prusias. Rather than give up to his sworn enemies, Hannibal committed suicide; the year 183 B.C. is given as the date of his death by Livy, the same year that Scipio Africanus and Philopoemon, general of the Achaean League in Greece, died, but the specific date is conjectural.

Hanno (han'ō). Carthaginian navigator; fl. probably in the early 5th century B.C. He led a colonizing expedition to the western coast of Africa. An account of his voyage (Periplus) is extant in a Greek translation taken from a Phoenician text. He probably reached the coast of what is now Sierra Leone or Liberia. Hanno's account, used by Ptolemy, remained the standard until after the Portuguese Gilianes' voyage past Cape Bojador (on the coast of what is now Spanish Sahara) in 1433.

Hanno. [Called Hanno the Great.] Carthaginian leader; fl. in the 3rd century B.C. He was the leader of the aristocratic party at Carthage and an opponent of Hamilcar Barca and Hannibal. He opposed the war with Rome and all other trans-Mediterranean adventures. His opposition to paying Hamilcar's troops led to their revolt, and his refusal to support Hannibal with sufficient aid was a principal contributory cause of Hannibal's failure.

Harma (här'ma). In ancient geography, a city of Boeotia, Greece. The name means Chariot, and was given to the city, some say, because here the chariot bearing Amphiaras was swallowed up when the earth opened as he fled from Thebes.

Harmodius (här-mō'di-us) and Aristogiton (a-ris-tō-jī'ton, ar'is-tō-). Killed 514 B.C. Two Athenian youths who killed Hipparchus, tyrant of Athens, in 514 B.C. They are represented as entertaining a strong affection for each other, which remained unaltered despite the endeavors of Hipparchus to draw that of the young and beautiful Harmodius toward himself. Enraged at the indifference of Harmodius, Hipparchus put a public insult upon him by declaring his sister unworthy of carrying the sacred baskets at the religious procession of the Panathenaea, in revenge for which the youths organized a conspiracy to overthrow both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias. They chose the feast day of the Panathenaea for the execution of their plot because it was the only day when the citizens could meet together, armed, without arousing suspicion. They had only a few accomplices, but they hoped that the stir made by the death of Hipparchus would rouse the citizens to throw off the yoke of tyranny. However, revolution was incidental, and was hoped for only as a means of saving themselves. As the time for the festival arrived the conspirators saw Hippias standing in the Ceramicus talking with one of their accomplices. They immediately concluded, falsely, that their plot was exposed and resolved to act at once. They found Hipparchus by the Leocorium and struck him down. Harmodius was captured by the guards and slain on the spot. It is said that Hippias, to whom the news was brought as he still stood in the Ceramicus, kept his features composed as if nothing had happened, pointed to the armed men in the procession whom he thought were implicated in the plot, ordered them to withdraw and had them disarmed. Aristogiton escaped temporarily through the excited crowd, but was shortly captured. When put to torture to reveal his accomplices, he named the principal friends of Hippias, who were executed. When pressed for further revelations, he answered that there remained no one whose death he desired, except the tyrant. Aristogiton then died under torture. Following the death of Hipparchus, Hippias, who hitherto, according to Thucydides, had maintained the laws, beautified the city, and carried out the wars of the Athenians and the sacrifices as prescribed, now became fearful of further plots. From this time on his rule became more oppressive, so that, according to Thucydides, and Herodotus also, the death of Hipparchus deepened, rather than lessened, the tyranny of the Pisistratidae. At the time of the murder of Hipparchus not much attention was paid to Harmodius and Aristogiton by the citizens. But as the rule of Hippias became more oppressive the conspirators came to be regarded as heroes, and after the expulsion of Hippias (510 B.C.), they were honored as such. A statue of them was placed in the market-place, on the way to the Acropolis opposite the Metroum; a copy of this is in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. They were the first men to have their statues set up in the market-place at Athens. The subject of Harmodius and Aristogiton became a favorite with painters and sculptors when popular fancy transformed them from murderers to tyrannicides.

Harmonia (här-mō'ni-ā). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Ares and Aphrodite. Zeus gave her to Cadmus when he became king of Thebes, and all the gods attended their wedding. Among the gifts to Harmonia was a necklace fashioned by Hephaestus which was said to guarantee beauty to its possessor. Some say Hephaestus gave it to Cadmus, and he gave it to Harmonia. Others say this had been a gift of Zeus to Europa; and still others say it was given by Aphrodite to Harmonia. Harmonia was also given a peplus, or robe, by Athena, and some say Athena gave her both the necklace and robe. These two gifts, handed down to the descendants of Cadmus, brought great grief to their possessors, and played a part in the Expedition of the Seven against Thebes as well as in the war of the Epigoni. They were at last taken to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, where the god saw to it that they brought no further disasters. There they remained until the 4th century B.C., when they were carried off by a bandit. Harmonia bore Agave, Autonoe, Ino, Semele, and Polydorus to Cadmus. Although Harmonia and Cadmus were turned into serpents by Zeus, their tomb was to be found in the land of the Encheleans in Illyria. See Cadmus.

Harmonia. A naiad; according to some accounts, she was the mother of the Amazons by Ares.

Harmonides (här-mō'ni-dēz). Another name for Phereclus, meaning the son of Harmon, who built the ships in which Paris abducted Helen.

Harmost (här'most). In Greek antiquity, the title of the governors appointed by the Spartans, during their supremacy after the Peloponnesian War, over subjected or conquered cities. The harmost was, in effect, a military governor.

Harmothoë (här-mō'thō-ē). In Greek mythology, the wife of Pandareus and the mother of Aëdon, Cleothera, and Merope. When her husband was punished for his part in the theft of the golden dog that guarded the infant Zeus, Harmothoë fled to Sicily and there died in misery.

Harpagus (här'pā-gus). General of Cyrus; fl. 6th century B.C. According to Herodotus, he was descended from a noble Median house, and was the attendant of Astyages, who charged him with the duty of exposing the infant Cyrus, grandson of Astyages. Instead of performing that duty in person, he delegated it to the herdsman Mitradataes, who substituted a still-born child of which his wife had just been delivered. When the identity of Cyrus, who had been brought up by Mitradataes and his wife as their own child, was discovered, Astyages punished Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son. Harpagus waited until Cyrus had grown to manhood, then incited him to rebel against Astyages, and effected the downfall of the latter by deserting with the army to Cyrus. He was afterward one of the most trusted generals in the service of Cyrus, and played a prominent part in the conquest of Asia Minor.

Harpalyce (här-pal'i-sē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Clymenus of Arcadia. She bore a son as the result of an incestuous union with her father, and afterwards cut up the child and served it as food to Clymenus. Clymenus learned what she had done and slew her. She was turned into a bird of prey.

Harpalyce. A daughter of Harpalycus, legendary king of Thrace. Her father had trained her in the arts of hunting. After his death she became a huntress and pillaged the peasants and shepherds. They finally caught her in a net, killed her, and celebrated her death annually with a mock fight at her grave.

Harpalycus (här-pal'i-kus). In Greek mythology, a son of Hermes, noted for his fearsome appearance when fighting, who, according to some accounts, taught boxing to the youthful Heracles.

Harpies (här'piz). In Greek mythology, winged daughters of Thaumias and Electra, daughter of Oceanus. They were winged monsters, ravenous and filthy, having the face and body of a woman and the wings of a bird of prey, with the feet and fingers armed with sharp claws, and the face pale with hunger. They served as ministers of divine vengeance. Sometimes they punished criminals themselves, as they tormented Phineus for impiety; sometimes they caught criminals and handed them over to the Erinyes for punishment, as in the case of Merope, Cleothera (or Cameiro), and Clytië, who were punished by the Erinyes for the crimes of their father, Pandareus. The Harpies carried off the souls of the dead and defiled the food of their living victims. They were commonly regarded as two (Aello and Ocypete) or three in number (Celaeno), but occasionally several others were mentioned. Homer mentions only one, named Podarge. They were originally personifications of storm-winds sent by the gods to carry off offenders, and were later personified as fair-haired, winged maidens, their features and characteristics being more or less repulsive at different times and places. The Harpies have been to some extent confounded with the Sirens because of their form, being represented as women in the upper parts of their bodies and as birds below.

Harpina (här-pī'nā). According to Pausanias, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. According to the people of Elis, she was the mother of Oenomaus by Ares. Oenomaus founded a city in Elis and named it after her.

Harudes (hā-rō'dēz). [Also: Charudes.] German tribe first mentioned by Caesar as in the army of Ariovistus. In the campaigns of Tiberius the Harudes were situated on the lower Albis (Elbe), at the base of the Cimbric peninsula (Jutland). Nothing is known of their ultimate fate.

Haruspex (hā-rus'peks). One of a class of

minor priests or soothsayers in ancient Rome, of Etrurian origin, whose function it was to inspect the entrails of victims killed in sacrifice, and by them, as well as by certain natural phenomena, to interpret the will of the gods. Their duties were thus similar to those of the augurs, who, however, occupied a much higher position in the state.

Hasdrubal (haz'dru-bal, haz-drö'bal). [Also: Asdrubal.] Carthaginian general and politician, who died in Spain, 221 B.C. He rose to prominence as a leader of the democratic party in Carthage in the interval between the First and Second Punic wars, and married a daughter of Hamilcar Barca, whom he accompanied to Spain in 238 B.C. He subsequently returned to Africa to assume command in a war against the Numidians, and reduced them to submission. In 229 B.C. he succeeded his father-in-law as commander in Spain, where he founded the city of Carthago Nova (New Carthage, modern Cartagena), and largely extended the Carthaginian power, fixing by treaty the boundary between the Carthaginian and Roman possessions in Spain at the Iberus (Ebro). He was assassinated by a Celtic slave whose master he had put to death.

Hasdrubal. [Also: Asdrubal.] Carthaginian officer of high rank in the army of Hannibal in Italy. He contributed greatly to the victory of Cannae in 216 B.C. by a cavalry charge on the rear of the Roman infantry after having put the Roman horse to rout.

Hasdrubal. [Also: Asdrubal.] Carthaginian general; son of Hamilcar Barca and younger brother of Hannibal (c247-c183 B.C.); died 207 B.C. He was left in charge of the Carthaginian forces in Spain when Hannibal set out on his expedition to Italy in 218 B.C. He maintained the war against the Romans under the brothers Cnaeus and Publius Scipio with varied success until 212 B.C. Then, having been reinforced by two armies under Mago and Hasdrubal (d. 200 B.C.), son of Gisco, he was enabled to inflict a decisive defeat upon Cnaeus, who fell in the battle, Publius having been killed a short time previously in a cavalry engagement. He was defeated by Scipio Africanus at Baecula (Bailén) in 209 B.C., and probably in the same year crossed the Pyrenees on his way to join his brother in Italy. He crossed the Alps in 207 B.C., but was attacked and defeated by the Romans under Caius Claudius Nero and Marcus Livius on the Metaurus (Metauro) River in the same year before he could effect a junction with Hannibal. He fell in the engagement, and, according to Livy, his severed head was thrown into the camp of Hannibal by the victorious Romans.

Hasdrubal. [Also: Asdrubal.] Carthaginian general, son of Gisco; died c200 B.C. He was sent to Spain with an army in 214 B.C., and on the departure (c209 B.C.) of Hasdrubal, son of Hamilcar, on his expedition to join Hannibal in Italy, was left with Mago in command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was defeated with his colleague at Silpia by Scipio Africanus in 206 B.C., was in command of an army opposed to Scipio in Africa in 204 B.C., when his camp near Utica was fired by the Romans and nearly the whole of his army destroyed, and is said by some authorities to have taken poison to escape the fury of the Carthaginian populace.

Hasdrubal. [Also: Asdrubal.] Carthaginian general. He was commander-in-chief in the war against Masinissa in 150 B.C. Having sustained a decisive defeat, he was punished with exile. He was, however, recalled on the outbreak of the Third Punic War in 149 B.C., and was placed in command of the forces outside the walls of Carthage. He defeated the consul Manilius in two engagements (c148 B.C.). He subsequently became commander of the forces within the city, which he defended with great obstinacy against Scipio Aemilianus in 146 B.C. He finally surrendered, and, after gracing the triumph of Scipio, was allowed to spend the rest of his life in honorable captivity. It is said that at the time of his surrender his wife upbraided him for cowardice, and threw herself and her children into the flames of the temple in which she had taken refuge.

Hearth, Goddess of the. See Hestia.

Hebe (hē'bē). In Greek mythology, the goddess of youth and spring; the personification of eternal and exuberant youth, and, until supplanted in this office by Ganymede, the cupbearer of Olympus. She was a daughter of Zeus and Hera, who gave her as wife to Heracles after his death and deification, as a reward for his achievements. She bore him two sons. Hebe was worshiped as Dia in certain localities, and in this aspect she is associated with Aphrodite. Powers of rejuvenation were ascribed to her. The Romans called her Juventas.

Hebrus (hē'brus). [Modern name, Maritsa.]

A river of Thrace, about 300 miles long, that flows into the NE Aegean Sea. The maenads who attacked and dismembered Orpheus flung his head and his lyre into this river. There they miraculously floated, the lyre playing a plaintive air and the head murmuring sadly, and crossed the sea to the island of Lemnos.

Hecaleius (hek-ā-lī'us). Epithet of Zeus. When Theseus was on his way to capture the Marathonian bull he was entertained by an old woman named Hecale. She vowed to sacrifice a ram to Zeus if he returned safely. When he returned, having been successful, Hecale had died. Theseus established Hecalesian Rites to honor her and Zeus Hecaleius.

Hecamede (hek-ā-mē'dē). In the Iliad, a daughter of Arsinous of Tenedos, who was captured when Achilles took Tenedos and was awarded to Nestor as part of the spoils of war. She became the handmaiden and servant of Nestor in the Trojan War.

Hecataeus of Abdera (hek-ā-tē'us; ab-dir'ā). Greek philosopher and historian, active in the 4th century B.C. He appears to have accompanied Alexander the Great on his Asiatic expedition. He wrote a work on the Hyperboreans, and another on Egypt. Some critics also attribute to him a work on the Jews. A small number of fragments of his work survive.

Hecataeus of Miletus (mī-lē'tus, mī-). Greek chronicler and geographer, born at Miletus, c550 B.C. and died c476 B.C. He was descended from an ancient and illustrious family at Miletus, in Asia Minor. He thought he was the 16th generation in direct descent from a god until the priests of Egyptian Thebes disabused him of this notion. In his search for knowledge he traveled throughout the Mediterranean, in the Persian Empire, Egypt, and possibly also in Pontus, Libya, and Iberia. Most of our knowledge of him comes from Herodotus, who frequently consulted his description of the earth, and who disagreed with him about the source of the Nile and the existence of the river Oceanus, but otherwise respected him as a man of greatness. At the time of the Ionian revolt against the Persians (500-494 B.C.), the people of Miletus consulted him as a wise man. He urged them not to rebel against Darius, but his advice was ignored. He then urged them to seize the treasury of Apollo before the Persians got it, and to build a fleet with it which would command the Aegean. Again his advice was ignored, and Miletus was defeated. Subsequently Hecataeus served as ambassador to Artaphernes, satrap of Sardis under Darius I, whom he prevailed upon to treat the conquered insurgents with mildness. Hecataeus wrote of history as he knew it; that is, of times that have since come to be regarded as mythical but were considered to be historical in his own time. Sometimes he abandoned the Greek tradition in favor of the Egyptian tradition. In the fields in which he operated: literature, geography, and history, he was a great figure and represented the spirit of his age in his search for knowledge, his rationalistic approach, and his literary performance. Fragments of his work remain.

Hecate (hek'ā-tē). [Also: Hekate.] In Greek mythology, a triple goddess combining the concepts of moon-goddess, earth-goddess, and Underworld-goddess. She had powers over the sky, earth, and sea, and was also a giver of riches and good fortune. As moon-goddess, she was identified with Artemis. As Underworld-goddess, she was an attendant of Persephone; and as leader of souls of the dead she was associated with ghosts, magic, and witchcraft. She was invisible to mortals, but dogs could see her pass; and she was often conceived of as tearing through the night followed by a pack of spectral hounds. Hounds were sacred to her. Hecate was also a crossroads-goddess, and as such was represented with triple bodies back to back. In this aspect the Romans named her Trivia. She was also identified variously with Demeter, Rhea, and Persephone.

Hecatomb (hek'-a-tom, -töm). In ancient Greece, a great public sacrifice of oxen or other beasts. Homer speaks of hecatombs being offered, as by Agamemnon and Hector, to propitiate the gods. Hecatomb means literally "100 oxen," but a sacrifice so costly must rarely have been performed, the word coming to mean no more than a sacrifice of unusual importance: (JJ)

Hecatombaeon (hek''a-tom-bē'on). The first month of the Attic year, containing 30 days, and corresponding to the last half of July (roughly) and the first half of August. It was a month in which sacrifices were offered to the gods, whence its name.

Hecatompodon (hek'-a-tom'pe-don). Popular name of an early temple of Athena on the Acropolis at Athens. Its foundations, buried beneath the Parthenon, cannot be seen, but its dimensions and plan can be deduced from its name (hecatompodon means "100-foot") and from elements of the entablature and pediment sculptures which have survived, and which indicate a date before 550 B.C., in the time of the Pisistratids. It was a modest Doric temple of the limestone known as poros, restored with tristyle-in-antis porches at front and rear. The Hecatompodon was demolished between 490 and 480 B.C. to make way for a new and larger marble temple of Athena, the "Older Parthenon," which in turn was destroyed in scaffolding by the Persians in 480 B.C.

The name Hecatompodon is also used to designate the cella of the third temple of Athena to rise on this spot, the Parthenon, construction of which was begun in 447 B.C.

Although the name implies that the Parthenon cella was 100 feet in length, it was actually somewhat less, 91½ Doric feet as measured by Dinsmoor; the name doubtless arose from association with the Pisistratid Hecatompodon. (JJ)

Hecatompylon (hek-a-tom'pi-lon). A name for Thebes in Egypt, meaning "100-gated," a city said to have been founded by Heracles as he passed through Egypt on his way to the west to fetch the cattle of Geryon.

Hecatonchires (hek-a-ton-kī'rēz). Greek name, used collectively, for the 100-handed monsters Briareus (also called Aegaeon), Cottus, and Gyges (or Gyes). The Roman name was Centimani.

Hector (hek'tor). The Trojan hero of the Iliad. He was the son of Priam and Hecuba (but some say he was a son of Apollo), the Crown Prince of Troy, and the leader of the Trojans and their allies in the defense of Troy against the Greeks. He did not approve of the war and unsuccessfully tried to stop it by negotiation and by individual combat, as when he suggested the duel between Menelaus and Paris. He scorned his brother, Paris, as a beautiful coward and seducer of women, and often wished him in Hades. Nevertheless, Hector fought valiantly and was the bravest of the Trojans, as his honor compelled him to fight for his family and for his country. His bravery was the greater because he knew he was doomed to die and that Troy would fall. For sheer love of glorious combat he challenged the Greeks to send a champion against him in single combat. Telamonian Ajax won, by lot, the honor of fighting him and they struggled all day, with neither able to achieve victory. At the end of their duel each expressed admiration for the courage and skill of the other. Hector gave Ajax his sword as a gift. Ajax gave Hector his girdle in exchange.

In what is probably the most touching and tender scene in the Iliad, Andromache, his wife, begs him to withdraw from the field and to seek safety inside the city walls, for her sake and that of their son, as well as for his own. With understanding and compassion, for he foresees her gloomy future, he convinces her that he must go, for he cannot evade his destiny. He expresses the hope that his baby son, who now shrinks in terror from his father's glittering war helmet, will be proud of his father and will be a better man. Gently he salutes her and leaves to rejoin the fighting. Aided by Apollo, he leads the Trojans against the ramparts protecting the Greek galleys, smashes open the gates, and fires the ships. He slays Patroclus, the intimate friend of Achilles, and puts on his armor. The death of Patroclus causes Achilles to renounce the wrath that has kept him inactive during the struggle, and he enters the battle to avenge Patroclus. Achilles drives the Trojans back into the city. Hector is left alone before the walls to face him. Seized by a moment of human fear Hector flees. Three times Achilles pursues him around the walls of Troy. Now Hector masters his fear and stops to face his enemy. And now the gods forsake him. Athena deludes him by appearing in the guise of his recognizes the armor that Hector is wearing, knows that there is a chink in the armor at the throat. He plunges his spear through the chink, and Hector falls. Achilles slits the tendons of Hector's heels, and takes the girdle that had been given to Hector by Ajax and passes it through the slits. Then he fastens the girdle to his chariot and drags the body of his fallen enemy through the dust to the Greek camp. Daily thereafter Achilles maltreats Hector's body, but it is preserved from all signs of injury by the gods, who anoint it with nectar and ambrosia. Thus, when Priam comes at last to ransom it, the body is still fresh. Priam returns to Troy with the body of his son and, as all Troy mourns, gives it funeral honors. Even Helen mourns the death of Hector, for he had always been kind to her and protected her from the spite of some of the Trojan women.

brother. Hector hurls his spear at Achilles then turns to his supposed brother for another weapon. He finds no one is there and realizes that the moment has come to meet his inevitable fate. His request to Achilles that his body be restored to Priam for burial is wrathfully scorned; and Achilles, who

Great "shimmering-helmeted" Hector was one of the noblest characters of Greek literature—valiant, honorable, compassionate, reasonable, skillful in arms, and handsome in body. He paid due respect and honor to the gods, especially to Zeus, who in turn protected him often, but could not save him from his appointed fate. Some say that the bones of Hector were later taken to Thebes in Boeotia, and buried beside the fountain of Oedipus there. This was done in obedience to a command of the oracle, which recommended that the Thebans gain possession of the bones of Hector if they desired prosperity for their land. Others say they were moved at the command of Apollo, who ordered the reburial of Hector's body in a city that had taken no part in the Trojan War, in order to lift a plague that struck Greece. Hector was still worshiped at Troy in the time of the Roman Empire; even, in fact, after the state had recognized Christianity. The Emperor Julian was taken to the sanctuary of Hector in the Troad by the bishop. There he saw a bronze statue of Hector in a little shrine, before which embers of sacrificial fire were still glowing on an altar. The Emperor asked in surprise if people still sacrificed to Hector. The bishop replied that Hector was one of their good townsmen, and if people paid their respects to him it was no more than Christians did to their martyrs.

Hecuba (hek'ū-bā) or Hecabe (hek'a-bē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Dymas of Phrygia, or, as some say, of Cisseus. She was the second wife of Priam, king of Troy, and bore him 19 of his 50 sons. Her oldest son, Hector, was sometimes said to be the son of Apollo, as was her son Troilus. Among Hecuba's other sons were Paris, Deïphobus, Helenus, Polites, Antiphus, and Polydorus. Her daughters included Cassandra, Creusa, Laodice, and Polyxena. Before Paris was born Hecuba dreamed that she had given birth to a bundle of faggots tied with fiery serpents. She woke screaming that Troy was in flames. This dream was interpreted to mean that the child she was about to bear would bring destruction to Troy if he and his mother were not killed to prevent it. A second pronouncement said that the child born to a royal Trojan that day must be destroyed with his mother or Troy would fall in ruins. Hecuba bore Paris on the day of the later prophecy and Priam spared them both. Later, on the urgent advice of seers, he gave the infant to his herdsman with instructions to kill him. Some say Hecuba bribed the herdsman to spare her child.

In any event, Paris was not destroyed and when he appeared in Troy as a young man he was welcomed delightedly by his parents. During the Trojan War Hecuba pled with Hector to keep himself apart from the struggle but to no avail. When he was pursued to the walls by Achilles, she begged him to save himself but he refused; he stood and faced Achilles and met his death before his mother's eyes. For reasons that have never been satisfactorily explained, Hecuba, with Helen, questioned Odysseus, when he crept into Troy to steal the Palladium, and let him go without denouncing him as the spy he was. In this case, Hecuba acted with Helen. Later she beseeched Menelaus to kill Helen as the cause of the disasters which had overcome Troy and the house of Priam. In the sack of Troy Hecuba saw her son Polites and her husband slain by Neoptolemus. Only her children Cassandra, Polyxena, and Polydorus now remained to her. In the division of the spoils Hecuba was awarded to Odysseus, perhaps in fulfillment of some promise he had made to her when he secretly entered Troy, or perhaps to prevent her from revealing that he had appeared in any but a heroic light on that occasion. As the woman who once had been the proud queen of a rich kingdom waited to be carried off as a slave, she was informed that Cassandra and her daughter-in-law Andromache were to be the captives of Agamemnon and Neoptolemus respectively; and that, on the advice of Odysseus, her grandson Astyanax must be destroyed lest at some future time he raise an army and march against the Greeks. The aged, broken queen left Troy in flames and sailed with her captors across the Hellespont to Thrace. Here the Greeks were held by unfavorable winds. To appease Achilles and secure favorable winds, Hecuba's last remaining daughter was sacrificed on the tomb of Achilles. Hecuba wished that she might have died with her city, and counted Priam lucky that he had not lived to see his city fall and his children destroyed. In the midst of these shattering griefs the body of her son Polydorus was brought to her. He had been sent with a rich treasure to Polymnestor of Thrace for safe-keeping. Polymnestor had betrayed his trust, some say in his greed for gold, slain the young prince, and cast his body into the sea. It was washed ashore at Hecuba's feet. In a sudden fury for revenge Hecuba, with Agamemnon's connivance, lured Polymnestor and his two young sons into her tent, with a story that she had concealed a great hoard of Trojan gold there. Once they were inside Hecuba and other Trojan women attacked him, put out his eyes, and killed his two sons. Cassandra's prophecy that Hecuba would never go to Greece was fulfilled. The Greeks would have stoned her to death for the blinding of Polymnestor and the murder of his two sons, but she was transformed into a bitch, Maera, and ran howling off into the wilderness. Others say that she was taken to Thrace by Odysseus, but that she so hideously condemned the Greeks for their barbarity and treachery and uttered such constant invectives that they put her to death. Her spirit was transformed into a black bitch that leaped into the sea and swam off to the Hellespont. Even the gods agreed that Hecuba had not deserved to meet such an end.

Hecuba. A tragedy by Euripides, exhibited in 425 B.C. Before the tent of Agamemnon, on the coast of Thracian Chersonese, the ghost of Polydorus appears. Because of his youth, this son of Priam and Hecuba had been sent to Polymnestor in Thrace, with much gold, for safety during the Trojan War. As long as Hector lived and Troy was victorious, Polymnestor took good care of him. But when Troy fell Polymnestor murdered Polydorus for the gold and threw his body into the sea. Now the Greeks, having vanquished Troy, are prevented from sailing for home because the shade of Achilles demands the sacrifice of Polyxena, Priam's daughter, to honor his deeds in the war. The ghost of Polydorus prophesies that she will be sacrificed, and that his mother will see two corpses.

Hecuba, dressed as a slave, appears with a chorus of captive Trojan women. She tells them she has dreamed of Polydorus and Polyxena, and they sadly warn her that Polyxena must be sacrificed to Achilles' shade before the Greeks can sail. They say that Agamemnon wanted to spare her but Odysseus convinced him that Achilles' spirit demanded this honor. Polyxena joins her mother and learns of her impending fate. She regrets the sorrow this will cause her mother but she will be glad to die, for death will be a happier fate than life as a slave. When Odysseus comes to take her away, Hecuba reminds him of the time he entered Troy in disguise. Helen recognized him and warned Hecuba of his presence, but in response to his pleas Hecuba spared him. Now she pleads with him to spare her child. He denies her pleas. Polyxena refuses to plead for her life. She longs to die. Hecuba begs Odysseus to take her instead of her daughter. It was she who bore that son Paris who killed Achilles with his arrows, so she should be sacrificed. Again Odysseus denies her. Achilles' ghost, he says, demands Polyxena. Hecuba swoons as he takes Polyxena off.

Talthybius, Agamemnon's herald, comes to the despairing Hecuba. He has compassion for the fallen queen. He would rather die than fall so low. He has come to inform Hecuba that she may claim her daughter's body for burial. All the Greeks, he says, watched Achilles' son lead Polyxena to be sacrificed. She did not flinch from the knife but died heroically, as the Greeks freely acknowledged, by the hand of Achilles' son. Later Agamemnon comes to Hecuba to command her to fetch Polyxena's body, since he has, at her wish, forbidden the Greeks to touch it. He finds Hecuba with the corpse of Polydorus in her arms. His body had been washed up on the beach and brought to Hecuba. She appeals to Agamemnon, in the name of her daughter Cassandra, who is his captive, and as a champion of the right, to help her to avenge herself on Polymnestor. Polymnestor has betrayed his old friend, murdered Polydorus and cast his body into the sea, for the sake of the gold Polydorus had brought with him from Troy. Agamemnon would like to help her if it can be done without the knowledge of the Greeks. All Hecuba requires is his permission to bury Polyxena and Polydorus together and his promise to send Polymnestor to her. To his doubts that feeble, unarmed women can do much, she replies that it was women who killed the sons of Aepytus, and women who depopulated Lemnos. He agrees to send Polymnestor to her.

When Polymnestor enters with his two young sons Hecuba inquires about Polydorus. He assures her all is well with him. She then speaks about a secret hoard of gold, and adds that she has a treasure of jewels in her tent, brought with her from Troy. All go into the tent. The chorus of women, remaining outside proclaims that the penalty for murder will soon be paid. At this Polymnestor screams from within the tent that he has been blinded and his children murdered. Hecuba comes out of the tent, Polymnestor groping after her and shouting for help. He tells Agamemnon, who has returned, that he killed Polydorus lest he reassemble the Trojans and start another war on the Greeks. In pain and anguish of heart he tells him that Hecuba and the captive women duped him, disarmed him, killed his children, and blinded him. Hecuba scoffs at Polymnestor's tale that he murdered Polydorus to help the Greeks. He did it for the gold, but if he really wants to help the Greeks he should give it to them. Agamemnon judges that Polymnestor, who is guilty of guest-murder, the foulest crime, has got what he deserved. Polymnestor prophesies that Hecuba will turn into a red-eyed bitch. He tells Agamemnon a bath of blood awaits him in Argos, and prophesies the death of Cassandra and Agamemnon at the hands of his wife Clytemnestra. Agamemnon orders the soldiers to take him away and leave him on a desert island. He then commands Hecuba to bury her children quickly for, following the sacrifice of Polyxena on Achilles' funeral pyre, a favorable breeze has sprung up, and they will sail for Greece at once.

Hegeleos (hē-jel'ē-os). In Greek legend, a son of Tyrsenus, and a grandson of Heracles. He taught the Dorians how to play the trumpet and set up a sanctuary of Athena Salpinx (Trumpet) in Argos.

Hegemone (hē-je'mō-nē). In Athens only two Charites (Graces) were recognized. Hegemone (Queen) was one of them. See Charites.

Hegeso (hē-jē'sō), Monument of. Monument in Athens, Greece, on the Street of Tombs, remarkable for the beauty of its relief-stele of the 4th century B.C.

Helen (hel'en). [Also: Helen of Troy.] In Greek legend, the "all-glorious" woman whose divine beauty led to a disastrous war which ended in the complete destruction of Troy and the empire of King Priam. Various stories are related concerning her birth, but certain it is that Zeus was her father. Some say that Zeus pursued Nemesis; that she fled from him, transforming herself from one animal to another to escape. At last she took the form of a goose and flew off. Zeus assumed the form of a swan, overtook her and ravished her. Nemesis laid a blue and silver egg which was found by Leda, wife of Tyndareus. She took it home and hid it in a chest, and from this egg Helen was born. Others say that Hermes found the egg Nemesis had laid and tossed it between Leda's knees, and it was from this that Leda bore Helen. The most common account is that Zeus, in the form of a swan, made love to Leda, and she bore him Helen. Helen's brothers were the twins, Castor and Polydeuces, of whom Polydeuces, and sometimes both, are said to be the sons of Zeus. Her sister was Clytemnestra, the child of Tyndareus. From childhood Helen was famed for her beauty. As a child, some say at the age of 12, she was kidnaped by Theseus and Pirithous and taken to Athens. Theseus, having lost his wife, intended to make Helen his bride. However, the Athenians frowned on this exploit of Theseus and, to avoid their displeasure, he sent her to Aphidna with his mother for safe-keeping. Helen's loyal brothers swooped down on Aphidna and rescued her, and carried her back to Sparta. As she grew to marriageable age the richest and most powerful princes of Greece sought her hand. Tyndareus, her supposed father, turned none of the suitors away. On the other hand, he dared not choose any one among them lest the others turn on him in wrath. Odysseus, not one of Helen's suitors, suggested a scheme whereby Tyndareus might award his daughter's hand without incurring the anger of the disappointed suitors. He advised Tyndareus to require each of the suitors to take an oath, on the joints of a horse, by which each would swear to come to the aid of the man who became Helen's husband in the event that any ill should come to him because of his marriage. Ajax, Teucer, Patroclus, Philoctetes, Idomeneus, and many others willingly took the oath. Tyndareus gave her to Menelaus, whom he also made the heir to the throne of Sparta. Whether Menelaus was also Helen's choice is not known. Helen bore Menelaus one daughter, Hermione, and, some say, three sons. However Helen and Menelaus may have felt about each other, the gods had decreed that their marriage was doomed. Some say Zeus wanted to make Helen famous for having embroiled Europe and Asia in a devastating war, or that he wanted to exalt the demigods. Some say Aphrodite was punishing Tyndareus, who had once overlooked her when he was sacrificing to the gods, by causing his daughters to become notorious adulteresses. Whatever the reason, the gods deliberately caused the war and took an active role in its progress. As Homer pictures Helen, she was the helpless tool of the gods, neither responsible for her beauty nor the disasters it caused.

Aphrodite had promised Paris, son of King Priam of Troy, the fairest woman in the world if he awarded her the golden apple which Eris had tossed among the wedding guests at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis. Paris did award Aphrodite the apple. Helen was the fairest woman in the world and already married. Yet Aphrodite set all in train to carry out her promise. Paris, with the blessing of his father, sailed to Sparta, telling no one the true object of his journey. In Sparta he was courteously welcomed and entertained by Menelaus. Apparently Menelaus felt perfectly secure in the affections of Helen, for though it was obvious to everyone that Paris was madly in love with Helen and making no effort to hide it, at the end of nine days Menelaus sailed off to Crete to attend his grandfather's funeral. He left his kingdom and the task of entertaining his distinguished and handsome Trojan guest in charge of Helen. The night of Menelaus' departure Helen eloped with Paris, taking a son and a great treasure with her. Paris' fleet was delayed by storms sent by Hera, and more time elapsed in side journeys to Cyprus, Phoenicia, and Egypt, before Paris arrived in Troy and formally married Helen. She bore him several children, all of whom perished in infancy. The entire city of Troy fell in love with Helen; old men stood at the walls to watch her pass; Priam vowed he would never let her go. Embassies from the Greeks demanding her return were summarily dismissed. The resolution of Paris and Priam to keep Helen did not weaken even when the Greeks gathered a great fleet of over 1000 ships and raided the coasts of the Troad. This resolution was concurred in by most of the Trojans. Men like Antenor, who advised from the very beginning that she be restored to her husband and reparations made, were regarded as traitors.

After nearly ten years of raids and attacks on the allies and cities of the Troad, the Greek fleet was beached off the plain of Troy and the city was besieged. Violent encounters followed between the Greeks under Agamemnon and the Trojans under Hector, then Paris and Menelaus, by agreement between the Greek and Trojan chieftains, fought in single combat to decide who should have Helen. This was a sensible solution to avoid further bloodshed by limiting the fighting to the two men most intimately concerned. If the gods had not intervened, the Trojan War would have ended here. Menelaus was about to strangle Paris in this duel when Aphrodite snatched him away in a mist and restored him to Helen. Helen was by no means grateful; she chided both the goddess and Paris. She would have preferred to go back to Menelaus and her homeland, but was compelled to accept the bidding of the goddess. In the Iliad, Helen's elopement is the dynamic force which sets off the great struggle between the Greeks and Trojans, but once the struggle is in progress Helen plays a minor role. Homer makes no criticism of Helen. His attitude is one worshipful of her beauty and sympathetic to her plight as a pawn of the gods. Following the interference of Aphrodite in the duel between Menelaus and Paris, full-scale war broke out again. As the Greeks massed on the plain Priam called Helen to him and asked her to identify various outstanding Greeks he could see from the towers of Troy. She named and characterized such heroes as Ajax, Odysseus, and others, and looked for her brothers among the throng, unaware that they had died and been deified. Watching the Greeks and remembering her happy life in Sparta, Helen regretted the trouble she, at Aphrodite's hands, had caused, and longed for her husband and her daughter. She was one of the chief mourners at the death of Hector. He had always been gentle and compassionate with her, and had ever turned aside the anger of others. As she grieved over Hector's death she lamented her years in Troy (20, according to Homer), and wished she had died rather than have caused so much anguish to so many. Following the death of Paris, Helen feared that she, now without a protector, would suffer the anger of the Trojans for the misery she had caused, but Deiphobus and Helenus, brothers of Paris, quarreled for her hand. She was awarded to Deiphobus, because of his brave deeds. The Trojans disapproved of this marriage by force.

When Odysseus crept into the city in disguise to steal the Palladium, which the Greeks had learned protected the city as long as it remained in the citadel, Helen recognized him. She took him, cringing and appealing for mercy, to Hecuba. Hecuba and Helen questioned him and let him go free, without telling anyone he had been there. Some say Helen did this to prepare for her return to Menelaus. Others say she succeeded, as she thought, in getting valuable information about the Greeks' plans from Odysseus. But Odysseus returned with Diomedes, and this time the Palladium was stolen from the citadel. Troy's days were numbered. The Greeks sailed away behind the island of Tenedos and left the Wooden Horse on the beach before Troy. The Trojans jubilantly hauled it inside the walls, deluded into the belief that it would please Athena and give them dominion over Europe. Helen, accompanied by Deiphobus, walked around the Wooden Horse. To test whether there were indeed, as Cassandra proclaimed, armed men hidden inside it, Helen imitated the voices of the wives of the Greek warriors and called out their names. So true was her imitation that Anticlus would have replied, and Menelaus and Diomedes wanted to leap out of the horse on hearing her voice, but Odysseus restrained them all. Some say Aphrodite, in disguise, appeared to Helen and told her Menelaus was in the Horse, and that she walked around it to help the Trojans, but Athena came to prevent her from helping the Trojans and caused her to light a signal fire which burned from the roof of her house all night and advised the Greeks it was safe to return. Others say it was Sinon who, after releasing the Greeks from inside the Wooden Horse, lighted the beacon to summon the Greek fleet back. He opened the gates of Troy and the Greeks streamed silently inside the walls and sacked the city. Menelaus made straight for Helen's house. Though he had proclaimed that he would kill her, he was passionately in love with her and could hardly wait to get her back. Deiphobus, with whom Menelaus and Odysseus found Helen, was slain and horribly mangled. Menelaus instantly forgave Helen. He was more than willing to blame the elopement, as she did, on the gods. She feared the anger the Greeks would harbor against her, and went among them in shame, but she was so beautiful everyone "marveled to see the glory of loveliness of that all-flawless woman"; no one reproached her. She accompanied Menelaus to his ship and they passed the rest of the night in sweet converse.

Following the destruction of Troy, Menelaus quarreled with Agamemnon and sailed immediately, without offering due sacrifice to the gods. To punish him, Athena drove his fleet off course, and afterward he and Helen were delayed eight years on their journey home. Helen feared the welcome she would get in Greece, but as it turned out, she and Menelaus, who returned to Sparta with rich treasure, lived among their people in great prosperity and harmony. So deep was the affection and understanding between Helen and Menelaus, according to Homer, that she could refer ruefully to the aberration which had caused her to leave her husband and embroil Europe and Asia in a disastrous war. There is a story that the poet Stesichorus wrote a scurrilous account of Helen's elopement. Some time later he went blind and learned that Helen had taken away his sight to punish him for dishonoring her name. He wrote a new account, which he called the true one, and repudiated the former one as spurious. According to his revised version, Helen never went to Troy at all. Zeus sent Hermes to carry her off in a cloud. She was taken to Egypt and left under the protection of the king there. The Helen for whom Menelaus and all the Greeks fought Hector and all the Trojans was a phantom, fashioned from a cloud by Hera. While they fought over this wraith the real Helen, blameless of any infidelity to Menelaus, remained in Egypt, bemoaning the awful fate which had caused her name to be dishonored. Seven years after the end of the Trojan War Menelaus, who had been completely taken in by the phantom Helen, touched at Egypt after a storm had wrecked his fleet. There he found his own true, beautiful, and virtuous wife. They were joyously reunited as the phantom Helen disappeared.

There are as many accounts of Helen's end as there are of her birth. Some say that Helen was threatened by Orestes when she and Menelaus at last landed in Sparta, because he considered her the cause of all his troubles. She was borne off in a cloud to Olympus, at Zeus' command, where she joined her brothers as a goddess who protects mariners. Others record that Menelaus died in Sparta and that Helen, friendless, fled to her former friend Polyxo in Rhodes. Polyxo, the wife of Tlepolemus who was killed in the Trojan War, avenged her husband's death by inciting her servants to hang Helen. But others say that Helen and Menelaus lived happily together; that Menelaus was made immortal as the son-in-law of Zeus, and that he and Helen went to the Elysian Fields together where they wander hand in hand. Still others say that Achilles had fallen in love with her when he saw her on the walls of Troy, and that at the end of her life with Menelaus in Sparta, she went to the island of Leuce which had been given to Achilles by Poseidon. There she married Achilles and lived happily with him and his companions, Antilochus, Patroclus, and the two Ajaxes. Mariners who sailed near the wooded shores of the island could hear their voices floating over the water as they recited the verses of Homer which recounted their exploits. A special shrine to Helen, as a goddess of beauty, was erected at Therapne, and an annual festival was held there in her honor.

Helen. A drama by Euripides, written about 412 B.C. In this drama Euripides presents the view that Helen, daughter of Zeus and Leda, and wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, never went to Troy at all. Hera, angry with Paris for awarding the prize for beauty to Aphrodite, substituted a phantom Helen, shaped from a cloud, for the real Helen whom Aphrodite had given to Paris as a reward for giving the golden apple of beauty to her. Paris, unaware of the substitution, took the phantom back to Troy with him, while the real Helen was spirited away by Hermes and left under the protection of King Proteus of Egypt. There she remained, lamenting the evil fate that had made her name a byword of infamy, although she was innocent of dishonoring her husband. Because of the anger and wiles of Hera, Greeks and Trojans perished by the Scamander in Troy for a wraith; the whole war, for which Helen was held to be the cause, was fought for a cloud. After seven years, Menelaus, who had been continually prevented from reaching his homeland by violent storms, was shipwrecked on the Egyptian coast. He found Helen, and after learning that the Helen he had captured at Troy was nothing but a phantom, and that his wife had been noble and virtuous throughout the long years, he joyously claimed her. By trickery they were able to escape from Theoclymenus, the son and successor of Proteus, who had determined to marry Helen, and return to Sparta. Thus the will of the gods, absolutely incomprehensible to mortals, was fulfilled, while Euripides calls attention to the futility of war.

Helena (hel'ē-nā). Greek painter; daughter of the Egyptian Timon. She is said to have lived in the time of the battle of Issus (333 B.C.), and to have painted a picture of that subject. This picture was hung by Vespasian in the Temple of Peace at Rome. The great Pompeian mosaic of the battle of Issus must have been made about this time, and is perhaps a copy of the picture.

Helena. Island off the coast of Attica, between Cape Sunium and the island of Ceos. Helen is said to have landed there first on her return with Menelaus from Troy, and the island was named for her.

Helenor (he-lē'nôr). In the Aeneid, the son of a Lydian king and a slave-girl from Lycymna. He had fought at Troy and accompanied Aeneas in his flight from that city to Italy. He was one of the principal defenders of the garrison in the war between the Trojans, under Aeneas, and the Latins, under Turnus, when Turnus attacked it while Aeneas was away seeking help.

Helenus (hel'e-nus). In Greek legend, a son of Priam and Hecuba, and the twin of Cassandra. When he was a child the twins were left outside while others celebrated in the temple of Apollo. Sacred serpents came and licked their ears and gave them prophetic powers. When later, Paris proposed to set out for Sparta with the secret intention of abducting Helen, Helenus agreed with Cassandra that Troy would go up in flames if he made the trip, but their prophecies were ignored. In the Trojan War he fought bravely, killing many and wounding Achilles and Menelaus. After the death of Paris, he contended with Deiphobus for Helen's hand. She was awarded to Deiphobus, who forcibly married her, and Helenus withdrew from the city and went to live on Mount Ida. The Greeks learned from Calchas that only Helenus could tell them what protected Troy and determined to seize him. Odysseus captured him in the temple of Apollo and took him to the Greek camp. Helenus agreed to give the required information on condition that he be sent to a land far from Troy at the close of the war. He said Troy could not be taken unless a bone of Pelops was brought to the Greek camp, that Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, must join the fighting, and that the Greeks must steal the Palladium that protected Troy as long as it remained in the city. After the war Helenus advised Neoptolemus to go to Molossia. He also told him to wait two more days before sailing, and prophesied that storms would overtake the others. In gratitude for his advice Neoptolemus took Helenus with him when he left Troy, and bequeathed him Andromache, captive and concubine of Neoptolemus, on his death. Helenus also told Neoptolemus to build a city where he found men living in houses whose foundations were of iron, walls of wood, and roofs of wool. It was because of this advice that Neoptolemus later settled in Epirus, where he came upon a group who were camped under blankets supported by spears. Some say that Neoptolemus also gave Helenus his mother, Deidamia, for a wife. Later, after the death of Neoptolemus, Helenus acquired Andromache (Hector's wife), and a part of Neoptolemus' kingdom in Epirus, thus becoming a ruler over Greeks. He built a miniature Troy, with a copy of the Scaean Gate, near a river which he named Xanthus after the river of Troy. He entertained Aeneas when the latter stopped there on his way from Troy to Italy, and made certain prophecies regarding his fate. He told Aeneas that the voyage and dangers ahead were yet great, that a sow with 30 new-born piglets would mark the site of the city Aeneas was to build, that he should avoid the east coast of Italy because it was peopled by Greeks, that he should sail around Sicily to avoid Scylla and Charybdis, that he should pay particular homage to Hera, and that he should consult the Cumaean Sibyl. He then gave Aeneas a plumed helmet that had once belonged to Neoptolemus and many other presents and guides and sent him on his way.

Heliadae (hē-lī'a-dē). A name given to the seven sons of Helius and Rhode, daughter of Poseidon. They were thought to be especially gifted in knowledge of astrology. For the murder of one of the brothers, the other brothers were scattered through various lands.

Heliades (hē-lī'a-dēz). A name for the daughters of Helius and the nymph Clymene. Their grief for the death of their brother, Phaëthon, was so great that the gods in pity transformed them into poplar trees. There they stand, eternally weeping tears of amber, on the banks of the Eridanus River into which Phaëthon fell when struck by a thunderbolt of Zeus.

Helicaon (hel-i-kā'on). In Greek legend, a son of Antenor and Theano, and the husband of Laodice, a daughter of Priam. He was horribly wounded in the fall of Troy and was rescued by Odysseus. His family was spared by the Greeks, because Antenor had advised the Trojans to return Helen, and later migrated to the northern coast of Italy.

Helice (hel'i-sē). In ancient geography, a city of Achaea, on the south coast of the Gulf of Corinth. According to some accounts, it was founded by Ion, son of Apollo and Creusa, and named for his wife Helice, daughter of King Selinus of Aegialus. Men of Helice went to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon. Poseidon had a temple there. In 373 B.C., according to Pausanias, some suppliants who had fled to his temple and taken refuge in his famous sanctuary were dragged away from the altars by the Achaeans. To punish them for this impiety Poseidon sent an earthquake against the Achaeans. Helice was shaken to the ground and was then swallowed up in the sea by a tidal wave; none of its inhabitants was left alive.

Helicon (hel'i-kon, -kən). [Also: Elikon, Helikon, Zagora.] Mountain range in S central Greece, on the N shore of the Gulf of Corinth, about 50 miles NW of Athens. According to legend Helicon and Cithaeron were brothers. Cithaeron was fierce and brutal. He murdered his father and attempted to hurl gentle Helicon from a rock, whereupon the brothers were transformed by the gods into the mountains which bear their names. Helicon became the home of Apollo and the Muses. Wild Cithaeron became a mountain on which unwanted infants were often exposed to die. Helicon contained the fountains of Aganippe and Hippocrene. Peak elevation, about 5868 feet.

Heliconian (hel-i-kō'ni-an). Epithet of Poseidon, meaning "Of Helice," from the town in Achaea of that name. The Ionians founded the sanctuary of Heliconian Poseidon at Helice, and it was very holy to them. When they were driven out by the Achaeans they took the cult of Heliconian Poseidon to Athens with them. From Athens the Ionians went to the coasts of Asia, and their worship of Heliconian Poseidon went with them. They established altars there, as at Miletus, and also founded a precinct and altar of Heliconian Poseidon at Teos. At Helice, the Achaeans removed some suppliants from the altar of Heliconian Poseidon and killed them. As punishment Poseidon visited upon their city complete destruction. First an earthquake swallowed it up, then a flood inundated it.

Heliodorus (hē'li-ō-dō'rus). Greek novelist, born at Emesa (modern Homs), Syria, and active toward the end of the 4th century A.D. One of the two best Greek novelists, according to some scholars (the other was Longus), he was the forerunner of a new and buoyant movement in the writing of romances. His strength lay in his control of plot, his skill in narrative, and in the lively power and quality of his writing. According to one account, given as typical of Heliodorus, he was a bishop of the Christian Church. His works aroused the criticism of his colleagues and he was asked either to give up writing romances or his bishopric. He resigned his bishopric. Some say, however, that this is an apochryphal tale, and that Heliodorus the bishop was another individual. An extant novel by Heliodorus is the Ethiopica, in ten books, which served as a model to later Greek novelists.

Heliopolis (hē-li-op'ō-lis). [Ancient Egyptian, An or On; modern name, Matarieh, Matariya; known as the "City of the Sun-God."] In ancient geography, a city in Lower Egypt, on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. According to legend, it was founded by Actis, a son of Helius and Rhode, who named it for his father. It was situated on the edge of the desert, about four miles E of the apex of the Nile delta. It was a seat of learning ("the university of Egypt") and of the worship of the sun-god Ra. Its site is about six miles N of Cairo.

Heliopolis. [Modern name, Baalbek, Baalbec, or Ba'albek.] Ancient city of Syria, situated on the slope of the Anti-Libanus mountains, about 34 miles NW of Damascus; now a small town in E Lebanon. Famous in modern times chiefly for its ruins, it was a center of the worship of Baal as sun-god, whence both the original and Greek names. The city was a Roman colony (Colonia Julia Augusta Felix) under Augustus, and was adorned, especially with the great temple of Jupiter which he began, by Antoninus Pius. There are also remains of temples to Bacchus and Venus. Its decline began with its capture by the Arabs, and it was totally destroyed by an earthquake in 1759. The site is famous for the ruins of the great temples on its acropolis. The older portions of the acropolis wall, made of huge stones, are of Phoenician or kindred origin, and date from the time when the worship of Baal was still supreme. Aside from these sections of the wall, all the structures now remaining are Roman or later in time, and are interesting for their grouping, their great size, and the beauty of the materials. The site has been known to Europeans since the 16th century, and its monuments have been studied and sketched by many explorers.

Helius (hē'li-us). The sun-god (called Hyperion by Homer). He was the son of the Titan Hyperion and the Titaness Thia, and was the brother of Eos and Selene. By Clymene he was the father of Phaëthon. Aëtes, Circe, and Pasiphaë were his children by Persa. Helius is also known as a god of herds and flocks, who keeps his own sacred flocks on Trinacria (Sicily), an island which was given to him by Zeus after it was formed in the battle between the gods and Giants, and on the island of Erythea. Helius is represented as a strong and beautiful youth, with heavy waving locks and a crown of rays, driving a four-horse chariot. He keeps his horses in a magnificent stable built for him by Hephaestus, and each morning rises from the ocean on the east and drives across the heavens in his glowing car, descending at evening into the western sea. At night, while asleep, he is borne along the northern edge of the earth in a golden boat or cup made by Hephaestus to his rising-place in the east. Because of his passage through the sky nothing escapes the notice of Helius. It was he who warned Hephaestus of the love affair between Ares and Aphrodite, who saw Hades abduct Persephone, who told Artemis that Oeneus of Calydon had forgotten to include her in his sacrifice of first fruits to the gods. Rhodes, the principal seat of his worship, came into Helius' hands in the following manner: when Zeus was parcelling out various cities and islands to the gods he forgot Helius. Helius offered to take as his portion an island which was just then rising out of the sea. This was Rhodes, and Helius made it his own. There he became the father of seven sons and a daughter by the nymph Rhode. His sons became rulers of the island and their descendants built his famous statue, the Colossus of Rhodes. In later times Helius was confused with Apollo because of his association with the sun. The Romans identified him with their Sol.

Helius. Roman court favorite; died 68 A.D. He was prefect of Rome and Italy during the absence (67-68) of Nero in Greece, being invested with full power of life and death even over the senatorial order. He was put to death, with Locusta, the poisoner, and other of Nero's creatures by Nero's successor, the emperor Galba.

Helladians (he-lā'di-anz). In Byzantine geography, a name coined to describe the people of Hellas, the region in and near the Greek peninsula, to distinguish them from those speaking Greek, or the Hellenes.

Helladic (he-lad'ik). A term coined by prehistorians to denote the material culture of the bronze age (c3000-c1100 B.C.) of the mainland of Greece, and its three chronological divisions: Early Helladic c3000-c1950 B.C., Middle Helladic c1950-c1650 B.C., Late Helladic c1650-c1100 B.C., each in turn subdivided into two or more phases. The term Mycenaean is synonymous with Late Helladic in this context and is freely substituted for it. Parallel terms are Cycladic, denoting the bronze-age culture of the islands of the Aegean (Cyclades), and Minoan, denoting the bronze-age culture of Crete. (JJ)

Hellanicus (hel-a-nī'kus). Greek chronicler or logographer. He was born at Mytilene, in Lesbos, possibly c480 B.C. and lived until some time after 406 B.C. He is said by Suidas, probably erroneously, to have lived with Herodotus at the court of Amyntas of Macedonia. The same doubtful authority states that he died at Perperene, on the coast of Asia Minor, opposite Lesbos. He is known to have lived before Thucydides, who mentioned his now-lost work Atthis (a history of Attica), which in its turn mentioned the battle of Arginusae (406 B.C.), and is thought to have been younger than Herodotus. Using local written and oral records, he collected what he thought to be a mass of facts, but which in many cases were local or general myths, legends, and versions of events distorted for local purposes, and put these into chronological order according to a system of his own devising. He wrote a history of Persia, including in it many Greek stories, and preserved many Greek legends (which he thought of as historical events in danger of being lost) in his histories of the Aeolians in Asia Minor. He wrote about the descendants of Deucalion and histories of Media and Assyria from the time of Ninus to his own day. He went to Argos and wrote the legends of that region and also published a list of the priestesses of Hera at Argos, as well as a list of the victors of the games of Apollo at Sparta. These lists, considered to be accurate, were important as providing a chronological basis for the history of the past, but to this chronology he fitted the myths and legends of which he wrote. Next he went to Athens and wrote his Atthis, in which he gave long lists of the names of kings of Attica in an attempt to account for a period beginning more than a thousand years before the first Olympiad. His artificial and invented lists, with his method of using local data uncritically, have at times put obstacles in the way of obtaining historical fact, and he was called a liar by Ephorus, careless by Apollodorus, and less reliable than Homer, Hesiod, and the tragic poets by Strabo. Nevertheless, he attempted to be systematic, and was conscientious in following a method of recording, even when he had to invent to complete the record, and even when what he recorded was in no sense history. Only fragments of his works survive.

Hellas (hel'as). In ancient geography, originally a town and small district in Phthiotis, Thessaly, later extended to denote the lands inhabited by the Hellenes, modern Greek Ellas. The terms Greek and Greece were never applied by the Greeks to themselves, being used by Italians first to designate the Hellenes of S Italy (Magna Graecia) and subsequently extended to include the Hellenes of the mainland. (JJ)

Helle (hel'ē). In Greek legend, the daughter of Athamas and Nephele, and a sister of Phrixus. The two children flew away on the winged ram with the golden fleece to escape the death plotted for them by their stepmother. Helle fell off and was drowned in the Hellespont, whence its name, meaning "Sea of Helle."

Hellen (hel'en). In Greek legend, a son of Deucalion and Pyrrha. He married Orseis and settled in Thessaly. Through his sons, Aeolus, Xuthus, and Dorus, he was the eponymous ancestor of the entire Hellenic race. Aeolus was the founder of the Aeolian tribe; the sons of Xuthus, Achaeus and Ion, founded the Achaean and Ionian tribes; and Dorus was the founder of the Dorian tribe.

Hellenes (hel'enz). Ancient Greeks; properly, the Greeks traditionally so called from Hellen, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, the legendary ancestors of the true Greeks, consisting of the Dorians, Aeolians, Ionians, and Achaeans.

Hellespont (hel'es-pont). [Modern name, Dardanelles.] Strait connecting the Propontis (Sea of Marmara) with the Aegean Sea, and separating the Chersonesus Thracica (Callipoli peninsula) from Asia Minor. It was named for Helle, the sister of Phrixus. As she and her brother were escaping from Orchomenus on the back of a golden-fleeced ram, Helle lost her hold and fell into this strait, which ever after bore her name. It was celebrated in the legend of Hero and Leander. It was crossed by Xerxes in 480 B.C., and by Alexander the Great in 334 B.C. Length, about 45 miles; average width, 3 to 4 miles; narrowest point, about 1¼ miles.

Helos (hē'los). In ancient geography, a town in Laconia, situated near the sea, about 25 miles SE of Sparta. It was said to have been founded by Helius, the youngest son of Perseus. The Dorians reduced it by siege and reduced the inhabitants to slavery and carried them off to Sparta.

Helvetii (hel-vē'shi-ī). A Celtic people which in the time of Caesar occupied a district east of the Jura, north of the Lacus Lemannus (Lake of Geneva), and west and south of the Rhenus (Rhine), in what is now Switzerland. They were defeated by Caesar in 58 B.C., and thoroughly subjugated by Augustus in 15 B.C.

Hemera (hem'er-a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Erebus and Nyx (Night). Later she came to be identified with Eos (Dawn) when, as she accompanied Helius, she changed from Dawn and became Day.

Hemerasia (hē-mēr-ā'zhā). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "She who Soothes." There was a sanctuary of Artemis Hemerasia in Arcadia on the spot where Melampus cured the daughters of Proetus of their madness.

Hemithea (hē-mith'e-a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Cycnus of Colona and Proclea. She was the sister of Tenes and was banished with him by her father and accompanied him to Tenedos. Some say Achilles fell in love with her when the Greeks landed on Tenedos on their way to Troy, and that it was a quarrel over her that led Achilles to kill Tenes. Others say that after Achilles killed Tenes he pursued Hemithea. He would have caught Henioche (hē-nī'ō-kē). Epithet of Hera, meaning "Charioteer." Suppliants at the oracle of Trophonius, at Lebadia, sacrificed to Hera Henioche.

Hephaestion (hē-fes'ti-on). Macedonian of Pella; died at Ecbatana (now Hamadan, Iran), 324 B.C. He was the intimate friend and companion of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied on the campaigns in Asia. Alexander called him "the friend of Alexander," whereas his other close companion he named "the friend of the king." When Alexander crossed the Hellespont (334 B.C.) and laid a garland on the tomb of his hero and supposed ancestor, Achilles, Hephaestion did homage at the grave of Patroclus, for he was linked to Alexander as Patroclus was to Achilles. When Alexander increasingly adopted barbarian (Oriental) customs as he continued his conquest of Asia, Hephaestion did the same, although other of Alexander's closest companions resented the influence the barbarians seemed to be wielding on their king. On the march into India, Hephaestion, with three regiments, went by the Khyber Pass to the Indus River, where he was to arrange transport for the crossing of the army. On the return from India Alexander rested at Ecbatana, the Median capital. Thousands of poets and actors came from Greece to entertain the king; great feasts and celebrations were held. Hephaestion fell ill of a fever. He disregarded his physician's orders to rest and abstain from feasting, and joined Alexander at a banquet. He suffered a relapse and died. Alexander was wild with grief. He ordered the manes and tails of the horses and mules to be cut, razed the fortifications of neighboring cities as a sign of mourning, crucified the physician who attended Hephaestion, and forbade the playing of music until an oracle of Ammon arrived instructing him to sacrifice to Hephaestion and worship him as a hero. He fell on the tribe of the Cossaeans and destroyed them, some say as a sacrifice to Hephaestion. When he arrived in Babylon, 323 B.C., he caused a funeral pyre 200 feet high to be raised, on which his friend's body was burned. For the funeral, of unsurpassed magnificence, he had set aside 10,000 talents. The last honor he paid his friend was the erection of shrines, in which Hephaestion would be worshiped as a hero, at Alexandria in Egypt and in other cities.

Hephaestus (hē-fes'tus). One of the 12 Olympian gods, he was the god of fire and the divine smith. With Athena, he was the patron of handicrafts, and through his skill as a craftsman he was one of the chief promoters of civilization and of city life. He was the creator of all that was beautiful and mechanically wonderful in Olympus, especially arms and armor for the gods. At the festival of the Apaturia, when children were enrolled as citizens, Hephaestus was honored as the god of fire. In general, he was a beneficent god, much loved by mortals and gods alike for his kindness and his skill in the peaceful arts.

Some say that Hephaestus was the son of Hera alone, that he had no father. They say Hera produced him alone after Athena was born from the head of Zeus to show that she too could have a child without anyone's help.

But others say Zeus was his father. When he was born, he alone of the ideally beautiful gods was ugly, and Hera, in disgust, flung him out of heaven. He fell into the sea and was rescued by Thetis and Eurynome. The Nereids treated him kindly and kept him with them in a cavern beneath the sea for nine years. It was because of her kindness that Hephaestus, in the Trojan War, made new armor for Achilles, son of Thetis. While living under the sea Hephaestus, "equally skilled in both hands," made a golden throne to which he attached golden mesh fetters, so fine they were invisible. This he sent to Hera, to punish her for hurling him out of heaven. When she sat on the throne she was immediately held fast by the invisible fetters. The gods of heaven sought to persuade Hephaestus to return to Olympus and free her. He refused. Ares threatened him with force. Hephaestus compelled him to withdraw by menacing him with molten missiles. Dionysus came to try his persuasions. Hephaestus trusted Dionysus and received him. Dionysus got him drunk and led him to Olympus, where he at last agreed to free Hera. From then on he took his place among the gods and was greatly loved by them, and made them beautiful bronze palaces. But Zeus, angry with Hera because she had caused Heracles to be shipwrecked on the isle of Cos, punished her by hanging her out of heaven with anvils attached to each of her feet. Hephaestus remonstrated with him, and sought to help his mother. Enraged at his interference, Zeus flung him again from heaven. Through one whole day he fell, and landed at last on the island of Lemnos. Half-dead, he was rescued and cared for by the Lemnians, for which reason Lemnos became one of his favorite haunts. Some say both his legs were broken in this fall, and that he was ever after lame. But others say he was born lame. He made himself golden maidens that had the power to move by themselves, and these helped him to walk and assisted him in his forge. And in his forge he made golden tripods on wheels, that went of themselves to the gatherings of the gods. He never again interfered in the quarrels of Zeus and Hera. On the contrary, he tried to persuade his mother to yield to the will of her husband in the future.

Some say that before he freed Hera from the throne to which she was bound by invisible chains, he won from her a promise that Aphrodite would be given to him for a wife. He paid rich marriage gifts to Zeus for her and she was married to him. But she was an unwilling wife. She preferred the straight and handsome Ares, and frequently entertained him when Hephaestus was absent. Helios, who sees everything in his passage through the skies, saw Aphrodite and Ares together and reported it to Hephaestus. Hephaestus determined to expose the guilty pair. He fashioned a net so fine it was invisible and as strong as it was fine, and placed it over his marriage bed. Then he told his golden wife that he was going on a journey to Lemnos. As soon as he had gone, Ares came joyously to his house and embraced Aphrodite on the marriage bed. Instantly the lovers were caught in the golden mesh and could not escape. Hephaestus returned and called all the gods to witness his dishonor. The gods came and laughed mightily at the plight of Aphrodite and Ares, but the goddesses stayed at home, out of modesty. Hermes was frankly envious of Ares as he viewed the glorious body of Aphrodite, and confessed that he would gladly change places with him. Zeus refused to have anything to do with the matter and rebuked Hephaestus for exposing the dishonor to his name. But Poseidon, fired with love by the sight of Aphrodite, offered, if Ares should default, to make good the marriage gifts Hephaestus had given Zeus for Aphrodite's hand and which he now demanded be returned. Hephaestus accepted his offer and freed the lovers. Aphrodite went to her island of Cyprus and was there purified by her nymphs. Ares went to Thrace. But in a short time all was as before. Hephaestus loved Aphrodite so passionately that he gladly took her back on her terms. Aphrodite bore no children to Hephaestus, but he was the father of Palaemonius the Argonaut, who was lame like his father. He was also the father of Erichthonius. Some say that Poseidon, for a joke, told Hephaestus that Athena would welcome his advances. When she came to his forge for new weapons he attempted to embrace her. She repulsed him, and his seed fell on her leg. The goddess brushed it off with a piece of wool, which she then cast from her. It fell on Mother Earth, and from this accidental union Erichthonius was born. This encounter did not seem to mar the friendly relations between Athena and Hephaestus, for they were often associated in various exploits. Some name Charis, one of the Graces, as a wife of Hephaestus; and some name Aglaia, the youngest of the Graces, as his wife.

In the Trojan War Hera called on him to come to the aid of Achilles. For Achilles had so choked the Scamander River in Troy with the bodies of those he had slain that the river rose up against him to drown him. Hephaestus sent his flames and dried up the river, and the river-god promised to take no further part in the war. Hephaestus used his skill for peaceful purposes usually, and it was greatly against his will and only because he was commanded to do so by Zeus, that he forged fetters and bound Prometheus to a crag in the Caucasus. At the time he mourned that his great art, so often employed for the good of mankind, should be used for such a cruel purpose, even though it was his own fire that Prometheus had stolen and given to man, for which Zeus punished him. Among the marvelous works said to have been created by Hephaestus were bronze palaces for the gods, the fire-breathing bronze-hoofed bulls that Aeëtes required Jason to yoke; Talos, the bronze man who guarded the island of Crete for King Minos; Ariadne's wonderful crown that was afterward set in the heavens; the armor of Achilles; the bronze castanets with which Heracles frightened the Stymphalian birds, and Heracles' golden breastplate; and the necklace of Harmonia that brought sorrow to all who possessed it. It was also Hephaestus who fashioned the figure of Pandora, into which the gods breathed life. But some say the only truly authentic work from the hand of Hephaestus that survived was the scepter he made for Zeus. Zeus sent it to Pelops by Hermes, and ultimately it passed into the hands of Agamemnon. This scepter came to be the most precious possession of the people of Chæroneia, who say they found it on the borders of their land. They worshiped it under the name Spear, and offered sacrifices to it daily. It was kept in a house selected by the priest and near it stood a table on which meats and all kinds of cakes were offered. The Lycians also claimed to have one of the works of Hephaestus, a bowl that was dedicated by Telephus in the temple of Apollo.

Lemnos, once a volcanic isle, was of course a favorite place of Hephaestus, and there he had a forge, manned by the Cyclopes. A volcanic island of the Lipari group was said to be the site of another of his forges, and Mount Aetna in Sicily was also said to lie over one of the forges of Hephaestus. In Athens Hephaestus was honored with a splendid marble temple, the Hephaesteum, and an altar. The Chalkeia, a feast of the metal workers, honored him and Athena; and at the Hephaestia a torch race was run in his honor. He was sometimes known as Mulciber (Melter), by the Romans, who identified him with Vulcan. In art he was represented as a bearded man, usually with the short sleeveless or one-sleeved tunic and the conical cap, and holding the smith's hammer and tongs.

Heptanesus (hep-tā-nē'sus). The seven principal inhabited islands of the Ionian Sea: Corcyra, Paxos, Leucas, Ithaca, Cephalonia, Zacynthus, and Cythæra. (JJ)

Heptaporus (hep-tap'ō-rus). Named by Homer (Iliad) as one of the rivers of the Troad which, after the Trojan War had ended, was diverted from its course by Apollo and Poseidon and sent against the wall which the Greeks had erected to protect their ships. The rivers so diverted from their courses, with the aid of Zeus, washed the wall into the sea. See Rhesus, river.

Hera (hēr'ā). [Also: Here.] One of the 12 Olympian gods, the greatest feminine divinity of Olympus, queen of heaven; daughter of Cronus and Rhea; wife and sister of Zeus, and inferior in power to him only. She was the goddess of women and childbirth, the type of virtuous womanhood, and of the wife and mother. Honored by the Greeks in these capacities, she yet appears in their myths as an extremely unpleasant and rather spiteful goddess, driven to it perhaps by the turmoils of her own married life. She was a sky-goddess, as Zeus was a sky-god. The ancients attributed the storms in the heavens to the quarrels of Zeus and Hera. Aeolus, keeper of the winds, released them at her command.

Like her sisters before her, Hera was swallowed up by Cronus as soon as she was born, and was cast out with them when Zeus duped his father into drinking an emetic. Many places where she was worshiped claimed to be her birthplace. The Samians said she was born on their island. In antiquity they pointed out a tree near the Imbrus River under which they claimed she was born. At Samos an image of Hera was annually hidden at the seashore, where it was annually discovered, as part of her worship. Argos also claimed to be her birthplace. She contended with Poseidon for control of it; the dispute was submitted to the river-gods Inachus, Cephissus, and Asterion, who decided in favor of the goddess. Samos and Argos were the chief seats of her worship, although the Arcadians claimed that they were the first to worship her. According to the Iliad, Argos, Mycenae, and Sparta were the three cities most loved by her. Near Mycenae was the national Argive shrine of the goddess, the Heraeum, where the great image of her by Polyclitus was housed. In Argos the years were named according to the priestesses of Hera who served in the Heraeum. Some say Hera was brought up by Temenus, son of Pelasgus, in Arcadia, where the Seasons were her nurses. Temenus erected three shrines of Hera: one of Hera the Child, in commemoration of her early years under his care; one of Hera the Bride, in honor of her marriage to Zeus; and a third of Hera the Widow, in memory of a time when she quarreled with Zeus and left him.

Homer says that Hera dwelt at some time in her youth with Oceanus and Tethys, for whom she always had a high regard. When she reached marriageable age her brother, Zeus, courted her, but she repulsed him. He assumed the form of a cuckoo and approached her, some say on Mount Thornax in Argolis, others say it took place in Crete. Deceived, she picked up the bird and nestled it in her bosom. Zeus at once resumed his own form and ravished her. Thus was she persuaded to marry him. Almost as many places as claimed to be her birthplace also claimed to be the scene of her marriage, which took place in the spring. The wedding was attended by all the gods, who brought gifts. Gaea presented her with a tree bearing golden apples, which was set out in the Garden of the Hesperides and guarded by the daughters of Atlas. The wedding night, which lasted 300 years, was spent on the island of Samos. Each year thereafter Hera was said to renew her virginity by bathing in the spring of Canathus in Argos. In all things except the capacity to bestow the power of prophecy, Hera's powers, though great, were inferior to those of Zeus. He often confided in her and sometimes even took her advice, but zealously guarded his right to do as he pleased in any given case. When the arrogance of Zeus became unbearable to the gods they plotted against him and bound him as he slept. Through the intervention of Thetis he was freed by Briareus. To punish Hera, the ringleader in the plot, Zeus fastened bracelets of gold on her wrists, anvils on her feet, and hung her out of heaven. Only when the gods pleaded with him and promised never again to revolt did he relent and restore her to Olympus. When the Giants waged war on the gods it was Hera who prophesied that they could never be slain by the gods, but only by a mortal who was protected by a magic herb. She took vigorous part in the battles against the Giants. Porphyryon sought to violate her, Zeus sprang to her aid and wounded him, and Heracles, the mortal of her prophecy, slew Porphyryon.

Hera bore Ares, Hephaestus, and Hebe to Zeus. Hephaestus was born lame, and in disgust Hera flung him out of heaven. To punish her, Hephaestus, a master-smith, built a magnificent chair and sent it to her. When she sat in it the arms closed about her and held her fast. The gods tried in vain to free her. At last Dionysus went to Hephaestus, got him drunk, and led him to Olympus where he freed his mother. When she saw what a gifted craftsman he was, Hera became reconciled with Hephaestus and set up a forge for him on Olympus. Hera was also said to be the mother of Ilithyia, the birth-goddess, and of Python, the serpent she sent to pursue Leto throughout the world before she bore Apollo and Artemis, the children of Zeus. And some say that, angry because Zeus bore Athena from his own head without any help from her, she bore the monster Typhon without the help of Zeus and gave him to the serpent at Delphi to rear.

The marriage of Zeus and Hera was the only proper marriage on Mount Olympus, but it was an exceedingly stormy one. Any subject was a cause for argument. Once they disputed as to which sex enjoyed the pleasures of love more. Hera contended the masculine sex did. Zeus assured her that the feminine sex did. The dispute was submitted to Tiresias, who had lived both as a woman and as a man, for decision. His answer was that if the pleasures of love were counted as ten, women enjoyed nine parts and men one. Hera was so infuriated by his judgment, some say, that she struck Tiresias with blindness. The unflagging interest of Zeus in other women, mortals or immortals, was a constant source of anger to Hera. Whenever possible she punished the objects of Zeus' readily bestowed love, even when, as was often the case, they had submitted reluctantly to his caresses, and she was as vindictive to the children of Zeus by other women as she was to their mothers. She sent a gadfly to pursue Io, whom Zeus had transformed into a heifer when Hera was about to discover him dallying with her. Echo, a nymph who tried to protect Zeus by chattering with Hera and so delaying her that she did not come upon Zeus and Io until he had changed the form of Io, was punished by Hera. She was permitted to go on talking, as she loved to do, but her conversation was limited to the repetition of the last words of whomever had spoken to her. Hera transformed Callisto, mother of Zeus' son Arcas, into a bear. Zeus placed Callisto's image among the stars. Such an honor to one of her rivals so infuriated Hera that she induced Poseidon to forbid the image of the Bear ever to sink into his waters, which is why the constellation of the Bear never sets. By a trick she caused the destruction of Semele, and later drove Athamas mad, so that he killed his own son, because Athamas sheltered the infant Dionysus, son of Zeus and Semele; or, as some say, because Athamas put aside the wife Hera had given him and took another in her place. As for Dionysus, some say Hera commanded the Titans to tear him to pieces. He was restored through the agency of Athena, but when he was grown Hera recognized him and drove him mad.

The two most afflicted objects of Hera's enmity were Heracles and the Trojans. Basic to her hatred of Heracles was that he was the son of a rival. Even before he was born she hated him. Zeus boasted before his birth that the king of the Perseid line was about to be born. Hera tricked Zeus into giving the most solemn oath that the first child born that day to the house of Perseus would become master of the land. Having secured the oath, she hastened to the house of Sthenelus and caused Nicippe, his wife, to produce her child before its time. She then kept Ilithyia, the birth-goddess, from going to the aid of Alcmena, who was momentarily expecting her child, and delayed the birth of Heracles. Thus, in fulfillment of his oath, Zeus was forced to allow Eurystheus, son of Sthenelus and Nicippe, to be supreme over Heracles, his own son by Alcmena. But the name Heracles means "Glory of Hera," and was perhaps given because through Hera's enmity he was forced to accomplish mighty deeds. Some say that by a trick Hera was duped into nursing Heracles, but he nursed so vigorously she turned him over to his own mother, unaware whose child he was. When he was an infant in his cradle she sent huge serpents to attack him. He strangled them. Throughout his life she tormented him. She drove him mad, so that he killed his children by Megara. Some say she was responsible for the poisonous, many-headed Hydra, whose killing was one of the labors imposed on Heracles by Eurystheus. Hera sent an enormous crab to help the Hydra when Heracles attacked it, but to no avail; he killed the Hydra. Hera set the image of the crab in the heavens, as Cancer, one of the signs of the Zodiac, to reward it. As another of his labors, Heracles was sent to fetch the cattle of Geryon. Hera came to Geryon's aid and fought Heracles, but he wounded her in the right breast and she was forced to withdraw. Even so, as he was leading the cattle back to Eurystheus, she sent gadflies to sting them and they scattered in a frenzy, so that he was forced to roam widely in order to recover them. She set the dragon Ladon to guard the Apples of the Hesperides, and set his image among the stars after he was killed by Heracles. Once when he was returning from Troy, Hera bribed Sleep to lull Zeus, and when he had succumbed she ordered up a great storm and caused Heracles to be shipwrecked on the island of Cos. Some say it was on this occasion that Zeus was so angered by her that he hung her out of heaven. In his war against Pylus, Hera took the side of Pylus and engaged in the fighting. Again Heracles wounded her. On only one occasion did she fail to hamper him. This was when he fought against the sons of Hippocoon. He was so grateful for her indifference in this case that he sacrificed goats, the only victims available, to her and built a shrine of "Goat-eating Hera" in Sparta. The Spartans were the only ones to give her this name and to offer goats to her. When Heracles was suffering and begged for death, Philoctetes lighted his funeral pyre to bring his suffering to an end. Some say Hera punished Philoctetes for his compassion by sending the serpent that bit him when he accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan War. But when at last Heracles was burned and made immortal, Zeus persuaded her to go through a ceremony that imitated the birth process and to adopt him as a son, and she gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage.

The reason for her relentless hatred of the Trojans came from the Judgment of Paris. Hera, with Aphrodite and Athena, contended for the Apple of Discord, the golden apple that was thrown among the wedding guests at the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, and was inscribed "To the Fairest." Zeus refused to rule as to which of the three goddesses was the fairest and recommended them to consult Paris, son of Priam, who was reputed to be a fine judge of beauty. The goddesses sought Paris and put the problem to him. Each of them offered a handsome bribe if he would award the apple to her. Paris, as is well known, accepted Aphrodite's bribe—the most beautiful woman in the world for his wife—and gave the apple to her. This brought down the unending wrath of Hera on Paris and, by extension, on all Trojans. She took an active part in the Trojan War that resulted when Paris carried off his reward—Helen, wife of King Menelaus of Sparta—and lent her aid to the Greeks on every occasion. When the Trojans had hurled back the Greeks with ruinous losses, Hera again prevailed on Sleep to lull Zeus, and with the aid of Aphrodite's magic girdle, which she borrowed for the occasion, so aroused desire in Zeus that he forgot all about the war and gave himself up to love and sleep. While he was so occupied, the Greeks sallied out against the Trojans and inflicted heavy losses. Again Zeus raged when he learned how she had tricked him, and forbade the gods to take any part in the war for a time. At last, however, fearful that the Trojans would be utterly destroyed when Achilles rejoined the fighting, he gave his permission for the gods to interfere as they wished. Hera attacked Artemis and scattered her arrows. She encouraged Athena to attack Aphrodite, and when the Xanthus River rose up to engulf Achilles for glutting its waters with the bodies of slain Trojans, Hera prevailed on Hephaestus to set the river afire and forced its withdrawal from the strife.

Pelias felt the wrath of Hera because, in his youth, he dragged Sidero from Hera's altar where she had sought refuge, and because Pelias withheld honors that were due the goddess. She favored Jason against Pelias, partly for the above reason, and partly because, to test Jason, she disguised herself as a crone and asked him to carry her across the swollen Anaurus River. Jason courteously obliged, although he found his burden heavy, and won unceasing gratitude and help from the goddess in his later exploits.

Hera was worshiped throughout the Greek world, especially as a protectress of women. Among the festivals celebrated in her honor were the Daedala, celebrated at Plataea, the Heraea, celebrated in Argos, and the Heraean Games, celebrated at Olympia in Elis. There were temples and shrines of Hera in many places, the most famous of which were the Heraeum, near Mycenae in Argolis, the great temple in Samos, and her ancient temple at Olympia. The temple of Hera Prodromia (Guide) at Sicyon was said to have been founded by Phalaces, son of Temenus, because Hera guided him on the road to Sicyon. In a sanctuary of Hera Protectress, on the road from Sicyon to Phlius, the men celebrated a festival by themselves. The women's temple there was called the Nymphon. Before the temple of Hera Anthea (Flowery) at Argos, was a common grave of women who came to help Dionysus in a war against the Argives. Every spring, a flower festival was celebrated in honor of Hera Anthea by the women of the Peloponnesus. The Spartans had a sanctuary of Hera Hypercheiria (Protectress), because she saved the land when the Eurotas River was flooding it. This sanctuary was dedicated in obedience to an oracle. The Spartans also had a temple of Argive Hera, said to have been founded by Eurydice, a daughter of Lacedaemon and the wife of Acrisius. The Eleans poured libations and sang hymns to Hera Ammonia at Olympia once a month; this name for the goddess was given her as the wife of Zeus Ammon, the Libyan name for Zeus. The Argives, and many others, sacrificed cows to Hera. Sacred to her also were the cuckoo, the crow, and, in later times, the peacock. The pomegranate, symbol sometimes of fruitfulness and sometimes of death, was also sacred to her.

Homer describes Hera as "Ox-eyed," "White-armed," and in general as a majestic personage to whom the other gods and goddesses paid homage. He also shows her as passionately punishing the Trojans by whatever means she could contrive. In art the goddess is represented as a majestic woman, fully clad in flowing draperies, characteristically with a crown on her brow, and bearing a scepter. The renowned statue of Hera by Polyclitus in the Heraeum in Argolis remains only in description or, as some scholars think, in the copies, the Farnese and Ludovisi Junos. By the Romans Hera was early identified with their Juno, originally a distinct divinity; and the Latin name is often incorrectly given to the Greek goddess.

Heraclea (her-ā-klē'ā). In ancient geography, a city of Magna Graecia, situated near the Gulf of Tarentum, in what is now Lucania, S Italy, near the modern village of Policoro. It was established as a colony of Tarentum, and was the scene of a victory of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, over the Romans in 280 B.C. It was this victory and that of Asculum in the following year, in which Pyrrhus lost heavily, which gave rise to the saying "a Pyrrhic victory," meaning a gain made at great cost to the victor.

[Latin, Tabulae Heracleenses.] Two fragmentary bronze tablets discovered near Heraclea in Magna Graecia about the middle of the 18th century, and preserved at Naples. Heraclea Pontica (pon'ti-kā). [Also: Heraclea; modern Turkish name, Ereğli.] In ancient geography, a city in Bithynia, Asia Minor, situated on the Euxine Sea about 100 miles E of what is now Istanbul, Turkey. According to legend, it was founded by the Mariandyni and named for Heracles in gratitude to him for repelling the Bebryces and restoring the land to the Mariandyni. According to some accounts, it was near here that Heracles came up from the Underworld with Cerberus, and as the three-headed dog of Hades emerged into the light foam fell from his jaws. From this foam sprang the poisonous aconite plant, which flourished in this region thereafter. Colonists from Megara later settled at Heraclea (c560 B.C.) in obedience to the advice of an oracle to settle on land that had been dedicated to Heracles.

Heracles (her'a-klēz). [Latin, Hercules.] The mightiest and most famous of Greek heroes. His deeds were fabulous for the courage and strength which he displayed in performing them and his name—Herculean, a Latinized form—has become synonymous for prodigious strength, courage, or size. His sufferings, largely as a result of Hera's antagonism, were equally heroic and were endured by him with immense fortitude. Beginning with the circumstances of his birth every characteristic and deed of his life was extraordinary. Zeus, having decided to father a hero to end all heroes, chose Alcmena, wife of Amphitryon of Tiryns, to be the hero's mother. She is said to have been the last mortal woman whom Zeus embraced. Since she was impeccably chaste Zeus appeared to her in the guise of her husband, and caused the sun and stars to halt in their courses so that the night the god spent with her was three times as long as usual. When the day arrived on which Heracles was to be born, Zeus exultantly vowed that the first male child born that day would reign over the descendants of Perseus. Hera, as usual inflamed by the infidelities of her husband, hurriedly arranged to delay the birth of Heracles and to hasten the birth of Eurystheus, son of Sthenelus, king of Mycenae. She summoned Ilithyia, the birth-goddess, to sit outside Alcmena's door at Thebes with crossed knees and clenched hands. By this magic Alcmena's labor was prolonged until Galinthias, a handmaiden of Alcmena's, falsely announced the birth of Heracles, whereupon Ilithyia was so startled that she jumped up, uncrossing her knees and relaxing her hands, and allowed Heracles to be born. In a rage at the deception, Ilithyia seized Galinthias and changed her into a weasel. But by this time Eurystheus had already been born and Zeus, although he was furious, was obliged to honor his vow. Nevertheless, he persuaded Hera to agree that Eurystheus should be king but that Heracles, after performing ten great labors for Eurystheus, should become immortal. Alcmena, now aware that she had been seduced by a god, abandoned her child out of fear of the jealousy of Hera. The babe was found by Athena, the friend and patron of Heracles throughout his life, who gave him to Hera to rear, pretending that she did not know what child it was. Hera took the child but the infant sucked so forcefully that Hera refused to nurse him and, unaware of his parentage, unwittingly gave him to his own mother to bring up. Alcmena had produced another son, a twin half-brother of Heracles, by Amphitryon. This was Iphicles, younger than Heracles by one night, and the two children were bedded down together. Hera was not long in ignorance of the true origin of Heracles, who at this time was called Alcaeus. She sent two serpents into the cradle where Heracles and Iphicles were sleeping. The infant Heracles grasped the serpents in his bare hands and strangled them.

In his youth Heracles was taught to drive a chariot by Amphitryon, to wrestle by Autolycus or by Harpalyceus, son of Hermes, to shoot with the bow and arrow by Eurytus, to fence by Castor. His studies in literature were supervised by Linus, son of the river-god Ismenius, and he was given instruction on the lyre by Eumolpus. It happened that on one occasion Linus attempted to improve his performance on the lyre by boxing his ears. In a rage Heracles flung the lyre at him and killed him. He was acquitted of a murder charge on the ground that he had resisted an aggressor, but Amphitryon sent him to tend his flocks around Mount Cithaeron to keep him out of trouble. While there he went to Thespieae to hunt the Thespian Lion which roamed over Mount Helicon and Mount Cithaeron and was ravaging Amphitryon's flocks. According to some accounts, he killed the lion, skinned it, and wore its pelt as a cloak, using the massive head as a kind of helmet. Others say it was the Nemean Lion's skin he wore, and that Alcaeus killed the Thespian Lion. In any event, Heracles so impressed Thespius, founder and king of Thespieae, that he wished to have descendants by Heracles and gave him his 50 daughters to bring about the desired end. All but one of the 50 maidens was delighted with the attentions of Heracles, and between them they produced 51 sons, including two sets of twins. The one who refused his advances was condemned to lifelong virginity as a priestess in his temple. Of these 51 sons, Heracles later sent 40 to colonize the island of Sardinia, as he had been commanded to do by an oracle.

Heracles next followed his foster father Amphytrion to Thebes. He found the city under bondage to Erginus, king of the Minyans, and compelled to pay annual tribute to Erginus. Heracles met the heralds who had come to collect the tribute, cut off their ears and noses, which he threaded on a string and hung around their necks, tied their hands behind their backs, and sent them back to Erginus. As was to be expected, Erginus raised a force to punish Thebes for this outrage. The Thebans, having been disarmed in previous wars with the Minyans, would have surrendered, but Heracles rallied them and armed them with the shields and spears which were hanging in the temples as offerings to the gods. Under his leadership the Minyans were defeated and Erginus was slain, and thenceforth the Minyans were compelled to pay a tribute to the Thebans twice as large as the one they had been exacting from Thebes. In gratitude to Heracles, Creon, king of Thebes, gave him his daughter Megara in marriage.

The fame of Heracles spread far and wide. Eurystheus now summoned him to perform the ten labors. Heracles deemed it unworthy of him to serve an inferior mortal like Eurystheus, and became so despondent at the idea that in a fit of madness, inspired by Hera, he killed his children. Restored to sanity, and purified by Thespius, he went to the Oracle at Delphi for instructions. The priestess now gave him the name Heracles (Glory of Hera) because he would obtain glory as a result of Hera's enmity, and ordered him to begin his labors for Eurystheus so that he could become immortal.

The first labor was to bring Eurystheus the hide of the Nemean Lion. This animal, which could not be killed by iron, bronze, or stone, had its lair in a cleft in Mount Tretus, between Mycenae and Nemea. Heracles blocked one entrance of the cleft, which ran through the mountain, so that the lion could not escape, followed the creature in and strangled it. He then skinned the lion and ever after used its shaggy pelt as a cloak. Eurystheus was so terrified at the sight of Heracles clad in the lion's skin, with its fierce head serving as a cap, that, some accounts say, he ordered him to report his successes from outside the city walls in the future.

The second labor was to kill the many-headed Hydra that lurked in the Lernaean swamp and wasted the surrounding area with its noisome breath. According to some accounts the Hydra had nine heads, one of which was immortal. Others say there were as many as 100 heads. The difficulty in killing it was that as fast as one head was cut off, two fire-breathing heads grew in its place. As Heracles struggled with the monster Hera sent a huge crab to help the monster by biting Heracles' feet. Heracles crushed the crab, which Hera then translated to the heavens as the constellation Cancer. He now called upon Iolaus, companion of many of his exploits, and as fast as Heracles sliced off one of the Hydra's heads Iolaus seared the stump with hot pitch. In this way it was decapitated of all its heads. Heracles dipped his arrows in the Hydra's venom, and coated them with such a lethal poison that whoever was wounded by one of them, no matter how superficially, was doomed to die. Eurystheus refused to recognize this labor, on the ground that Heracles had not performed it alone: Iolaus helped him.

On his way to perform the next labor, the capture of the Erymanthian Boar, Heracles visited Pholus the centaur, in a cave on a mountain. Pholus entertained him by opening a cask of wine which had been given to him by Dionysus. The other centaurs smelled the wine and were maddened by the fumes. They attacked Heracles, and were aided in their onslaught by a torrential rain. This gave them a distinct advantage, for with their four feet they could maintain their footing in the slippery mud of the mountain-side, whereas Heracles was constantly slipping to his knees. Even so, he killed many of them and drove the rest off. They fled to Chiron in Malea, whither he pursued them, and there by accident wounded his friend Chiron with one of his arrows. The wound could not be healed because of the Hydra's venom on the arrow which caused it. On the other hand, the centaur Chiron was immortal and could not die. Later, he was finally released from his suffering by a generous act of Prometheus, who offered to assume Chiron's immortality so that Chiron could die. Pholus also died as a result of this engagement. In withdrawing an arrow from one of the fallen centaurs he unfortunately dropped it. It pricked his foot and he died instantly. Heracles buried him on the mountain and named it Mount Pholoe in his honor. He now pursued the Erymanthian Boar, which he was ordered to take alive. He chased it to the north and finally caught it in a deep snow drift or, as some say, with a net, and returned to Eurystheus carrying the Boar on his shoulders. Eurystheus hid in a specially constructed bronze vessel, buried in the ground, when he learned that Heracles was approaching with the Boar. (Some say it was this deed that so terrified Eurystheus that he ordered Heracles to report his future successes from outside the city walls.)

The fourth labor was to catch the golden-horned Hind which dwelt near the Cerynean river in Arcadia. Since the Hind was sacred to Artemis it had to be taken alive. Heracles pursued it for a year and finally caught it as it drank at the river Ladon. With one perfect shot of his bow he transfixed the forefeet of the Hind and captured it. As he carried it off on his shoulders Artemis reproached him for harming one of her creatures. The goddess forgave him when he pleaded that he was carrying out the command of Zeus in performing the labors for Eurystheus.

The fifth labor was to drive off the bronze-beaked birds that were infesting the Stymphalian marsh. They were huge pestilential birds with iron feathers, and were sacred to Ares. As they flew over the countryside they dropped their feathers and killed many of the countrymen, and their filthy habits were destroying the crops. Athena gave Heracles a bronze rattle which he shook violently and so startled the birds that they rose in flight and he was able to pick off many of them with his arrows. The rest fled to the island of Ares where they were later encountered by the Argonauts.

For his sixth labor Heracles was commanded by Eurystheus to cleanse the stables of Augeas, king in Elis. Augeas was the possessor of large and magnificent herds but his stables had not been cleaned for years. Heracles approached him and offered, without telling him that he had been sent for this purpose, to cleanse the stables before nightfall in return for the payment of one-tenth of the cattle. Augeas agreed, and called his son Phyleus to witness the bargain. He did not expect to have to make the payment as he felt it would be impossible to accomplish the task in the time stipulated. However, Heracles diverted the Alpheus and Peneus Rivers from their courses, washed them through the stables and carried out his end of the bargain as proposed. Augeas refused to pay. He said that the river-gods had helped Heracles, and furthermore, he had learned that Heracles was commanded to carry out this task by Eurystheus. Heracles called on Phyleus to state whether Augeas had promised a payment of one-tenth of his cattle. Phyleus supported Heracles and urged his father to pay. In a rage, Augeas banished his son and expelled Heracles. Heracles swore he would get his revenge. He then proceeded to Olenus and killed Eurytion, a centaur who tried to ravish the daughter of the king there. But some say this centaur attacked the daughter of Eurystheus, and that Heracles generously aided his enemy by slaying the centaur.

The seventh labor was to bring back the Cretan Bull beloved by Pasiphaë from Crete. King Minos offered to help in this task but Heracles subdued the bull by himself, and rode on its back as it swam the sea from Crete to Greece. Eurystheus took one look at the bull and turned it loose. It roamed the countryside until it came to Marathon and thereafter became known as the Marathonian Bull.

When he had accomplished this labor Heracles established the Olympic Games, dedicated to Zeus, on the banks of the Alpheus River. He paced off the stadium and won all the contests himself in the first Games. The gods gave him valuable gifts: Athena gave him a robe, Hephaestus a war-club and coat of mail, Poseidon horses, Hermes a sword, Apollo bow and arrows; but on the whole Heracles preferred to fight with a club he cut himself from a wild olive tree, or with his bow and arrows.

For his eighth labor Heracles captured the man-eating mares of Diomedes of Thrace. Diomedes, a son of Ares and Cyrene, fed his animals on human flesh. Heracles tamed them by feeding them the flesh of their master. He founded the city of Abdera, in memory of his servant Abderus who had been killed as he tended the mares while Heracles captured Diomedes. He then returned with the mares to Eurystheus, who consecrated them to Hera.

The news of Jason's expedition to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece now came to Heracles' ears and he interrupted his labors to join the Argonauts. They unanimously chose him as their leader but he would not take the honor from Jason, who had organized the expedition. It was Heracles who reminded the Argonauts that their goal was Colchis when he thought they lingered over-long enjoying the favors of the women of Lemnos. Heracles took his squire, Hylas, with him on the voyage, and when the Argonauts stopped in Mysia Hylas, who had gone to fetch water at a spring, disappeared. Heracles delayed so long in his search for Hylas that the Argonauts sailed without him.

Heracles wandered through Mysia, searching for Hylas and commanding the Mysians to do likewise. Ever after, once a year the Mysians sacrificed to Hylas, calling his name aloud and pretending to search for him.

Heracles returned to Eurystheus and learned that Admete, his daughter, had a fancy for Hippolyte's girdle, and that his ninth labor was to fetch it. Hippolyte was a queen of the Amazons, who dwelt near the Thermodon River that flows into the Euxine Sea (Black Sea), and her girdle was a belt given to her by her father Ares. On his way to the Amazon country Heracles landed on the island of Paros and carried off two hostages in revenge for the slaying of two of his crew who had gone to fetch water. In Mysia he was entertained by Lycus, and helped that king to defeat Mygdon, king of the Bebryces, and gave the land he seized from the Bebryces to Lycus, who named it Heraclea in his honor. Proceeding then to the port of the Amazons, he was graciously welcomed by Hippolyte, who freely consented to give him her girdle. But Hera stirred up the Amazon women with a rumor that Heracles was attacking their queen. They marched against him and he, thinking he had been tricked, killed Hippolyte, took the girdle, and set out for Hellas, taking Antiope, a sister of Hippolyte, with him as a captive. On his way home he passed Troy and saw a beautiful maiden chained to a rock. On inquiring the reason for this he learned that she was Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, and that she was being offered as a sacrifice to a sea-monster sent by Poseidon to punish Laomedon. Heracles offered to slay the monster on condition that Laomedon give him the immortal horses of Tros which Zeus had given Tros in compensation for his abduction of Ganymede. Laomedon agreed to the conditions, whereupon Heracles leaped fully armed into the jaws of the monster, hacked about in its belly for three days, and then emerged, victorious but completely bald. Laomedon refused to honor his agreement, now that the danger was passed, and Heracles departed, vowing revenge. He sailed to the island of Thasus, where he subdued the Thracians, and finally arrived at Mycenae, where he presented the girdle to Eurystheus. The captive Antiope was given to Theseus.

His tenth labor, to fetch the cattle of Geryon from the island of Erythea, took him over most of Europe. Heracles went to Crete, gathered a large force, and rid the island once and for all of wild beasts in gratitude to the Cretans for their hospitality. He sailed from Crete to Libya. There he wrestled with Antaeus, a giant whose strength increased as his body came in contact with the earth. Heracles overcame him by holding him aloft and crushing his ribs. He then subdued all Libya and put it under cultivation. Next he went to Egypt and killed Busiris, who was in the habit of sacrificing strangers. Heracles allowed himself to be bound and led to the altar, then he suddenly burst his bonds and killed Busiris. In Egypt he founded the 100-gated city of Hecatompylon, or Thebes. From Egypt he went to Gadir and set up the Pillars of Heracles, one on each continent. According to some accounts, this passage between Calpe (Gibraltar) and Abyla (Ceuta) was very wide and Heracles built each side out so that his Pillars make the passage narrower and thus keep ocean monsters out of the inner sea. Others say that the two continents were joined and that Heracles cut a passage between them so that the waters of the ocean could mingle with those of the inner sea. In any event, setting up the Pillars was hot work under the broiling sun. Heracles sent a threatening arrow at the Sun for sending such heat. But the Sun was amused at his presumption and indulgently gave him a golden goblet in which to cross the sea. Heracles apologized and set off in the goblet for Erythea. There he killed Orthus, the hound that guarded Geryon's cattle, and Eurytion, the herdsman. He then slew Geryon and took his cattle. Passing through Liguria on his way home he was attacked by two sons of Poseidon and their forces. When he had used up all his arrows he prayed to Zeus for help. Zeus sent a shower of stones which Heracles hurled at his attackers and so repelled them. The place where this event occurred, between Massilia (Marseilles) and the Rhodanus (Rhône) River is still noted for its many stones about as big as a man's fist, and is called the Stony Plain (Plaine de la Crau.) He then crossed the Alps, marched to the Tiber and, pitching his tent where Rome now stands, was hospitably received by Evander, a Trojan immigrant who became a king in Latium. In Italy he slew the monstrous three-headed Cacus, who was terrorizing the countryside, and being weary from this effort went to rest at Paestum, but cicadas made such a noise he could not sleep. He prayed for relief and Zeus banished the cicadas from Paestum, where they have not been heard again from that day to this. One of Geryon's bulls now escaped and, stepping into the sea at Rhegium, swam across to Sicily. It wandered to the kingdom of Eryx and was put into Eryx' own herd. When Heracles came in search of it Eryx agreed to surrender the bull if Heracles should defeat him in a wrestling match. Heracles killed him and turned his kingdom over to the natives. Resuming his journey home, he came to the Ionian Sea. Here Hera sent gadflies to madden the cattle, and many of them escaped to Thrace. Those which Heracles did not recover became the forebears of the Thracian cattle.

Eight years and one month had now passed since Heracles began his labors for Eurystheus. That king, however, refused to count the slaying of the Lernaean Hydra and the cleansing of the Augean Stables, because in the one case Heracles had the help of Iolaus and in the other he did it for pay. Thus two more labors were laid on him. The eleventh was to fetch the Golden Apples of the Hesperides, the apples which had been given to Hera as a wedding gift and which were guarded by the Hesperides, daughters of Atlas, and by the 100-headed dragon, Ladon. Heracles did not know where the apples were to be found. He journeyed to the Eridanus River and there, at the prompting of the river-nymphs, seized the sea-god Nereus as he slept. Nereus went through many transformations in an effort to escape but Heracles held him fast and compelled him to give the information he wanted. On the advice of Nereus he went to Rhodes where, being hungry, he took a bullock from a cart, killed it, roasted it, and ate it. Meanwhile the owner of the bullock stood on a hill at a safe distance and cursed helplessly.

For this reason it became the custom in that country to curse when sacrificing to Heracles. Next he passed through Arabia, where he slew Emathion, crossed Libya, and again received a golden goblet from the Sun in which he crossed the sea to the Caucasus. He found Prometheus chained to a crag there, while vultures daily gnawed at his liver. Heracles killed the vultures and freed Prometheus, who assumed Chiron's immortality and thus permitted the suffering centaur, accidentally wounded by one of Heracles' poisoned arrows, at last to die. In the land of the Hyperboreans Heracles found the olive tree, which he took home with him, and acting on instructions from Prometheus he approached the Titan Atlas, in whose garden the tree with the golden apples grew. Heracles offered to hold up the heavens while Atlas fetched the apples, as he had been advised not to pluck them himself. Atlas demurred, in fear of the dragon, whereupon Heracles sent an arrow over the garden wall and killed Ladon. He then shouldered the heavens while Atlas went for the apples. When Atlas returned he offered to take the apples to Eurystheus himself as long as Heracles was so obliging as to hold up the heavens. Heracles agreed but asked Atlas to relieve him a moment so that he could pad his shoulders and make his burden less uncomfortable. Atlas resumed the burden and Heracles, who had no intention of taking over Atlas' monotonous job, walked off. He gave the apples to Eurystheus, but as it was unlawful to possess them they were restored to the garden through the good offices of Athena.

For his twelfth and last labor Heracles was to fetch Cerberus from Hades. To prepare for the task he went to Eleusis and asked the priest to initiate him into the Eleusinian Mysteries. However, since it was a rule that only Athenians could properly be initiated and he was a foreigner, Demeter established the Lesser Mysteries in his honor, which were celebrated at Agrae on the Ilissus River. Duly purified, he descended to Hades through an opening at Taenarum in Laconia, or as some say, at Heraclea on the Euxine Sea, guided by Athena and Hermes. As he stepped from Charon's boat—he had persuaded the ferryman of the Styx to take him across by assuming a terrifying expression—all the shades fled in fear except Meleager and Medusa, who boldly faced him. He would have run his sword through Meleager but was assured that he had nothing to fear from ghosts, and as they then engaged in friendly conversation, Heracles promised Meleager that he would marry Deianira, Meleager's sister, on his return to earth. In Hades Heracles found Theseus and Pirithous immobilized on Chairs of Forgetfulness. He freed Theseus and took him back to earth with him, but was unable to free Pirithous. He also rolled away the stone with which Demeter had flattened Ascalaphus for talebearing concerning Persephone's food in the Underworld, but Demeter immediately transformed Ascalaphus into a short-eared owl as an alternate punishment. Hades, persuaded by Persephone, allowed him to take Cerberus on condition that he capture him without weapons. This he did by grasping him firmly around the neck and choking him until the hound submitted. He returned to earth with Cerberus by an entrance near Troezen, or some say through a cave in the land of the Mariandyni on the Euxine Sea. When he had shown Cerberus to Eurystheus he returned the hound of Hades to the Underworld.

Now that he had finished his labors for Eurystheus Heracles gave his wife Megara to his faithful friend Iolaus, as he feared to have more children by her, remembering how he had slain her children in his madness. He sought Eurytus in Oechalia and asked for the hand of his daughter Iole. Eurytus, who had learned archery from Apollo and had in turn taught it to the youthful Heracles, had promised his daughter to whoever could defeat him in an archery contest. Heracles defeated him but Eurytus, claiming that Heracles used divine arrows, and fearful because of his former madness, refused to give up his daughter. Heracles departed, and shortly thereafter some of Eurytus' mares were missing. He was convinced that Heracles had stolen them. His son Iphitus, who had urged his father to carry out his bargain and give Iole to Heracles, claimed Heracles was innocent, and in truth it was the well-known thief Autolycus who had taken them. Iphitus set out to find Heracles and prove his innocence. He met him as he was returning from Pherae, having brought Alcestis up from the Underworld, where he wrestled Hades himself, and restored her to Admetus, and gained Heracles' promise of assistance in a search for the cattle, but unfortunately, Hera sent another spell of madness, in which he hurled Iphitus from the walls of Tiryns and killed him.

Once again in possession of his senses, Heracles was overcome with remorse and asked Neleus of Pylus to purify him. Neleus, with the backing of his sons, refused. Deiphobus of Amyclae purified him for the murder. Even so, he was plagued by disease and went to consult the Oracle at Delphi to learn how he could be cured. The priestess refused to have anything to say to him, whereupon Heracles seized her tripod and threatened to set up his own oracle. Apollo rushed onto the scene to defend his priestess and the dauntless Heracles attacked the god. Zeus separated them by hurling a thunderbolt between them and the priestess hurriedly gave him instructions. She told him to sell himself as a slave and give the purchase price to the sons of Iphitus. Omphale, queen of Maeonia, bought him. For her he seized the Cercopes, deceitful men who had been turned into apes by Zeus, and, hanging them head down from a pole, carried them to Omphale. He killed Syleus for his unpleasant habit of forcing travelers to compete with him in tilling his vineyards. Omphale, impressed with his deeds, freed him and married him and bore him a son, Lamus. It is said that while in Omphale's services, Heracles and the queen sometimes exchanged garments. This is the foundation for the story that Heracles worked for Omphale dressed in women's clothes and that he was so effeminate as to engage in spinning and weaving.

Freed of his service, Heracles returned to the Peloponnesus to carry out his vows of revenge on Laomedon, Augeas, Eurytus, and Neleus. He sailed to Troy in six ships and attacked the city. Telamon of Salamis, who accompanied him, was the first to breach the wall. Angry that anyone had gotten ahead of him in valor, Heracles was about to kill Telamon but paused as he noticed Telamon hastily piling up stones. When he asked the reason for this Telamon said he was building an altar to Heracles the Victor. His ready answer mollified Heracles and saved Telamon from certain death. Heracles sacked Troy and killed Laomedon and all of his sons except Podarces, who had advised Laomedon to pay Heracles as he had promised for destroying the sea monster. He gave Hesione, Laomedon's daughter, to Telamon. She ransomed Podarces with her veil and thus he gained the name Priam, "Ransomed." Heracles turned over Laomedon's ruined kingdom to him. On his way home from Troy Hera sent violent storms that shipwrecked Heracles on the island of Cos. He was then urgently sought out by Athena, who asked his assistance in the war against the Giants which was now raging on the plain of Phlegra. The goddess helped him to find the magic herb that would protect him and they hurried off to the battle. Although the gods had wounded many of the Giants Heracles was required to dispatch them, as an oracle had foretold that only a mortal could kill them.

He next turned his attention to Augeas. He collected an Arcadian army but was repelled by the sons of Actor and Molione. Eurystheus banished him from Tiryns and he attacked and killed Eurytus, the son of Augeas, near Cleonae, where a temple to Heracles was erected, some say by himself. He made a second attack on Augeas in Elis in which he killed Augeas and gave the kingdom to Phyleus because the latter had supported Heracles in the matter of the payment Augeas had promised. He then marched against Neleus, who had refused to purify him for the murder of Iphitus, and slew Neleus and all of his sons except Nestor. According to some accounts, in this battle he also wounded Hades, Hera, and Ares, who fought on the side of Neleus. He fought against the Spartans, to avenge the death of a son of his friend and to punish them for aiding Neleus, and defeated Hippocoön, who had seized the throne from his brother Tyndareus, and restored Tyndareus.

On his way home he stopped in Tegea, where he was entertained by Aleus. He ravished Auge, daughter of Aleus, a priestess in the temple, and she later bore his son, Telephus. Returning then to Pheneüs, he stayed there five years. At the expiration of this time he left for Calydon and fulfilled the promise made to Meleager in the Underworld to marry Deianira, daughter of Oeneus. First however, he had to overcome the river-god Achelous, who was also one of Deianira's suitors. Achelous fought in the shape of a serpent and then in the form of a bull. Neither form helped him. Heracles seized him by a horn and hurled him to the ground with such force that the horn broke off. This horn eventually became the Cornucopia, the "Horn of Plenty."

Heracles marched with the Calydonians against the Thesprotian city of Ephyra, slew the king and ravished his daughter, who subsequently bore him Tlepolemus. At a banquet with Oeneus he impatiently cuffed the lad who poured water over his hands for the libation. The boy died as a result of what Heracles considered a light tap. It was clearly an accident but Heracles, overcome by remorse, insisted on taking the penalty, which was to go into exile. He set off with Deianira for the kingdom of Ceyx, in Trachis. On the way it was necessary to cross the Evenus River. Nessus, a centaur, offered to ferry Deianira across on his back while Heracles, swimming, went ahead. As they neared the shore Nessus attempted to violate Deianira. Her screams drew instant action from Heracles. He sent one of his poisoned arrows into the centaur. Before he died Nessus advised Deianira to preserve his blood as it would be a potent love charm in the event that Heracles' interest in her should waver, as it was constantly doing. She secretly gathered the blood and kept it in a vial.

At Trachis they were hospitably received, and Heracles fought as an ally of Aegimius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapiths. Among other deeds he performed at this time: he killed Cycnus, the son of Ares and Pelopia, who killed strangers and used their polished skulls to build a temple to his father; he slew Amyntor, who had refused to give Heracles his daughter, on the ground that he already had a wife, and took Astydamia, Amyntor's daughter, by force and became the father of Ctesippus by her; he gathered an army with which he attacked Eurystus, father of Iole, slew him and his sons, and took Iole captive. On his way back from this war he went to Cenaeum, the extreme northwestern point of Euboea, and prepared to sacrifice to Zeus. He sent his herald Lichas to Trachis to get the robe he customarily wore when sacrificing. Deianira learned from Lichas that Iole was with Heracles and decided that the time had come to make use of Nessus' love charm. She rubbed the dried blood of Nessus on the robe and sent it off with Lichas. After the herald left she noticed that the ground on which a drop of the blood had fallen was smoldering, and in terror she tried to recall Lichas, but it was too late. Lichas gave the robe to Heracles, who put it on and prepared his sacrifice. As the heat of his body warmed the robe the blood of the centaur with which it was covered melted, and suddenly it seared Heracles' body as with a sheet of fire. He tried to pull off the robe and his skin came with it. He was in torment, and it was caused by his own arrow which had poisoned Nessus' blood. According to some accounts he leaped into the waters of a stream to cool his burning body, but the only effect of this was to cause the water to bubble and steam, which it has done from that day to this and accounts for its name, Thermopylae, "hot springs." In a frenzy he hurled the innocent Lichas into the sea, and swore to kill Deianira. However, she had learned the effects of Nessus' love charm and hanged herself. On the advice of Apollo, Heracles repaired to Mount Oeta and built a great pyre. He secured a promise from his son Hyllus to marry Iole, and mounted the pyre. No one had the courage to light it for him, in spite of his pleas to be released from his sufferings. Only Philoctetes, in compassion, found the heart to set it alight. In return for this he was given the bow and arrows of Heracles. As the pyre blazed up, a flash of lightning blinded all present; a cloud passed under Heracles' body and bore it away. The pyre was instantly consumed and as no bones were found all took it for granted that Heracles had been carried to Olympus. Zeus took him to Olympus in a four-horse chariot and persuaded Hera to adopt him as a son. This the goddess did, partly because she had no choice, but also partly in gratitude because Heracles had protected her in the war with the Giants when one of the Giants sought to violate her. She even permitted him to marry Hebe and acquiesced when he was made gate-keeper of Olympus.

The Locrians began to sacrifice to Heracles as a hero immediately after his death. They were followed in this by the Thebans, but it was the Athenians who first worshiped him as a god. The general opinion was that Heracles' immortal parts, reft from his blazing pyre, went to Olympus, but his mortal parts went as a shade to the Underworld, and Odysseus saw it when he visited the Underworld.

Heracles was worshiped throughout the Mediterranean world. Each town and city added some act or exploit to the hero's life which would identify him with their own people. The legion of sons he was supposed to have fathered gave many places a direct ancestor who was a son of Heracles. Only Euripides speaks of Heracles as being the father of one daughter, Macaria. The Romans took over Heracles, whom they called Hercules, lock, stock, and barrel, and added some incidents to his life which were exclusively connected with their own history and nation. Every town, village, and city, wished to be connected in some way, no matter how slightly, with the great hero. This perhaps accounts for the incredible number of exploits which were added to the list of his accomplishments.

Heracles, Labors of. According to some accounts, Heracles was obliged to perform only ten labors for Eurystheus, but because Eurystheus refused to count two of them, Heracles performed 12 great labors. The order of the 12 labors differs in the accounts given by different writers, and even the labors themselves differ. Following is a list that includes those labors generally regarded as the 12 great labors of Heracles: 1) the strangling of the Nemean Lion; 2) the killing of the Lernaean Hydra; 3) the capture of the Erymanthian Boar; 4) the capture of the Cerynean Hind; 5) the cleaning of the Augean Stables; 6) the slaughter of the Stymphalian Birds; 7) the capture of the Cretan Bull; 8) the capture of the man-eating mares of Diomedes of Thrace; 9) the securing of the girdle of Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons; 10) the fetching of the red oxen of Geryon; 11) the procuring of the Golden Apples of the Hesperides; 12) the bringing to the upper world the dog Cerberus, guardian of Hades. Labors that are sometimes substituted for some of those on the above list by other writers are: the strangling of the serpents; the battle with the centaurs on Mount Pholoe; the killing of the guest-slayer Cycnus; and the rearing of the Pillars of Heracles to hold up the heavens.

Heracles the Dactyl (dak'til). In Greek mythology, one of the five Dactyls of Crete who, according to some accounts, protected the infant Zeus on Mount Ida in Crete. Afterward he went, with his brothers, to Elis to propitiate Cronus. Some say he engaged in a race with his brothers at Olympia in Elis, and that this was the origin of the Olympic Games, and that they were held every fifth year because there were five brothers. And some say that Heracles the Dactyl had brought back the wild olive from the land of the Hyperboreans and crowned the winner in this first race with a wreath made from its branches, thus establishing the custom of crowning the victor with wreaths of the wild olive. Heracles the Dactyl is also said to have built the first altar to Zeus at Olympia, constructing it from the ashes of the bones of victims he had sacrificed. The image of Heracles found floating on a raft in the sea between Chios and Erythrae and won by the Erythraeans with a rope made of women's hair was said to be of Heracles the Dactyl, not Heracles son of Alcmena.

Heracleum (her-ä-klé'um). [Also: Candia, Heraklion, Herakleion, Iraklion, Megalokastron.] City on the N coast of the island of Crete, near the site of ancient Cnossus.

Heraclidae (her-ä-klí'dē). Descendants of Heracles; specifically, in Greek legend, certain Achaean chiefs claiming descent from Heracles, who in prehistoric times joined the Dorian migration to the Peloponnesus. The sons of Heracles were said to have been expelled from their heritage in the Peloponnesus by Eurystheus (to whom Hera had given the region) and to have settled in Attica. The most notable of their descendants who joined the Dorians were Temenus, who in the partition of the conquered territories obtained Argos; Procles and Eurysthenes, who obtained Lacedaemon; and Cresphontes, who obtained Messenia. The invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidae in alliance with the Dorians was commonly referred to as the return of the Heraclidae.

Heraclidae, The. Drama by Euripides. See Children of Heracles, The.

Heraclides (her-ā-kli'dēz). Greek philosopher, born in Pontus, and active in the 4th century B.C. He went to Athens in his youth and became a disciple of Plato and Speusippus. He wrote on a number of subjects, including philosophy (uncritically following and exaggerating Plato's spirit of mysticism), geography, grammar, poetry, and mathematics, but only fragments of his work remain.

Heraclitus (her-ā-kli'tus). Greek philosopher, born at Ephesus, Asia Minor, probably c535 B.C., and died there, probably c475 B.C. He was of a noble family and of distinctly aristocratic temper. When the democracy came into power after the defeat of the Persians he withdrew to the country and pursued his studies. He looked with scorn not only on his fellow Ephesians but on many of his fellow philosophers as well. He is one of the earliest of the metaphysical school, and was known as the "Dark" or "Weeping" philosopher (the latter in contrast to Democritus' epithet the "Laughing" philosopher) because of his depth of concept and his misanthropy. He held a theory of the relativity of things: nothing was absolute, all was subject to change and constantly changing; the individual is part of a general harmony in the world and virtue consists of becoming part of that harmony by denial of individuality. All things flow; the basic principle of life is fire, which changes to water, then to earth, and then back again. But it is the process of change itself that governs, and this operates according to certain laws, whether they be of Nature to restore a balance, or of Fate, or of Justice, which brings retribution. Only the gods have perfect wisdom, according to Heraclitus, and as they are also subject to change they will be destroyed also. The ideas of Heraclitus were expressed in the ardent terms of a prophet, but in such difficult oracular language that he was called "the Obscure" by the ancients. The Ephesians nevertheless thought highly of him, and engraved his image on the coins of Ephesus for centuries. Fragments of his great work, On Nature, in three books, are extant.

Heraea (hē-rē'ā). In ancient geography, a city in W Arcadia, on the Alpheus River; according to tradition, it was founded by Heraeus, son of Lycaon. Among the temples were those of Pan and of Hera, and of Dionysus Citizen and Dionysus Giver of Increase.

Heraea. An Argive festival, celebrated every five years in honor of Hera. The priestess of Hera rode in a car, drawn by white oxen, to the Heraeum, the national shrine of the Argives near Mycenae. A procession accompanied the priestess, the soldiers bearing their arms. As part of the festival, oxen were sacrificed to the goddess, a great feast was provided, and games were held. One of the contests peculiar to this festival was to hurl the javelin at a shield while running at full speed.

Heraean (hē-rē'an) Games. Games established by Hippodamia in honor of Hera, in gratitude to the goddess for her help in bringing about the marriage of Hippodamia to Pelops. The games consisted of a single race in which the contestants were virgins of different ages. The prize was an olive wreath and a part of a cow that was sacrificed to Hera.

Heraeum (hē-rē'um) or Heraion (rī'on). National shrine of the Argives, and one of the most sacred sanctuaries of Hera, situated near Mycenae, in Argolis. It was to this shrine that Cleobis and Biton pulled their mother in a barrow so that, as a priestess, she could take part in the rites. In the temple they went peacefully to sleep, never to wake again. This was the answer the goddess gave to their mother's prayer for a fitting reward for her devoted sons. Some say it was at this temple, within two miles of Mycenae, that Agamemnon heard the vows of the Greek chiefs that they would take Troy or die in the attempt. The site of the temple is on a slight rise between the streams Eleutherios and Asterion. The waters of the Eleutherios were employed by the priestesses of the goddess in purification ceremonies. The Argives claimed Hera was nursed by three daughters of the river-god Asterion, whose names were Euboea, Acraea, and Prosymna. On the banks of the river grew a plant, also named asterion, which was offered to Hera, and of which garlands were woven for the image of the goddess. The ancient temple dated from the 6th century B.C. This temple burned when, it is said, a priestess tending the sacred fire fell asleep. A new temple was built in its place (c423 B.C.), of which the Argive Eupolemus was said to be the architect. The new temple contained the celebrated chryselephantine colossal statue of Hera by the sculptor Polyclitus. The ivory and gold seated image wore a crown on which were embossed figures of the Graces and the Horae. In one hand the goddess held a pomegranate, symbol of fertility; in the other hand she held a scepter on which a cuckoo perched. The cuckoo signifies that Zeus first won Hera when he assumed the form of a cuckoo. Next to the goddess was an ivory and gold image of her daughter Hebe. Also in the temple was an ancient image made of wild pearwood, brought to the Heraeum from Tiryns, which the Argives had conquered and destroyed. The silver altar in the precinct was decorated with a representation of the marriage of Hebe and Heracles. Before the temple were statues of former priestesses of the goddess, including one of the unfortunate priestess whose nap had brought destruction to the old temple. The shield Menelaus took from Euphorbus at Troy was dedicated in the ancient temple, and in Roman times the Emperor Hadrian dedicated a peacock, bird sacred to Hera, made of precious stones in the new temple. Cleomenes, the Spartan king (c519-c487 B.C.), thought he had received assurance from an oracle that he would take Argos. He attacked the Argives near Tiryns and they fled for refuge into a sacred grove. As all efforts to force them out failed, Cleomenes set fire to the grove and burned them to death. Afterwards he asked the name of the grove. On learning that it was a grove sacred to Argus he feared that the oracle had been fulfilled, that he had taken the grove Argus and would not take the city Argos. He visited the Heraeum and made sacrifices to the goddess to learn whether he should proceed in his attempt to take Argos.

When he made his offerings a flame flashed from the breast of the image of the goddess. This was a sign to Cleomenes that he should not attack Argos, for only if the fire flashed from the head of the image were the omens considered to be propitious. The Heraeum was excavated (1892-1895) by the American School at Athens, and more recently by the French School. A very valuable collection of archaic terra-cottas was recovered, as well as architectural and sculptural remains. The sculptures of the pediment depicted on one side the birth of Zeus and the war of the Giants, on the other the taking of Troy. Large fragments of these have been recovered.

Herceius (hër-sē'us, -sī'us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Of the Courtyard." It came from the custom of placing an image of Zeus in the forecourt of temples and palaces. There was, for an example, an altar of Zeus Herceius before the house of Oenomaus at Pisa. In the sack of Troy, Priam was killed by Neoptolemus before the image of Zeus Herceius. Sthenelus later carried away this image as part of his share of the spoils of war. The image had three eyes, two in the usual place and a third in the forehead. The presence of the three eyes was to indicate that Zeus exerted his powers in heaven, the sea, and in the Underworld, some say. Sthenelus took the image to Argos and set it up at Larissa, the name of the citadel in Argos.

Herculaneum (hër-kū-lā'nē-um). Ancient city in Campania, S Italy, near the coast, about six miles SE of Naples, directly at the W foot of Mount Vesuvius. Like Pompeii it was overwhelmed in the eruption of 79 A.D. The city was buried deep under heavy volcanic ash which solidified to a form of tufa. The ancient town was forgotten, and modern Resina grew up over its ruins. In 1709 an inhabitant of Resina sunk a well which reached the ancient theater, and brought to light sculptures and marble facings. Further search was made, solely for the marbles and works of art, and subsequent excavations were undertaken by the Italian government, but were very unscientifically and irregularly conducted, and the galleries pierced were in great part filled again. Under the French rule (1806-15) systematic explorations were instituted; a little was done between 1828 and 1837; then nothing until Victor Emmanuel caused (1869) the resumption of the work. The most important remains are the theater, basilica, prison, some interesting private dwellings, and portions of several streets paved with lava. In Herculaneum were found a number of carbonized manuscripts on papyrus, some of which have been deciphered, and some of the best-known statues in the Naples Museum, including the Agrippina, Sleeping Faun, Aristides, and busts of Plato and Demosthenes.

Hercules (her'kū-lēz). The Roman name for Heracles (q.v.). (For the Labors of Hercules, see Heracles, Labors of.) The Romans adopted the Greek hero Heracles, lock, stock, and barrel, and added to the legends assembled about his name some purely Roman adventures. According to the Romans, Hercules stopped at Rhegium on his way back to Greece with the cattle of Geryon. Here one of the bulls from his herd swam across the strait from Rhegium to Sicily. Heracles followed to recover the bull, wrestled with King Eryx, son of Aphrodite, in whose herd his bull was hidden, killed him and won his kingdom, which he left until one of his descendants should come to claim it. The Romans also claimed that while in Italy Hercules freed King Evander from the domination of the Etruscans; that he killed King Faunus, who sacrificed strangers on the altar of his father Hermes, and that by Faunus' widow he was the father of Latinus, the ancestor of the Latins; that he founded Pompeii and Herculaneum; and that he went on in Sicily to the spot where the city of Syracuse was later founded and established the festival commemorating the rape of Proserpina (Persephone) near the sacred chasm of Cyane through which, according to the Romans, Pluto carried off Proserpina to the Underworld. With these and many more legends, the Romans linked the peoples of Italy and the rise of their own state with Hercules, whom they worshiped as a hero and a god of physical strength, courage, and related qualities.

Hercules. An ancient constellation, between Lyra and Corona Borealis, representing a man upon one knee, with his head toward the south, and with uplifted arms. The ancients did not identify the constellation with Hercules; the moderns place a club in one hand, and a branch of an apple tree, with the three heads of Cerberus, in the other.

Hercules Furens (fū'renz). Drama by Euripides. See Madness of Heracles.

Hercyna (hēr-sī'nā). In Greek mythology, a fountain-nymph of Lebadia in Boeotia, and a playmate of Persephone. Once as they were playing, a goose she was holding escaped and fled into a cave. Persephone pursued it and lifted the rock in the cave under which it was hiding. A spring immediately gushed forth from the place where the rock had lain, which became the source of the Hercyna River. Near the source of the river in the cave stone images were placed. On the bank of the river was a temple of Hercyna, with an image of the maiden holding a goose in her arms. The bones of Arcesilaus, brought back from Troy by Leitus, were entombed beside the river. Across the river was a grove sacred to Trophonius, in which there was an image said to have been made by Praxiteles. Those who sought to consult the oracle of Trophonius had first to bathe in the waters of the river Hercyna.

Hercynian Forest (hēr-sin'i-an). [Latin, Hercynia Silva; Greek, Herkynia Hule.] In ancient geography, a mountain range forming the N boundary of what was then known as Europe, and seemingly identified by Aristotle with the Alpine mass. Caesar described it as a nine days' journey wide and a 60 days' journey long, apparently including all the mountains and forests in S and C Germany. It has been variously represented as in C Germany, and as identical with the Böhmerwald, the Thüringerwald, and others.

Hermæ (hēr'mē). Square stone pillars, symbolic of the god Hermes, that were set up in his honor in the doorways of houses and temples, and at cross-roads and streets. On the top of the square pillar an image of the head of Hermes rested. In the midst of the Peloponnesian War (415 B.C.), all the Hermæ in Athens were found to have been mutilated. This was just at the time when an expedition was to be sent out against Sicily, and the Athenians were struck with terror by the mutilation of the Hermæ, and felt it was an evil omen for the expedition. Alcibiades, one of the generals of the expedition, was accused of being ringleader in a plot to overthrow the democracy and the mutilation of the Hermae was ascribed to him. However, it was decided to put off his trial until he returned from the expedition. But while he was away in Sicily, before the Athenians had had any success there, the Athenians became frenzied over the mystery of the mutilation of the Hermae and recalled him to stand his trial. Numerous accusations were lodged against many leading men of Athens. Alcibiades did not return but fled into exile. Meanwhile, a young Athenian of good family confessed that he had been one of those who mutilated the pillars and named his companions. In later times it was thought that this confession had been made only to calm the populace, and the mystery of the mutilation of the Hermae was never solved, but it had many repercussions, and years later was brought up to haunt some of the outstanding men in Athens.

Hermann (her'män). See Arminius.

Hermaphroditus (hër-maf-rō-dī'tus). In Greek mythology, a son of Hermes and Aphrodite, born on Mount Ida. In his youth he journeyed to Caria, where he came to the fountain in which dwelt the nymph Salmacis. Salmacis fell in love with his beauty, which combined that of Hermes and Aphrodite, but he rejected her advances and begged her to go away. As he bathed in Salmacis' pool the nymph dived into its clear water and clung to him, praying they might be united in one person. Her prayer was answered; the bodies of Hermaphroditus and Salmacis were fused into one being combining both male and female attributes.

Hermes (hër'mēz). One of the 12 Olympian gods. He was the messenger of the gods, the bringer of dreams, the god of flocks and herds, and of the market-place; he was god of commerce and trade, of inventions, science, and the arts, and of craft in oratory. As an ancient fertility god, he became also a god of wealth, hence of luck, hence of thieves. He conducted the souls of the dead to Hades, and thus was a link between the worlds of the living and the dead, equally beloved in both. The story of Hermes is that while Hera slept Zeus went to a cave on Mount Cyllene, in Arcadia, and there embraced Maia, the daughter of Atlas. In this same cave his son

Hermes was born to Maia one day at dawn. The infant was wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid on a winnowing fan, but he refused to stay in his cradle. On the very first day of his life he crept to the entrance of the cave, and there, on the threshold, he found a tortoise. He greeted the tortoise with joy, took it up, scooped out the flesh from its shell, and bound it with ox hide. To the sounding box he made in this manner he attached horns, which he connected at their free ends with a bridge of reed. From the bridge he strung seven sheep-gut strings to the sounding box. (Some say he strung only three strings, others say it was four, and that it was Apollo who added the strings that make the seven-stringed lyre.) After he invented a plectrum he tried out his new musical instrument; he plucked the strings and sang of the love of Zeus and Maia and of his own birth. Then, being hungry, he set off to the meadows of Pieria, where the cattle of Apollo were grazing. Here he selected 50 head from the herd and prepared to make off with them. But to cover his tracks, he made huge sandals of oak bark, fastened together with woven grasses, and put them on the hoofs of the cattle. But some say he made the cattle walk backward, to disguise their path, and that he put the sandals on his own feet and camouflaged himself with branches as well. All agree that he was the inventor of sandals, and that he made them to help him carry out his theft of Apollo's cattle. As he started off with the cattle for Pylus, on the Alpheus River, he was spotted by an old man who was cultivating his crops in the nearby fields. Hermes promised the old man rich crops if he would say he had not seen him. According to some accounts the old man agreed; but others say he would make no promise. Hermes proceeded with the cattle to the Alpheus River, where he fed them, penned them in a cave, and built a fire by scraping sticks of wood together. He was the first to build a fire in this manner. He killed two of the steers, roasted their flesh, and nailed their hides to the rocks. The flesh of the roasted steers he cut into 12 portions but, though he was hungry, he ate none of it himself, as it was a sacrifice to the gods. Some say he did eat of the flesh, and that this was the first flesh sacrifice made to the gods. He then quenched the fire, threw his sandals into the river, and returned to Cyllene, where he slid through the keyhole into the cave, and was back in his cradle before his absence had been discovered, having, in the first 24 hours of his life, invented sandals, a method of making fire by rubbing sticks together, the first flesh sacrifices to the gods, and the lyre, to say nothing of having stolen his brother Apollo's cattle. Some say his mother saw him as he slid back into his cradle and pulled the covers around his neck; and she chided him, and predicted he would come to a bad end. He at first innocently answered that he was much too young to do anything that merited such a rebuke, then reproached her for talking to him as if he were a "wordless babe," assured her that he would get along all right, and would look after her too. As he had already made up his mind to be a god, he promised her that they would dwell among the immortals. For, he said, if his father Zeus would not make him a god he would make himself one. At dawn the next day Apollo discovered that 50 of his cattle were missing. Some say Apollo searched fruitlessly for them, and finally offered a reward for their return. Silenus and his companions, eager for the reward, set out to track down the missing cattle. They came to the cave in Cyllene and heard strange music issuing from it. They questioned the nymph Cyllene about the music and learned from her that a marvelous child had been born the day before, who had invented a new instrument from ox hides and sheep gut. The Sileni were suspicious, especially when they heard of the ox hide, and charged that this marvelous child had stolen the cattle of Apollo. Cyllene was indignant at this ridiculous charge. Just then Apollo arrived, guided thither by a long-winged bird, some say, but others say he knew by divination that Hermes had stolen his cattle. They say that when Apollo noticed the loss of his cattle he asked the old man working in the fields if he knew what had become of them. The old man answered that many passed by as he worked and he could not know them all, but he did especially notice a child, a mere babe, driving cattle backward. Apollo found the tracks and the strange imprints made by the sandals Hermes had invented, and although he didn't understand the strange tracks, he knew where to look for his lost cattle.

Now he arrives, full of wrath, at the cave on Cyllene and charges Hermes with the theft. Hermes cowers in his cradle as Apollo sweeps through the cave looking for his cattle, in vain. He threatens Hermes. Hermes answers that he is a mere infant, who knows nothing of such things and is interested only in his mother's milk. After all, he says, he was born only yesterday, and scarcely understands the meaning of the word "cattle." Apollo is beguiled by the cheekiness of his infant brother. Nevertheless, as Hermes refuses to say where the cattle are and protests his innocence, Apollo hales him off to Zeus. Zeus, too, is amused by Hermes' lies, but orders him to restore the stolen cattle, and asks Apollo to forgive his baby brother. Hermes submits to the will of Zeus; he leads Apollo to Pylus and brings the cattle from the cave where he had hidden them.

Hermes/

Now Apollo notes the two hides nailed to the rock, and resolves to punish Hermes. But the willow bonds he makes to bind him fall to the ground and sprout. Apollo asks what he did with the two steers he killed, and is told that they were sacrificed to the 12 gods. Surprised, Apollo says he knows of only 11 gods; who is the twelfth? Hermes modestly names himself. As Apollo prepares to set his cattle to graze Hermes plucks his lyre, which up to now he has kept hidden under his swaddling clothes, and sings of the creation of the world and of the gods. Apollo is enchanted with the music. He agrees to give Hermes the cattle in exchange for the lyre, and promises to honor him and his mother. Hermes hands the lyre over and in his turn promises never again to steal anything of Apollo's. They become fast friends. As the cattle graze Hermes invents a shepherd's pipe of reeds and pipes on it guilelessly. Apollo, hearing it, demands this instrument too, and offers in exchange the golden wand with which he herds his cattle. But Hermes bargains. He will exchange the pipe for the golden wand and instruction in the art of prophecy. Apollo gives him the golden wand, which will make him a warder of cattle and bring him wealth, but will not teach him the art of prophecy. However, he tells Hermes of the three sisters, the Thriae, who dwell on Mount Parnassus and who will teach him the art of divining by pebbles. In addition to learning this, Hermes also invented the art of divining by knucklebones. Apollo names him god of flocks, cattle, and all animals, and tells Zeus of the deeds young Hermes has already performed. Zeus appoints him herald of the gods, gives him a herald's staff wound with white ribbons, which must be respected by friend and foe, and a round hat and winged sandals, and Zeus appoints him protector of travelers, god of treaties and commerce. Thus Hermes is enrolled as one of the gods. Hades appoints him as the god who summons the dying by laying his golden staff gently on their eyes, and Hermes becomes Pterseus (Destroyer), because he is the herald of Death, and Psychopompus, because he conducts the dead souls to the Underworld. Sometimes Hermes uses his staff merely to bring sleep to mortals, and as such he is the bringer of dreams and to him libations are poured before bedtime. In time Hermes shared with Apollo the honors given to the god of the palaestra (athletic contests), and feasts called Hermaia were dedicated to him as the god of athletic skills that make men strong and handsome.

As herald of the gods Hermes performed many errands. After the flood that Zeus sent to destroy wicked men, Hermes was sent to ask Deucalion, who survived it, what he wished for. Deucalion wished for men to repopulate the earth. It was Hermes who sent the ram with the fleece of gold to rescue Phrixus and Helle when their father was about to sacrifice them. At the command of Zeus he killed 100-eyed Argus, set by Hera to guard Io after she had been transformed into a heifer. Because of this Hermes won the epithet Argeiphontes (Slayer of Argus). He guided Perseus to the Phorcydes when he was on his mission to fetch the head of Medusa, gave him the adamant sickle to cut off the Gorgon's head, and restored the cap, wallet, and sandals to the nymphs when Perseus was through with them. It was Hermes who led the goddesses—Athena, Aphrodite, and Hera—to Paris to be judged for the prize of beauty that Eris had thrown among the wedding guests at the marriage of Thetis and Peleus. Some say Hermes, at the command of the gods, carried Helen off to Egypt and delivered her into the charge of the king, and that the Helen Paris carried off to Troy, and for whom the Greeks and Trojans fought a disastrous war, was only a phantom, a wraith created by Hera to punish the Trojans. In the Trojan War he aided the Greeks, with the permission of Zeus, but when Hector was killed by Achilles, Hermes, in disguise, led Hector's aged father Priam to the camp of the Greeks and spirited him into Achilles' tent so that he could ransom his son's body. He then conducted the grieving old king, with Hector's corpse, safely back to Troy. By his cunning and his gift for crafty language Hermes often helped the gods. He retrieved the sinews of Zeus that had been cut out and hidden by the monster Typhon and restored them to Zeus, who then conquered Typhon. He helped to rescue Ares when he was imprisoned in a bronze vessel by Otus and Ephialtes. To him was entrusted the infant Dionysus to save him from the wrath of Hera. He took Dionysus to Ino and Athamas and persuaded them to rear him as a girl. When Hera drove Ino and Athamas mad, Zeus transformed Dionysus into a kid, and in that guise Hermes took him to the nymphs of Nysa. In the gods' war with the Giants Hermes wore the cap of invisibility, loaned to him by Hades, and overcame the giant Hippolytus. As a god who had connections with the Underworld he bore a message from Zeus to Hades, demanding the release of the abducted Persephone so that the earth might not become barren because of Demeter's sorrow, and he brought Persephone back to her mother Demeter in his chariot. On the other hand, he forcibly restored Sisyphus to the Underworld, from which he had escaped by a trick. But he fetched up Protesilaus, killed in the Trojan War, to spend a few hours with his wife on earth. It was Hermes who sold Heracles for three talents to Omphale, to purge him of his crime of murdering Iphitus. Hermes was sent by Zeus to help Atreus in his struggle for the throne of Mycenae; and again, he was sent to warn Aegisthus not to seduce Clytemnestra while her husband was off at the Trojan War. He gave the lyre to Amphion and gave the magic herb moly to Odysseus to protect him from the spells of the enchantress Circe. Altogether, Hermes was a most helpful god; a diety of great ingenuity, craft, and, on the whole, good will.

Like most of the gods, Hermes had many loves. Apemosyne, daughter of King Catreus of Crete, rebuffed him. However, as she was returning from a spring one day he spread fresh hides in her path, and when she attempted to run from him she slipped and fell; he seized her and ravished her. Some say Hermes was the father of Eros by Aphrodite, and some say he was the father of Pan by Penelope. He also loved Herse, daughter of Cecrops, and she bore him Cephalus who was carried off by Eos, and Ceryx, the first herald of the Eleusinian Mysteries. Other sons were: Autolycus, the notorious thief; Echion and Eurytus the Argonauts; Daphnis, who invented bucolic poetry; Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, for whose murder Pelops erected the first temple of Hermes in the Peloponnesus; Abderus, who accompanied Heracles to Thrace to fetch the man-eating mares of Diomedes and perished there.

In recognition of his role as protector of travelers and wayfarers, square pillars were set up in his honor. They were called Hermæ, and were to be seen at cross-roads, lanes, byways, and before houses. In addition, there were heaps of stones at the cross-roads to which passing travelers added their stones in tribute to Hermes. An image of Hermes of the Gateway stood at the entrance to the Acropolis. As god of the Market-place his image stood near the Painted Portico in Athens. Another image, bearded and made of stone, stood in the market-place at Pharae. Here there was an oracle of Hermes. In front of the image was a hearth to which bronze lamps were fastened. At nightfall, the inquirer at the oracle burned incense on the hearth, filled and lighted the lamps, put them on the altar to the right of an image of a coin called a "copper," then he whispered his question into the ear of the image of Hermes. Having asked his question, the inquirer stopped his ears and left the market-place, when he unstopped his ears. The first words he overheard thereafter constituted the oracular response. Hermes was called Cyllenian (Of Cyllene), for his birthplace; Epimelius (Keeper of Flocks), and the god who brought fertility to flocks and fields; Pronaos (Of the Fore-temple) and had an image said to have been made by Phidias at the entrance to the Acropolis at Thebes; he was Acacesius (Of Acacesium) after Acacus, founder of Acacesium, because, some say, as a child he lived in Acacesium and Acacus was his foster-father; he was Dolius (Crafty); Champion, especially at Tanagra where he led the youths of the city against invading Eretrians, and where there was a wild strawberry tree under which he was said to have been nourished; he was Spelaïtes (Of the Cave); and Promachos (Defender). He was the god of luck and of profit; whatever was found by chance was a gift of Hermes. He was born on the fourth of the month and that day and number were sacred to him. His worship, which was particularly strong in Arcadia, its ancient seat, extended throughout Greece. In art he was sometimes represented bearded, but after the archaic period usually as a graceful and vigorous youth, slightly draped, with caduceus (staff), petasus (round hat), and talaria (winged sandals) as attributes. The most noted artists of antiquity executed works in which Hermes was the subject. One of the most beautiful as well as one of the best-known statues of antiquity that have been preserved is the Hermes Carrying the Infant Dionysus, found in the ruins at Olympia. The Roman Mercury, their god of commerce, became identified with Hermes.

Hermes Carrying the Infant Dionysus (hēr-mēz; dī-ō-nī'sus). Subject of sculptured groups by several ancient artists, including one by Praxiteles which the Greek traveler Pausanias says he saw (c170 A.D.) in the Heraeum, or Temple of Hera, at Olympia. A superbly executed and well-preserved marble group found in the cella of the Heraeum by the German excavators was assumed at the time to be the group recorded by Pausanias and to be the original by Praxiteles. Since that day some experts have asserted that 1) the workmanship and finish are not referable to the time of Praxiteles, and 2) there is reason to think Praxiteles' original was of bronze; therefore, these scholars argue, the group found was not the original, but a copy substituted in ancient times, conceivably after Pausanias' visit. In the group, Hermes carries the babe on his left forearm, which rests on a tree stump. His right hand, now missing, held something which caught the child's attention, probably a bunch of grapes. A greatly inferior adaptation of this group was found in the theater of Minturnae in 1933. (JJ)

Hermesianax (hēr-mē-sī'a-naks). Greek elegiac poet of the 4th century B.C. He was born at Colophon, in Ionia, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great and Demosthenes, and a friend of Philetas. He wrote love elegies. One long fragment of his work Leontion, in three books, remains. It consists mainly of a list of lovers of mythology and legend.

Hermione (hēr-mī'ō-nē). In Greek legend, the daughter of Helen and Menelaus. She was nine years old when her mother eloped with Paris and left her in Sparta. Menelaus gave her into Clytemnestra's charge while he sought the return of Helen. She was betrothed to Orestes at the command of Apollo, but some say that toward the end of the Trojan War when oracles foretold that Troy could not be taken without the presence of Neoptolemus, Menelaus promised her to Neoptolemus in return for his aid at Troy. Others say she was given to Neoptolemus because Orestes, pursued by the Furies for the murder of his mother, could not marry her. She married Neoptolemus long after he returned from the war accompanied by his captive and concubine Andromache. Hermione bore no children to Neoptolemus and accused Andromache, whom she constantly referred to as a barbarian, of putting a spell on her. Neoptolemus went to Delphi to consult the priestess concerning his wife's childlessness. While he was gone Hermione plotted to kill Andromache and her sons by Neoptolemus. She was prevented from doing so by the timely arrival of Peleus, grandfather of Neoptolemus. In fear of her husband's wrath for what she had tried to do, Hermione attempted to kill herself by hanging, but was saved by her handmaidens. She later married Orestes, who some say had a hand in Neoptolemus' death at Delphi, and bore him a son, Tisamenus.

Hermione. In ancient geography, a city on the E coast of the Peloponnesus, near Troezen. According to tradition, it was founded by Hermione, a grandson of Phoroneus, but some say the Hermionians were Dryopes who had been driven out of Doris by Heracles. The rock from beneath which Theseus took up his father's tokens was on the road between Troezen and Hermione. The most ancient city of Hermione contained temples of Apollo Platanistis (Of the Plane Tree), sanctuaries of Demeter Thermasia (Warmth), Poseidon, and Athena. The old city was moved back a short distance from the coast. In the newer city there was a temple of Aphrodite Pontia (Of the Deep Sea) and Limenia (Of the Harbor), in which maidens and widows about to marry sacrificed. Annually, the Hermionians held a festival to Dionysus of the Black Goatskin. A sanctuary of Demeter Chthonia was said to have been founded by Clymenus, son of Phoroneus. It was named in honor of an Argive maiden, Chthonia, who received Demeter when she was searching for Persephone. An annual festival was held in her honor, in the course of which a procession of wreath-decked maidens led cows, also adorned with wreaths, to the temple. One cow at a time was induced to enter the temple, where four elderly women waited and slaughtered the cow with an ax when it came inside. Four cows were dispatched in that manner. All Hermionians took part in the ceremony outside the temple, but the most sacred object within was never seen by any man. Hermione was noted for having its own private entrance to Hades. Consequently, the thrifty Hermionians considered it unnecessary to put a coin under the tongue of a corpse to pay Charon to ferry it across the Styx. By this entrance, the Hermionians claimed that Heracles dragged Cerberus, the Hound of Hell, up to the light, and Hades, they said, carried Persephone to his realm through this chasm. In the Trojan War men of Hermione joined the Greeks before Troy under the leadership of Diomedes. When the Dorians invaded the Peloponnesus, Dorians from Argos settled in Hermione. In the Persian War Hermione sent three ships to join the Greek fleet at Salamis (480 B.C.), and its name was inscribed on the trophy dedicated at Delphi as having taken part in the victory of Plataea (479 B.C.).

Hermippus (hēr-mi'pus). Greek satirical poet, active about the end of the 5th century B.C. He was an older contemporary of Aristophanes, and a writer of the Old Comedy. His first victory was in 435 B.C. An enemy of Pericles, he attacked Aspasia, his mistress, and charged her with impiety. Fragments of his satirical, abusive work survive.

Hermocrates (hēr-mok'ra-tēz). Syracusan general and politician; killed at Syracuse, c407 B.C. At a congress at Gela attended by delegates from all the Greek cities of Sicily and called (425 B.C.) for the purpose of considering whether the cities should ally themselves with Athens against Syracuse, Hermocrates formulated a policy of Sicily for the Sicilians. He advised the representatives not to invite outsiders in to settle the quarrels of the Greek cities with each other, and to unite to repulse any interference in their affairs by outsiders. His policy was not adopted, nor in the end was he able to follow it himself, but for the time being the intervention of Athens in Sicilian affairs was postponed. Ten years later an Athenian expedition arrived in Sicily at the request of Segesta, which was engaged in a quarrel with Selinus, and to restore Leontini, which had been taken by Syracuse. Hermocrates was appointed general to defend Syracuse. A fleet was assembled and walls were built. With the aid of the Spartan general Gylippus, who came in response to Syracusan appeals for help, the Athenians were completely defeated at sea (413 B.C.), and cut to pieces or enslaved as they attempted to retreat overland. After the defeat of the Athenians Hermocrates was appointed commander of a fleet that was sent to the aid of Sparta in the Aegean and took part in the battle of Cynossema (411 B.C.). While he was gone a resurgence of democratic feeling in Syracuse was used by his political opponent, Diocles, to secure his banishment and to deprive him of his command. He went to Persia and served the Spartans under the satrap Pharnabazus. In 408 B.C. he returned to Sicily, but was not allowed to return to Syracuse. He built a small fleet, hired mercenaries, and gathered a band of followers from Himera, the city just destroyed by the Carthaginians, and set about to drive back the Carthaginians. He had great success and hoped now to win back his own city, but Diocles prevented his recall. Hermocrates thereupon went to the ruins of Himera and gathered the bones of the soldiers of Diocles who had fallen there and whose bones Diocles had neglected to inter. Hermocrates loaded the bones on wagons and sent them into Syracuse, while he waited outside the city walls, hoping to be recalled. Diocles was banished for having failed to bury the dead, but Hermocrates was not recalled. All else failing, he now resolved to take the city by force. With a few followers he was secretly admitted to the city by his supporters inside it, but before the main body of his supporters could join him his presence in the city became known, and he was overpowered and slain (c407 B.C.).

Hermodorus of Ephesus (hēr-mō-dō'rus; ef'e-sus). Greek philosopher, of the 5th century B.C. He is said to have gone to Rome and to have assisted the decemvirs in drawing up the laws of the Twelve Tables at Rome in 451 B.C.

Hermogenes (hēr-moj'e-nēz). Greek rhetorician of the 2nd century A.D. He was born at Tarsus, in Cilicia, and in his youth went to Rome. There he earned the admiration of the emperor Marcus Aurelius for his skill and power in oratory. He wrote a work on rhetoric, in five books, which became a standard text for the subject, and which still survives.

Hermonthis/Herodianus Aelius

Hermonthis (hēr-mon'this). [Modern name, Armant, Erment.] In ancient geography, a town in the Thebaid, Egypt, situated on the Nile about eight miles SW of Thebes. It was a seat of ancient worship, and important ruins remain, notably those of a temple built in the time of Cleopatra.

Hermus (hēr'mus). [Modern name, Gediz.] In ancient geography, a river of Asia Minor, said to have gold-bearing sands in its channel. On it was located Sardis, the Lydian capital of King Croesus. The river was also called Sarabat.

Hernici (hēr'ni-sī). Ancient Italian people, allied to the Sabines, dwelling in the Apennines about 40 miles SE of Rome. Their capital was Anagnia (Anagni). They were subjugated by the Romans in 486 B.C., and revolted (unsuccessfully) in 387 and 362 B.C. and in 306 B.C.

Hero (hērō). In Greek legend, a priestess of Aphrodite at Sestos, on the Hellespont, beloved by Leander, who swam across the Hellespont every night from Abydos to see her. One night Leander was drowned and Hero, heartbroken, drowned herself also.

Hero or Heron (hēr'on). Alexandrian "mechanist" and mathematician, active probably c150 A.D. He was the inventor of Hero's fountain, in which a jet of water is maintained by compressed air, and of a machine acting on the principle of Barker's mill, in which the motion is produced by steam. One of his extant works describes a machine that manipulated mechanical actors through a four-act tragedy, including a shipwreck and a fire, without any further aid once the machine had been set in motion. In geometry he wrote the Metrica. Fragments of his Commentary on Euclid's Elements survive in Proclus and in the work of an Arabian writer. His Mechanica in three books exists in an Arabic version. Surviving also are his Pneumatica, in two books, Barulcus (a treatise on the raising of heavy weights), Belopoeica (a treatise on the making of darts), On the Dioptra, On Mirrors, On Automaton- making, and a treatise on the making of a machine called the "Cheirobalistra."

Herodas (hē-rō'das) or Herondas (-ron'-). Greek satirical poet; fl. c3rd century B.C. He seems to have lived on the island of Cos, but little is known of him beyond a few lines quoted by other writers, and the eight poems of his literary mimes in iambic sczons, preserved in a papyrus manuscript in the British Museum. These poems show him to have been a realist who portrayed in vivid manner, and in a particular style and meter, the speech and incidents of everyday life.

Herodes Atticus (hē-rō'dēz at'i-kus), Tiberius Claudius. [Sometimes called Atticus Herodes.] Greek rhetorician, born at Marathon, c101 A.D., and died there, c177. He was the son of an old and rich family and was soundly educated in rhetoric and philosophy. His eloquence won the admiration of the emperor Hadrian, who appointed him to public office. In 129 he returned to Athens and became distinguished as a teacher. In 140 Antoninus Pius invited him to Rome to become the tutor of Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus, and rewarded him with public offices, including that of consul (143). He inherited great wealth from his father, which he used for the benefit of his fellow citizens. He is notable for his interest in public works during the period of government influence, building such structures as the Odeum at Athens, another odeum at Corinth, a stadium at Delphi, baths at Thermopylae, and an aqueduct at Canusium, as well as restoring many ruined buildings in Greece. Fragments of his writings survive.

Herodianus (hē-rō-di-ā'nus) or Herodian (hē-rō-di-ān). Greek historian, born about 170 A.D., died about 240 A.D. He lived at Rome, where he held public office. His history of the Roman emperors, from the death of Marcus Aurelius (180) to the accession of Gordianus III (238), survives.

Herodianus Aelius. Greek grammarian, born at Alexandria, who was active in the 2nd century A.D. He went to Rome and became friendly with Marcus Aurelius. His chief interest was the study of grammar and in reducing it to a system. A work of his on the words and unusual forms in the Iliad was epitomized, with other studies of the Iliad, in the 3rd century A.D. His work on anomalous words and a short Atticist lexicon are extant. He is considered one of the greatest, and the last, of the original Greek grammarians.

Herodorus (hē-rō-dō'rus). Greek historian of Heraclea on the Euxine Sea. He was active at the end of the 6th century B.C. His work, critical history of the earliest records, was chiefly concerned with his native town and with Heracles, who had seized the land on which it stood from the Bebryces and given it to the Mariandyni; it also included mention of the Argonauts and the descendants of Pelops. His approach to the early records—that is, to the myths—was an attempt to give a rationalistic account of such stories as that of Prometheus and Laomedon, for example, and to fit them into some sort of chronological order. Of Laomedon, who, according to the myth, refused to pay Apollo and Poseidon as promised for building the walls of Troy, Herodorus explains that Laomedon took money from the treasuries of other temples to build the walls and never repaid it. Of Prometheus, chained to a rock and gnawed by an eagle in the myth, Herodorus says Prometheus was a Scythian prince, the Eagle was a river of that name which regularly overflowed its banks and flooded the country. The Scythians imprisoned Prometheus, punishing the prince for the evils that fell on them, and he was freed only when Heracles, with the aid of science, improved the channel of the river and it ceased to flood the country. Although he believed the common tradition that the Nemean Lion had fallen from the moon, he explained it on the ground that the moon was another earth, populated by some of the strange beasts and birds spoken of in the stories but never seen on earth in his day. In furtherance of his work of critically examining and recording the early records, Herodorus made extensive geographical studies. The questing mind that prompted Herodorus to search for rational explanations of the myths, the only explanations men had for the universe and the basis of their theology, must be admired as a step forward in man's search for knowledge.

Herodotus (he-rod'ō-tus). Greek historian, called "The Father of History." He was born at Halicarnassus in Asia Minor, probably c484 B.C.; died, c424 B.C. According to the commonly accepted account of his life, gleaned chiefly from his own works, he was the son of Lyxes and Dryo, persons of means and station at Halicarnassus. He fought against the Persians, who controlled Halicarnassus, and against Lygdamis, the tyrant of his native city. Before Lygdamis was overthrown Herodotus fled to Samos. On the fall of the tyrant he returned to Halicarnassus, but for some reason, perhaps a political one, he soon left and went to Athens. There he found a second home, and became a friend of Sophocles, and possibly of Pericles also. Ultimately, he went as a citizen to the model colony of Thurii which Athens founded (443 B.C.) on the site of the ruined city of Sybaris in south Italy. There he wrote his history, and there he died. The Greek word from which our word "history" comes means "a learning or knowing by inquiry." Herodotus was a seeker of knowledge and information. His search led him to travel widely. He visited Egypt; traveled in what was then known as Asia as far as Susa and Ecbatana; journeyed around the Euxine Sea to the mouths of the Ister (Danube); visited the Crimea and the land of the Colchians. He went to Tyre in Phoenicia and to Cyrene in Libya. He knew Greece well, having traveled, perhaps as a professional story-teller, to Dodona, Acarnania, Delphi, Thebes, Athens, Tegea, Sparta, and Olympia, and he also traveled along the coast of Thrace. What he learned he set down in his history of the Persian Wars to 479 B.C. His History is a work in nine books, which men later named after the nine Muses. The first six books are occupied with what might be called the background of the wars, the last three books are concerned with the mighty forces which were in motion and the course of the war down to 479 B.C. In the opening sentence of his work he announces that he publishes the results of his researches in the hope of preserving the memory of the deeds of men, and of preventing the great and glorious actions of the Greeks and the barbarians (Persians) from losing their due meed of glory. In doing so he means to set down a record of the reasons for the struggle between the Greeks and the barbarians. Beginning with a rationalized account of the seizure of Io and her removal from Greece to Egypt, followed by the theft of Medea from Colchis (representing Asia) by Jason, and the abduction of Helen by Paris and the war which the Greeks waged on Troy (again, representing Asia), Herodotus details the ancient reasons for enmity between Asia and Greece. He then takes a long leap through time to the period of Croesus, the first Asiatic ruler to subdue the Ionian cities. He describes the power of Croesus and his fall to Cyrus, and gives a vivid, anecdotal, and broad-minded picture of the reigns of Cyrus, Darius, and Xerxes, describing the wars they fought, their reasons for fighting them, and the course of the engagements which took place. In the course of so doing, Herodotus finds occasion, by means of what modern writers call "flash-backs," to describe what he had learned of the origin and ancestry of the peoples and customs of the areas in which he had traveled. His history includes a fascinating collection of the myths, legends, and folk tales of the peoples whose lands he visited, with plentiful references as well to those of the Greeks. He has been criticized by some for discursiveness, for the inclusion of material not strictly relevant to his theme, and for what seems, to some, to have been a naïve acceptance of patently unacceptable stories and conclusions. However, we can hardly blame Herodotus for accepting as true what was regarded as truth in his time, and we must be grateful for the liveliness with which he paints the picture of the ancient world. And because of his discursiveness and inclusiveness much has been preserved which would otherwise have been lost. The anecdotes he relates—perhaps, it is true, with the idea of entertaining his audience—give an immediacy to the work which may account for its vitality even today. Whatever he quoted in the way of conversations (and he quoted some which could not have taken place), stories, oracles, or fantastic incidents, is revelatory of the ideas and attitudes of his own time. In many cases Herodotus cites the sources of his information. Often he repeats what "was told" to him by people he had reason to believe, under the circumstances of his age and the state of knowledge at the time. Sometimes he gives his information or descriptions without comment, and sometimes he repeats stories that he quite frankly says he does not believe himself. But over all, there is a sympathy and understanding of peoples and their differences, an admiration for the worth even of enemies, which is a winning tribute to the compassion and curiosity of the author, and makes him lively and interesting reading even more than 2000 years after his death.

Heroic Age. One of the five Ages of Man described by Hesiod. It followed the Bronze Age and preceded the Iron Age. Men of the Heroic Age were descended from mortals and fought gloriously and for the joy of combat in the Trojan War. The siege of Thebes and the expedition of the Argonauts were among other glorious exploits of the Heroic Age. At the end of their days, the men of the Heroic Age were transported to the Elysian Fields.

Herophile (hē-rof'i-lē). A legendary prophetess of Delphi. She is said to have lived before the Trojan War, for she foretold that Helen would be reared in Sparta and would be the ruin of Europe and Asia, and that for her sake the Greeks would capture Troy. She claimed that her mother was immortal, a nymph of Trojan Mount Ida, and that her father was a mortal. She was an attendant at the temple of Apollo Smintheus but spent most of her life in Samos, with occasional visits to the sanctuaries of Apollo at Clarus, Colophon, and Delphi. At Delphi she stood on a high rock and chanted her oracles. She died in the Troad and was buried in the grove of Sminthian Apollo, whom at various times she claimed as a husband and a brother in her oracles.

Herophilus (hē-rof'i-lus). In Greek mythology, a son of Aphrodite and Poseidon.

Herophilus. Greek anatomist and physician at Alexandria; born at Chalcedon, in Bithynia; fl. c300 B.C. He was a pioneer in dissection and is credited with early descriptions of the brain, the liver, and the genitals, and with being the first to describe motor and sensory nerves as different in function. Among his writings were commentaries on Hippocrates, a manual for midwives, and notes on the causes of sudden death.

Herostratus (hē-ros'tra-tus). Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Artemis (Diana) at Ephesus, one of the seven wonders of the world (allegedly, on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great), in order to immortalize himself.

Herse (hēr'sē). In Greek mythology, one of the three daughters of Cecrops, the half-man, half-serpent king of Attica, and Agraulos. Hermes, beholding her in a procession for Athena, fell in love with her and bribed Agraulos the Younger to facilitate a visit to her. Agraulos took the bribe but refused to do anything to help Hermes because she had been inspired by Athena with gnawing envy of her sister's good fortune in being loved by a god. In anger, Hermes turned Agraulos to stone and sought Herse. She bore him two sons, Cephalus and Ceryx. Long before this happened, however, Athena had given Agraulos and her daughters a chest to guard. She cautioned them not to open the chest. Some time after the death of Agraulos the Younger, Herse and her mother and sister could no longer control their curiosity. They opened the chest and were horrified to find therein an infant which was half-child and half-serpent. Maddened by this discovery, they leaped from the Acropolis and were killed. Athena was so grieved when she learned of their deaths from her sacred crow that she dropped the huge stone she was carrying to fortify the Acropolis, and it became Mount Lycabettus. She also changed the crow's feathers from white to black for bringing her bad news, and forbade all crows from ever again visiting the Acropolis.

Hersilia (hēr-si'li-ā). In Roman legend, a woman of the Sabines. When Romulus invited the Sabines to the celebration of the Consualia and, by arrangement with his followers, fell upon the Sabine women and carried them off because of the lack of women in his new city of Rome, Hersilia was taken by Romulus and became his wife, according to some accounts. The Sabines waged war on the Romans to recover their women, who had become quickly adjusted to their Roman husbands, and were driven off. Romulus prepared to carry the war against the Sabines but, some say, Hersilia persuaded him to forgive the parents of the stolen women for trying to regain their children, and instead, to receive the Sabines into the new state of Rome. Some say that Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome (672-640 B.C.), was a grandson or great-grandson of Hersilia and Romulus.

Hesiod (hē'si-od, hes'i-). Greek didactic poet, born at Ascra, on the slopes of Mount Helicon in Boeotia, and, according to some scholars, active in the 8th century B.C. His youth, according to a poem attributed to him, was spent in rural pursuits at his native village. He left Ascra, it is thought, because of a lawsuit brought against him by his brother on the death of their father, and went to Naupactus where he settled. As far as can be learned, he spent all his life in these two places, except for a short trip he once took across the Euripos to Chalcis, where he participated in some funeral games and won a tripod which he dedicated to the Muses. He especially avoided southern Greece, it is said, because an oracle had foretold his death at Nemea. In the end he did die in the sacred precinct of Nemean Zeus in Locris. According to tradition he was murdered by the brothers of a woman who bore him a son in his old age. The murderers flung his body into the sea, but dolphins bore it back to land, and by order of the oracle at Delphi a tomb was built for his bones in Orchomenus. The son born to him in his old age was said by some to have been the lyric poet Stesichorus. The obscurity of his life has led some critics to adopt the opinion that the name does not represent an actual person, but is a mere personification of the Boeotian or Hesiodic school of poetry, as opposed to the Homeric or Ionic. Among the numerous works ascribed to him are Works and Days, the Theogony, and The Shield of Heracles. Hesiod says that he was tending his flocks when the Muses visited him. They announced to him, "We know how to tell many false things true-seeming, but we know how to speak the real truth when we will." From then on Hesiod became a poet. Works and Days is in the form of an address to his brother, and exhorts him to live justly and gain wealth by honest toil (instead of by suing him!); it contains myths and fables, gives notes on agriculture and navigation, tells what days are lucky and unlucky for agricultural and nautical undertakings, praises hard work, and lays down precepts for moral guidance. It also reveals that Hesiod shared the popular superstitions, that he was a woman-hater, and that he felt he lived in an evil age. In this poem appears the story of Pandora, descriptions of the Four Ages of Man (or five, including the Age of Heroes), and a noted description of Winter. According to the Boeotians, this poem is the only authentic work of Hesiod. The Theogony attempts to reduce to order the stories of the origin of the earth and the origin and relationships of the gods. According to Herodotus, it was Homer and Hesiod who first composed the genealogies of the gods, gave them their names and occupations, and described them. The Theogony contains the most ancient materials of mythology and is one of the principal sources of our knowledge of the mythology of the early Greeks. A third poem, The Shield of Heracles, is also attributed to Hesiod, but his authorship is now doubted by most scholars. It describes the shield made by Hephaestus for Heracles and used by him in his fight against Cycnus the robber. Fragments of other works attributed to Hesiod, particularly of the Catalogues, survive.

Hesione (hē-sī'ō-nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, and Leucippe. On the advice of an oracle she was chained to a rock on the shores of Troy as a sacrifice, to be killed by a sea-monster sent by Poseidon to devastate the land because Laomedon had refused to pay Poseidon and Apollo for their help in building the walls of Troy. Passing by Troy, Heracles saw her and when he learned the reason for her pitiful situation he offered to slay the monster and free her. Laomedon promised to pay him with the marvelous horses that Zeus had given to compensate for the abduction of Ganymede. Heracles slew the monster and freed Hesione but once the danger was removed Laomedon refused to honor his promise. Heracles vowed revenge. After some time he returned and attacked Troy. He killed Laomedon and all of his sons except Podarces (Priam), sacked the city, and took Hesione captive. He gave her to Telamon, who had aided him in his attack, and she bore him a son, Teucer, the half-brother of Telamonian Ajax. According to some accounts, when Priam, the new king of Troy, had reestablished his kingdom he sought the return of his sister, and sent his son Paris with a fleet to bring her back.

Paris took the occasion to go to Sparta and seduce Helen and bring her back to Troy, thus causing the Trojan War. Others say that Hesione fled from Telamon to Miletus, where King Arion found her and married her. She bore a second son, Trambelus, whom Arion reared as his own son, although he was the child of Telamon, and who was afterward killed at Troy by Achilles.

Hespera (hes'pēr-ā). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Erebus and Nyx (Night). The name for Eos when, as she accompanied Helios, she had passed through the heavens to the western shore and had become Evening.

Hespere (hes'pēr-ē). In Greek mythology, one of the Hesperides. She changed herself into a poplar tree at the approach of the Argonauts to the Tritonian Lake. See Hesperides.

Hesperia (hes-pir'i-ā). According to the ancient Greeks, the region of the west, especially Italy, and sometimes, according to the poets, the Iberian peninsula. Aeneas, having stopped in Crete on his flight from Troy, was told in a dream to go to the land of his fathers, Hesperia, and found a new nation.

Hesperides (hes-pēr'i-dēz). In Greek mythology, three maidens, Hespere, Erytheis, and Aegle, who guarded the tree with the golden apples which Gaea (Earth) caused to grow as a marriage gift for Hera. According to Hesiod they were daughters of Nyx and Erebus; in later accounts they are named as the daughters of Atlas and Hesperis. They dwelt in the gardens of the west, or among the Hyperboreans, or in Libya; the location of their garden is variously given. Ladon, a 100-headed dragon, helped them guard the apples, but to no avail, Heracles came and slew Ladon and obtained some of the golden apples to take to Eurystheus. The Hesperides were also visited by the Argonauts, who had been blown to the coasts of Libya by a storm and then lifted in the Argo by a mighty wave which washed them into the interior and left them stranded. They carried their ship over the desert to the Tritonian Lake and came to the Hesperides, who first transformed themselves into dust and earth before the Argonauts, and then into trees—Hespere into a poplar, Erytheis into an elm, and Aegle into a willow. The reason for their fear at sight of the Argonauts was that only the day before Heracles had come and taken the golden apples. When they found the Argonauts were not hostile they told them how to find a spring which Heracles had caused to gush up from the earth in the desert and wished them good luck.

Hesperis (hes'pe-ris). According to some accounts, the mother by Atlas of the Hesperides. She was the daughter of Hesperus.

Hesperus (hes'pe-rus). Personification of the evening star, in Greek mythology; son of Astraeus and Eos (according to Hesiod): identified with the planet Venus. The Latin name for it was Vesper.

Hestia (hes'ti-a). One of the 12 Olympians. She was the eldest daughter of Rhea and Cronus and, like Artemis and Athena, was a virgin goddess. This came about because Apollo and Poseidon were rivals for her love. She settled their quarrel by vowing to remain a virgin forever. For thus preventing strife from breaking out on Olympus Zeus ordered that the first victim of every public sacrifice be dedicated to Hestia. As goddess of the hearth and the hearth fire, Hestia was intimately linked with every Greek family, for the hearth was the center of Greek life. She presided over individual well-being and the duties of hospitality. Hestia, who remained aloof from the wars and disputes in which the other gods and goddesses reveled, was worshiped as a beneficent and kindly goddess. Her shrine was a sanctuary for suppliants, and her fire, both in private and public hearths, was sacred. The Romans identified her with their Vesta.

Hetruria (hē-trō'ri-a). See Etruria.

Hexapolis (hek-sap'ō-lis), Dorian. In ancient Greek history, a name given to a league of six Dorian cities: Lindus, Ialysus, Camirus (all in Rhodes), Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and the island-city of Cos.

Hicetaon (hi-se-tā'ōn). In the Iliad, a son of Laomedon, and a descendant of Dardanus, Ilus, and Tros. Like his brother Priam, he was too old to fight in the Trojan War, and served as a counselor. In this capacity he advised the Trojans to restore Helen to Menelaus, although he felt the Trojans could not be blamed for fighting for such as she, who was like to a goddess immortal in face and figure.

Hiera (hī'e-ra). According to some accounts, the wife of Telephus, and a leader of the Mysian women, allies of the Trojans in the war against the Greeks. She was slain in battle by Nireus. Some say she was a daughter of King Priam of Troy, and that she surpassed Helen in beauty.

Hierapolis (hī-ēr-ap'ō-lis). [Eng. trans., "Sacred City."] Ancient city in Phrygia, Asia Minor, near Laodicea. It was held sacred on account of its hot springs and cave called "Plutonium," and was the birthplace of Epictetus.

Hierapolis. Ancient city in Syria, about 50 miles NE of Beroea (Aleppo); the Greek Bambyce, and the modern Membij.

Hiero I (hī'e-rō) or Hieron I (-ron). Tyrant of Syracuse, who died 467 B.C. He was the brother of Gelo, whom he succeeded as tyrant in 478 B.C. Cyme (Cumae), the northern outpost of the Greek settlements on the Italian coast, harried by its neighbors the Etruscans, appealed to Hiero for aid. He sailed at the head of a large Syracusan fleet and defeated the Etruscans at the Battle of Cyme (474 B.C.). Thenceforth Etruscan power in Italy declined. Hiero and Syracuse, like the other Greek settlements in Italy and Sicily, were strongly attached to their motherland, and honored and preserved Greek customs and Greek gods. From the spoils taken from the Etruscans at Cyme, Hiero dedicated a fine bronze helmet at Olympia. Hiero's court was wealthy and luxurious, and its ruler a generous patron of literature. The poet Pindar was an ardent admirer of Hiero and was a welcome guest at his court. He wrote the First Pythian Ode to celebrate the victory at Cyme. Hiero revered the sacred sanctuary at Delphi, to which the tyrants of Syracuse made rich gifts. He sent his horses and chariots to take part in the great games at Olympia. His entries won victories there in 476, 472, and 468 B.C., and at the Pythian Games, in which he also participated, in 482, 478, and 470 B.C. Pindar and Bacchylides, another poet who was welcomed at his court, commemorated his victories in their odes. To memorialize the founding of the city of Aetna, which Hiero accomplished by removing all the inhabitants of Catana and repeopling and renaming it, Aeschylus, visiting at Hiero's court, wrote a play, Women of Aetna. The play has been lost, and the city as Aetna did not long survive; it soon became Catana again. A quarrel between Hiero and Theron, tyrant of Acragas, was settled, so it is said, by the poet Simonides, who spent the last years of his life in Syracuse. Under his successor, the work of Hiero as a tyrant was undone. His defeat of the Etruscans at Cyme was a lasting benefit to the Greek settlements of Italy, and his generosity as a patron of literature bore fruit which survives to our own age.

Hiero II or Hieron II. King of Syracuse, born c307 B.C.; died 216 B.C. He became (275 B.C.) general of the Syracusans, and as a result of his victory over the Mamertines, who were spreading into Syracusan territory, was chosen king in 270 or in 265 B.C. The Carthaginians, looking for a chance to gain possession of a base in Sicily, came to the Mamertines' aid, but they in turn had called on Rome for help. Hiero therefore became an ally of Carthage in 264 B.C., but driven back by the Romans, he became a permanent ally of Rome in 263 B.C. and remained on their side during the First and Second Punic wars.

Hieronymus of Cardia (hī-ron'i-mus; kār-di-ə). Greek general and historian; fl. end of the 4th century B.C.; died c250 B.C. He was possibly one of Alexander the Great's generals. After Alexander's death he joined Eumenes, was taken prisoner by Antigonos, who pardoned him, and was later made military governor of Boeotia by Demetrius Poliorcetes. He wrote a carefully documented history of the Diadochi (successors of Alexander) from the death of Alexander to the Pyrrhic War. His work was an important source for Arrian's history of Alexander the Great. Hieronymus lived to an extremely advanced age and died at the court of Antigonos Gonatas.

Hilaira (hīl-ā-ī-rā) or Hilara (hī-lā-rā). In Greek mythology, daughter of Leucippus. She was a priestess of Artemis. She and her sister Phoebe were betrothed to their cousins, Idas and Lynceus, but Castor and Polydeuces carried them off and had sons by them. According to some accounts, the bitterness which now arose between the two sets of twins, Idas and Lynceus, and Castor and Polydeuces, led to the death of Castor.

Himera (him'e-rā). In ancient geography, a town on the N coast of Sicily, about 30 miles E of Panormus (Palermo). Famous warm springs, sacred to the nymphs, were located here. The city was founded, 648 B.C., by Greek colonists from Euboea. Here (480 B.C.) Gelon of Syracuse defeated the Carthaginians under Hamilcar. By a trick, the forces of Gelon secured entrance to Hamilcar's camp and slaughtered him as he stood by a great altar of Poseidon. Hamilcar's grandson Hannibal (d. 406 B.C.) conquered Himera (408 B.C.), sacrificed 3000 men on the spot where his grandfather had been killed to appease his shade, and completely destroyed the city to avenge his grandfather's defeat and death. No city was ever again raised on the spot. Afterward Thermae Himerenses (the modern Termini Imerese) was the chief town in the vicinity. Himera is also known as the birthplace of Stesichorus.

Himera. Ancient name of two rivers in Sicily, one (the modern Salso) flowing S, and the other (the modern Grande) flowing N past the ancient town of Himera.

Himeros (hī'mēr-os). The god of longing or desire closely associated with Eros.

Himerus (hī'mēr-us). In Greek legend, a son of Lacedaemon and Taygete. Aphrodite caused him to ravish his sister Cleodice unwittingly. When he realized what he had done he leaped into the river which was sometimes known by his name, but was more generally called the Eurotas River.

Himilco (hi-mil'kō). Carthaginian navigator; fl. c500 B.C. According to Pliny he conducted a voyage of discovery from Gades (modern Cádiz) northward along the coast of Europe, perhaps as far as Britain. It is inferred from passages in the Ora Maritima (c400 A.D.) of Festus Avienus that the voyage of Himilco may have extended to the Sargasso Sea, though similar seaweed patches occur off Portugal.

Himilco. Carthaginian general (fl. c400 B.C.). He was a cousin of Hannibal (d. 406 B.C.), whom he accompanied at the siege of Acragas (406 B.C.). In order to attack the walls, Hannibal ordered a causeway to be built and plundered the tombs of cemeteries outside Acragas for material. Plague broke out and Hannibal was one of its first victims. Himilco succeeded to the command. Feeling that the gods were angry at the plundering of the tombs, Himilco sacrificed a boy to the Carthaginian god Moloch, and finished building the causeway, but without taking any more material from the tombs. He besieged the city and at the end of eight months the defenders, in despair, decided to abandon their homes and their gods. Practically the entire population marched out at night, unhindered by the Carthaginians, and left their city to be plundered and occupied (406 B.C.) by Himilco's forces. The following year he marched against Gela, besieged the city, and took it when its inhabitants also fled. In 397 B.C. Himilco returned to Sicily to protect the Carthaginian cities from the attacks of Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He retook the city of Motya, captured and almost completely destroyed by Dionysius the year before, and founded a new city, Lilybaeum, nearby, and the city of Tauromenium on the heights above the Sicilian city of Naxos. He defeated the Syracusan fleet at Catana and marched to besiege Syracuse. His army encamped in a marsh, but Himilco pitched his tent on higher ground, in a precinct of Olympian Zeus. This insult to Greek gods, and a more horrendous sacrilege—the plundering of a temple of Demeter—were thought by the Syracusans to have caused the plague that now broke out in the Carthaginian camp. The pestilence so weakened the besiegers that a well-planned assault by the besieged on the plague-stricken camp succeeded, and the forces of Himilco were defeated. But Himilco himself came to a secret arrangement with Dionysius, treacherous on both sides, whereby, in return for the payment of 300 talents, Dionysius allowed Himilco to escape with 40 triremes and his Carthaginian soldiers, leaving his allies and mercenaries to their fate at the hand of Dionysius. Upon returning home Himilco committed suicide.

Hipparchus (hi-pär'kus). Younger son of Pisistratus and brother of Hippias. The brothers succeeded their father (527 B.C.) and reigned as tyrants of Athens conjointly. The night before the Panathenaic Festival, according to Herodotus, Hipparchus dreamed that a tall and handsome man stood over him and made the following statement: "Bear thou unbearable woes with the all-bearing heart of a lion, / Never, be sure, shall wrongdoer escape the reward of wrong-doing." The next day Hipparchus offered sacrifices to ward off the evil portended by the dream and then led the Panathenaic procession. While leading it he was murdered (514 B.C.) by Harmodius and Aristogiton, Gephyraeans whose ancestors were said to have come to Boeotia from Phoenicia with Cadmus and who, being driven from Boeotia, fled to Athens for refuge. The murder of Hipparchus did not end the tyranny of the Pisistratidae but, according to Herodotus, merely exasperated them. Hipparchus was a great patron of the arts. It was his invitation which brought the poets Anacreon and Simonides to Athens. The great advances in vase-painting, sculpture and architecture of Pisistratid Athens are due in great part to this cultured ruler.

Hipparchus. Greek astronomer; considered the father of systematic astronomy; born at Nicaea, Bithynia, c190 B.C.; died c125 B.C. He catalogued 850 or more stars, invented the planisphere, and made a number of important discoveries including the eccentricity of the solar orbit, some of the inequalities of the moon's motion, and the precession of the equinoxes. Only one of his own writings survives, In Eudoxi et Arati Phaenomena, but Ptolemy acknowledged his indebtedness to Hipparchus for the Ptolemaic theory of the universe. He is credited also with development and extension of the use of trigonometry.

Hipparete (hi-pä-rē'tē). Daughter of Hipponicus and sister of Callias; fl. end of the 5th century B.C. Her father gave her in marriage to the Athenian general Alcibiades. He continued his public affairs with various courtesans after the marriage and she left him and went to live with her brother. Later, she sued him for divorce. When she appeared in court, in person rather than by proxy, he strode in, picked her up, and carried her through the agora to his house. This was according to the law. A wife suing for divorce must appear in court in person so that her husband might, if he so desired, reclaim her as his property. Hipparete then continued to live with him until her death, which took place shortly thereafter.

Hippasus (hip'ä-sus). In Greek mythology, son of Leucippe and a grandson of Minyas. When Dionysus came to Orchomenus and invited the daughters of Minyas to join his revels, they refused. They were driven mad and offered Hippasus as a sacrifice. They tore him to pieces and devoured him.

Hippia (hip'i-a). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Horse-goddess." She is credited with having invented the war-car and drove her own chariot in the war between the gods and the Giants. The people of Acharnae, a division of Attica, invoked Athena Hippia.

Hippias (hip'i-as). Tyrant of Athens, 527-510 B.C. He was the eldest son of Pisistratus and with his brother Hipparchus succeeded him as ruler of Athens, 527 B.C. After the murder of Hipparchus (514 B.C.), he became sole ruler and tyrant of Athens. As a result of the extremely harsh rule to which he subjected the Athenians the Alcmaeonidae, who had been banished by the Pisistratidae, joined other exiles and sought to free Athens. With the assistance of the Spartans under Cleomenes, the Athenians compelled Hippias to leave the country (510 B.C.). He went to Sigeum on the Scamander River in Asia Minor. Later the Spartans, fearing lest a free Athens become as strong as Sparta, sent to Hippias in Sigeum, invited him to Sparta, and proposed to restore him to power in Athens. However, the allies of Sparta, especially the Corinthian representative, rebuked the Spartans for seeking to restore a tyrant, and since they refused to participate in the undertaking it was abandoned. Hippias went again to Sigeum where he embarked on an intense program of interesting Artaphernes, nephew of the Persian king Darius, in making war against Athens. The Athenians learned of his activities and sent messengers to Artaphernes, to whom he replied that if they valued their safety they must take back Hippias. As the Athenians refused to do this henceforth they were open enemies of the Persians. Hippias accompanied Artaphernes when he invaded and took Eretria. A dream convinced him that he would be restored to Athens with all his former power and that he would live to old age in his native land. He now assumed the role of guide to the Persians and led them to the plain of Marathon, as he considered it a favorable ground for the Persian cavalry. When he had arrived at Marathon it happened that he sneezed violently and as he was then of advanced years, probably well over 60 at the time, one of his teeth was forced out by the violence of his sneeze and fell in the sand. Hippias searched for it but could not find it. To him this was the fulfillment of his dream and it now seemed to him that after all the land would never fall to the Persians, and that all his share of it would be the part occupied by his lost tooth. In the ensuing battle of Marathon (490 B.C.) the Persians were completely defeated, and Hippias died shortly thereafter, c490 B.C.

Hippias. Greek sophist and polymath, born about the middle of the 5th century B.C. He was a contemporary of Socrates. He came to Elis and taught and wrote in various parts of Greece, especially in Athens, and acquired great wealth and fame. In his teaching his main object seems to have been to teach his students how to be successful. He occupied himself in rhetorical, philosophical, and political studies. He was also well-versed in poetry, music, mathematics, painting, sculpture, and handicrafts. Out of his own richly furnished mind he could produce, at short notice, arguments to buttress any side of a question. Plato, in two dialogues, criticized him by characterizing him as vain of his memory and method and arrogant in his teaching. One of the great contributions of Hippias was to Greek chronology, and consisted in publishing a list of the Olympiads, with their successive victors. This provided a point of departure of inestimable value to history.

Hippocamp or Hippocampus (hip'ō-kamp, -kam'pus). In Greek and Roman mythology, a sea-horse with two forefeet and a body ending in the tail of a dolphin or other fish. The car of Poseidon and those of other deities were drawn by such sea-horses.

Hippocoön (hip-ō'kō-on). In Greek legend, a son of Oebalus of Sparta and the nymph Batia. He was the half-brother of Tyndareus and Icarius, and banished them both in order to make himself ruler of Sparta. He was attacked and slain by Heracles, because his sons had killed a friend of Heracles, and Tyndareus was restored to the throne of Sparta.

Hippocoön. According to legend, a comrade and kinsman of Rhesus, king of Thrace and ally of the Trojans. Hippocoön was roused by Apollo when Diomedes and Odysseus, having entered the Trojan camp as spies, were slaying Rhesus and the Thracians. Hippocoön gave the alarm, but it was too late and the Greek pair escaped with the marvelous horses of Rhesus. Hippocoön later accompanied Aeneas on the flight from Troy to Italy.

Hippocrates (hi-pok'ra-tēz). Father of Pisis-tratus. Once when he went to the games at Olympia, as he was sacrificing, the water in the cauldrons for the victims began to boil, although there was not as yet any fire beneath them. A soothsayer interpreted this prodigy as a warning to Hippocrates: if he were unmarried he should remain so, that he might never have a son; if he already had a wife he should put her aside; and if he already had a son he should disown him. Hippocrates disregarded the advice of the soothsayer. Afterward he became the father of a son. Hippocrates was a descendant of Neleus (Nestor's father) and named his son Pisistratus, after Nestor's son of that name.

Hippocrates. [Called the Father of Medicine.] Greek physician, born on the island of Cos, c460 B.C.; died at Larissa, Thessaly, c377 B.C.. Nothing definite is known of his life: he is said to have been a descendant (17th or 19th in direct line) of Asclepius, to have traveled widely, and to have practiced in various places. Of the 72 (or 87) medical works attributed to him, it is not known which, if any, he wrote; there is, however, general recognition of a Hippocratic school of medicine and a corpus of Hippocratic treatises that were preserved in the Alexandrian library. The Hippocratic physician discarded the philosophic approach and also the ancient customs and beliefs in his insistence that the effect must have a cause; moreover, the effect was the result of ascertainable causes and was not of supernatural origin. Climate, food, even the kind of government under which the patient lived had to be considered. Observation was the keynote of the teaching of Hippocrates; of necessity his knowledge of anatomy was weak, since current religious beliefs did not sanction vivisection, and his theories of essences or humors were incorrect. But his observation was sharp enough to make the facies Hippocratica, described in his Prognostics, a still recognizable symptom in the dying patient. His Aphorisms contains the famous "Life is short, but art is long." The Hippocratic Oath, taken by doctors today, is perfectly in harmony with Hippocrates' reported medical practice, even though it was not written by him.

Hippocrates. Tyrant of Gela, in Sicily; died 491 B.C. He extended the power of Gela over Naxos, Zancle, and other Greek cities of Sicily. He waged war on Syracuse and defeated the Syracusans at the Helorus River, but was prevented from taking Syracuse when aid arrived for that city from Corinth and Corcyra. He was killed while attacking the city of Hybla (491 B.C.).

Hippocrates of Chios (kī'os). Greek mathematician; fl. at Athens, 470-400 B.C. He wrote an Elements of Geometry, now lost. The third and fourth books of Euclid's Elements are to some extent based on the work of Hippocrates, who is said to have proved that the areas of circles are to each other as the squares of their diameters. His best-known work is on the "lunes of Hippocrates," certain figures bounded by two intersecting arcs of circles.

Hippocrene (hip'ō-krēn, hip-ō-krē'nē). Fountain on Mount Helicon, in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses. Traditionally it sprang up from a hoof mark of Pegasus, and is alluded to as a source of poetic inspiration.

Hippocurius (hip'ō-kū'ri-us). Epithet of Poseidon, meaning "Horse-tending." He had a sanctuary at Sparta.

Hippodamas (hi-pod'a-mas). In Greek mythology, father of Perimele. He flung his daughter into the sea when he learned that she had been ravished by the river-god Achelous.

Hippodameia (hi-pod-a-mē'a, -mī'a). See Briseis.

Hippodamia (hi-pod-a-mī'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Oenomaus, king of Pisa and Elis, and Sterope. Either because of incestuous love for her or because an oracle had declared that he would die at the hands of one of her offspring, her father refused to give her in marriage. He compelled her suitors to run a race with him, from Olympia to the Isthmus of Corinth. If Oenomaus, who gave the contestants a head start, overtook them he flung his spear into their backs and killed them. When Pelops came wooing Hippodamia, she fell in love with him and bribed Myrtilus, Oenomaus' charioteer, so that Pelops could win. Pelops also bribed Myrtilus; he won the race, and Oenomaus was killed. Hippodamia established games to Hera, the Heraean Games, in gratitude for her marriage to Pelops. She bore him many children, among them: Pittheus, Atreus, Thyestes, Copreus, and Sciron. She became jealous of Pelops' affection for his bastard son Chrysippus. Some say she murdered Chrysippus but was recognized and fled. Others say she and her sons Atreus and Thyestes were implicated in the murder. However it was, she fled to Argolis and killed herself. Later her bones were brought back and buried at Olympia. Annual sacrifices were made by women in her sanctuary.

the proper grouping of dwelling-places. The plans of three cities were specifically attributed to him: Piraeus, the port of Athens; Thurii, a colony established by Athenians and others in 443 B.C. on or near the deserted site of Sybaris in the toe of Italy; and Rhodes. At Piraeus and Rhodes, rectangular street plans have in fact been detected, although it is not certain that these go back to the 5th century B.C., and by 408 B.C., when Rhodes was laid out, Hippodamus would have been at least 70 years old; Thurii has not been excavated. The checkerboard plan of Olynthus in Macedonia, dates from c425 B.C., during Hippodamus' active period, and it has been suggested that this was designed either by Hippodamus himself or by engineers trained in his atelier. Hippolochus (hi-pol'ō-kus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Bellerophon, and the brother of Isander and Laodamia. He resigned his claim to his father's kingdom in favor of his nephew Sarpedon. His son was Glaucus, Sarpedon's devoted comrade.

Hippodamia. In Greek legend, a daughter of Butes, or, as some say, of Adrastus. She married Pirithous. Pirithous did not invite Ares and Eris to their wedding, and some say that out of spite they caused an outbreak of battle between the Lapiths and the centaurs at the wedding festivities. Hippodamia was married only a short time when she died.

Hippodamus of Miletus (hi-pod'a-mus; mi-lē'tus, mi-). Greek architect and engineer, born c480 B.C., considered by the Greeks to have been the father of city-planning. According to Aristotle, it was he who introduced the principle of straight, wide streets and Greek legend, a queen of the Amazons; a daughter of Ares and Harmonia, or, according to other accounts, of Otrera or of Aphrodite and Ares. She dwelt near the Thermodon River on the Euxine Sea, and was the possessor of a famous girdle, a gift to her from Ares, which Heracles was told to fetch as one of his labors for Eurystheus. When Heracles came to her shores she received him graciously and voluntarily agreed to give him the girdle. However, Hera stirred up the Amazon women with a rumor that Heracles was about to abduct their queen. They armed themselves and prepared to attack.

Heracles, suspecting treachery, killed Hippolyte and took her girdle. According to other accounts, Heracles got the girdle in exchange for one of Hippolyte's sisters whom he had captured; or by engaging in personal combat with Hippolyte and slaying her; or even from Theseus, who had secured the girdle and gave it to Heracles in exchange for Antiope, a captive Amazon princess.

Hippolyte. Name sometimes given to the Amazon queen who bore Hippolytus to Theseus. See Antiope.

Hippolytus (hi-pol'i-tus). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle, Hermes, hidden in Hades' cap of invisibility, felled him and Heracles killed him.

Hippolytus. In Greek legend, a son of Theseus and the Amazon Antiope. When Theseus had sons by his lawful wife Phaedra, he sent Hippolytus from Athens to Troezen where his grandfather Pittheus made him his heir. Hippolytus was a handsome, athletic, and chaste youth. He built a temple to Artemis in Troezen and devoted himself to the worship of that goddess to the exclusion of others. By this devotion to Artemis he denied the power of Aphrodite, and she resolved to punish him. She caused Phaedra, his stepmother, to fall madly in love with him. Phaedra followed him to Troezen and covertly watched him every day as he exercised on the gymnasium ground, jabbing the pin of her jeweled brooch in the leaves of a nearby myrtle tree in her frustration. After some time, encouraged by her nurse, Phaedra sent Hippolytus a letter in which she confessed her love for him and invited him to share her couch. Hippolytus was horrified. He destroyed the letter, his only evidence that she had made the advances, and reproached Phaedra. She, fearing he might expose her, wrote a letter to Theseus accusing Hippolytus of committing the acts she wished he had committed, and then hanged herself from the lintel. When Theseus read the letter he accused Hippolytus and without listening to the protests of his son, who had come to Athens, banished him from the city. Theseus called on Poseidon to punish Hippolytus. As Hippolytus drove furiously along the coast road in his chariot, Poseidon sent a huge wave from the sea. Riding the crest of the wave was a great bull, or according to some accounts, a sea monster. The horses were terrified and shied and reared. Hippolytus prevented them from plunging over the cliffs but they had swerved from the road. Either the reins caught on a fig tree by the roadside or the axle of the chariot wheel struck the tree bole. The chariot overturned and Hippolytus, entangled in the reins, was dragged to his death. Too late Theseus learned that his son was innocent. Some say the body of Hippolytus was buried beside that of Phaedra in a tomb in Troezen near the myrtle tree, the leaves of which still bear the scars of being jabbed by Phaedra's brooch. The people of Troezen paid Hippolytus divine honors, brides cut off a lock of their hair and dedicated it to him. But some say the people of Troezen did not believe Hippolytus was killed by his horses, and that he was not buried in Troezen. They say his spirit went to Tartarus and there Artemis demanded that Asclepius restore him to life. Asclepius, with the aid of an herb, did as she requested, but since it was against divine law for the dead to return to life Artemis wrapped him in a cloud, transformed his appearance and rapt him off to Italy. She changed his name to Virbius and sent him to live in her sacred grove in Aricia. There, with the permission of the goddess, he married the nymph Egeria. No horses were allowed in the sacred grove. Priests of the temple were drawn from runaway slaves. See Aricia.

Hippolytus. A tragedy by Euripides, exhibited 428 B.C. and won first prize. It treats the vengeance which Aphrodite brought on Hippolytus for denying the power of love. Seneca and Racine, among others, wrote tragedies based on this legend.

The scene is before the palace of Theseus in Troezen, whither Theseus has withdrawn in a self-imposed exile for slaying a kinsman. Aphrodite enters and vows to punish Hippolytus for scorning her and dedicating himself to the chaste goddess Artemis. It is not because he worships Artemis that Aphrodite punishes him; it is because he fails to honor her as well, for the chaste huntress and the goddess of love merit equal reverence. This day will see her vengeance on Hippolytus, actor; up, lûte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ƒH, then; ġ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z̃ as z or zh.

and on Phaedra, the young wife of Theseus, as well. She sees Hippolytus approaching, and withdraws.

Hippolytus enters with his fellow huntsmen and sings praises to Artemis. A servant advises him to honor Aphrodite too, but Hippolytus answers that men may choose the gods they will worship, and he has chosen pure Artemis. He departs. His servant is troubled, and prays that Aphrodite will forgive Hippolytus, for this is the folly and extremism of youth. As the servant leaves a chorus of Troezenian ladies enters. They speak of the unhappy state of Phaedra, who seems ill and longing to die. They ask what cause has fallen on their young queen.

Phaedra approaches with her nurse and her handmaidens. The conversation between Phaedra and the nurse expresses the fevered longings of the one and the concern of the other. The nurse does not know why Phaedra is so unhappy, for her mistress will not tell the reason. She coaxes Phaedra, reminds her of her children, mentions Hippolytus. His name brings a cry from Phaedra. She loves her children, she says, but fate has conquered her. Her hands are pure but her soul is stained. She longs for death, for her death will be her honor. She recalls the unnatural love of her mother Pasiphaë, and her sister Ariadne's betrayal of her father and country out of love for Theseus. At length she reveals that she is passionately in love with Hippolytus, the young son of Theseus and the Amazon Hippolyte. The nurse is horrified, the chorus of women grieves. Phaedra tells of her sleepless nights. She has mused on the unhappiness of men's lives, and concludes that it is not inborn folly that causes suffering, but the failure of men to do what they know is right. When she was smitten with love for Hippolytus she tried to overcome it with self-control. Unsuccessful, she has resolved to die rather than shame Theseus. The nurse has been thinking the matter over. After all, she says, it is not so unusual; many have had the same experience, and it would be a poor thing if Phaedra could help those she loves only by dying. Everyone must yield to Aphrodite, she says, and cites numerous cases—Zeus and Semele, Eos and Cephalus. If even the gods capitulate Phaedra, too, must bow; Phaedra has tried to be too perfect. Since a god has willed that she love Hippolytus, she must accept the god's will and yield, as it is presumptuous to try to be stronger than the gods. Phaedra instantly sees through the nurse's compromising and practical reasoning, and rejects it. Life is more than honor, the nurse insists. Phaedra is shocked, and begs her not to weaken her determination to die rather than yield to her love. The nurse persuades her that she has a charm to soothe love and goes off. The chorus sings of the awful power of love and the grief it can bring. Presently Phaedra and the Troezenian women hear the voice of Hippolytus from within the palace. The nurse has told him of Phaedra's love for him. He is shocked and angry, and curses the nurse. He comes from the palace, aghast at what he has heard, and makes a long speech denouncing women. He is defiled just to have heard the nurse's suggestion that he betray his father. If he hadn't been trapped into giving an oath that he would not reveal what the nurse subsequently told him, he would go straight to Theseus. As it is, he cannot break his oath. He leaves. Phaedra sends the nurse away; the latter justifies her action by telling how welcome it would have been if it had worked. Phaedra declares that she intends to die, but wants to leave no stain of dishonor on her sons or on Theseus. At the same time, she wants to punish Hippolytus; to teach him that all the gods must have their due. Phaedra withdraws. The chorus sings that Phaedra's marriage to Theseus was doomed from the start, because Aphrodite was offended. A cry is heard from within—Phaedra has hanged herself. Theseus enters and is stunned by the news. He orders the doors opened and Phaedra is revealed hanging from a lintel. He apostrophizes his dear, dead wife. Why did she do it, he mourns; what broke her heart? The chorus grieves with him, and shudders at the woe they know is still to come. Theseus sees a note. In it Phaedra accuses Hippolytus. Enraged, Theseus calls on Poseidon as his father, reminding the god that he had once promised Theseus three curses. He wishes to use one now, and asks Poseidon to destroy his son. The chorus, sworn to silence by Phaedra, cannot tell

Theseus his son is innocent. Hippolytus enters and sees Phaedra dead. Theseus assails him as a traitor who would have betrayed his father. Hippolytus veils his head in horror. Theseus bids him reveal himself, and reviles him for having pretended to be so chaste. Hippolytus is a vile hypocrite, convicted by Phaedra in her letter, to which her suicide is a witness. He banishes Hippolytus. Hippolytus swears that he is innocent, that he never betrayed his father, nor even thought or dreamed of such a thing. Phaedra guarded her honor with dishonor, he says, and he can say no more because of his oath. Theseus, ignoring the pleas of the chorus and the denials of Hippolytus, banishes his son on the spot. Hippolytus leaves. The chorus laments. A messenger enters and announces that Hippolytus is near death, that the curse Theseus invoked has already operated. Poseidon sent a monster from the sea that caused the horses of Hippolytus' chariot to rear as he drove along the shore. The chariot was overturned and Hippolytus, entangled in the reins, was dragged along and so mangled that he is now at the point of death. The messenger, though a servant of Theseus, believes Hippolytus was innocent—no matter how many women hanged themselves nor how many letters they had written before doing so. Theseus is not so glad to hear of his son's approaching death as he had expected to be. He orders bearers to bring his son to him. The chorus of women sings of the power of love to bring unbending hearts low. Artemis, veiled in a cloud, addresses Theseus: Hippolytus was innocent; Phaedra was nobly resolved not to reveal the love Aphrodite had inspired in her for Hippolytus; the misguided act of a doting nurse, who sealed the lips of Hippolytus with an oath, precipitated the disaster. Phaedra wrote a lying letter to protect her honor. Artemis accuses Theseus of condemning Hippolytus too hastily. Even Poseidon, she says, though he fulfilled the curse as he had promised, finds him wicked. But Theseus may yet be forgiven, for the whole disastrous chain was set off by Aphrodite to punish Hippolytus for denying her power.

Bearers bring in Hippolytus. He cries to Zeus to behold the injustice that has rewarded his upright life. He longs to die and be free from pain. Artemis addresses him. He pities his father and wishes men's curses could strike the gods as the gods' curses strike men. Artemis soothes him, promises that he will ever be remembered in Troezen by the offerings of hair from girls who are about to marry. She bids Theseus take his son in his arms, then, because she cannot look on death, she disappears. Hippolytus forgives his father and dies. As Theseus mourns the chorus sings of the great blow that has fallen on the city with the loss of one so mighty.

Commentators say Euripides changed the last few lines of this drama to commemorate the death of Pericles, which occurred just before the play was presented. The lines as they stand, translated by A. S. Way, are:

"On the city hath lighted a stroke without warning,

On all hearts desolation.

Rain down, O ye fast-dropping tears of our mourning!

When the mighty are fallen, their burial-oblation

Is the wail of a nation."

Hippomedon (hi-pom'e-don). In Greek legend, a son of Aristomachus. He was an Argive and was one of the seven chieftains who marched against Thebes to restore Polynices to the throne. He perished in the expedition. Some say he was slain by Ismarus, others say he was overcome by a cloud of Theban missiles after he had nearly drowned in the Ismenus River. His body was recovered by Theseus after the Thebans had refused honorable burial to those who fell at Thebes. He was the father of Polydorus, one of the Epigoni.

Hippomenes (hi-pom'e-nēz). In Greek legend, the son of Megareus and Merope, and the grandson of Poseidon. As a woman-hater, he went to sneer as he watched Atalanta race against her suitors, but remained to fall in love with her. With the help of Aphrodite he resolved to race Atalanta and to win her. Aphrodite gave him three golden apples which, during the course of the race, he cunningly threw in front of Atalanta. She, who had at one time vowed to remain a virgin, stooped to pick them up and lost ground. In this way Hippomenes won the race and won Atalanta for his wife. According to some accounts, Atalanta had already fallen in love with Hippomenes at sight, and thus was the more ready to take advantage of any delay which would permit him to win. In his joy at winning Atalanta Hippomenes forgot to give proper thanks to Aphrodite, and the goddess became his enemy. She induced him to commit a sacrilege in the temple of Cybele. Cybele, in her turn punishing, turned him and Atalanta into lions and yoked them to her car. According to other accounts it was Zeus who turned them into lions; Hippomenes is also known as Melanion.

Hipponax (hi-pō'naks). Greek iambic poet, born at Ephesus in the 6th century B.C.; fl. 540-537 B.C. According to tradition he was a lame, deformed beggar, who invented the "halting iambic" (choliambic meter), or "scazon" (limping), so-called because it has a spondee or trochee in the last foot rather than the expected iambic foot. In this meter he composed his satirical verses, or perhaps they should more properly be called abusive verses. They were directed against all who offended him, and especially against women. He was banished (540 B.C.) by the tyrants of his native city to Clazomenae, and lived the rest of his life there in poverty. In this place two sculptors, Bupalus and Athenis, caricatured him. He avenged himself on them in such bitter, abusive verse that, according to tradition, they were driven to suicide. He is reputed to have been the first to parody epic poems. Only fragments of his work survive.

Hipponicus (hi-pon'i-kus). Athenian of the 5th century B.C. He was the father of Calias and of Hipparete, wife of Alcibiades.

Hipponous (hi-pon'ō-us). In Greek legend, one of the last Trojans slain by Achilles. Achilles, wounded and dying, kept his fighting spirit to the end and slew Hipponous just before he died.

Hipponous. According to legend, the father of Periboea. He ordered his daughter to be slain because she claimed the child she was about to bear had been fathered on her by Ares.

Hippochoë (hi-pō'thō-ē). According to legend, a daughter of Mestor (son of Perseus and Andromeda) and Lysidice (daughter of Pelops). She was carried off to the Echinades islands by Poseidon, to whom she bore Taphius, the colonizer of Taphos.

Hippothous (hi-pō'thō-us). In Greek legend, a son born secretly to Alope, daughter of Cercyon, a king in Arcadia. Poseidon was his father. Alope gave him to a nurse and ordered that he be exposed to die, but he was saved by shepherds and taken to Cercyon, who recognized the mantle in which the infant was wrapped as belonging to his father. He ordered the child exposed again, and again he was saved. Theseus later killed Cercyon and put Hippothous on the throne of Arcadia in his place.

Hippothous. Named in the Iliad, as a captain of Pelasgians, allies of Troy in the Trojan War. He was slain by the spear of Telamonian Ajax as he tried to drag the body of Patroclus to the Trojan camp.

Hippys (hip'is). Greek historian who lived at Rhegium, 5th century B.C. He was the earliest collector and writer of the myths, traditions, and legends of Sicily and Italy.

Hire (hī'rē) or Hira (hī'ra). See Ire.

Hirpini (hēr-pī'nī). Ancient Italian people, of Samnite stock, living in southern Samnium in the district near Beneventum, subjugated by the Romans in 290 B.C.

Hirtius (hēr'shi-us), Aulus. Roman politician; killed near Mutina (Modena), Italy, 43 B.C. He was a friend of Caesar and the reputed author of the eighth book of Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic War, and of the history of the Alexandrian war. As consul with Pansa (43 B.C.) he defeated Antony at Mutina, but less than two weeks later was killed in another battle there.

Hissarlik (hi-sär-lik'). See Troy.

Histiaea (his-ti-ē'a) or Hestiaea (hes-). In ancient geography, a city on the NW coast of Euboea, Greece, opposite Thessaly, colonized by Thessalians. In the Trojan War Greeks from "vine-clad" Histiaea fought under the command of Elephenor, captain of the Abantes. In 447-446 B.C. it was conquered by Athens under Pericles and Tolmides. Its inhabitants were driven out and fled for refuge to Macedonia; the territory was annexed by Athens, and nearby the deserted city the Athenians sent colonists to found the city of Oreus. After the defeat of Athens in the Peloponnesian Wars, Oreus fell under the dominion of Sparta. The Athenian colonists were expelled, the ancient name Histiaea was restored. In 207 B.C. Attalus II conquered the city, lost it to the Romans, and reconquered it, 200 B.C.

Histiaeus (his-ti-ē'us). Tyrant of Miletus, through the friendship of Darius the Persian, at the end of the 6th century B.C. He was executed at Sardis, Asia Minor, 494 B.C. When Darius attacked Scythia (c512 B.C.), the Ionian leaders who were allied to Darius and who had been left to guard the bridge by which Darius crossed the Ister (Danube), considered whether they would revolt against Darius and regain their freedom. Histiaeus urged them not to revolt and suggested a means by which they could preserve the bridge from the attacks of the Scythians. To reward him for this service Darius promised him whatever boon he asked. Histiaeus asked for Myrcinus on the Strymon River in Thrace, that he might build a city there. His request was granted. Histiaeus took the town and began to raise a wall about it. Darius now feared that he meant to make himself master of the area. He sent for Histiaeus, on the pretext that he needed his advice, compelled him to relinquish the throne of Miletus, and kept him in honorable confinement at the court of Susa, Miletus being left under the regency of Aristogoras, nephew and son-in-law of Histiaeus. Histiaeus longed to return to Miletus but could not go as Darius pretended he needed him, nor could he send out any messages to Aristogoras as he was closely watched. He finally hit on the following scheme: He chose his most trusted slave, shaved his head, and pricked a message on his scalp. When the hair had grown back he sent the slave to Aristogoras in Miletus with instructions to Aristogoras to shave the head of the messenger and look at it. Aristogoras did as commanded and found orders to revolt against Darius. Histiaeus incited the revolt because he thought if Miletus rebelled Darius would send him to quell the revolt. All Ionia revolted and, as he had planned, Histiaeus was sent to put it down. Being now freed of Darius' restraint, he warred against Persia. He was finally captured in Mysia and handed over to the Persian satrap Artaphernes. The latter, fearing that Darius might even now forgive Histiaeus because of his former services, impaled his body, cut off his head and sent it back to Darius at Susa.

Hittites (hit'its). Ancient people in Asia Minor c2000-1200 B.C., traditionally descended from Heth, son of Canaan, the son of Ham. They settled in the region of Hebron on the hill, are mentioned as one of the seven principal Canaanite tribes, and sometimes as comprising the whole Canaanite population. Hittite kings are mentioned who seem to have dwelt N of Palestine. About the middle of the 9th century B.C. they disappear from Biblical history. Some scholars, however, distinguish the latter as Syrian Hittites, whom they consider a different group from the Canaanite Hittites. Historically it is assumed that the Hittites were a people of Indo-European stock who invaded the region known as Cappadocia c1800 B.C., conquered its people, and retained their power in Asia Minor until c1200 B.C., when they were overcome by Rameses II. Thothmes III of the XVIIIth Dynasty fought with them c1600 B.C. in Megiddo. Later Seti attacked them c1350 B.C., and Rameses II (the supposed Pharaoh of the oppression) defeated them at Kadesh, on the Orontes, c1200 B.C. and married a Hittite princess. Attacks by the so-called "sea-nations" followed by Thracian, Phrygian, and Assyrian invasions finally overthrew them late in the 12th century B.C. Monuments have been discovered since 1872 in Hama, Aleppo, Carchemish, Cappadocia, Lycaonia, and Lydia, which would show that the Hittite empire once spread over the greater part of Asia Minor; and it may be that from there they at one time pushed their way into N Syria. The question whether they formed one people with the Hittites of the Canaanite stock remains an open one. The inscriptions on these monuments are in hieroglyphic characters.

Homadus (hom'a-dus). In Greek legend, a centaur who attacked Heracles on Mount Pholoe. Heracles drove him off, and he fled. Later he tried to violate Alcyone, the sister of King Eurystheus, and Heracles killed him.

Homagyrus (hom-a-jī'ri-us). Epithet of Zeus. At Aegium, in Achaea, Agamemnon assembled the leading princes and heroes of Greece to consult with them about making war against Troy, when Paris carried off Helen. Thereafter, the sanctuary at Aegium was named the sanctuary of Zeus Homa-gyrius (Assembler).

Homer (hō'mēr). Poet (fl. before 700 B.C.) to whom is assigned by very ancient tradition the authorship of the Iliad and the Odyssey, and of certain hymns to the gods (Homeric Hymns). Other poems also, as the Batrachomyomachia (Battle of the Frogs and Mice), were with less certainty attributed to him. Seven cities (Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis in Cyprus, Chios, Argos, and Athens) contended for the honor of being his birth-place; of these, the best evidence connects him with Smyrna. He was said to have died on the island of Ios. The tradition that he lived on the island of Chios, and in his old age was blind, is supported by the Hymn to the Delian Apollo. Modern criticism, especially that stemming from the great scholarly debate of the 19th century, when the Homeric works were the focus of classical study, has led to doubt whether such a person as Homer existed at all, the great epics which bear that name being supposed to be, in their existing form, of composite character, the product of various persons and ages. It is possible, however, that the nucleus of the Iliad, at least, was the work of a single poet of commanding genius; debate still continues, the only agreement being that in the Iliad and the Odyssey we have the prototype of epic poetry. According to Herodotus, Homer lived c850 B.C.; others give a later date, and some a date as early as 1200 B.C. His poems were sung by professional reciters (rhapsodists), who went from city to city. They were given substantially their present form under Pisistratus or his sons Hipparchus and Hippias, who ordered the rhapsodists to recite them at the Panathenaic festival in their order and completeness. The present text of the poems, with their division into books, is based upon the work of the Alexandrine critics.

Homeric Hymns (hō-mer'ik). Group of Greek hexameter poems, five of considerable length and 29 shorter, anciently ascribed to Homer. Each is inscribed to and relates a legend concerning a god or goddess. The most noted are the Hymn to the Delian Apollo, in which an account is given of the birth of Apollo and of the ancient festival at Delos (the author describing himself as the blind bard of rocky Chios), the Hymn to the Pythian Apollo, and the hymns to Hermes, Demeter, and Aphrodite.

Homeridae (hō-mer'i-dē). Ancient Greek clan at Chios claiming to be descended from Homer. They recited epics and poems purporting to be by him and it is thought by some scholars that they gave polished form to the Iliad and the Odyssey and may have written the Homeric Hymns and other poems attributed to him.

Homeromastix (hō'mer-ō-mas'tiks). See Zoilus.
Hoples (hop'lēz). According to tradition, one of the four sons of Ion. One of the four ancient tribes of Athens was named for him. His brothers were Aegicores, Argades, and Geleon.

Horace (hor'as). [Full Latin name, Quintus Horatius Flaccus.] Roman poet, born at Venusia (modern Venosa), in Apulia, Dec. 8, 65 B.C.; died at Rome, Nov. 27, 8 B.C. His father, a freedman, owned a small farm. He took his son to Rome to be educated as were the sons of knights and senators, and guided his son's education with great solicitude. Horace has left a picture of one of his masters, Orbilius, who pounded their lessons into his pupils by the aid of frequent floggings. To complete his education, Horace went to Athens to study philosophy. While he was there Caesar was murdered. Like many young men of his day he was fired with enthusiasm for republican ideas and joined the republican army of Brutus, in which he served as a tribunus militum. He took part in the battle of Philippi (42 B.C.), in which, as he tells us, he threw away his shield, a reference to the fact that his side was defeated and he fled. He says Mercury rescued him, trembling as he was, and spirited him away in a mist to safety. He then returned to Rome where for a time he was in want which, he says, gave him the courage to turn to poetry. At Rome he became acquainted with Vergil and Asinius Pollio. Through Vergil and Varius he met Maecenas who became his literary patron and lifelong friend. He became reconciled to the rule of Augustus and lauded his work in peace. Despite his connections in high places he did not fawn or flatter the emperor or his patron, and refused the post of private secretary that Augustus offered to him. Maecenas gave him a farm in the Sabine hills (33 B.C.) which became his favorite dwelling place. He retired to it frequently, delighted with the simple life of the country, soothed by the Falernian wine he celebrated in his writings, and free to meditate, write, and entertain. When in Rome he lived modestly and enjoyed being a spectator of the lively Roman scene. He died in his 57th year, only a few months after Maecenas, and was buried on the Esquiline Hill near the tomb of Maecenas. His works (all publication dates are approximate) are Satires, conversation pieces in hexameters (first book 35 B.C., second 30 B.C.); Epodes (30 B.C.), often in iambs, with a refrain; Odes (first three books 23 B.C., fourth 13 B.C.), lyrics in various meters of great originality, beauty, and melody, modelled on the Greek poets Sappho, Alcaeus, Anacreon, and Simonides; Epistles (first book 20 B.C., second 13-8 B.C.), personal letters in hexameters addressed to friends; Carmen Saeculare (17 B.C.), composed at the request of Augustus for the Secular Games in 17 B.C. and sung by a chorus of boys and girls; and Ars Poetica (23-15 B.C.), a treatise on the art of poetry, especially dramatic poetry. The work of Horace does not burn with passion. Rather it is illuminated by urbanity, irony, gentle self-deprecation, and passages of free lyricism in which he extols the virtues of the simple life, the beauties of nature, and the joys of friendship. A gentle shadow sometimes falls because of his consciousness that whether prince or pauper, the end for all men is dust and shade. Probably no other Roman poet has had so great an influence on modern poetry, both in English and in the Romance languages.

Horae (hō'rē). In Greek mythology, three nature-goddesses who preside over the changes of the seasons and the accompanying course of natural growth and decay. According to Homer, they are handmaidens of Zeus, who guard the gates of heaven and control the weather; according to Hesiod, they are daughters of Zeus and Themis, named Eunomia ("Good Order"), Dice ("Justice"), and Eirene ("Peace"), guardians of agriculture and also of social and political order. Their number varied from two, as at Athens (Thallo, goddess of spring flowers, and Carpo, goddess of summer fruits), to four.

The dance of the Horae was a symbolized representation of the course of the seasons. Horatii (hō-rā'shi-i), The Three. In Roman legend, three brothers celebrated in the reign of Tullus Hostilius (672-640 B.C.), for their combat with the three Curiatii of Alba Longa. Tullus, king of Rome, was preparing to war on Alba Longa because of some cattle raids. The ruler of Alba Longa said the two cities were foolish to fight each other and so become weak and an easy prey for their common enemy the Etruscans. Since a war would make one of the cities master of the other, he proposed that the issue be decided by single combat between representatives of the two armies. Tullus agreed. On the Roman side were three brothers—the Horatii; they volunteered to fight the three Curiatii of the Alban side, and the two armies drew up to watch the combat. The Curiatii succeeded in killing two of the Horatii and the Romans groaned, for they feared they would become subject to Alba. The lone Horatii brother who remained was untouched by any wound. The three Curiatii had all suffered wounds. Horatius could not defend himself if he were attacked by all three Curiatii at once. He resorted to guile. He pretended to flee, and as the wounded Curiatii pursued him at unequal distances because of their injuries, he turned and slew them one at a time as they came up. As a result of his victory Alba Longa fell under Roman dominion. Horatius was returned to Rome in triumph. As he entered the city his sister Horatia saw him and noted that the cloak he wore was one she had woven for one of the Curiatii to whom she was betrothed. She immediately began to lament and call on her dead lover's name. Horatius, enraged to see her tears in the hour of his triumph, unsheathed his sword and plunged it into her breast. "Go to your betrothed," he said, "with your ill-timed grief, since you have forgotten your brothers, both dead and living, and have forgotten your country. So perish every Roman woman who mourns a foe!" Because he had taken the law into his own hands, Horatius was brought to trial. His father pleaded with the Roman people not to deprive him of his last remaining child, one who had done so much for Rome. Horatius was acquitted, but that it should not appear that anyone could take the law into his own hands with impunity, he was ordered to endure a ritual punishment. A beam, symbolizing a yoke, was erected across the street and he was compelled to pass under it with his head covered, as a token that he submitted to the yoke of Roman law. The beam remained in place for centuries, restored from time to time by the state, and came to be known as "the Sister's Beam." Horatia was buried in a stone tomb on the spot where she had died by her brother's sword.

Horcus (hōr'kus). See Orcus.

Horn of Plenty. In Greek mythology, a horn of the goat Amalthea, or of a goat belonging to the nymph Amalthea, which nursed the infant Zeus. The horn was said to be always full of whatever food and drink one desired. For the Romans, the Horn of Plenty—Cornu Copiae (Cornucopia, q.v.)—was the horn of Achelous, the river-god who had taken the form of a bull to fight Heracles and lost one of his horns in the struggle. This Horn of Plenty was always full of fruits and flowers.

Horoscope (hor'ō-skōp). The Greek term horoskopos "hour-watcher," Latin horoscopus, may mean 1) a diagram of the Zodiac as it appeared at a particular moment, e.g. at the birth of a child, showing the 12 constellations or Signs ("houses") of the Zodiac and the distribution among them of the seven visible planets or "wanderers" (Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Sun, Moon); or 2) a horizontal line, bisecting such a diagram, which represented the horizon and indicated the position of the sun in relation to the horizon. From the horoscope or "aspect" of the stars at a critical moment, as at birth, astrologers professed to foretell the fortune of the client. (JJ)

Hortensian Law (hōr-ten'shi-an, -shan). In the history of ancient Rome, a law, adopted probably in 286 B.C., which decided that the decrees (plebiscita) of the Comitia Tributa should be binding on all citizens, patricians as well as plebeians.

Hortensius Hortalus (hōr-ten'shi-us, -shus; hōr'ta-lus), Quintus. Roman orator, born 114 B.C.; died 50 B.C. He was a leader of the aristocratic party, a minor historian, collector of art, and a composer of love poems.

Catullus twice addresses him. As a pleader he defended the notorious Verres (70 B.C.), whose conviction by Cicero was a notable defeat for Hortensius. Many stories circulated concerning his luxurious habits. (JJ) Hyacinthia (hī-a-sin'thi-a). A Spartan resurrection festival celebrated at Amyclae in Laconia, in honor of Hyacinthus and of Apollo. It was celebrated for three days in July, and commemorated sorrow for the death of vegetation, joy for the harvest, and trust in the annual renewal of nature. The first day of the festival was devoted to silent mourning for Hyacinthus at his grave in the sanctuary of Apollo. The following days of joy and hope were celebrated with processions of singing youths and maidens to the temple of Apollo, with games, sacrifices, and feasts.

Hyacinthides (hī-a-sin'thi-dēz). In Greek mythology, the daughters of Hyacinthus the Spartan. They were Aegleis, Antheis, Lycataea, and Orthaea, and were sacrificed in Athens on the advice of the oracle to save the city when it was attacked by Minos, king of Crete, to avenge the murder of his son. The city was wracked by plague and earthquakes and it was thought that the sacrifice of the maidens would bring relief from these as well as protection from Minos. However, the sacrifice was unavailing, and the Athenians were compelled to yield to Minos and pay him tribute of their sons and daughters before the plague and earthquakes stopped.

Hyacinthus (hī-a-sin'thus). [Also: Hyacinth.] In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth, the son of Amyclas, king of Amyclae in Laconia. He was loved by Thamyris the poet, by Apollo, and by Zephyr (the West Wind). Thamyris was defeated in a musical contest by Apollo, and blinded, which removed him as a rival for the affections of Hyacinthus. But one day when Apollo was teaching young Hyacinthus to throw the discus, or a quoit, Zephyr seized the discus and blew it back against Hyacinthus with such force that it killed him. From his blood Apollo caused the hyacinth to spring, and upon the petals of the plant was thought to be marked the exclamation AI ("woe!"). Hyacinthus represents the death of young things just as they are approaching the full bloom of their beauty, as fruits and flowers that flourish in the spring but die under the heat of the summer sun. The tomb of Hyacinthus was at Amyclae, under the great image of Apollo. Sacrifices were offered to him as a hero and his festival, the Hyacinthia, was observed at Amyclae during three days in July. Modern scholarship sees in Hyacinthus an agricultural or vegetation deity, and in his annual festival a typical resurrection ritual.

Hyacinthus. A Spartan who moved to Athens with his four daughters. See Hyacinthides.

Hyades (hī'ā-dēz). [Also: Hyads.] In Greek mythology, a group of nymphs, the daughters of Aethra and Atlas, and the sisters of Hyas. They grieved so over the death of their brother that they were translated to the heavens as the seven stars in the head of the constellation Taurus. Others say the Hyades were the nymphs of Nysa who nurtured the infant Dionysus, and that they were translated to the heavens by Zeus as a reward for their care of his son. The rainy season, which begins with their rising, is a mark of their continuing care, for the rain they send nurtures the vine sacred to Dionysus. The Romans, through a mistaken etymology, called the constellation Succulae (Little Pigs).

Hyas (hī'ās). In Greek mythology, a son of Aethra, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and Atlas. He was a mighty hunter who sought a lioness and her cubs and was killed by a Libyan boar. His sisters grieved so for him they were placed among the stars as the Hyades.

Hybla (hī'blā). [Also: Hybla Magna, Hybla Celeatis, Hybla Major.] In ancient geography, a city in Sicily, on the S slope of Mount Aetna, about 11 miles NW of Catana (Catania); believed to have been at or near the modern Paternò.

Hybla Heraea (he-rē'ā). In ancient geography, a town of S Sicily, W of Syracuse. It was an ancient Sicel town. Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, besieged the town, 491 B.C., and was killed while attempting to breach its walls. The modern city of Ragusa lies on the slopes of the hill where ancient Hybla Heraea stood.

Hybla Minor (mī'nor). [Also: Megara Hyblaea.] In ancient geography, a city on the E coast of Sicily about 12 miles N of Syracuse. The celebrated Hyblaeon honey, mentioned frequently by ancient poets, may have been produced in the vicinity. It is often confused with Hybla on Mount Aetna, sometimes called Hybla Major.

Hydaspes (hi-das'pēz). Ancient name of the Jhelum River, a river in the Punjab, West Pakistan, rising in Kashmir and joining the Chenab about 80 miles NE of Multan; in its upper valley is the Vale of Kashmir. On its banks Alexander the Great defeated Porus in 326 B.C.

HERACLES AND THE LERNAEAN HYDRA
Black-figured Greek amphora.

Hydra (hī'drā). In Greek mythology, a monstrous dragon of the Lernaean Spring, in Argolis, represented as having nine heads, each of which, being cut off, was immediately succeeded by two new ones unless the wound was cauterized. The destruction of this monster (by searing each neck as he cut off the head, with firebrands supplied by Iolaus) was one of the 12 labors of Heracles.

Hydra. An ancient southern constellation, representing a sea-serpent. It is of Babylonian origin, like most of the ancient constellations. It is bounded by the ancient constellations Canis Minor, Argo, Centaurus, Virgo, Corvus, Crater, Leo, and Cancer, and by the modern constellations Sextans and Monoceros (which separates it from Canis Major). It contains one star of the second magnitude, and about 400 stars visible to the naked eye.

Hydria (hī'dri-ā). In ancient Greece, a large vase, used especially for carrying water. It has a capacious body with a narrow mouth and usually a broad rim, and three handles: one at the back extending above the rim, and a smaller one on each side.

Hydrus (hī'drus). [Modern name, Otranto.]

Hyettus/Hyllus

In ancient geography, a seaport of Apulia, SE Italy, called by the Romans Hydruntum, situated about 45 miles SE of Brundisium. It was founded by colonists from the Dorian city of Tarentum and retained its Greek language and culture until the 11th century.

Hyettus (hī-et'us). In ancient geography, a village of Boeotia, Greece, near Lake Copais. It was founded, some say, by an Argive named Hyettus who killed his wife's lover and fled to the Boeotian king Orchomenus. The king gave him land and he founded this village. Hyettus is the first man recorded as having exacted the punishment of death from an adulterer. Later, in the time of Dracon, the concept was established that an adulterer caught and killed was himself, by his act, the cause of his own death. In the village of Hyettus was a temple of Heracles, with an image of unwrought stone. The sick went to this temple to be cured.

Hygea (hī-jē'a). [Also: Hygieia.] In Greek mythology the goddess of health. She was the daughter of Asclepius; in later myth, his wife. In later myth also, she became the goddess of mental health.

Hyksos (hik'sōs, -sos). ["Princes of the Desert"; wrongly called (from an incorrect etymology) the "Shepherd Kings."] Name given to the kings of Egypt, of a foreign (probably Semitic) race, whose rule (c1800–c1575 B.C.) fell between the XIIIth and the XVIIIth Dynasties. They introduced into Egypt the horse and chariot.

Hylaeus (hī-lē'us). In Greek mythology, a cloud-born, Arcadian centaur. According to some accounts, he pursued Atalanta during the Calydonian Hunt with the intention of violating her, but she repulsed and slew him. Others say he was slain by Heracles in the battle with the centaurs on Mount Pholoe. And still others say he was killed by Theseus in the battle between centaurs and Lapiths.

Hylas (hī'lās). In Greek legend, a son of Thiodamas, king of the Dryopians, and the nymph Menodice. Heracles slew Thiodamas and carried off his young son, Hylas, who became his squire and beloved companion. He accompanied Heracles as an Argonaut. When the Argonauts landed in Mysia, Hylas went to the fountain of Pegae to fetch water while Heracles searched for a tree from which to make an oar. Dryope, the nymph of the fountain, fell in love with Hylas as he stopped to draw water, and pulled him into the spring to dwell thereafter with her and her sister nymphs. It was because he stayed to search for Hylas that Heracles was left behind by the Argonauts and did not take part in the recovery of the Golden Fleece.

Hyllus (hil'us). In Greek legend, a son of Deianira and Heracles. He took his dying father to Mount Oeta, built a funeral pyre at his request, and promised to marry Iole, daughter of Eurytus of Oechalia. He learned from Heracles that his death, as a result of Nessus' blood having been rubbed on his sacrificial robe by Deianira, fulfilled an old prophecy that no living mortal would destroy him, but that he would die because of a dead enemy. Hyllus could not bear to carry out his father's last request, which was to light the pyre on which Heracles was lying. This was done by Philoctetes. After the apotheosis of Heracles, Hyllus joined with the Athenians in a war against Eurystheus, captured him, and, according to some accounts, cut off his head. He then successfully invaded the Peloponnesus, but a plague broke out and he was warned by the oracle at Delphi to withdraw and to await the third crop before he returned. Hyllus took this to mean three years, and at the expiration of this time he returned. In order to avoid bloodshed he offered to engage in single combat with a representative of Mycenae, on the condition that if he was victorious the kingdom of Mycenae would be his, but if he lost the Heraclidae would withdraw for fifty years. Echemus, king of Tegea, accepted his challenge. In the duel Hyllus was slain and was buried in Megara. The Heraclidae honored his agreement and withdrew from the Peloponnesus. The oracle at Delphi explained that the third crop meant the third generation, not the third year, as Hyllus had interpreted it.

Hyllus. In Greek legend, a son of Heracles and the nymph Melite. Heracles had gone to the home of Nausithous, king of the Phaeacians, to purify himself after the murder of his children. There he violated Melite, who bore him Hyllus. Hyllus migrated from Phaeacia to the Cronian Sea, and was later slain.

Hymen (hī'men) or Hymenaeus (hī-me-nē'us). Originally, the marriage song among the Greeks. The names were gradually personified, and Hymen, the marriage song personified, was invoked as the god of marriage. According to legend he was the son of Apollo and one of the Muses, or of Dionysus and Aphrodite, or, in some accounts, a mortal youth who was invoked in hymeneal songs. He is represented as a beautiful youth, more serious than Eros, carrying a bridal torch.

Hymettus (hī-met'us). A mountain ridge in Attica, Greece, lying SE of Athens. For a few minutes just before dusk it sometimes glows with a soft violet color, and from this Athens has the epithet "violet-crowned." In ancient times the mountain was celebrated for its honey, and also for its bluish-gray marble. Elevation, about 3368 feet.

Hyperbolus (hī-pēr'bō-lus). Athenian politician and demagogue; killed at Samos, c411 B.C. He was a lamp-maker who rose in politics during the Peloponnesian War. His pretensions made him the butt of the comic poets and he endured all manner of abuse, but cared not at all what men said of him and continued to pursue his ambitions. Thucydides called him "a rascal and a disgrace to the city." He was allied with Alcibiades, leader of the radical party, against Nicias, leader of the aristocratic party. In 417 B.C. he engineered a vote of ostracism in an attempt to get rid of Nicias. He thought the radicals would vote against Nicias and that he would be ostracized; if not, the supporters of Nicias would surely vote against the radical Alcibiades. In either case one of them, so he reasoned, would be removed and he could compete on more equal terms against the one who remained. But Alcibiades deserted him and joined forces with Nicias. In the resulting vote Hyperbolus was himself ostracized and sent into exile. Candidates for ostracism had been the leaders of the state, prominent men whose very prominence and influence were considered to be a possible danger to the democracy. Ostracism was thus a back-handed honor. When the vote fell on Hyperbolus it was felt that the process of ostracism had been degraded. He was the last Athenian ever to be ostracized; afterward, the practice fell into disuse. He went to Samos and was murdered there (c411 B.C.) by the oligarchic party that supported the government of the Four Hundred at Athens.

Hyperboreans (hī-pēr-bō'rē-anz). In early Greek legend, a people who were believed to live beyond the north wind, and were not exposed to its blasts, but enjoyed a land of perpetual sunshine and abundant fruits. They were free from disease, violence, and war. Their natural life span was said to be 1000 years, and was spent in the worship of Apollo, who was said to pass the winter among them. No one ever actually described their land, and its existence was doubted by some in ancient times, but Abaris, who in legend went around the world on an arrow, claimed to have visited it. According to Herodotus, those who were supposedly neighbors of the Hyperboreans—for example, the Scythians—never mentioned them, but they were named by Hesiod. Again according to Herodotus, those who had the most to say about the Hyperboreans were the people of Delos. The Delians claimed that two Hyperborean maidens, Hyperoche and Laodice, brought offerings of the first fruits wrapped in wheaten straw to Delos. They were accompanied by five men. When the Hyperboreans found that their envoys to Delos did not return they no longer sent their envoys direct to Delos. They sent their offerings to the Scythians, who passed them on to their neighbors, and eventually the offerings, given in honor of Apollo, reached Delos. Some say Apollo came from their land. It was also claimed that the Hyperboreans sent the birth-goddess Ilithyia to assist Leto on Delos when she was about to bear Apollo. Some said that the wild olive was brought from their land into Greece by Heracles. And some said that it was the Hyperboreans who first established the oracle of Apollo at Delphi where, later, they sent a temple made of bees' wax and feathers. The Hyperboreans Pagasus and Agyieus were said to have established the oracle. When the Gauls attacked Delphi (279 B.C.), Pagasus and Agyieus were said to have appeared in superhuman form and to have driven them away. In later times the Greeks gave the name Hyperboreans to inhabitants of northern countries generally.

Hypercheiria (hī-pēr-kī'ri-ā). Epithet of Hera. The Spartans, in obedience to an oracle, raised a sanctuary of Hera Hypercheiria (Protectress) in their land, when the goddess saved them from the Eurotas River which was flooding its banks. At Sparta, mothers sacrificed to a wooden image of Hera Aphrodite when their daughters were about to be married.

Hyperenor (hī-pe-rē'nôr). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Panthous and Phrontis. He was the brother of Polydamas and Euphorbus, and was slain by Menelaus when the Greeks drove the Trojans back from the Greek ships, as Zeus slept.

Hyperenor. One of the Sparti who sprang from the earth when Cadmus sowed the dragon's teeth. See Sparti.

Hyperesia (hī-pe-rē'shā). Town of Achaea, on the coast. Men of Hyperesia went to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon. The name of the town was later changed to Aegira (q.v.).

Hyperides (hī-pe-rī'dēz or hī-per'i-dēz). One of the Ten Attic Orators, born c390 B.C.; died 322 B.C. He studied with Plato and Isocrates and achieved an important position in Athenian forensic circles. His gay private life and natural wit made him a favorite topic of comedy. In politics he was allied with Demosthenes against the Macedonian Party which favored peace with Philip of Macedon. After the destruction of Thebes (335 B.C.) by Alexander, he and Demosthenes, only with the greatest difficulty, escaped being handed over to the Macedonians. In 324 B.C. he was one of the prosecutors of Demosthenes, on charges of bribery. However, in seeming to prosecute Demosthenes, Hyperides actually defended him, and his action in this case led to no breach in their friendly relations. After the death of Alexander, Hyperides and Demosthenes joined forces to rouse the Peloponnesus to war. The Lamian War broke out and was pursued to disaster for Greece. The Macedonian general demanded the surrender of Hyperides and Demosthenes. His death sentence was signed but he fled to a temple in Aegina for refuge. He was seized there, and by order of the Macedonian commander Antipater was put to death in 322 B.C. Some consider the work of Hyperides to rank next to that of Demosthenes in forcefulness, and superior to it in charm. Large fragments of five speeches, found in Egyptian papyri in the 19th century, show that his work was marked by forthrightness, humor, and grace.

Hyperion (hī-pir'i-on). In Greek mythology, a Titan, one of the sons of Gaea and Uranus. By the Titaness Thia he was the father of Eos (Dawn), Helius (Sun), and Selene (Moon). In the Odyssey he is identified with Helius, and in late mythology with Apollo.

Hypermnestra (hī-pērm-nes'trā). In Greek mythology, one of the 50 daughters of Danaus. When she and her sisters were about to be married to the 50 sons of Aegyptus, Danaus gave each of them a sharp pin or dagger and ordered them to kill their husbands on the wedding night. Hypermnestra, divinely inspired, looked on her sleeping husband Lynceus and could not bear to kill him. She told him of her father's plot and begged him to flee. To inform her of his safety she asked him to light a beacon when he reached Lyncea, 60 furlongs away, and she promised to answer his signal. Lynceus escaped and made known his safety to her. Danaus was enraged by her disobedience. He imprisoned her and would have killed her but the Argives acquitted her and she dedicated an image to Aphrodite in gratitude. Later Danaus reluctantly reunited her with Lynceus. But some say Lynceus returned and won her back by force and killed Danaus. Hypermnestra bore Abas, the ancestor of Perseus, to Lynceus.

Hypnos (hip'nos). In Greek mythology, the god of sleep; son of Erebus and Nyx (Night), and brother and companion of Thanatos (Death). He is usually represented as a winged figure accompanying Thanatos. He had three sons named Morpheus, Icelus, and Phantasus, regarded as dream-bringers. Hypnos is identified with the Roman Somnus.

Hypseus (hip'sūs). In Greek mythology, a son of the nymph Creusa and the river-god Peneus. He was king of the Lapithae and the father, by the naiad Chlidanope, of Cyrene.

Hypsipyle (hip-sip'i-lē). In Greek legend, a fat, fâte, fâr, fâre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pîne; not, nôte, möve, nôr,

daughter of Thoas, king of Lemnos. When the women of Lemnos rose up and killed all the men because they had abandoned their true wives for captive women, Hypsipyle secretly spared her father and set him afloat on the sea in a chest. She then became queen. By the time the Argonauts landed in Lemnos on their way to find the Golden Fleece, Polyxo, aged nurse of Hypsipyle, was easily able to change the attitude of the Lemnian women toward men. They invited the Argonauts to stay and share their island. Hypsipyle entertained Jason and by him became the mother of twin sons. According to some accounts, when the Lemnian women later learned that Hypsipyle had spared her father they rose against her, killed her sons and sold her into slavery to Lycurgus, king of Nemea, under whom she became the nurse of Opheltes, his son. According to other accounts, her sons were not killed, but rescued her and returned her to Lemnos, after she had carelessly allowed Opheltes to be slain by the bite of a serpent. Her sons were Euneus and Thoas, and according to Homer, Euneus supplied the Greeks at Troy with wine from Lemnos during the Trojan War.

Hypsipyle was the subject of a play by Euripides, lost from the manuscript tradition but fortunately now represented by extended passages on papyrus recovered from the village dumps of Greco-Roman Egypt.

Hypsistus (hip-sis'tus). Epithet of Zeus. Cecrops, king of Athens, was the first to worship Zeus Hypsistus (Most High), and he established the rule that no living creature was to be sacrificed to Zeus Hypsistus. Instead, cakes were offered on his altars. Of the many images of Zeus Hypsistus, as at Corinth, on the Acropolis at Athens, at Olympia, the oldest was the one in Sparta. The Spartan image was of bronze, so made in separate pieces that the limbs were held to the torso by nails. This image was said to have been made by Clearchus of Rhegium.

Hyrkania (hēr-kā'ni-a). In ancient geography, a region in W Asia, around the S end of the Hyrcanum Mare (Caspian Sea); now part of N Iran.

Hyrrie (hī'ri-ē). In Greek mythology, the mother by Apollo of that Cycnus who flung himself over a cliff in anger at his friend Phylus. She grieved so over her son's death that, according to some accounts, she was transformed into a pool. Others say she was turned into a swan along with her son.

Hyrmina (hēr-mī'na) or Hyrmine (-nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Epeus and granddaughter of Endymion. She married Phorbas the Lapith and bore him Actor, who founded the city in Elis, on the coast, which he named Hyrmine after her. Her grandsons, the Actoridae, or Moliones as they were sometimes called, shared in the government of Elis during the reign of Augeas.

Hyrnetho (hēr-nē'thō). In Greek legend, a daughter of Temenus, a son of Aristomachus who won Argos as his share of the Peloponnesus. He favored his daughter and her husband over his sons, and proposed to leave his kingdom to Hyrnetho and her husband Deiphontes. When they learned of this, his sons—Agelaus, Eurypylus, and Callias—hired assassins to murder their father. Hyrnetho accompanied her husband when he marched to Epidaurus and took over the land without a struggle. Her brothers tried to persuade her to abandon Deiphontes, and when she refused they carried her off in their chariot and then, pursued by Deiphontes, they killed her. Deiphontes and his sons buried her in a place that came to be known as the Hyrnethium, and established a hero-shrine in her honor. It was the custom to place in her shrine branches and twigs that fell from olive trees. See also, Deiphontes.

Hyrtilus (hir'shi-us). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a leader of the Mysians, allies of Troy in the Trojan War. He was wounded by Telamonian Ajax at the battle for the Greek ships, when the Trojans had driven their forces onto the very ships. But Poseidon in disguise helped the Greeks, and it was with his aid that Hyrtius was driven back.

Hysiae (hī'si-ē). In ancient geography, a city in Argolis, Greece, situated in the mountains west of Lerna. Here Argos defeated the Spartans in battle (traditional date, 669 B.C.).

Hysiae. Village of Boeotia, Greece, situated on the lower slopes of Mount Cithaeron, on the border between Attica and Boeotia. There was a temple of Apollo here, and a sacred well, from which oracles could be obtained by drinking the waters at night. The village, once part of Boeotia, fell under

Hystaspes/Iamblichus

Athenian control following a war between Athens and Boeotia (509 B.C.), in which the Boeotians were defeated. In the Persian War, the Persians and Greeks faced each other across the Asopus River near here (479 B.C.). The Greeks, instructed by an oracle to fight on the plain of Eleusinian Demeter, found at Hysiae, thanks to the intervention of Zeus, a very ancient sanctuary of Eleusinian Demeter, and in the battle of Plataea nearby they thoroughly defeated the Persians. The Persian general Mardonius was slain, and some say his tomb was at Hysiae.

Hystaspes (his-tas'pēz). Persian general; fl. c517 B.C. He was an Achaemenid, related to and a contemporary of Cyrus the Great. Ordinarily, it would have been he who succeeded to the vacant throne when Cambyses III died without issue, but instead Hystaspes saw his son Darius I become king and served under him. He was satrap of Parthia and Hyrcania, and is thought by some to have been the patron of Zoroaster. Among his other sons were Artabanus, Artaphernes, and Artanes.

Iacchus (i'a-kus). In Greek mythology, a divinity peculiar to Athens, and important for his intimate connection with the Eleusinian mysteries. His mother is variously given as Demeter, Persephone, or Semele; his father as Zeus or Dionysus. He is undoubtedly a personification of the ritual cry raised by the worshipers of Dionysus, and the resemblance of his name to Bacchus (Dionysus) easily led to his identification with the latter. His image, crowned with myrtle and bearing a torch, was carried in the famous procession from the Eleusinium at Athens to the sekos (sanctuary) at Eleusis, and he presided over the mysterious rites there. He was sometimes called the Phrygian Bacchus, who, as a son of Demeter, was distinct from the older Dionysus.

Iache (i'a-kē). In Greek mythology, a nymph, one of the companions of Persephone.

Ialmenus (i-al'mē-nus). In Greek legend, a son of Ares and Astyoche. He and his brother, Ascalaphus, accompanied Jason in the Argo on the expedition for the Golden Fleece. Like his brother, he was a suitor for the hand of Helen, daughter of Zeus and Leda. And like the other suitors, he took an oath that he would come to the aid of the man who became Helen's husband in the event that any ill befell him as a result of his marriage. When Helen was carried off to Troy by Paris, Ialmenus became a leader of the Boeotians and served as a chief of the Greek sentries in the Trojan War that followed.

Ialysus (i-al'i-sus). Ancient city in N Rhodes, on the NW coast of the island about six miles SW of the modern city of Rhodes. According to Homer, it was founded by Tlepolemus, a son of Heracles. Other accounts say it was built by the Telchines and named for a Danaid, or the city took its name from the hero Ialysus, grandson of Helius. It was a Dorian city, and a member of the Hexapolis (League of Six Cities); it flourished c1000 B.C. About the 4th century B.C. it was surpassed by the city of Rhodes, and declined.

Iambe (i'am-bē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Celeus and Metanira, of Eleusis. When Demeter in her search for Persephone stopped at the house of Celeus, Iambe tried to cheer her up with somewhat bawdy stories. For this reason ribald songs came to be sung at a certain point in the Eleusinian mysteries.

Iamblichus (i-am'bli-kus). Syrian Neoplatonic philosopher, born at Chalcis c250 A.D. in Coele-Syria (modern El Bika); he died c325 A.D. His main work was an encyclopedia of Pythagorean doctrine in nine books, of which four or five remain. In his mathematical books, Pythagorean mysticism is carried to the extreme. Iamblichus believed in divination and magic and was reputed to have worked miracles. He mentions the first pair of amicable numbers (220 and 284), but the interest of the Pythagoreans in the properties of numbers makes it virtually certain that they were not his own discovery but were already known by the time he wrote. The philosophy of Iamblichus is a development of a reasoned system of paganism as opposed to Christianity.

Iamus (i'a-mus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Evadne and Apollo. His mother abandoned him through shame, and he was nursed by two serpents who fed him honey. From them and from his father Apollo he received the gift of prophecy and founded a family of seers called, after him, Iamidae.

Ianthe (i-an'thē). According to legend, a beautiful maiden of Phaestus, in Crete. She was the daughter of Telestes. She loved and was loved by Iphis, the daughter of Telethusa. Telethusa had brought Iphis up as a boy, because her husband intended to kill her child if it was a girl. Thus Ianthe supposed that she was in love with a young man. The two young people were betrothed, but Telethusa and Iphis, fearing the revelations marriage would bring, delayed the ceremony. At last, when it could be delayed no longer, Telethusa entered the temple and prayed to Io for aid. Her prayer was answered. As she left the temple Iphis was transformed into a man. The next day Ianthe and Iphis were married.

Iapetus (i-ap'e-tus). In Greek mythology, a Titan; son of Uranus (the sky) and Gaea (the earth); father by the nymph Clymene of Prometheus (and therefore ancestor of the human race), Epimetheus, Atlas, and Menoe-tius. He was thrown by Zeus into Tartarus after the Titans were overthrown.

Iapygia (i-a-pij'i-a). In ancient geography, a name used vaguely by the Greeks for a region approximating what is now the SE part of Italy.

Iapygians (i-a-pij'i-anz). Under the general name of Iapygians there were commonly included five distinct tribes of Italy: the Messapians, the Peucetians, the Calabrians, the Salentinians, and the Daunians. The first-named are spoken of by Strabo as the inhabitants of the Iapygian peninsula, eastward of Tarentum and Brundisium.

Iapyx (i-ā'piks). A son of Daedalus. He was the mythical ancestor of the Iapyges, a people of southeastern Italy.

Iarbas (i-ār'bas). In Roman legend (Aeneid), a son of Jupiter Ammon and a ravished African nymph. He was king of the Gaetulians in Numidia and sold Dido the land on which she built Carthage. He wished to make Dido his queen but she rejected his suit. When he learned from Fama (Rumor) that Dido had given her affections to Aeneas he prayed to Jupiter. He asked if it was in vain that he had brought the worship of Jupiter to Africa and built a hundred shrines in his honor, since Jupiter permitted Dido to pledge her love to Aeneas. Jupiter answered his prayer by sending Mercury (Hermes) to command Aeneas to leave Carthage and pursue his destiny in Italy.

Iardanus (i-ār'da-nus) or Iardanes (i-ār'da-nēz). In Greek legend, a king in Lydia, the father of Omphale, who succeeded him as ruler.

Iardanus. [Also: Jardan, Jardanus; modern name, Iardhanos.] In ancient geography, a river of Elis, Greece, that had the same name as the Phoenician river, the Jordan. Homer mentions it in the Iliad as the place where Nestor and the Pylians fought against the Arcadians in his youth and where he slew Ereuthalion.

Iasion (i-ā'zi-on). In Greek mythology, a Titan, or according to other accounts, a son of Zeus and the Pleiad Electra; the twin of Dardanus and a founder of the Trojan race. Demeter fell in love with him at the marriage of Cadmus and Harmonia and he lay with her in a "thrice-plowed field" and begot Plutus (the wealth-giver, especially the giver of agricultural bounty). For this association with the goddess, Zeus struck Iasion dead with a thunderbolt. This myth is probably the rationalization of some very early Greek fertility rite associated with Demeter in her aspect as a grain-goddess.

Iaso (i-ā'sō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Asclepius, and the sister of Aigle, Hygea, and Panacea. She was a goddess of healing.

Iason (ē-ā'son). See Jason.

Iasus (i'a-sus). According to some accounts, the father of Atalanta. He was so disappointed not to have a son that he exposed her on a mountain in Calydon to die. Through the intervention of Artemis she was saved and when, as a young woman, she won honors in the Calydonian Boar Hunt, Iasus was glad to own her as his daughter.

Iberia. In ancient geography, the region bounded by the Caucasus Mountains on the N, (ancient) Albania on the E, Armenia on the S, and Colchis on the W; now largely the E portion of Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Iberians (i-bir'i-anz). Prehistoric inhabitants of the Iberian Peninsula, thought to have entered the region perhaps from Africa, as far back as the New Stone Age. Various theories have been advanced in regard to them: 1) that they preceded the Celts in Spain and merged with them to the extent of interabsorption; 2) that they were identical with the Basques (a supposition now discredited). They were a short, dark people to whom are attributed various characteristic neolithic cairns and dolmens which survive in sections of North Africa, Spain, Portugal, and Great Britain. They were eventually conquered and absorbed by the Romans.

Ibycus (ib'i-kus, i'bi-). Greek lyric poet who was born at Rhegium, Italy, and flourished in the second half of the 6th century B.C. He spent much time wandering around Greece before he settled at the court of Polycrates of Samos and later at that of Periander. Fragments of his poems indicate that they dealt with mythological themes (the Funeral Games of Pelias, the Sack of Troy, and the Calydonian Boar Hunt) written in the style of Stesichorus, and with personal love-songs. According to tradition, he was murdered by robbers near Corinth, and called on a flock of passing cranes to bear witness. Shortly afterward, during the performance of a play in a Corinth theater, one of the murderers, at sight of some cranes flying overhead, involuntarily exclaimed, "the avengers of Ibycus." Suspicion was aroused and the murderers identified. Hence the "cranes of Ibycus" became a proverb for the belief that "murder will out."

Icaria (i-kār'i-a). [Also: Ikaria, Nicaria, Nikaria, Kariot.] Island in the Aegean Sea, situated about 13 miles W of Samos. According to legend, it was to this island that Daedalus brought the body of his son Icarus after the latter, flying so close to the sun as to melt the wax holding his wings together, fell into the sea and was drowned. Daedalus buried his son here and named the island after him. Area, about 99 square miles; length, about 25 miles.

Icaria. Site in the Rapedosa valley, Attica, Greece, N of Mount Pentelicus, excavated and identified (1888) by an expedition from the American School at Athens. Here, according to the legend, wine-making and the Dionysiac cult were introduced into Attica by Dionysus himself, and here was born Thespis, who, by the changes he introduced into the old dithyrambic songs, became the originator of tragic drama, with Icaria as the theater.

Icarian Sea (i-kār'i-an). [Latin, Mare Icarium.] In ancient geography, part of the Aegean Sea surrounding Samos and the neighboring small island of Icaria, along the coast of Asia Minor. In Greek legend it is the scene of the drowning of Icarus, son of Daedalus, and was named for him.

Icarius (i-kār'i-us). In Greek mythology, an Athenian who entertained Dionysus, not knowing he was a god. As a reward for his hospitality, Dionysus taught Icarius the cultivation of the vine and the art of wine-making. Icarius offered some wine to a band of peasants but as they did not mix it with water they got drunk from it. Thinking themselves poisoned, they killed Icarius and buried his body under a pine tree. See Erigone.

Icarius. In Greek legend, the son of Gorgophone, daughter of Perseus, and her second husband Oebalus. He was the brother of Tyndareus of Sparta and the father of Odysseus' wife Penelope.

Icarus (ik'a-rus, i'ka-). In Greek legend, the son of Daedalus and a Cretan slave, Naucrate. He was imprisoned with his father in the labyrinth that Daedalus had built for King Minos. Freed by Pasiphaë, Daedalus and Icarus escaped from Crete with the aid of wings that Daedalus made by threading feathers together and fastening them with wax. Before they flew off, Daedalus warned his son not to fly too low lest the sea wet his wings and make them heavy, and not to fly too high lest the sun scorch them. Above all he warned Icarus to follow his father

closely and not to be diverted by the creatures he would see in the sky. They passed the islands of Delos, Paros, and Samos safely. Icarus then became over-confident as he soared through the air and forgot his father's warnings. In his pleasure at wheeling in flight he flew so near the sun that the wax bindings of his wings melted and he fell into the sea and was drowned. Daedalus rescued his corpse and buried it on an island now known as Icaria in the Icarian Sea. Some say that it was Heracles who buried his body on the island where his body was cast up.

Icelus (is'e-lus). The dream-god who sent dreams of birds and beasts. He was the child of Nyx (Night) and the brother of Hypnos (Sleep) and Thanatos (Death). Men called him Phobeter, "the Terrifier," but the gods named him Icelus.

Ichnousa or Ichnusa (ik-nō'sa). Greek name for the island of Sardinia. The name means "footprint," and was given to the island because of its shape. It was also called Sandaliotis, from its resemblance to a sandal.

Ichor (i'kōr, i'kēr). An ethereal fluid believed to flow instead of blood in the veins of the gods.

Ichthyocentaur (ik'thi-ō-sen'tōr). In Greek mythology, a fabulous creature of the sea with the body of a man, the legs of a horse, and the tail of a fish. The Ichthyocentaurs were attendants of Triton and other sea-gods.

Icos (i'kos). An island in the Aegean Sea, near the coast of Thessaly and Euboea. Peleus, father of Achilles, on his way to Molossia to join his grandson Neoptolemus, was cast ashore there by storms, and died and was buried there.

Ictinus (ik-ti'nus). Greek architect; fl. in the middle of the 5th century B.C. With Calliocrates, he was the chief designer of the Parthenon, begun 448 B.C., dedicated 438 B.C. He also designed the temple of Demeter and Persephone at Eleusis, and the temple of Apollo Epicurius at Bassae near Phigalia (the sculptured Ionic frieze of this temple is among the treasures of the British Museum). Ictinus and Phidias were identified with Pericles in the execution of his great scheme of public works.

Ida (i'da). In Greek mythology, one of the nymphs who took care of the infant Zeus when his mother hid him in a cave on the island of Crete to save him from being devoured by his father Cronus. Also, a nymph of Mount Ida who, according to some accounts, was the mother, by Zeus, of the Dactyls, the discoverers of iron and the art of iron-working, in Crete.

Ida, Mount. [Modern name, Psiloriti; Latin, Ida Mons.] Mountain in C Crete, the highest peak of the island. According to Greek mythology, the infant Zues was raised on Mount Ida by Amalthea. Elevation, about 8195 feet.

Ida, Mount. A mountain in the range of the same name in Phrygia and Mysia, Asia Minor. At the base of it was the Troad, whose capital was Troy. The mountain, described in the Iliad as "many-fountained," was a seat of Zeus and had a grove sacred to him and an altar to him. It was from here that Zeus directed the Trojan War on many occasions and watched the progress and weighed the fates of his favorites. Mount Ida was also known as the place from which Zeus carried off Ganymede, as the site of the Judgment of Paris, and as a seat of worship of Cybele. The highest peak of the mountain was also known as Gargarus or Gargaron (5749 feet).

Idaea (i-dē'a). In Greek legend, the second wife of Phineus. She falsely accused of wicked acts his two sons by Cleopatra, his first wife. Phineus had them imprisoned and flogged daily. When the accusations were proven false by Calais and Zetes, brothers of Cleopatra, Phineus restored his sons and sent Idaea back to her father in Scythia.

Idaea. In Greek mythology, a nymph of Mount Ida in the Troad. She married Scamander when he came to Phrygia from Crete and bore him a son, Teucer.

Idaeian Mother, The (i-dē'an). Another name for Cybele, deriving from her sanctuary on Mount Ida. Other names are Mater Idaea, and the Great Mother of the gods.

Idalium (i-dā'li-um). [Also: Idalia; modern village name, Dali.] In ancient geography, a town and promontory on the coast of Cyprus, with a temple to Aphrodite, who was sometimes called Idalia.

Idas (i'das). In Greek legend, the son of Arene by Poseidon, but brought up as the son of Aphareus, Arene's husband. He was a man of great valor, a skilled bowman, a strong man with the spear, and the devoted brother of Lynceus. The brothers took part in the Calydonian Hunt, and accompanied Jason on the Argo in the quest for the Golden Fleece. As an Argonaut, Idas boasted that his own spear was of more help to him than was Zeus, and was chided for blasphemy by Idmon the seer. Orpheus stilled the ensuing quarrel between them by playing his lute. Later Idas slew the boar which had attacked and killed Idmon, and still later, when the Argonauts arrived in Colchis, he objected violently when Jason decided to seek the assistance of Medea. Idas considered it an insult to his manly valor and skill as a warrior to accept help from a woman.

Idas and Lynceus were betrothed to their cousins, the Leucippides, but Castor and Polydeuces carried the Leucippides off and had sons by them, thus earning the enmity of Idas and Lynceus. Idas fell in love with Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus. To win her he had to defeat her father in a chariot race, and did so with the help of a winged chariot given to him by Poseidon. Apollo also loved Marpessa. When he learned that Idas had won her he engaged in a duel with him—Idas was one of very few who dared challenge the gods—but Zeus intervened and said Marpessa could choose between Apollo and Idas. She chose Idas, because she feared the immortal would too soon tire of her. After the death of Aphareus Idas and Lynceus resolved their quarrel with Castor and Polydeuces and made a raid with them for some cattle in Arcadia. In the division of the spoils Idas and Lynceus won the cattle by a trick and drove them off. Later Castor and Polydeuces stole the cattle from them, and hid in a hollow tree to waylay Idas and Lynceus. Lynceus, whose sight was so keen he could see through a tree trunk, spotted them. He and Idas rushed up and in the fight that broke out Lynceus and Castor were killed, and Zeus, to protect his son Polydeuces, hurled a thunderbolt that killed Idas.

Idmon (id'mon). In Greek legend, an Argonaut, the son of Apollo and Cyrene, but reared as the son of Abas of Argos. He was a seer (his name means "the knowing one") who learned the augury of birds from Apollo. At the start of the expedition in the Argo he predicted that though there would be grievous trials, both coming and going, the Argonauts would bring back the Golden Fleece. He also predicted that he would not return with them. This prophecy was fulfilled in the land of the Mariandyni, where he was attacked and killed by a wild boar.

Idomeneus (i-dom'e-nūs, i'dō-mē-nē'us). In Greek legend, the son of Deucalion. He was king of Crete, and was renowned for his courage, and for his good looks. As a former suitor of Helen he commanded a fleet and sailed to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy to recapture Helen from Paris. Although he was no longer young, he fought with the courage of a wild boar and accounted for many Trojans with his spear. With others, he volunteered to meet Hector in single combat but was eliminated in the drawing of lots. He and the two Ajaxes were the chief defenders of the Greek fortifications against Hector's attack. On his way home after the war his ship was beset by storms. He prayed to Poseidon to abate them, promising to sacrifice the first thing he met upon landing. This, to his sorrow, was his son. True to his vow, he prepared the sacrifice, but was interrupted by a pestilence which swept Crete. On this occurrence Leucus, who had first become the paramour of Idomeneus' wife Meda and then murdered her and seized the throne, banished Idomeneus from Crete. He went to Bruttii, where he ended his days.

Idothea (i-dō'thē-ā). In the Odyssey, a nymph, the daughter of the sea-god Proteus. She told Menelaus, becalmed on the island of Pharos on his way home from the Trojan War, how to catch Proteus when he went to sleep with the seals and how to force him to tell what god was angry and kept Menelaus so long from home.

Idyia (i-dī'ya). In Greek legend, a daughter of Tethys and Oceanus. She was the wife of King Aeëtes of Colchis and, according to some accounts, the mother of his son Apsyrtus.

Iliad (il'i-ād). Greek epic poem, composed, according to tradition, by Homer sometime during or before the 8th century B.C. With its companion poem, the Odyssey, it is one of the greatest epics of world literature and one of the earliest examples of literary invention. It describes, in 15,693 dactylic hexam-

eters, events that took place early in the tenth year of the Trojan War. In the course of the long poem many references are made to mythological and legendary events which took place prior to the outbreak of the war. Remarkable for the surpassing majesty and beauty of its language, it also demonstrates intimate knowledge of human nature, explicitly illuminates human character, and powerfully extols the might and virtues of warriors. Homer attributes somewhat mortal motives to the immortals—the gods and goddesses, moved by jealousy, pride, love—who actively participated in the affairs of the heroes. They caused the war, interfered in its progress, and struggling among themselves decided its outcome.

Book I: In the tenth year of the Trojan War, Apollo sends a plague against the Achaeans (they were never spoken of as Greeks by Homer; he called them Achaeans, Argives, and Danaans interchangeably). Calchas, a seer, explains that Apollo is punishing them because Agamemnon, "king of men," refuses to restore the captive Chryseis to her father Chryses, Apollo's priest, who had approached Agamemnon with an offer of ransom. Aga-memnon, after much debate, agrees to return her but insists on taking Briseis, a captive who had been awarded to Achilles as his "meed of honor," in her place. This is the cause of the quarrel between Achilles and Agamemnon and the reason for the famous "wrath of Achilles" which is the theme of the Iliad. Achilles withdraws from the fighting, foretelling the day when Agamemnon will desperately need him to save the Achaeans from the fury of "man-slaying" Hector. Achilles appeals to his mother, "silver-footed" Thetis, to intercede with Zeus. When she does so Zeus promises to give victory to the Trojans until the Achaeans acknowledge the honor due to Achilles and Agamemnon atones for his insult. With this promise, Zeus sets himself against Hera and Athena who favor the Achaeans.

Book II: Zeus causes the Achaeans to resume the warfare by sending a deceptive dream to Agamemnon, telling him to assemble his forces for the capture of Troy. Iris, the messenger of the gods, warns the Trojans that the Achaeans are massing and advises them to do the same. There follows a catalogue of the captains of the Greeks, Trojans, and their respective allies.

Book III: Chided by Hector for cowardice and for causing the war by stealing Menelaus' wife Helen, Paris agrees to a single combat with Menelaus to decide who shall have Helen and to avoid the carnage of further warfare. The Greeks and Trojans are delighted by the prospect of settling the war in this manner and oaths of friendship are exchanged by the two armies. In the duel, Menelaus is about to conquer when Aphrodite rescues Paris and spirits him away to Helen. She, the innocent cause of the long war, yearns for her homeland and Menelaus. When Paris is restored to her, she bitterly reproaches both him and the goddess.

Book IV: Following the rescue of Paris, Zeus in Olympus deliberately taunts Hera and Athena with being less careful of their favorites, the Achaeans, than Aphrodite is of Paris. Disguised as a Trojan, Athena then appears to Pandarus, a famed Trojan archer, and dares him to shoot at Menelaus and win fame for himself. Hera deflects the arrow and Menelaus is only slightly wounded. Agamemnon immediately calls the Greeks to arms for this violation of the oath of friendship. At the same time the Trojans rally and battle is joined. Many heroes on both sides are slain as Athena aids the Greeks and Apollo upholds the Trojans.

Book V: As the battle rages, the gods take an ever more active part. Athena endows Diomedes with unconquerable courage and skill as he slashes through the Trojans, even spurring him to wound Aphrodite as she bears her son Aeneas, whom Diomedes had felled, from the field. Ares then goes to the aid of the Trojans at Aphrodite's behest and helps them stand off the Achaeans until he in his turn is wounded by Diomedes. Content that the furious struggle continues, Hera and Athena withdraw to Olympus.

Book VI: The tide of battle swings back and forth. Helenus, Hector's brother, tells him to return to the city and instruct their mother and other Trojan matrons to offer sacrifices to Athena. He does so, and visits his wife Andromache and his baby son. Andromache pleads with him not to make her a widow. Sadly and gently he tells her he must return to the battle, for although he knows Troy is destined to be destroyed it is his fate ever to be in the forefront of the struggle. Meanwhile, Diomedes and Glaucus, squaring off to fight each other, discover that their fathers had been friends and swear oaths of friendship instead. They exchange armor, and Glaucus, beguiled by Zeus, gives up his gold armor for Diomedes' bronze armor—the classic example of getting the worst of a bargain. It is at this encounter that Glaucus expresses the ruling ambition of the heroes on both sides: "Ever to be of the best."

Book VII: Hector, returning to the battle with Paris, wreaks havoc among the Achaeans. Watchful Athena hurries down from Olympus to sustain her favorites, but she is intercepted by Apollo, who is championing Hector. The two gods decide to withdraw from the battle for one day and to inspire Hector to challenge the Greeks to a single combat, not for any prize but for the love of combat itself. Ajax is chosen by lot to accept the challenge and they fight to a standstill until nightfall. Antenor, "prudent in counsel," advises the Trojans to restore Helen, but Paris refuses. A truce is declared for burial of the dead, and the Greeks improve their opportunity by building a wall and digging a moat to protect their ships.

Book VIII: Zeus now orders the gods and goddesses to refrain from helping the Greeks, while he goes to Mount Ida and from there tips the scales in favor of the Trojans. Under his protection Hector ravages the Achaeans. Hera and Athena think to defy Zeus and go to their aid, but Zeus, divining their intention, sends Iris to warn them not to interfere. He prophesies that Hector will fight unconquered until Achilles emerges from his tent and joins the battle to avenge the death of his friend Patroclus. Twice Hector drives the Greeks back, but the coming of darkness prevents him from surmounting the ramparts and putting the torch to their ships.

Book IX: Hector's onslaughts arouse fear and confusion among the Greeks. Agamemnon, admitting that he was wrong in angering Achilles, offers to make amends. Nestor, "wise counselor," advises that a delegation be sent to Achilles by which Agamemnon will offer to restore Briseis and give him many other great gifts if Achilles will come to their aid. Achilles' pride cannot be bought in this manner, however. Recalling that Thetis had foretold that if he fought at Troy he would gain undying fame but have a short life, he refuses the offer and threatens to sail for home the next day.

Book X: In despair, for his own rashness and for the life of his men, Agamemnon seeks further counsel. At a meeting of the chiefs it is decided to send a spy to the Trojan camp. Diomedes and Odysseus volunteer to go. On the way they meet Dolon, a Trojan who had been sent to spy on them. They capture him, and after learning that Rhesus, a king of Thrace and a Trojan ally, is located at some distance from the Trojan camp, they slay Dolon. Next they find Rhesus, slay him and twelve of his men, steal his horses and return to the Greek galleys.

Book XI: At dawn, Eris alone of the gods descends to the strife. The Achaeans fight savagely. Many Trojans are slain before Zeus again tips the scales in favor of Hector. Then Diomedes, Eurypylos, and the surgeon, Machaon, are wounded by shafts from Paris' bow. Agamemnon and Odysseus are also wounded. Ajax is betrayed by Panic. All withdraw to the ships. Achilles, watching from his ship, sees Nestor race to the galleys in his chariot. He sends Patroclus to learn what wounded hero Nestor is driving. For Patroclus "this was the beginning of evil." He sees Machaon, wounded, and hears a long speech in which Nestor laments his advancing years, recalls the glorious exploits of his youth, and reminds Patroclus that his father had sent him off to the war with Achilles charging him "ever to be of the best." As a peroration, Nestor urges Patroclus to come clothed in Achilles' armor and leading his Myrmidons, if Achilles, unmoved by the travails of his countrymen, still refuses to fight.

Book XII: Meanwhile Hector, fighting like a whirlwind, drives the Greeks to their ships. An eagle flying over drops the serpent it holds in its talons just as the Trojans are about to assail the moat and wall protecting the ships. Polydamas interprets this as an evil omen, but Hector scorns him, saying that there is only one omen, "to fight for our country." Despite the Greeks' maniacal defense of the ramparts, Sarpedon, an offspring of Zeus, breaches the walls, while Hector smashes open the gates with a huge stone and leaps inside. The Trojans pour in after him.

Book XIII: Satisfied with the Trojan's progress, Zeus then turns his eyes to more peaceful scenes. But Poseidon, in anger at Zeus and with pity for the Achaeans, evades Zeus' order not to interfere by assuming mortal shape and circulating among the desperate Greeks. He rallies them to battle and inspires them with fresh valor and might. With his encouragement they resume their furious defense of the ships. Many heroes on both sides are slain but neither side gains the advantage.

Book XIV: Agamemnon wants to put to sea in the ships but Poseidon appears to him in mortal form and prophesies the rout of the Trojans. Hera, too, resolves to help them indirectly. By trickery she persuades Aphrodite to loan her the magic girdle of love, seduces Zeus with blind desire, and bribes Slumber to lull him to sleep. With Zeus thus occupied Hector is stunned by a stone and the Trojans are driven onto the plain as Poseidon turns back the tide of the battle.

Book XV: Zeus wakes from his trick-induced sleep to see the Trojans fleeing. He reviles Hera and sends her to Olympus to have Poseidon recalled, and to despatch Apollo to heal Hector of his wound. He reminds Hera of his promise to Thetis and again foretells Hector's death by Achilles' hand. In the meantime he determines that Hector shall have the glory. Once more the Achaeans draw back as Hector, restored by Apollo, fights like a flame. Patroclus hears the rush of the Trojans on the ramparts and speeds off to Achilles, while Hector, protected by Apollo, approaches the ships. Zeus grants him the glory of firing the ships, though he knows that death and destruction are the ultimate fate of Hector and Troy.

Book XVI: Patroclus, weeping for the Achaeans, reproaches Achilles for his pitiless spirit. Achilles boasts that the Trojans would not now be threatening the ships if Agamemnon had not, by his insult, caused him to withdraw, and again refuses his help, but yields to Patroclus' ardent plea that he be allowed to go to their aid. He clothes Patroclus in his own armor, loans him his immortal horses—Balius and Xanthus—and puts him in command of the Myrmidons. Hector and the Trojans immediately perceive the change in the tide of battle and fall back. Sarpedon is slain as he tries in vain to stop Patroclus' murderous progress, whereupon a savage struggle takes place over possession of his corpse. As Patroclus pursues the Trojans to the walls of the city, Apollo comes to Hector's aid. The god stuns Patroclus and loosens his armor. Euphorbus wounds him and Hector slays him with his spear. Dying, Patroclus breathes that it was the gods and not Hector who had slain him.

Book XVII: The death of Patroclus brings on a prodigious struggle for his body. Hector dons the armor he had stripped from him and fights in the vanguard. Menelaus, fearing that Hector will conquer, sends Antilochus to tell Achilles that his comrade has been slain and to urge him to come and rescue his corpse.

Book XVIII: Achilles covers his head with ashes when he learns of the death of Patroclus. Thetis hears her son weeping and comes from the depths of the sea to comfort him. She reminds him of his prayer that the Achaeans should suffer because of Agamemnon's insult. He replies with bitter reproaches on himself for that anger which had caused him to withdraw to his tent, leading to the death of so many Achaeans and ultimately to that of his beloved comrade. He swears to kill Hector. Since he has lost his armor, Thetis urges him to wait until next morning when she will return with new armor forged by Hephaestus. Iris now comes, a messenger from Hera, to tell Achilles to show himself on the ramparts, that the mere sight of him, protected by Athena's flaming egis, will terrorize the Trojans. When they see him the Trojans are confounded and Patroclus' corpse is rescued. Polydamas, seeing that Achilles has now come out against them, advises the Trojans to withdraw to the city, but Hector scorns his advice.

Book XIX: When Thetis returns at dawn Achilles calls an assembly and renounces his wrath. Agamemnon admits his error and blames his rash act in taking Briseis on Ate, the goddess of blindness and mischief. He restores Briseis to Achilles and gives him great gifts in atonement. Achilles, refusing to eat until Patroclus is avenged, puts on his new armor, bridles his immortal horses, and calls on the Achaeans to follow him into battle.

Book XX: Zeus now tells the gods to intermingle in the fight as they choose, lest Achilles, returning to the battle, should defy fate and destroy Troy. Hera, Athena, Poseidon, Hermes, and Hephaestus take the Achaeans' part. Ares, Apollo, Artemis, Leto, Xanthus, and Aphrodite go to the side of the Trojans.

Book XXI: With a ferocious onslaught, Achilles drives the Trojans back to the banks of the Scamander, or Xanthus, as it was called by the gods. There Hera delays the Trojans with a thick cloud and Achilles slaughters them in droves. The river-god is horrified. He asks Achilles not to choke up his streams with Trojan corpses. When Achilles boastfully denies him, the river overflows its banks and pursues Achilles to the plain. To save him, Hera sends Hephaestus to set the river afire. Then the gods begin to quarrel among themselves. Athena sets upon Ares and then Aphrodite. Hera attacks Artemis and scatters her arrows. Apollo returns to the plain, and by assuming the shape of a Trojan, induces Achilles to chase him, thus drawing him away from the city and preventing him from overtaking Hector and the Trojans.

Book XXII: When the Trojans are safely inside the walls Apollo reveals himself to Achilles, who acknowledges that he could not defeat a god and turns back to the city. Hector reproaches himself for disregarding Polydamas' advice when Achilles first appeared on the ramparts, and for causing the losses the Trojans have suffered. He resolves to meet Achilles and defend the city, and ignores his father's and mother's pleas to come into the city for safety. As Achilles draws near Panic invades Hector. Three times he flees around the walls with Achilles in ardent pursuit. Zeus pities Hector, but when he weighs Achilles and Hector in the scales, Hector is doomed. Apollo now appears to Hector to give him courage so that he will engage Achilles and meet his fate. Then Apollo forsakes him, and Athena deludes him by appearing to him in the shape of his brother. But when Hector, having hurled his spear at Achilles in vain, turns to his supposed brother for another one, there is no one there. Now Hector knows that the gods have deserted him. Making a futile charge at Achilles with his sword, Hector is mortally wounded when Achilles drives his spear through a chink in the armor at Hector's throat. Hector's dying request for a proper burial is rejected by Achilles. The Achaeans gather around and run their swords through the fallen hero. Insatiate Achilles lashes Hector's feet to his chariot and drags Hector's body to the Greek ships.

Book XXIII: Achilles now prepares to bury Patroclus as he had promised he would do as soon as Hector was killed. The funeral rites include a magnificent feast and a huge pyre surrounded by 12 slain Trojan princes and sacrifices of sheep, cattle, horses, and dogs. Following the burning of Patroclus' body the funeral games are held: chariot race, boxing and wrestling matches, foot race, sword duel, shotput, and archery contest.

Book XXIV: Each day as he mourns, Achilles drags Hector's body three times around the tomb of Patroclus. This treatment of an honorable enemy offends Zeus. He sends an order to Achilles to yield the body to Priam when he comes for it. At the same time, Iris bears a message to Priam to go alone to

Achilles, bearing rich gifts, and ransom his son's corpse. As a good omen for Priam, Zeus sends an eagle, and he commands Hermes to protect and guide Priam to the heart of the enemy's camp. On the way, Hermes, in disguise, tells Priam that Hector's body has been protected by the gods with nectar and ambrosia and is as fresh as a dewdrop. He smuggles Priam into Achilles' tent where the latter is astounded to see the old king and, his desire for vengeance sated, listens to him with compassion. He weeps for Patroclus as Priam mourns for Hector. Kissing the hands that had slain his son, Priam begs him to accept ransom and deliver the body. Achilles agrees, as he had been ordered to do by Zeus. He asks Priam how many days he wants to mourn Hector and promises to hold the war in abeyance during that time. Hermes spirits Priam and Hector's body away in the night so Agamemnon will not learn of Achilles' compassion and interfere. On the return to Troy the whole city, led by Andromache, Hecuba, and Helen, mourns for Hector for nine days. On the tenth day his body is burned. On the eleventh the flames of the pyre are extinguished with wine and Hector's funeral rites have been accomplished.

Ilias Latina (il'i-ās la-tī'na). Condensation (1st century A.D.) of the Iliad, the "Latin Homer," in 1070 painstaking Latin hexameters, of uncertain authorship. (JJ)

Ilias Parva (pār'va). Title of a lost epic, treating of the events of the closing weeks of the Trojan War, from the fatal contest for the arms of Achilles to the admission into Troy of the Wooden Horse, usually attributed to the epic poet Lesches of Mytilene (7th century B.C.). (JJ)

Ilion, Ilios, Ilium (il'i-on, -os, -um). Names for Troy, meaning the city founded by Ilus. See Troy.

Ilione (il-i-ō-nē, -ō'nē). [Also: Iliona.] In Greek legend, the oldest daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was the wife of Polynestor, king of Thrace, and the mother of his son Deipylus. Entrusted with the care of her young brother, Polydorus, Ilione purposely confused the two children so that if one died the other would succeed to the throne. According to some accounts, Polynestor, bribed by the Greeks to kill Polydorus, by mistake killed his own son, whereupon Ilione first blinded and then killed him.

Ilioneus (il-i-ō'nē-us, il-i'ō-nūs). In the Aeneid, a Trojan who accompanied Aeneas on his flight from Troy. He commanded one of the ships of the fleet and was separated from the others when they were assailed by a great storm off Sicily. Aeneas thought he had perished but when Aeneas, wrapped in a mist by Venus to protect him in a strange land, approached Dido, he found Ilioneus standing before her and asking for asylum. Ilioneus told Dido that they were not pirates, but Trojans who were on their way to Hesperia. Later, when the Trojans landed in Italy, Ilioneus acted as an emissary from Aeneas to Latinus. He gave Latinus presents, relics from Troy, and asked for a plot of land on which the Trojans might settle.

Ilioneus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan hero, the only son of Phorbas. Peneus pierced him through the eye-socket with his lance, then cut off his head and waved it on the end of his lance as he taunted the Trojans. This is one of the few instances of brutality for its own sake in the Iliad.

Ilissus (i-lis'us). [Modern Greek name, Ilissos or Eilissos.] In ancient geography, a small river in Attica, Greece, flowing just S of Athens. It was on the banks of this river that Orithyia, the daughter of Erechtheus, was playing when Boreas swooped down in a great gust of wind and carried her away to Thrace to be his consort.

Ilithyia (il-i-thī'ya). [Also: Eileithyia.] The goddess who presides over childbirth, sometimes called the daughter of Hera. In her role as the goddess who helps women in childbirth she can either hasten or delay delivery. Hera enlisted her aid to delay the birth of Heracles until after Eurystheus, whose arrival was speeded up, was born. On the Hill of Cronus, near the site of the Olympic Games, an infant was transformed into a serpent, and so terrified the Arcadians, who were warring on the Eleans, that they fled with great losses. The spot where the serpent then disappeared into the hill was marked by a shrine to Ilithyia. In it priestesses fed a snake on cakes of honey in memory of this miracle. The Romans identified Ilithyia with Juno, whom they called Lucina in this aspect.

Ilium/Imhotep

Iliupersis (il'i-ū-pēr'sis). In classical mythology, archaeology, etc., the destruction of Troy or Ilium; hence, a poem or an account treating of the destruction of Troy, or a graphic or plastic representation of the destruction of Troy, or of some episode connected with its fall.

Illyria (i-lir'i-ā). [Greek, Illyris, Illyria.] In ancient geography, a region in the W part of the Balkan peninsula, N of Greece. Its boundaries are vague. In the second millennium B.C. this region was occupied by tribes speaking an Indo-European language and collectively known as Illyrians. The S part of Illyria came early under Greek influence. According to some legendary accounts, Cadmus fled to this region with his wife after the death of his grandson Pentheus, who had denied the divinity of Dionysus. He settled among the Encheleans who defeated the Illyrians in war and made Cadmus their king. In his old age Cadmus had a son, Illyrius, for whom the Illyrians were named. Historically, the Greeks, apparently attracted by the mines in the interior, began colonizing the coast in the 6th century B.C. and continued for a number of centuries thereafter. The kingdom of Illyria, with Scodra as its capital, was important in the 3rd century B.C., and was overthrown (168 B.C.) by Rome. The region formerly known as Illyria is now occupied principally by Yugoslavia and Albania.

Illyrians (il-ir'i-anz). People of ancient Illyria, including groups later known as Dalmatians and Pannonians; but the term is most commonly applied to the tribes who inhabited the coastal region of the Balkan peninsula north of what is now Albania. They were a warlike, piratical people, who threw off all Greek attempts to subjugate them. The Romans conquered them in the 3rd century B.C. and under Augustus the country, called Illyricum, was organized as a Roman province.

Illyrius (i-lir'i-us). According to legend, a son born to Cadmus in his old age. He became ruler of Buthoë, a city built in Illyria by Cadmus, after the death of Cadmus.

Ilus (i'lus). In Greek legend, a son of Dardanus and the brother of Erichthonius. According to some, he was the grandnephew of Dardanus and son of Tros. Having been victorious in a wrestling match in Phrygia, he was awarded 50 youths and 50 maidens as a prize. He was also given a spotted cow and told to follow it until it should lie down. On that spot he was to erect a city. Ilus carried out his instructions and followed the cow until it came to rest on a hill in the Trojan plain. There he built Ilium, named for himself. He prayed to Zeus for a sign that he had chosen well, and was answered by finding a wooden image in the ground in front of his tent. This was the Palladium. Apollo told Ilus that as long as the Palladium remained within its walls the city would be safe. Ilus was the father of Laomedon, by Eurydice, daughter of Adrastus, and the grandfather of Priam.

Ilus. Another name for Ascanius, the son of Aeneas and a descendant of Ilus, founder of Troy.

Imbrasmus (im'brā-sus). A river of the island of Samos. Near its waters Ancaeus the Argonaut, son of Poseidon and Astypalea, was born.

Imbrex (im'breks), Licinius. [Also known as Publius Licinius Tegula.] Latin poet; fl. c200 B.C.; known as a writer of comedies and of at least one hymn.

Imbrius (im'bri-us). In the Iliad, a son of Mentor. He came from Pegasus and married Medesicaste, a daughter of King Priam of Troy. Priam treated him as one of his own children. In the Trojan War he fought on the side of the Trojans and was slain by Teucer. Locrian Ajax cut off his head and hurled it among the Trojans.

Imbrus (im'brus). [Also: Imbros.] An island in the NE Aegean, situated just W of the Hellespont. Near here, according to the Iliad, was a deep chasm under the sea where Poseidon stabled his horses while he went to observe the Trojan War and to help the Achaeans. The island was won for Athens by Miltiades just before the outbreak of the Persian War. Like its neighbor Samothrace, it was a center for the worship of the Cabiri (q.v.).

Imhotep (im-hō'tep). Egyptian architect, physician, and adviser to King Zoser; probable designer of the oldest pyramid, the famous Step-Pyramid at Sakkara; fl. 3rd Dynasty (c3190-3100 B.C.). In later mythology, he acquired divine status as the first-born son of Ptah and Sekhmet, with whom he formed the Memphic triad. In this concept, he was the god of knowledge, akin to Thoth, and was identified by the Greeks with Asclepius.

Inachus (in'ā-kus). In Greek mythology, the god of the river Inachus, son of the Titan Oceanus and his sister Tethys, whose children were the Oceanids and the rivers of the world. He was the first king of Argos and was the father of Io and of Phoroneus by the nymph Melia. When Poseidon contended with Hera for control of Argolis, Zeus asked the river-gods Inachus, Cephissus, and Assterion to mediate the quarrel. The river-gods decided in favor of Hera. Poseidon was enraged that they had awarded Argolis to Hera and to punish them dried up their rivers so that they ceased to flow in the summer.

Inachus. [Modern Greek name, Inakhos or Inachos.] In ancient geography, a river in Argolis, flowing into the Gulf of Argolis SE of Argos.

Indiges (in'di-jēz) or Indigites (in-dij'i-tēz). A Roman term by which mortals, such as Aeneas and Romulus, were known when they were deified after death. The specific meaning of the term when applied to Roman gods is not clear.

Indus (in'dus). [Also: Sind; Sanskrit, Sindhu.] Chief river of Pakistan. It rises among the Himalayas of W Tibet, and flows NW through gorges in Tibet and Kashmir. Near the N part of Kashmir it turns S and flows SW through Pakistan (Punjab and Sind) into the Arabian Sea. It has formed an extensive delta. Its chief tributaries are the combined rivers of the Punjab (Jhelum, Beas, Chenab, Ravi, and Sutlej, entering through the Panjnad) and the Kabul. By means of the Sukkur Barrage, in Sind, the Indus irrigates several million acres of land. The volume of water in the Indus varies greatly, with floods in the spring and summer, and low water in winter; because of this extreme variability and silt deposition, it is not much used for navigation. Alexander the Great returned from India (325 B.C.) by the Indus valley, proceeding to Patala.

Inessa (in-es'ā). [Modern name, Biancavilla.] Town on the island of Sicily, S of Mount Aetna and about nine miles NW of Catana. It was a Greek settlement.

Inferi (in'fēr-ī). The Roman name for the inhabitants of the infernal regions, the dead. It is also the name of the gods of the lower world in contrast with the Superi, the gods of heaven. Inferiae were the sacrifices offered by the Romans to the souls of deceased members of their families.

Ino (ī'nō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, and the sister of Semele, Agave, Autonoe, and Polydorus. She married Athamas, king of Orchomenus, after he had abandoned his first wife, Nephele, by whom he had two children, Helle and Phrixus. Ino also had two children by Athamas, Learchus and Melicertes. She plotted to destroy Phrixus and Helle so that her own children would be the heirs. By some means she parched all the grain seed secretly, so that when it was planted no crops grew and there was a famine. Messengers were sent to consult the oracle and returned with the news, as they had been bribed to do by Ino, that the gods could be propitiated and starvation avoided if Phrixus were sacrificed to them. Athamas took Phrixus and Helle to a mountain top and prepared to sacrifice them. Just as he was about to put the knife to their throats, however, Hermes sent a miraculous winged ram with fleece of gold which rescued them and bore them off on his back. Hera punished Athamas for abandoning Nephele, whom she had arranged for him to marry in the first place, by driving him mad. In his frenzy he killed Learchus and would have killed Ino. She escaped, carrying her son Melicertes in her arms, and leaped into the sea. However, Zeus was grateful to her for sheltering his son Dionysus and transformed her into a sea-goddess who was known thereafter as Leucothea. Melicertes became the sea-god Palaemon. It was in her capacity as sea-goddess that Leucothea saved Odysseus from drowning when his raft was shattered in a storm. She gave him her veil and helped him to reach shore on the island of the Phaeacians.

Insubres (in'sū-brēz). Ancient Gallic people in Cisalpine Gaul, dwelling north of the Padus (Po), in the vicinity of Mediolanum (Milan). They were finally made subject to Rome in 194 B.C.

Intaphernes (in-ta-fēr'nēz). A Persian noble who, with Darius, was one of seven conspirators who overthrew the False Smerdis and made Darius ruler of the Persians. Among the privileges which the six were to enjoy when Darius was made king was that they were free to enter the palace unannounced whenever they chose, except when the king was with a woman. This privilege led to the death of Intaphernes. Acting on it, he wished to enter the palace on a matter of business with the king. Guards sought to bar his way on the grounds that the king was with a woman. Intaphernes thought they were lying, and drawing his scimitar, he cut off their ears and noses and strung them on his bridle. The guards went to Darius and told him what had happened. Darius, fearing that this was part of a plot against him, secretly consulted the other conspirators. He learned from their answers that they knew nothing at all of Intaphernes' insolence. Relieved on this score, Darius seized Intaphernes, his children and his close relatives, put them in fetters and condemned them to death. Each day the wife of Intaphernes stood before the palace gate weeping. Darius took pity on her and offered to grant her as a boon the life of one of the condemned family. She answered that if she could save the life of one only she chose that of her brother. Darius was surprised at this choice and asked why she had not chosen her husband or one of her children. Her answer was that the gods might grant her another husband and more children, but as her father and mother were dead she would never have another brother. Darius saw the worth of such reasoning. He not only spared her brother's life but that of her oldest son as well. Intaphernes, with the rest of his children and relatives, was put to death.

Inuus (in'ū-us). A name for the Roman god Faunus in his role as fertility god of cattle and good spirit of the forests, fields, and pastures.

Io (ī'ō). In Greek mythology, a beautiful daughter of the river-god Inachus. She was a priestess of Hera at Argos. Zeus saw her as she wandered by the river and fell in love with her. He appeared to her in dreams and told her she had inspired his heart with love. One day he overtook her as she returned from the river. She fled from his embrace. He called a dark cloud to cover the earth, seized her, and ravished her. From her seat on Olympus Hera saw the cloud which appeared from nowhere and, ever suspicious of her notoriously unfaithful husband, she hurried down to earth to investigate. Zeus, hearing her approach, transformed Io into a beautiful pure white heifer, so that Hera should not discover his love-affair and heap angry recriminations on his head. Hera was acutely suspicious on finding Zeus in the company of a heifer and inquired where it had come from. He had had no time to think what he would say and improvised a tale that the heifer had sprung from the earth. Hera admired it and asked Zeus to give it to her as a gift. He was most reluctant but dared not risk further questions by refusing this gift to his wife, and turned Io over to Hera. She set the 100-eyed Argus to guard the heifer and went off, if not satisfied with his explanation at least content that she had foiled whatever plan he had in mind for the heifer. Argus, whose 100 eyes were never all asleep at once, guarded Io vigilantly. By day he allowed her to graze; at night he tied her up. Inachus searched in vain for his daughter. At length he came upon Argus and his charge. Io ran up to her father and licked his hand, but he had no idea this was his daughter. In despair that she could not speak to him and tell him of her plight she at last traced her name in the dust with her hoof—the hoofprint of a cow still spells her name. Inachus was desolate when he realized what had happened to his daughter, but he was powerless and Argus soon drove her on to new pastures. At length Zeus, in pity for Io, sent Hermes to slay Argus and set Io free. Hermes lulled all his 100 eyes to sleep and cut off his head. But Io was still not delivered. The shade of Argus pursued her, and Hera sent a gadfly to torment her. Half-crazed by the continual stings of the gadfly, she wandered distractedly through Greece. The Ionian Sea is so-named because she swam across it to Thrace. There she found Prometheus, bound to a rock. She pleaded with him to tell her if the future held any hope. He could not be immediately encouraging. He told her that much weary wandering lay ahead of her. Hounded by the gadfly, she would cross over into Asia—the place where she crossed, he said, would be known as Bosphorus, “Ox-ford”—then after many years of wandering and suffering she would arrive at the Nile. Here at last she would regain her true shape. Zeus would touch her and she would bear him a son, Epaphus. With a frenzied cry Io left Prometheus and fled, stung by the gadfly. All turned out as he had predicted. She came at last to the Nile, was retransformed into her own shape, and bore Epaphus after Zeus touched her. She married Telegonus, king of the Egyptians, and set up images to Demeter. The Egyptians called the goddess Isis, and they also gave Io the name Isis, which may be the reason why images of the goddess are shown with a cow’s horns. The descendants of Epaphus were Aegyptus, Danaus, Cepheus, and Phineus, and ultimately, as Prometheus foretold, a male child was born, a mighty archer, who brought about the release of Prometheus; he was Heracles. According mation into a horned heifer was represented by the crescent moon.

Iobates (i-ob’ā-tēz). In Greek legend, a king in Lycia and the father of Antia, wife of Proetus. He received Bellerophon kindly when he came to him with a message from Proetus, and after entertaining him hospitably for nine days he read the message. In it Proetus asked him to kill Bellerophon, charging that he had insulted Antia. Iobates did not want to offend the gods by slaying Bellerophon himself. He sent him, in turn, to kill the Chimaera, to fight the Solymi, and then to fight the Amazon women. As Bellerophon was successful in each case Iobates set an ambush to kill him, but Bellerophon slew the Lycian heroes who sprang on him from ambush and returned to Iobates. He decided that Bellerophon must have divine aid and therefore must be innocent of the crimes charged against him by Proetus. Iobates then gave him his daughter in marriage and a wide domain to rule over in Lycia. The message from Proetus to Iobates is the earliest reference to writing in European literature.

to later rationalizations of the Io story, she was not seduced by Zeus at all. Rather, it was a group of Phoenician traders who landed in Argos and carried her off to Egypt. Later the Greeks identified Io with Isis, the Egyptian moon-goddess. The starry skies symbolized the 100-eyed Argus; her transfor-

Iodama (i-od'ā-mā). According to Greek tradition, a daughter of Itonius. Some say she was a priestess in the temple of Athena Itonia in Boeotia, between Alalcomenae and Coronea. She went into the sacred precinct at night and Athena appeared to her. When

Iolaus/Ion

Iodama saw the Gorgon's head on Athena's aegis she was turned to stone. Fires were lighted daily on the altar, and chants were thrice intoned, saying Iodama lived and desired fire. Others say Athena was a daughter of Itonius and that Iodama was her sister, and that the goddess accidentally turned her to stone by allowing her to see Medusa's head on her aegis.

Iolaus (i-ō-lā'us). In Greek legend, the son of Iphicles. He was the nephew, faithful friend, and companion of Heracles, and accompanied him as he carried out his labors for Eurystheus, sometimes acting as Heracles' charioteer and sometimes as his armor-bearer, but in all cases giving whatever aid he could to his beloved uncle. Heracles loved him dearly, but when, in a spell of madness inspired by Hera, he killed his children, he also attacked Iolaus, but the latter escaped his attacks and comforted Heracles when his senses were restored to him. Later Heracles gave Megara, the mother of his murdered children, to Iolaus as his wife. Iolaus led 40 of Heracles' sons by the daughters of Thespius to Sardinia and founded a colony there. He established the city of Olbia and named the colonists Iolarians after himself. Hercules established a sanctuary of Iolaus in Sicily. Iolaus returned to Greece and became the protector of Heracles' children after the latter had become immortalized. When the son of Theseus gave the children of Heracles sanctuary in Marathon, causing a war with Eurystheus, Iolaus, by then an old man, armed himself with weapons which he took from the walls of the temple. Despite protests that he was too old and weak to fight, he jumped into a chariot and drove into the battle, first praying to the gods to be given youth and strength for one day. Two stars lit on the yoke of his chariot, and cast a shadow over him. When the shadow lifted Iolaus was revealed as a stalwart youth. He pursued and captured Eurystheus and took him back to Alcmene, mother of Heracles, to give her the privilege of deciding the fate of her son's enemy. But some say Iolaus cut off Eurystheus' head and Alcmene then gouged out his eyes with a spike.

Iolcus (i-ol'kus). [Modern name, Volos.] In ancient geography, a city of Thessaly, in NE Greece, situated on the Gulf of Pagasae. Its king, Aeson, was deprived of his throne by Pelias. Jason, son of Aeson, came to reclaim the throne and was sent to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece by Pelias. Iolcus, or nearby Pagasae, is, according to tradition, the point from which the Argonauts set forth on their expedition to recover the Golden Fleece. The site of Iolcus was occupied from ancient times. Remains of the Mycenaean and Geometric periods have been found there. The ancient city occupied a height that rose abruptly above the shore.

Iole (i'ō-lē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Oechalia. Heracles sought her for a wife and was promised her hand if he defeated Eurytus in an archery contest. When Heracles won, her father refused to keep to his bargain. Heracles vowed revenge, and in the meantime he married Deianira. He later slew Iphitus, son of Eurytus, and afterward gathered an army, attacked and killed Eurytus and his sons, and took Iole captive. Deianira, to whom Heracles sent Iole, had nothing but pity for the youthful captive, but she was determined to recapture Heracles' affections if possible. She sent him a robe anointed with what she thought was a love charm. But it turned out to be a poison that entered Heracles' blood and ended his mortal life. Hyllus, his son, married Iole, as he had promised his dying father he would do, and Deianira hanged herself.

Ion (i'on, i'on). According to Greek tradition, a son of Creusa, daughter of King Erechtheus of Athens, and Apollo; eponymous ancestor of the Ionians. His mother abandoned him as an infant in the cave where Apollo had ravished her, and when, overcome by remorse and anxiety, she returned to fetch him, no trace of the child was to be found, and she feared he had been carried off by eagles. But Apollo had sent Hermes to rescue his son, and Ion was taken to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, where he was reared by the priestess. By the time he was grown to young manhood he had become a priest in the service of Apollo at Delphi. Meanwhile, Creusa had married Xuthus, an alien from Thessaly who had come to Athens and saved the city in a war with the Eu-boeans. Creusa and Xuthus ultimately went to Delphi to ask the oracle why they had no children. There Creusa met the young priest. By command of the oracle, he was given to Xuthus as a son. Creusa, driven nearly to madness by grief for her own lost son and jealousy over Xuthus' new son, sought to poison Ion. By the intervention of the gods the poisoned wine which she intended for him was poured on the ground, doves that sipped it died, and her plot was discovered. At this, Ion tried to kill Creusa, but again the gods intervened, and mother and child were made known to each other and reunited. Ion returned to Athens with Creusa and Xuthus, who was not informed that he was his wife's own son. Ion married Helice, daughter of King Selinus of Aegialus, and succeeded his father-in-law as king of the Aegialeans. The name of his people was changed to Ionians. They afterward colonized the coast of Asia Minor, which became known as Ionia. Ion gave his assistance to the Athenians in a war against the Eleusinians and, being successful in this, was made king of Athens. The four sons of Ion and Helice—Geleon, Hopletes, Argades, and Aegicores—became the ancestors of the four Ionic tribes.

Ion. A play by Euripides, exhibited between 413 and 408 B.C. It treats the legend of Ion, son of Creusa and Apollo, who was abandoned by his mother as an infant, was miraculously rescued, and ultimately became king of Athens and ancestor of the Ionian race.

The scene is at Delphi, in the court of the temple of Apollo. The great altar of sacrifice stands in the center. Hermes enters and relates the history of Creusa, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. She has come to the temple to ask the oracle why she and her husband Xuthus have no children. Hermes tells what he thinks is going to happen, and withdraws behind some laurel bushes to see how it all works out.

A young priest enters, accompanied by worshippers. He praises Apollo and orders his followers to purify themselves at the Castalian Spring while he purifies the temple, which, since he has neither mother nor father, has been his home and which he proudly serves. A chorus of Creusa's handmaids enters and sings of the glories of the temple. Creusa enters. The young priest is moved by the sight of her tear-stained face and feels drawn to her. He asks the reason for her weeping, for people usually rejoice in Apollo's temple. She answers that she weeps for a memory and over the wrongs of women and the injustices of gods. By his questions to her and her answers he draws from her the history of the kings of Athens. Coming to her own time, he learns that she was given to Xuthus, an alien, to reward him for having saved Athens in a war with the Euboeans, and that they have now come to the temple to ask the oracle why they remain childless. He tells her his story—that he was abandoned as an infant and brought up in the temple—and they pity each other. Creusa says she has come alone to the shrine on behalf of a friend. Her friend was ravished in a cave by Apollo, bore a son as a result, and abandoned the child in the very cave where the god had violated her. Now her friend is tormented by grief and anguish over the fate of the child she abandoned, and hopes to learn from the oracle what became of him. In fact, this story ascribed to a friend is Creusa's own story. The priest warns her not to put questions to the oracle that indicate a god had acted the part of a villain, and that no one should seek to reveal what the gods wish to hide. Creusa cries out at the injustice of Apollo, and asks the priest to say nothing of all this to Xuthus, who is now approaching. Xuthus enters and announces that he has learned from the oracle of Trophonius that he will take a son home with him. He goes to the inner temple of Apollo to learn how he is to gain this son. Creusa leaves to place boughs on the altar. Alone, the ardent priest is disturbed by Creusa's story that Apollo ravishes maidens and forsakes infants; he refuses to believe that the gods have one law for mortals and another for themselves—if this be true, the temples of the gods will soon be abandoned. He departs. The chorus invokes Athena, praying for an heir of Erechtheus for the throne of Athens. As the priest returns Xuthus comes from the temple and embraces him with joy, for he has learned that the first man he meets on leaving the temple is his son. The young man is not so enthusiastic; he wants to know who his mother is. Xuthus can't tell him, but thinks she may have been a maenad with whom he dallied during the festival of Dionysus, before he married Creusa. The priest reluctantly acknowledges him as his father, but longs to know who his mother was. The chorus rejoices for Xuthus, and prays for good fortune for Creusa. Xuthus plans a feast for his son, after which they will return to Athens, but his new son is troubled: he fears he will not be welcomed in Athens for the Athenians have no love for aliens, and not only is Xuthus an alien but his son has the stain of bastardy. Moreover, Creusa will hate him as a son of Xuthus she cannot share, and will hate Xuthus who no longer shares her childlessness. He thinks of the blessings and peace of his present life and fears the future. Xuthus tells him he must accept his fate, and names his new son Ion ("coming"), because he met him at his "coming-forth" from the temple. Xuthus and Ion depart. The chorus sings of Creusa and her new woe. Their loyalty is to her, the Athenian, rather than to Xuthus, the alien, and they resolve to tell her, in defiance of Xuthus' command, of his new-found son. By the time the chorus finishes their feeling for Xuthus has developed from one of beneficent indifference to definite dislike because he has been lucky and Creusa hasn't. Creusa now approaches with an old servant and learns that she has no son but that Xuthus has. The old servant instantly jumps to the conclusion that Xuthus' son is a bastard, and is incensed at this additional insult to Creusa. He invents a tale to account for this son: he is the child of a slave to whom Xuthus turned when Creusa bore him no children. Creusa immediately accepts his tale and laments that she has been betrayed by both mortal and immortal lovers. Now for the first time she tells the story of her son by Apollo, and cries out against the god for adding to her suffering by giving Xuthus a son when she has lost hers. The servant, deeply troubled, questions her. She tells the whole story and repeats her accusations against Apollo. She abandoned her child in the hope that Apollo would save his own son. All are bitter at the god for forsaking her and her child. On the urging of the servant she decides to avenge herself by slaying the son Apollo has given to Xuthus. She will put a drop of the Gorgon Medusa's blood—given to Erechtheus by Athena and to her by Erechtheus—into the wine cup the servant will hand to Ion at the feast. The chorus agrees it is better for Ion to die than for Athens to be ruled by an alien. Creusa and her servant depart. The chorus prays for her success. Soon the servant rushes back, searching for Creusa. When he presented the wine cup, Ion poured the wine on the ground because of some sacrilege; doves flew down to sip it and instantly died, uncovering the plot. Now the Delphians seek Creusa, to stone her. When she rushes in the chorus tells her to fly to the altar as a suppliant. As she does so Ion enters. He reviles Creusa, and calls on his unknown mother. As he prepares to seize Creusa the priestess of the temple enters, carrying a casket which holds the clothes he was wearing when he was left at the temple. She gives the casket to Ion as a clue to his mother and tells him to search for her. Ion weeps. His mother must have suffered as much in losing him as he did in losing her. Yet he would rather not know who she is than learn that she is unworthy. Creusa glimpses the robes in the casket and cries out. She recognizes them as those in which she wrapped her new-born child, and proves that she knows them by describing the embroideries on them. Mother and child are made known to each other and embrace. Happy to have found his mother, Ion is still troubled, for he cannot understand why Apollo has caused them to suffer. The goddess Athena now appears, sent, she says, by Apollo to tell Ion that he is the god's son, and that he must go to Athens with Creusa; that he will become king, and that his four sons will father four Athenian tribes. The goddess warns Ion and Creusa not to let Xuthus know that Ion is really Creusa's son, and predicts that Creusa will have sons by Xuthus. Creusa and Ion join in praising Apollo, and rejoice that their sufferings are ended.

Phocaea, Clazomenae, Erythrae, Teos, Lebedus, Colophon, Ephesus, Priene, Myus, Miletus, and later Smyrna. According to tradition, it was colonized about the 11th century B.C. by Ionian refugees fleeing from the Greek mainland before the invading Dorians. Conquered by Croesus in the middle of the 6th century B.C., it passed later to Persia, was the scene of an unsuccessful revolt, 500-494 B.C., became, on the close of the Persian War, a dependent ally of Athens, but passed again to Persia in 387, and to Macedonia in 334 B.C. Later it fell to Pergamum and Rome. Ionia was noted for its wealth, and for the early development of art, music, philosophy, and literature.

Ionian Islands (ī-ō'ni-ān). In ancient geography, the islands lying in the Ionian Sea W of Greece, and including Corcyra or Kerkyra (Corfu), Paxos, Leucas (Levkas), Ithaca (Ithaki or Thiaki), Cephallenia (Kephallonia), Zacynthus (Zante) and many smaller islands. Cythera, off the southern coast of the Peloponnesus, is sometimes counted among the Ionian Islands. The seven principal islands may be referred to as the Heptanesus. (JJ)

Ionians (ī-ō'ni-ānz). People of ancient Ionia, either refugees from the Greek mainland, possibly organized by Athens, who colonized the region, or, according to some scholars, a mixed Hellenic group who became even more mixed by intermarriage with the indigenous groups of the region. It is supposed that the Ionians received an alphabet of consonants from Phoenician traders, to which they made the enormous contribution of adding vowels. According to tradition, the Ionians were descendants of Ion, son of Apollo and Creusa. They were driven out of their land in the Peloponnesus by the Dorian invaders, the Heraclidae. The Ionians fled to Attica where they were received kindly and settled. Under the sons of Codrus, legendary Athenian king, the Athenians say that the Ionians embarked on colonizing expeditions to Asia. But some say Codrus was really a Messenian, and they say the Athenians claimed him and his descendants to reinforce their claim that Athens was the mother of the Ionian cities. But the Athenians point to the "tunic-trailing Ionians" mentioned by Homer in the Iliad as being Athenians. The Ionians attacked the coasts of Asia for the purpose of establishing colonies, seized cities already there, and in some cases founded new ones. They had 12 cities in Asia and would admit no more. They were: Miletus, Myus, and Priene, in Caria; Ephesus, Colophon, Lebedus, Teos, Clazomenae, and Phocaea, in Lydia; Erythrae and the island-cities of Samos and Chios. These 12 cities were the counterparts of the 12 cities they had formerly had in Aegialus. According to Herodotus, though they spoke different dialects of Attic Greek, they were all most anxious to be considered pure Ionians as distinct from the Dorian and other nations of Asia. And as he points out, though their cities were in fact colonized by Abantes, Minyans, Cadmeans, Dryopians, Phocians, and others who were not even Ionian in name, since they set such store by it, he was willing to let them call themselves Ionians. The true test of the Ionian race was that they came from Attica and celebrated the feast of the Apaturia, Herodotus says. This feast was held once a year, and at this time all children born in the preceding year whose birth entitled them to citizenship were registered. All the Ionian cities, except Ephesus and Colophon, prohibited by reason of an act of bloodshed, celebrated the Apaturia. And all the Ionians gathered to celebrate the feast of Panionia at the temple of Heliconian Poseidon, near Mycale. This united them culturally and preserved their distinction from other Greek nations in Asia.

Ionian Sea. [Italian, Mar Ionio; Latin, Mare Ionium.] Part of the Mediterranean between Greece on the E and S Italy and Sicily on the W.

Ionic Order (ī-on'ik). In architecture, one of the three Greek orders, so named from the Ionic race, by whom it was held to have been developed and perfected. The distinguishing characteristic of this order is the volute of its capital. In the true Ionic the volutes have the same form on the front and rear, and are connected on the flanks by an ornamented roll or scroll, except in the case of the corner capitals, which have three volutes on their two outer faces, that on the external angle projecting diagonally. The spiral fillets of the volute are continued along the face of the capital, beneath the abacus. The shaft, including the base and the capital to the bottom of the volute, is normally about nine diameters high, and is generally fluted in 24 flutes, separated by fillets. The bases used with this order are various. The Attic base often occurs, and is the most beautiful and appropriate. The architrave is normally formed in three bands, each projecting slightly beyond that below it, the whole crowned by a rich molding. The frieze frequently bears figures in relief. The cornices fall under three classes: the simple but richly molded and strongly projecting Greek cornice, and the less refined dentil and modillion (Roman) cornices. Beautiful examples of the Ionic order are the Erechtheum and the Temple of Nike Apteros on the Acropolis at Athens. The details of the Erechtheum are notable for the delicate elaboration of their ornament; but the interior capitals of the Propylaea are, in their simple purity of line, perhaps the noblest remains of the Greek Ionic. The order was probably evolved by the Ionian Greeks from forms found in Assyrian architecture.

Ion of Chios (í'on, í'on; kí'os). Greek writer, born c490 B.C., and died before 421 B.C. He was an aristocrat and was the friend of Cimon and the Spartan king, Archidamus. He wrote lyric poems, tragedies, and a cosmological work in prose. The Alexandrian critics placed him on their list of outstanding tragic poets. Among his writings was a book of memoirs which included descriptions of noted persons who visited Chios. A long anecdote about Sophocles survives from this in the work of Athenaeus.

Iophon (í'ō-fon). Distinguished Greek tragic poet, the son of Sophocles. According to a well-known but doubtful story, in Sophocles' later years Iophon tried to have the management of his estates transferred to his hands on the grounds that Sophocles was incompetent to manage them. In his defense, Sophocles read to the jury an ode from the Oedipus at Colonus, which he was then writing, proved that he was in full possession of his faculties, and kept charge of his own affairs.

Ios (í'os). [Also: Nio.] Island in the Aegean Sea, one of the Cyclades, about 12 miles SW of Naxos. Length, about 11 miles; area, about 46 square miles.

Ioxus (i-ok'sus). In Greek legend, a grandson of Theseus and Perigune. He led a colony to Caria where his descendants, the Ioxids, worshiped the wild asparagus and refused to burn or destroy it, because it had sheltered their ancestor Perigune.

Iphianassa (if'i-a-nas'a). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a daughter of Agamemnon. She was offered by her father to Achilles as a wife if he would forget his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to fight at the side of the Greeks, in the tenth year of the Trojan War.

Iphianassa. In Greek legend, a daughter of Proetus and Antia. With her two sisters, she was driven mad, for offending either Dionysus or Hera, and was cured by Melampus. She later married Bias, brother of Melampus.

Iphicles (if'i-klēz, í'fi-klēz). In Greek legend, the twin brother of Heracles; son of Amphitryon (a mortal) and Alcmene, Heracles being the son of Zeus and Alcmene. According to some accounts, Amphitryon wanted to find out which of the two boys was his own son. He therefore put two harmless serpents in the cradle where the infants were sleeping. Heracles grasped the serpents firmly and strangled them, laughing as he did so, but Iphicles screamed and tried to hide. Thus Amphitryon knew that Iphicles was his son. But others say that Hera introduced the serpents, which were deadly, into the cradle to destroy Heracles but was frustrated by the fearless strength of Heracles. Iphicles was the father of Iolaus, the faithful companion of Heracles. Iphicles and Heracles were also companions in several adventures before Iphicles was killed in the war which Heracles waged against Augeas, king of Elis.

Iphiclus (if'i-klus, i'fi-). In Greek legend, the only son of Phylacus, king of Phylace. He was a famous runner, who was reputed to be able to run over a field of standing grain without bending it, and to be able to speed over the sea. Nevertheless, he was beaten by Nestor in a footrace, according to Nestor. According to some accounts, he was one of those who joined Jason on the expedition of the Argonauts. His father was the possessor of famous flocks and herds and Melampus, the seer, tried to steal them for his brother Bias. Being caught, Melampus was imprisoned, but freed when he told Phylacus how Iphiclus could be cured of his childlessness. Melampus said that Iphiclus had been frightened when, as a child, he saw his father approaching him with a bloody knife with which he had been gelding rams. Phylacus stuck the knife into a tree and ran to comfort Iphiclus. Melampus instructed Phylacus to find the knife, scrape rust from it into wine, and give the wine to Iphiclus. After this had been done Iphiclus and his wife Clymene had two sons: Protesilaus, who was the first Greek killed at Troy, and Podarces, who then took command of the Phthians in his place.

Iphiclus. In Greek legend, a son of Thestius. He took part in the Calydonian Boar Hunt and in the expedition of the Argonauts to Colchis.

Iphicrates (i-fik'ra-tēz). Athenian general, from Rhamnus; fl. first half of the 4th century B.C.; died c353 B.C. He was noted for his military reforms. He equipped his soldiers, called peltasts, with light shields and javelins, which gave them much greater mobility for the raiding tactics he increasingly employed than the heavy armor worn by the hoplites. He emphasized drill and discipline; he lengthened the swords and javelins the soldiers carried, and introduced the wearing of leggings, called "Iphicratid boots." In the Corinthian War (c391 B.C.) he attacked a band of 600 Spartan hoplites and destroyed them. In 388 B.C. he was sent to the Hellespont with 1200 peltasts and defeated a Spartan force near Cremaste, and assured Athenian command of the Hellespont and the Bosporus, for the time being at least. With his band of mercenaries he served various princes of Thrace. About 378 B.C. he married a daughter of the Thracian king Cotys. He later served the king of Persia, and then returned to Athens. From there he was sent to the relief of Corcyra, besieged by the Spartans. On his way he encountered a fleet of ten Syracusan ships, sent to help Sparta. He attacked and captured all but one of them (372 B.C.). As a captain of mercenaries he served sometimes against his own country. He was adopted by Amyntas, king of Macedonia, and with the fleet he was operating off the Macedonian coast he helped to secure the throne for Perdiccas, son of Amyntas, on the latter's death (368 B.C.). He sided with the Thracian king Cotys against Athens in a war over the Chersonese, but the Athenians later pardoned him, and made him commander, with Timotheus and Chares, of a fleet to put down a revolt of Chios. Timotheus and Iphicrates, experienced soldiers, disagreed with Chares' plan to attack Chios and refused to take part in it. Chares was driven off with losses. He accused Iphicrates and Timotheus of treachery. They were tried, but Iphicrates was able to secure his acquittal.

Iphidamas (i-fid'a-mas). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Antenor and Theano. He was brought up by his grandfather Cisseus in Thrace, and married there. When he learned of the Greek attack on Troy he left his bride, sailed to Percote where he left his 12 ships, and journeyed overland to Ilium to aid his kinsmen. He bravely attacked Agamemnon but his spear failed to penetrate Agamemnon's shield and Agamemnon killed him with a sword thrust.

Iphigenia/Iphigenia in Aulis

daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and a sister of Orestes and Electra. Her father sacrificed her to Artemis at Aulis, where the Greek fleet was prevented from sailing to Troy by violent storms, to appease the goddess for the death of one of her creatures and to obtain favorable winds. However, as the knife was put to her throat Artemis snatched her up and substituted a hind in her place. Agamemnon thought that she had been taken to live among the gods, but Artemis wafted her to Tauris. There she became a priestess in the temple which contained a sacred image of Artemis. Her duty was to prepare all strangers who inadvertently landed in Tauris as victims to be sacrificed in the temple. After some time, two Greeks were brought before her to be cleansed before they were sacrificed. She gloated over the opportunity thus presented to avenge herself on the people who had been willing to slay her at Aulis, but in the course of talking to the two strangers and of hearing of many whom she had known, her love for her country and her people revived and she resolved to help them escape. First she would give them a message to take to her brother. She handed a scroll to one of the Greeks and, reciting the message contained in it, directed him to give it to Orestes. At that he handed it to his companion. When suitable proof was forthcoming that this was indeed Orestes the three made plans to escape which, with the aid of Athena, they subsequently did, taking the sacred image with them. According to some accounts, Iphigenia ended her days as a priestess in a temple, set up at Brauron, which thereafter housed the sacred image brought from Tauris. Iphigenia is sometimes said to have been the daughter of Theseus and Helen, and to have been adopted and brought up by her aunt, Clytemnestra. See Iphigenia in Aulis and Iphigenia in Tauris.

Iphigenia in Aulis. A drama by Euripides, produced after his death by his son, 405 B.C. The play opens outside the tent of Agamemnon in the Greek camp, as Agamemnon, in distress, tells an old servant that glory is bound up with peril, and ambition with trouble. The servant, remarking that since he is a mere mortal, joy and sorrow will be his lot and the will of the gods will prevail, asks why he is troubled. Agamemnon relates the oath which Tyndareus compelled the suitors of Helen to take: that they would defend and protect the man she took as a husband. Now they are gathered at Aulis in fulfillment of their oath, to help Menelaus recapture Helen, who has been carried off to Troy by Paris. Agamemnon wishes someone else had been chosen commander. He has learned from the seer Calchas that the winds which hold them in Aulis are caused by the wrath of Artemis and only the sacrifice of Iphigenia will appease the goddess and send favorable winds. On the advice of Odysseus he has written to Clytemnestra commanding her to send their daughter to Aulis on the pretext that she is to be married to Achilles. Now his feelings as a father choke him. He has written the truth to Clytemnestra and asks the old servant to take it to prevent Iphigenia from journeying to Aulis.

Menelaus, who snatched the letter from the servant's hand, now enters and accuses Agamemnon. He reminds him that he sought out the glory of being captain of the Greeks. Furthermore, for his own pride's sake he agreed to the sacrifice of Iphigenia to obtain favorable winds so that he could lead his thousand ships against Troy. By changing his mind he has shown that he isn't fit to wield the power he craved, and all Hellas will suffer if a wife can be stolen from her husband with impunity. Agamemnon answers that he can't restore a virtuous wife to Menelaus, and he will not harm his own child to regain a beautiful but faithless wife for Menelaus.

A messenger announces the arrival of Iphigenia, with Clytemnestra and Orestes, and that everyone is curious as to her reasons for coming. Agamemnon, heartbroken, feels that as leader of the expedition he must carry out the sacrifice of his daughter, and is tormented by the responsibilities that fall on the high-born. His grief moves Menelaus, and he apologizes for his angry words. He offers to give up Helen and advises Agamemnon to disband the fleet. Agamemnon fears it is too late: Calchas will have told the oracles and the opinion of the armies will compel him to carry them out. They cannot kill

Calchas, as Menelaus now suggests, for Odysseus will stir up the mob against them.

Clytemnestra, radiant at the thought of the approaching marriage, greets Agamemnon with delight. Iphigenia, of all his children the one who loves him most, thinks he is sad to give her to a husband when he tells her it breaks his heart to part with his child. He interrupts Clytemnestra's eager questions and commands her to return to Argos. She refuses: he can command the army, but she will do what is fitting for a bride. Sad and worried, Agamemnon goes.

Achilles enters and complains about the delay in sailing. His men are restive; they want to proceed to Troy or return home. Clytemnestra joins him and is humiliated when she understands from his talk that he knows nothing of a proposed marriage. They both now learn for the first time, from the servant, of the oracles and of Agamemnon's trick to get Iphigenia to Aulis, and of his determination to sacrifice her. Achilles, angry and insulted that his name has been dragged into the affair, offers to help Clytemnestra save Iphigenia.

Iphigenia comes before Agamemnon, weeping, and when he asks why, Clytemnestra bluntly asks him if he means to murder his child. Both women plead with him, but he says the sacrifice must be carried out so that the fleet can sail and so that Hellas will hereafter be safe from wife-snatchers and raiders. As he leaves, Achilles returns, and tells them that the whole fleet has now learned of the oracles and demands that the sacrifice take place. When he raised his voice against it he was stoned. Even his own Myrmidons clamor for it and Odysseus has been named leader of a group to seize Iphigenia. As he again offers to fight to save her, Iphigenia speaks: she is willing to die to save Hellas; she will do it gloriously and her name will be blessed. Achilles, though admiring her unselfishness, urges her to think again, and if she changes her mind he will fight at the very altar to save her. When they are alone, Iphigenia tries to comfort Clytemnestra by picturing the glory she will have as the benefactress of Greece, and tells her she will go to the sacrifice alone. They depart.

Soon a messenger comes and calls Clytemnestra. His message is that, just as Calchas put the gleaming knife to Iphigenia's throat Iphigenia vanished, and in her place was a hind with its throat cut. Agamemnon comes and confirms the story. He says they are blest because their daughter has been chosen by the gods. Clytemnestra must take Orestes and go home now. He is going to Troy.

Iphigenia in Tauris. A play by Euripides, produced sometime between 413 and 408 B.C. As the play opens, Iphigenia is discovered before a barbaric temple on a desolate sea-coast. She stands near a blood-stained altar, and speaks of her ancestors and relates that her father thought he had killed her at Aulis. But Artemis carried her away and substituted a hind in her place as a sacrifice. The goddess had wafted her to Tauris where, as a priestess, she now prepares mortal victims to be sacrificed. Lately she has been saddened by a dream that convinces her that her brother Orestes is dead.

She goes into the temple and Orestes and Pylades enter furtively. Orestes reminds Pylades of his wanderings as a result of the slaying of his mother. Now he has come to Tauris, at Apollo's command, to fetch a sacred image of Artemis that lies in the temple. As Pylades encourages him, they leave, to hide until nightfall when they will attempt to steal the image.

Iphigenia returns, accompanied by her serving women, exiles like herself. She tells them of her dream and of her intention to perform funeral rites for Orestes. As she finishes the ceremonial rites a herdsman enters and describes two strangers who have been caught and who will be sacrificed to Artemis. He says they are Greeks and that one of them is mad. Iphigenia vows to be pitiless to these Greeks, the first who have fallen into her hands, since it was the Greeks who would have sacrificed her at Aulis. The bound victims are brought before her. She questions them and learns that Troy has fallen; Helen is living happily in Sparta with Menelaus; Calchas and Achilles are dead; Odysseus has not yet reached his home; Agamemnon is dead by his wife's hand; Clytemnestra has been slain by her son Orestes, and Electra is alive and unwed. On hearing of her family and her country Iphigenia's love for her people revives. Impulsively she offers to save the two Greeks and asks them to take a message to Argos. She will tell them what is in the message in case the scroll on which it is written should come to harm. She hands the scroll to Pylades, recites her message, and tells him to deliver it to Orestes. Thereupon, Pylades hands it to Orestes and says her message has been delivered. Orestes proves to her that he is really her brother and they are joyous in reunion. He tells her why he has come to Tauris. Immediately the three plan their escape from Thoas, king of the Taurians. Orestes suggests that they kill Thoas, but Iphigenia refuses to do this: Thoas has been kind to her. Instead, she proposes to tell him that Orestes, a matricide, must be purified in salt water, and that the image, which he had touched, must be purified also. In that way they will make their way to the sea, where a ship is moored, and make their escape. Iphigenia carries out this plan when Thoas comes, and tells him he must go into the temple and that all should cover their eyes during the ceremony of purification. The scheme succeeds and the three escape to the ship. As Thoas waits the end of the purification ceremony a messenger comes to tell him that the priestess has gone off with the strangers in a ship, but strong winds have driven them back to shore. Thoas, determined to recapture and kill them, is halted by the appearance of Athena. She tells him it is the will of the gods for Iphigenia to return to Greece with Orestes. At the same time she bids Orestes take the image to Greece and construct a temple for it. At the high festival in the temple she instructs that a sword must be touched to a man's throat, enough to draw a single drop of blood, as a record that Orestes had been saved from being sacrificed. Thoas, seeing that nothing will be gained from struggling against the gods, allows Iphigenia, Orestes, and Pylades to depart, and frees as well the exiled women who had attended Iphigenia.

Iphimedia (if'i-mē-dī'ā). In Greek mythology, the wife of Aloeus and the mother, by Poseidon, of Otus and Ephialtes, who were called the Aloadae, after their mother's husband. Iphimedia and her daughters were taken to Naxos by pirates, but were rescued by her sons, who then made themselves masters of the island.

Iphinoë (i-fin'ō-ē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Antia and Proetus. With her sisters, Iphianassa and Lysippe, she was driven mad, for offending either Dionysus or Hera. When Melampus sought to cure them the sisters fled wildly to Arcadia. Iphinoë died on the way.

Iphinoë. In Greek legend, a woman of Lemnos, who acted as Queen Hypsipyle's messenger when she invited Jason and the Argonauts to land and make themselves comfortable in Lemnos.

Iphis (ī'fis). In Greek legend, an Argive, the son of Alector. Polynices sought his advice when he wished to persuade Amphiarus to join him in the expedition against Thebes. Iphis said that Eriphyle, wife of Amphiarus, feared she was losing her looks and suggested to Polynices that he bribe her with the necklace of Harmonia (said to make its wearer beautiful), on condition that she persuade her husband to join the expedition. Some accounts list Eteocles, son of Iphis, as one of the Seven against Thebes.

Iphis. According to legend, a maiden of Crete who was brought up as a boy. Before she was born her father had ordered her mother, Telethusa, to put the expected child to death if it turned out to be a girl, because he could not afford to bring up a girl. Io appeared to Telethusa in a dream and advised her to deceive her husband if the child was a girl, and to bring it up as a boy, and promised to help Telethusa if necessary. When Iphis was born the deception was carried out and the father, unaware of it all, in due course betrothed his supposed son to a beautiful Cretan maiden, Ianthe. Iphis fell desperately in love with Ianthe, and the love was returned. Telethusa delayed the marriage as long as she could. When delay was no longer possible, Telethusa prayed to Io and reminded her of her promise of aid. As Telethusa and Iphis left the temple, Io answered her prayers and Iphis was transformed into a man.

Iphition (i-fish'i-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan. He was the son of Otrynteus and the nymph of Lake Gygaea, and was slain by Achilles in the Trojan War.

Iphitus (if'i-tus, ī'fi-). In Greek legend, a son

of Eurytus, king of Oechalia; he was the brother of Iole. He and his brother, Clytius, joined Jason on the expedition of the Argonauts to Colchis. Iphitus tried to persuade his father to honor the agreement which he had made with Heracles: to give him his daughter Iole if Heracles defeated him in an archery contest, but when Heracles won Eurytus refused to carry out his agreement. Later, Eurytus missed some of his cattle, and thought Heracles had taken them for revenge. He sent Iphitus to bring them back. Iphitus thought Heracles was innocent. Nevertheless he followed him and told him about the missing cattle. Heracles, inwardly seething because he erroneously thought Iphitus suspected him, took him to a tower in Tiryns, asked him if he could see the cattle, and when Iphitus admitted that he could not, Heracles hurled him to his death. Iphitus was the possessor of a famous bow, said by some to have been given to Eurytus by Apollo. Iphitus gave the bow to Odysseus, who had gone to Iphitus' land in search of some missing cattle, and it was afterwards used by Odysseus to slay the suitors of Penelope.

Iphthime (if'thi-mē, if-thī'mē). In the Odyssey, a daughter of Icarius. She was a sister of Penelope, whose shape Athena assumed in order to appear to Penelope in a dream and to assure her that Telemachus was safe, and that he was protected by the gods.

Ipoctonus (i-pok'to-nus). Epithet of Heracles. The people of Erythrae in Asia Minor worshiped Heracles under this name because he killed the bugs that attack the vines. The name means "Worm-" or "Grub-killer."

Ipsus (ip'sus). In ancient geography, a town in W central Asia Minor, in Phrygia. Here, in 301 B.C., Lysimachus and Seleucus defeated and slew Antigonos, and brought to an end the wars carried on by the successors of Alexander the Great.

Ire (ī'rē) or Ira (-rā). Ancient town in Messenia, on the eastern shore of the Gulf of Messenia. It was one of the seven gift cities offered by Agamemnon to Achilles if he would give up his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to the battle in the Trojan War. Later Abia, nurse of a descendant of Heracles, built a temple of Heracles here. When Cresphontes became master of Messenia he changed the name of Ire to Abia in honor of her.

Irene (ī-rē'nē). In Greek mythology, the goddess of peace; one of the three daughters of Zeus and Themis known as the Horae (goddesses of order and the seasons). The Romans identified their Pax with Irene.

Iris (ī'ris). The "wind-footed" messenger of the gods, and the goddess of the rainbow—the arc that touches sky and earth. She was the daughter of Thaumas and Electra and was the sister of the Harpies. She could go to the ends of the earth or even to the Unto help their favorites, or stir up the courage of the Trojans. Later she was considered more especially as the messenger of Hera. She was sent by Hera to tell Peleus to prepare for his marriage to Thetis; to warn the Boreadae not to kill the Harpies; to tell Menelaus that Paris had carried off Helen; to release Dido's soul from her body after she had committed suicide in despair over being abandoned by Aeneas. As a messenger, Iris had no will of her own, but must convey the commands, for good or ill, as she was instructed to do. Some say that as Hera's messenger she carried a jug of water which put perjurers to sleep.

Iron Age. In classical mythology, a name given to the last (and the worst) of the four ages of mankind or the world, as described by Hesiod and Ovid. It is an age of hard work and agricultural toil, of constant care and trouble, of shame and falsehood, of moral, mental, physical, and spiritual decay; a period in which the only thing that triumphs is Evil. In this age, the land, which was formerly common to all, is divided into private property and becomes a source of conflict. Iron and gold are discovered and find use as material for arms in the wars that continually erupt. The evils of men are so great that Justice leaves the earth and retires to Olympus. It is in marked contrast to the first, and best, age, the Golden Age, when Cronus (Saturn) ruled, and is inferior even to the Silver Age, when people were foolish and arrogant, and to the Bronze (or Brazen) Age, which was an age of war. Hesiod, who described the Ages of Man, and with particular bitterness his own Age of Iron, also wrote of the Age of Heroes, in which men descended from gods fought gloriously and at the end of their days were transported to the Elysian Fields. This Age preceded the Iron Age.

Irus (í'rus). In the Odyssey, a nickname given to Arnaeus, a beggar of gigantic stature whose size deluded him into thinking he was as strong as he looked. He kept watch over the suitors of Penelope and was employed by them as a messenger, whence his nickname. When Odysseus, disguised as a beggar, returned to his own palace, Irus threatened him and told him to be off. He wanted no other beggars poaching on his territory.

Odysseus refused to leave and Irus, egged on by the amused suitors, challenged him to a fight, hoping that his challenge would not be accepted. Odysseus was glad to accept, however, and with one mighty blow knocked him out of the palace. He never begged in those halls again.

Isaeus (i-sē'us, -zē'-). One of the Ten Attic orators, and a professional writer of speeches. He was born at Chalcis or Athens c420 B.C.; died 350 B.C. He was a pupil of Isocrates and, some say, a teacher of Demosthenes. His 11 extant orations, mainly on contested inheritances, provide considerable light on the private law of Athens.

Isander (i-san'dér). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Bellerophon, and the brother of Hippolochus and Laodamia. He resigned his claim to his father's kingdom in favor of his nephew Sarpedon. While fighting against the Solymi he was slain by Ares.

Isauria (i-sô'ri-ä). In ancient geography, a district in Asia Minor on the northern side of the Taurus range, bounded by Phrygia on the N, Lycaonia on the E, Cilicia on the S, and Pisidia on the W. The surface was rugged. The inhabitants were famous in guerrilla warfare. They were defeated by Servilius in 76 B.C., and by Pompey, but continued unsubdued.

Ischepolis (is-kep'ô-lis). In Greek legend, a son of Alcathous, king of Megara. He went to join Meleager in the hunt for the Calydonian Boar and was slain. His body was returned to Megara and buried near the law courts there.

Ischia (ēs'kyä). [Ancient names, Aenaria, Pithecusa.] Volcanic island in the Tyrrhenian Sea, situated about 16 miles W of Naples. It was early colonized by Greeks from Eretria and Chalcidice, but was abandoned by them because of the volcanic eruptions of Monte Epomeo. Hieron I, tyrant of Syracuse, sent a garrison there (c470 B.C.) but they refused to stay when the volcano erupted again. The island has many hot springs and was known as a spa from Roman times. In ancient times it was known as Pithecusa (q.v.).

Ischys (is'kis). In Greek mythology, a son of Elatus of Arcadia. Coronis, beloved by Apollo, was unfaithful to the god with Ischys. White crows reported her infidelity to Apollo and were turned black for bringing the bad news (which the all-seeing god already knew), instead of remaining to peck out the eyes of Ischys. Ischys was slain, either by a thunderbolt of Zeus or by an arrow of Apollo.

Isernia (i-sér'ni-ä). See Aesernia.

Ishtar (ish'tär). [Also: Istar.] Principal goddess of Assyrian and Babylonian mythology, great mother-goddess or earth-mother goddess of love, fertility, sex, and war. As mother-goddess she was identified with the Sumerian Nana or Inanna, Phoenician Astarte or Ashtoreth, Greek Aphrodite, Roman Venus. She was also associated with the planet Venus. In her warlike character she was conceived of by the Babylonians as ruling the morning star; as goddess of love she ruled the evening star. The Assyrians distinguished between the Ishtar whose shrine was at Arbela, who presided over battles, and Ishtar of Nineveh, in whom the voluptuous aspect predominated. Ishtar also occurs as an appellation, or generic name, for a goddess in general. The story of Ishtar and her lover Tammuz, his death, her mourning for him, and her descent to the Underworld to bring him back, the parching of the earth in her absence, and the return of vegetation with her return is the great vegetation myth of Asia Minor and the Mediterranean region.

Isis (i'sis). In Egyptian mythology, the chief female deity; the sister, wife, and female counterpart of Osiris, and the mother of Horus. The most famous of all Egyptian goddesses, she was distinguished by the solar disk and cow's horns on her head, and in this aspect was often identified with Hathor. She was identified by the Greeks with Athena and Demeter. Her worship in a modified form, as a nature-goddess, was introduced subsequently to the Alexandrine epoch into Greece, and was very popular at Rome from the end of the Republic. The Greek and Roman priests and priestesses of Isis wore a special costume, and had as an attribute a form of dance rattle, the sistrum, which traveled with the cult of Isis through the Roman Empire as far as Gaul. On her statue was an inscription mentioned by Proclus: "I am that which is, has been, and shall be. My veil no one has lifted. The fruit I bore was the Sun"; hence the well-known allusion to a mystery as covered with "the veil of Isis." In Egypt she was also identified with Sothis, the Dog Star, and in later days with the planet Venus. As Neith she was the divine originator and patroness of weaving and other womanly arts. Her cult persisted in Europe until the latter half of the 6th century A.D.

Island of the Sun. An island where the magnificent oxen of the Sun (Helius) lived. Whoever ate of the oxen was doomed to death. It was here that Odysseus lost his entire company because, in spite of warnings given them by Circe and Odysseus, they slew and roasted some of the cattle. The island was Trinacria (Sicily).

Islands of the Blest. Another name for the Elysian Fields, or Elysium, the last home of heroes, sons of the gods, and those whose noble lives or participation in the Mysteries of Demeter earned them the happiness of dwelling there.

Ismarus (is'mä-rus). In Greek legend, a Theban who killed Hippomedon in the war of the Seven against Thebes.

Ismarus. A city of the Cicones, on the northern shores of the Aegean Sea. It was sacked by Odysseus on his way home from Troy. It was from this city that Odysseus took the wine which he later used to such advantage on Polyphemus, the chief of the Cyclopes.

Ismene (is-mē'nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Oedipus and Jocasta, and the sister of Antigone, Eteocles, and Polynices. She dared not join Antigone in her defiance of Creon when he forbade anyone to bury the body of Polynices, who had been slain attacking Thebes. Ismene wanted to share Antigone's punishment when the latter was led away to her death for her defiance, but Antigone scorned her. She told Ismene that since she had cautiously refused to act in defiance of Creon because she desired to live, now she must live.

Ismenium (is-mē'ni-um). Place in Boeotia where there was an oracle of Apollo. Oracles were given as a result of the inspection of entrails of victims.

Ismenus (is-mē'nus). According to Greek tradition, a son of the river-god Asopus and Metope. He went to Boeotia and settled on the banks of the small river that flows by Thebes and is called the Ismenus River in his honor.

Isocrates (i-sok'ra-tēz). One of the Ten Attic actor; up, lûte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; $\tau\eta$, then; δ as d or j, ς as s or sh, τ as t or ch, ζ as z or zh.

Orators, a professional speech-writer and teacher of rhetoric. He was born (436 B.C.) at Athens, the son of a wealthy flute manufacturer, and received a good education. When his father lost his money in the Peloponnesian Wars Isocrates was compelled to earn his living. He studied with Gorgias, and then went to Chios, where he taught rhetoric. On his return to Athens he opened a school (c392 B.C.) of rhetoric and philosophy. This school, intended to further the study of history, dialectics, mathematics, literature, and the use of language, was highly successful. He numbered among his pupils statesmen, poets, historians, and the orators Isaeus, Hyperides, and Lycurgus. Isocrates' view of life, expounded in his Speech on the Exchange of Property, was to steer a middle course between the purely practical and the purely philosophic. He defended his course on the ground that the practical man lacks culture and imagination, while the philosopher becomes too detached from life. He found that his course was much criticized from both directions, but his school and the culture he imparted in it were extremely popular. It is said that through shyness and because of a weak voice he kept aloof from an active public life. He attempted to exercise political influence through his writings. His Panegyricus, written (380 B.C.) for the Hundredth Olympiad, extolled the contributions of Athens to Greece, urged the Spartans to share supremacy of Greece with Athens, and exhorted all the Greek states to abandon their rivalries and unite against the barbarians. He was a friend and admirer of Evagoras of Salamis who alone fought against the Persians for eight years. When Evagoras was assassinated Isocrates transferred his admiration to his son. In 356 B.C. Isocrates addressed himself to Archidamus, king of Sparta, urging him to unite the Greeks on the mainland and free the Greeks in Asia. Archidamus failed him. Isocrates recognized that Philip of Macedon was the rising power. With unimpaired patriotism after the first peace with Philip (346 B.C.), he addressed him and urged him to seize the magnificent opportunity he now had to unite Greece, make himself the champion of liberty, and become the benefactor of the world. His views on Philip and the Macedonians made him extremely unpopular. He lived, in full vigor of mind and body, nearly 100 years, and saw all his hopes for Greek unity and democracy completely crushed. In 338 B.C., a few days after the Battle of Chaeronea in which Philip defeated the Athenians and the Boeotians, Isocrates died. Some say he starved himself to death in despair over the loss of Greek liberty. Isocrates was a master of style, whose influence extended to all subsequent Greek prose. According to Gilbert Murray, the essay-writing of Isocrates' school "forms in one sense the final perfection of ancient prose, in another the ruin of what was most characteristically Attic or indeed Hellenic. It is smooth, self-restrained, correct, euphonious, impersonal. . . . It has lasted on from that day to this, and is the basis of prose style in Latin and in modern languages." Of the Orations of Isocrates, which he did not speak himself but wrote for others, 21 are extant.

Issus (is'us). In ancient geography, a town in Cilicia, SE Asia Minor, situated near the head of the Gulf of Issus, about 45 miles E of what is now Adana, Turkey. Here Alexander the Great defeated (333 B.C.) the Persians under Darius III; Septimius Severus defeated (194 A.D.) his rival Pescennius Niger; and Heraclius defeated (622) a Persian army.

Ister (is'ter). An ancient name for the Danube River.

Istria (is'tri-a). [Also: Ister, Istropolis.] In ancient geography, a colony of the Milesians, founded about the time of the Cimmerian invasion of Asia Minor (7th century B.C.), near the mouth of the Ister (the modern Danube). It was a trading center for the lower Danube basin for many centuries.

Istvaeones (ist-vē'ō-nēz). Group of ancient Germanic tribes inhabiting the Rhine region, mentioned by Tacitus, and including the Batavi, Bructeri, Chatti, Sicambri, Tencteri, Ubii, and Usipetes. The last four tribes are also mentioned by Julius Caesar: the Tencteri and Usipetes as having invaded Gaul in 55 B.C., the Sicambri whose villages he burned, and the Ubii whom he protected against the Suebi (Suevi).

Isus (i'sus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a bastard son of Priam. In the early days of the Trojan War he was captured, with his half-brother Antiphus, by Achilles but was released for ransom. Later, he joined the battle and in the tenth year of the war was slain by Agamemnon.

Italica (i-tal'i-kā). Ancient Roman town in Spain, near Seville; founded by Scipio Africanus in 206 B.C. It has ruins of an amphitheater, and is said to have been the birthplace of three emperors: Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius I.

Ithaca (ith'-a-kā). [Modern Greek, Ithake, Thiaki.] One of the Ionian Islands, about two miles NE of Cephallenia. According to tradition, it was the center of the island kingdom of Odysseus, which comprised in addition, the islands of Dulichium, Same, and Zacynthus, and was the site of his palace. As described in the Odyssey, it has no plains suitable for agriculture or the rearing of horses, but has a topography well adapted for goats. The location of Ithaca, commanding the routes to Corcyra, Elis and Triphylia, and the western entrance to the Gulf of Corinth, could have given it the maritime importance it had as Odysseus' kingdom. From this island he sailed with 12 ships to accompany the Greeks to Troy. Some say that the topographical descriptions given by Homer in the Odyssey fit the island Leukas more accurately than Ithaca. And other scholars, in consideration of the topographical details, point out that Homer was writing poetry, and his descriptions are not necessarily to be taken as a geographical guide, although in fact they have been so taken, successfully in some cases. Excavations by archaeologists have not been able to support either claim; the question remains an open one.

Ithomatas (i-thō'mā-tas). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Of Ithome." When Polycaon and Messene first came into the Peloponnesus they established a precinct of Zeus Ithomatas on the summit of Mount Ithome in Messenia. Subsequently the worship of Zeus Ithomatas was neglected, but it was reestablished by Glaucus, the grandson of Cresphontes. The Messenians claimed that Zeus was born in their land, and was reared by two nymphs—Neda, for whom a river was named, and Ithome, for whom Mount Ithome was named. The Messenians carried water from the spring, where the infant Zeus was said to have been bathed after he was born, to the sanctuary of Zeus Ithomatas. The image in the temple was made by Ageladas. The priest of Zeus Ithomatas, who was chosen annually, kept the image in his house; annually also a festival, the Ithomaea, was held. In the First Messenian War with Sparta, the oracle at Delphi told the Messenians that the side that first set up 100 tripods in the precinct of Zeus Ithomatas would win. The Messenians set about making tripods, but the Spartans learned of the oracle also, and one of their number fashioned 100 tripods of clay and secretly entered the precinct where he set them up. Again, when Aristodemus, the Messenian leader in the war, was about to sacrifice to Zeus Ithomatas, the victims rushed into the fire of their own accord; this too, was an omen of Messenian defeat and in fact the Messenians lost the war. In the Second Messenian War the besieged Messenians became suppliants at the altar of Zeus Ithomatas, and were allowed to depart under a truce, because the Spartans were warned by an oracle not to harm the suppliants of Zeus Ithomatas. In 371 B.C. when the new city of Messene was founded with the aid of Epaminondas, the Messenians sacrificed to Zeus Ithomatas when the foundations of their new city, of which Mount Ithome was one wall, were laid. The Messenians claimed that Leuctra, in Laconia, was once a part of Messenia, because once a fire destroyed a forest there, and when the ground was bared a statue of Zeus Ithomatas was found to have been dedicated there. The finding of the image confirmed the Messenians in their claim that Leuctra had once been Messenian.

Ithome (i-thō'mē). A strong, natural fortress west of the Pamisus River in the western mountains of Messenia. To it the Messenians withdrew in the First Messenian War with Sparta (8th century B.C.), and walled it. In the Second Messenian War (7th century B.C.), under the command of Aristomenes, they were again defeated after a long struggle, but were permitted to withdraw from their fortress on Mount Eira unharmed on condition that they never return to the Peloponnesus. Before he left, Aristomenes returned to Ithome and in a remote spot buried the mysteries that had been brought to Mes-senia by Caucon. Nearly 300 years later, the mysteries were recovered, owing to a dream had by Epaminondas, the Theban conqueror of the Spartans at Leuctra (371 B.C.). His dream instructed him to restore the Messenians to the land where the mysteries were found. He recalled them from their exile all over the Greek world, and to the music of flutes helped them to lay out a new city, which bore the name Messene. Ithome formed the citadel of the new city, and one side of its boundaries.

Itius Portus (ish'i-us pôr'tus). In ancient geography, the place from which Caesar sailed for Britain; generally identified with Boulogne or Ushant (Île d'Ouessant).

Itonia (i-tō'ni-a). Epithet of Athena. Some say the goddess was the daughter of the Boeotian Itonius. There was a sanctuary of Athena Itonia in Boeotia, at which the annual assemblies of the Boeotians were held. At another sanctuary of Athena Itonia, between Pherae and Larisa in Thessaly, Pyrrhus dedicated the shields he took from the Gallic mercenaries of Antigonos II (273 B.C.). Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, caused the following inscription to be put with the shields: "Pyrrhus the Molossian hung these shields taken from the bold Gauls as a gift to Itonian Athena, when he had destroyed all the host of Antigonos. It is no great marvel. The Aeacidae (descendants of Aeacus) are warriors now even as they were of old."

Itonius (i-tō'ni-us). In Greek mythology, a Boeotian, said by some to be the father of Athena and Iodama.

Itylus (it'i-lus, i'ti-). In Greek mythology, the only child of Aëdon and Zethus. Aëdon, jealous of Niobe and her seven sons and seven daughters, plotted to slay Niobe's oldest son as he slept with Itylus. By mistake she killed Itylus and was transformed by Zeus into a nightingale, forever mourning for her son.

Itys (i'tis, it'is). In Greek legend, the son of Tereus and Procne, killed and served as a meal to his father by Procne and her sister Philomela. Tereus had seduced Philomela and torn out her tongue. After the revenge of the sisters, they fled, with Tereus in pursuit. See Procne.

Iulus (i-ū'lus). In Latin legend, a son of Ascanius (son of Aeneas) or, according to

other accounts, a surname of Ascanius himself.

Ivory Gate. In classical mythology, the gate of sleep by which false dreams are sent from the lower world.

Ixion (ik-si'on, ik'si-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Phlegyas, king of the Lapithae. In order to avoid paying the gifts he had promised so that he might marry Dia, daughter of Eioneus, he constructed a hidden pit in front of his palace, in which he placed a red-hot charcoal fire. When Eioneus came to the palace he fell into the pit and was consumed by the fire. Aeschylus names Ixion as the first murderer. Nevertheless, Zeus purified him and even invited him to dine with the gods. But Ixion had no gratitude. On the contrary, he planned to seduce Hera, sister and wife of Zeus. Zeus forestalled him in this by substituting a cloud in the form of Hera in Ixion's arms. The cloud-born woman, Nephele, eventually bore Centaurus, ancestor of the centaurs, to Ixion but in the meantime Ixion was punished for his presumption in daring even to think of embracing Hera. He was fixed to a fiery wheel and revolves eternally in the deepest reaches of Tartarus, in the section of Hades reserved for the desperate men who have sinned against the gods.

Iynx (ī'inks). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pan and Echo. According to some accounts, it was she who caused Zeus to fall in love with Io, by putting a spell on him. She was transformed by Hera into a wryneck, a kind of woodpecker.

Janiculum (jā-nik'ū-lum). [Also: Mons Janiculus, Mons Aureus; Italian, Monte Gianicolo.] Long ridge or hill in Rome, on the W bank of the Tiber, extending S from the Vatican, and opposite the Capitoline and Aventine hills. It is the highest of the seven hills of Rome, attaining an elevation of about 276 feet. At its highest point, guarding the Via Aurelia which here crosses the Janiculum, was an early blockhouse. Where the 3rd-century wall of Aurelian (270–275 A.D.) crosses the Via Aurelia was the Porta Aurelia, dismantled in 1643 and replaced by the modern Porta San Pancrazio. Nearby are the buildings of the American Academy. (JJ)

Janus (jā'nus). In Roman mythology, the ancient god of doorways and the special patron of the beginning of all undertakings, explained as the spirit of the doorway, its mana or numen. As god of beginnings his blessing was sought for the beginning of each day, month, and year, and at births, the beginning of life. As a Roman deity, he was credited with having given man the knowledge of agriculture, civil law, and coinage. As the protector of doors and gateways, he was represented as holding a staff or scepter in the right hand and a key in the left; and as the god of the sun's rising and setting he had two faces, one looking to the east, and the other to the west. His temple at Rome was kept open in time of war, and was closed only in the rare event of universal peace. His festival, the Agonia or Agonalia, was celebrated on January 9.

Jason (jā'son). In Greek legend, a son of Aeson. His mother is variously named as Perimede, Amphinome, Alcimede, and Poly-mede. Pelias, the half-brother of Aeson, seized Aeson's throne in Iolcus and would have killed Jason but his mother pretended that he had been born dead and lamented over him. She then spirited him away to Chiron the centaur, who brought him up on Mount Pelion. When he reached manhood, Jason returned to Iolcus to claim the throne. On the way he came to the Anaurus River. It was in flood and an old hag waiting on the bank asked him to carry her across. Jason did so, although many others had refused her request. (The old hag was Hera in disguise, and from then on she aided and protected Jason.) As he was crossing the river he lost one of his sandals in the mud. He arrived therefore before Pelias, clad in a leopard skin, but wearing only one sandal. Now Pelias had been warned to beware of a man wearing one sandal, and when he saw Jason he was frightened. He asked Jason who he was. Jason told him his name and his errand, and the relationship between the two was revealed. Pelias assured Jason that he would be glad to give up the throne in his favor, but that he was troubled by the ghost of Phrixus, which haunted him with the demand that the Golden Fleece of the ram on which Phrixus had escaped from Orchomenus, and which now hung in a grove in Colchis, be restored to Hellas. Once the Fleece was brought back, Pelias assured him, he would be glad to give up the throne. Jason agreed to go to Colchis to secure the Golden Fleece. Other accounts say that when Pelias saw Jason shod with one sandal, he asked him what he would do if he knew someone threatened his life. Jason replied that he would send him to Colchis to fetch the Golden Fleece. Hera had put these words into his mouth, wishing to bring glory to Jason and to punish Pelias.

However it happened, Jason made ready to go to Colchis. Many heroes of Greece responded to his call to help him secure the Fleece, among them Heracles, Iphiclus, Admetus, Oileus, Telamon and Peleus, Idmon, Castor and Polydeuces, Mopsus, Augeas,

Jason/

Idas and Lynceus, Meleager, the Boreadae, various sons of Hermes, Poseidon, Apollo, and many others. A ship was built at Pagasae and named the Argo after Argus, who built it with Athena's help. Those who sailed in her became known as the Argonauts. Jason was made commander of the expedition. The Argo sailed from Pagasae, and after a brief stop on the coast of Magnesia, went to Lemnos. There the Argonauts were beguiled for more than a year by the Lemnian women who, having killed all the males on the island, were delighted to welcome the Argonauts. Jason became the father of two sons, Euneus and Nebrophonus, by Hypsipyle, the Lemnian queen. After more than a year had passed, Heracles, according to some accounts, reminded the Argonauts of their mission and they continued their journey. In the course of the voyage the Argonauts landed among the Doliones, and by a tragic mistake killed their king Cyzicus. In Mysia they lost Heracles, who was separated from his companions while he searched for his squire Hylas. On the island of the Bebryces, Amycus, their king, challenged any member of the crew of the Argo to a boxing contest. He was defeated and killed by Polydeuces, and his followers were crushed by the Argonauts. Continuing, the Argonauts landed at Salmydessus in Thrace, where they found Phineus, a son of Agenor or Poseidon. He was living in misery, tormented by Harpies who defiled his food, and blinded by Zeus because of his power to predict the future accurately. The Boreadae banished the Harpies and Phineus gave the Argonauts much valuable advice on how to avoid the pitfalls that lay ahead of them. Leaving Phineus, they passed safely through the Symplegades, the "Clashing Rocks," sailed by the land of the Mariandyni after having been welcomed there by the king, and passed the country of the Amazons, and the island of Ares. There they found King Aeëtes' four grandsons who had been shipwrecked, and took them aboard the Argo to return them to Colchis.

After many adventures in which Jason was often discouraged, they arrived in Colchis, the kingdom of Aeëtes where hung the Golden Fleece. King Aeëtes was enraged when he learned the errand of the Argo- nauts, but he planned to avoid giving up the Fleece by making Jason submit to a test which he was sure would destroy him. He agreed to give Jason the Fleece if he could yoke two fire-breathing bulls, plow a field, and sow it with the dragon's teeth which Athena had given to Aeëtes. These dragon's teeth had come from Thebes where Cadmus had killed the dragon, sown some of the teeth, and given the rest to Athena. Hera and Athena, anxious for Jason, appealed to Aphrodite to aid him. The goddess of love and beauty bribed her son Eros with a golden ball, and he caused Medea, daughter of Aeëtes, to fall in love with Jason by piercing her with one of his arrows at the instant when Medea's eyes lighted on Jason. Torn between her filial duty and the great love which had come to her so suddenly, Medea decided to betray her father by telling Jason how he could succeed in the trial of courage which her father had set for him. She met Jason in a grove at night and offered her help. Jason promised to take her to Iolcus and to marry her in return for her aid. She gave him the Charm of Prometheus which made invulnerable for one day the person and weapons of whoever was anointed with it. This protected him from the fire-breathing bulls. She told him that when he sowed the dragon's teeth, armed men would spring up. He must cast a stone among them, whereupon they would fight each other to the death. Jason followed her instructions and successfully carried out the test that Aeëtes had set for him.

Aeëtes, however, was enraged. He knew that Jason had succeeded only with the help of Medea, and plotted to seize and kill him. Medea warned Jason of her father's intentions. She lulled the never-sleeping dragon and allowed Jason to steal the Golden Fleece; then they fled to the ship and sailed from Colchis, pursued by Aeëtes. Some say Apsyrtus, brother of Medea, went with them, and that Medea cut him to pieces and flung the parts of his body into the sea. This delayed Aeëtes in his pursuit, because he stopped to gather the pieces of his son's body for burial. Others say Apsyrtus pursued Jason with a large fleet, that he was lured into meeting Medea alone, and that Jason sprang out on him from ambush and killed him. The Argonauts then continued their flight. But they were harassed by many ills. At last the sacred oak of Dodona, which had been placed in the hull of the Argo by Athena, spoke to Jason and informed him his woes would not cease until he had been purified for the murder of Apsyrtus. He was to go to the island of Circe where the enchantress would sprinkle the blood of a pig on his hands and purify him.

After being purified, Jason and the Argonauts continued their journey. They passed the Sirens successfully, and with the help of Thetis navigated safely by the Wandering Rocks and Scylla and Charybdis. They landed at length on Drepana (also known as Corcyra) and were received by Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians. Here the Colchians caught up with them and would have taken Medea, but Arete, wife of Alcinous, persuaded her husband not to give up Medea if she were already married to Jason. But if they were not married he would hand Medea over to the Colchians. Arete immediately arranged a wedding. When the Argonauts at last returned to Iolcus (for more detailed information on the voyage of the Argo, see Argonautica), Jason learned that his father and mother were dead and that the king Pelias, having heard a false rumor that the Argonauts had all perished, had slain his young brother, Promachus. Jason planned to attack Pelias and seize the throne. However, Medea disposed of Pelias single-handed by means of her magic arts. Jason arranged good marriages for the three daughters of Pelias and out of fear of vengeance resigned the throne of Iolcus to Acastus, the son of Pelias. He then took the Golden Fleece to Orchomenus and hung it in the temple of Zeus. Next he dedicated the Argo to Poseidon on the Isthmus of Corinth. Then he and Medea went to Corinth where they lived happily together for ten years and became the parents of several children, some say seven boys and seven girls.

At the end of this time Jason proposed to leave Medea and to marry Glauce (or Creusa), daughter of Creon, the king of Corinth. Medea reminded him of all he owed to her. But Jason persisted in his plan to abandon Medea, although he offered to make suitable provision for her and her children. Medea, inflamed by his ingratitude, sent a robe to Glauce as a wedding gift. It was impregnated with magic and the instant Glauce put it on, it burned her to ashes. Her father also was consumed by the flames which sprang from it. Medea fled in a winged chariot drawn by dragons, after killing some of her children, and Jason too was forced into exile for being false to his oath to Medea. He wandered friendless about Greece and at last came to the Isthmus of Corinth where he had beached the Argo. As he sat in the shadow of its hull, remembering his past glorious exploits, the prow of the old ship broke off and fell on him, killing him instantly. To show that the Argo was innocent of his death, its image was set among the stars. The legend of Medea's betrayal and revenge spawned many variants. In Euripides' tragedy, for instance, Jason and Medea, with two sons, are living in exile at Corinth when the king offers Jason his daughter's hand in marriage, and with it the right of succession. It is Jason's eagerness to embrace this opportunity to repair his fortunes which triggers Medea's insane response.

Jaxartes (jak-sär'tēz). In ancient geography, a river (modern Syr Darya) of Scythia, in C Asia. Alexander the Great crossed the river (328 B.C.) and penetrated Scythia. Returning, he founded a city on the banks of the Jaxartes where it crossed the borders of Sogdiana. He named the new city Alexandria Eschata (Furthest), because it was intended to mark the northeastern limit of his empire. In succeeding centuries, the name of the city was changed to Khodjend. It is now Leninabad, in the Tadzhik Soviet Socialist Republic, U.S.S.R.

Jocasta (jō-kas'ta) or Jocate (-tē). [Called in Homer: Epicaste.] In Greek legend, a daughter of Menoeceus of Thebes and the sister of Creon. She was married to Laius, king of Thebes. When her son was born, Laius had his feet pierced and bound and ordered him exposed on Mount Cithaeron, because an oracle had foretold that his son would slay him and marry his mother. But his orders were not carried out. Oedipus, his infant son, fell into the hands of Polybus of Corinth and was brought up by him and his wife Merope as their own son. On reaching manhood, Oedipus fled from Corinth, because he regarded Polybus and Merope as his parents and he had been made aware of the oracle by visiting Delphi. On the road he met Laius and, unaware of his true identity, killed him. He then solved the riddle of the Theban Sphinx, thus causing her death, and went to Thebes where he was made king and given the newly widowed Jocasta for a wife. Jocasta bore him two sons, Eteocles and Polynices, and two daughters, Antigone and Ismene. When dark hints began to gather that Oedipus himself might be the murderer of Laius, for whom all Thebes—led by Oedipus—was seeking in order to lift a plague, Jocasta tried to persuade him to give up his investigations. She also pleaded with him to cease his inquiries into his origin. To his talk of oracles she cited many which, as she thought, had not come true. She said an oracle had told Laius that he would be slain by his son, but that his son had been exposed, and Laius was killed by robbers. But all the reassuring things she told him became hollow as the pieces of Oedipus' story fell into place. When Jocasta learned the horrifying truth that he was actually her son, his father's murderer, and the father of her children, she hanged herself.

Josephus (jō-sē'fus), Flavius. [Usually shortened to Josephus.] Jewish priest, soldier, statesman, and historian; born at Jerusalem, 37 A.D.; died at Rome, sometime between 95 and 100 A.D. The son of a priest and descendant of royalty, he studied Hebrew law and Greek and Hebrew literature. After spending three years in the desert with Banus, a hermit, he was chosen to serve as a delegate to Nero in 64. Upon his return from Rome, he was appointed governor of Galilee by the Sanhedrin, the great council of the Jews at Jerusalem. In 66 he was active in the Jewish revolt against Rome, and led in the defense of Jotapata for 47 days before he surrendered to Vespasian. He won the favor of the latter (as he had previously won that of Nero's mistress Poppaea Sabina) by making predictions calculated to please his hearers (he told Vespasian that he would become emperor). He went with Vespasian to Alexandria, was later freed, adopted the family name of Vespasian (Flavius), became a Roman citizen, and was given a pension and a considerable estate in Judea. He continued to enjoy the protection of Vespasian, and later of Titus and Domitian (he was with Titus at the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D.). His works are a History of the Jewish War, in seven books, first written in Aramaic and then translated into Greek; Antiquities of the Jews, in 20 books, dealing with the history of the Jewish people from the beginning of time to the year 66; Vita (his autobiography), in which he denies the charges made by his enemy, Justus of Tiberias, that he was responsible for the Jewish rebellion; and Contra Apionem, two essays in which he defends the Jews against the attacks of Apion, an anti-Semitic Alexandrian.

Juba I (jō'bā). [Also: Iuba.] Committed suicide, 46 B.C. King of Numidia, an ally of Pompey. He defeated the Caesareans under Curio in 49 B.C., and in 47–46 B.C. supported Metellus Scipio, whose forces were defeated at Thapsus. Following this, Juba died by his own hand at Zama.

Juba II. [Also: Iuba.] King of Mauretania, son of Juba I of Numidia; died c19 A.D. He was taken to Rome (46 B.C.) as a young child to form part of Caesar's triumphal procession and eventually became a protégé of Octavian. He was made king of Numidia c30 B.C., married Cleopatra Selene, daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, in 29 B.C., and was transferred by Augustus to Mauretania in 25 B.C. He established his capital at an old Carthaginian depot, Iol, which he renamed Caesarea (modern Cherchel). He was noted as a man of broad culture, as an art collector and author, in Greek, of many works on history and natural history, now all lost. (JJ)

Jugurtha (jō-gér'thā). [Also: Iugurtha.] Executed at Rome, 104 B.C. King of Numidia; son of Mastanabal and grandson of Masinissa. On the death of his uncle Micipsa in 118 B.C., he and Micipsa's two sons inherited the kingdom. He usurped western Numidia in 117 B.C. and eastern Numidia in 112. A war with Rome commenced as a result in 111, and he contended against Metellus in 109 and 108 and against Marius in 107 B.C. He was captured by Sulla, was exhibited by Marius in a triumphal procession at Rome in 104 B.C., and was then put to death by strangling.

Julia (jöl'ya). Daughter of Julius Caesar and his first wife Cornelia. She was born c83 B.C.; died 54 B.C. She was betrothed to Servilius Caepio, but instead became the wife of Pompey the Great in 59 B.C. At this point in his career Caesar needed Pompey's armies and his influence, and he used his daughter as a means of gaining Pompey's support. When she died in childbirth, Caesar gave a gladiatorial show and a public banquet in her honor.

Julia. Daughter of Augustus Caesar and Scribonia, born 39 B.C.; died at Rhegium, 14 A.D. She was married in 25 B.C. to Marcus Claudius Marcellus, on whose death in 23 B.C. she became the wife of Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa, by whom she became the mother of Caius and Lucius Caesar, Agrippa Postumus, Julia, and Agrippina. After Agrippa's death in 12 B.C., she married Tiberius for reasons of state. Her private life was the scandal of Rome, and it was particularly galling to Augustus when he learned of it, as he regarded himself as the upholder of public morals. Tiberius divorced her, and Augustus banished her, first to the island of Pandataria, and afterward to Rhegium.

Julia. Daughter of Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of Augustus Caesar; died 28 A.D. She seemed to have inherited the vices of her mother, and was banished by Augustus in 9 A.D. to the island of Trimerus.

Julian Calendar. A calendar instituted by Julius Caesar, radically reforming the lunar calendar previously in use at Rome, whose intercalations had invited political manipulation. Advised by Sosigenes, a Greek astronomer from Alexandria, Caesar added 80 days to the year 46 B.C., giving it 445 days in all, to bring the civil year into agreement with the solar. He made 45 B.C. the first year of a new calendar based on the ancient solar calendar of Egypt, with 12 months of 31 or 29 days, totaling 365 days; unlike the Egyptian calendar, provision was made for the intercalation of one extra day every four years. (This, the most accurate calendar devised up to that time, nevertheless incorporated an error of three days every 400 years. By the time of Pope Gregory XIII this amounted to ten days, necessitating the further correction contained in Gregory's Bull of February 24, 1582, giving us the Gregorian Calendar, now in general use.) Even Caesar's calendar suffered a mishap at the start; for some years the intercalary day was mistakenly added every third year instead of every fourth (the Romans counting both ends of a period, as usual), resulting in an error which was discovered and corrected during the principate of Augustus. The lengths of the months in days, however, have remained unchanged since the time of Augustus. (JJ)

Julian Emperors. Collective name for the Roman emperors Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members by birth or adoption of the family of Julius Caesar.

Juno (jö'nō). In Roman mythology, the queen of heaven, the highest deity in the Roman pantheon next to Jupiter, of whom she was both the sister and the wife. As a daughter of Saturn she was identified with the Greek Hera. She was the special protectress of marriage. Under her auspices the bride was conducted to the bridegroom's house, the door posts were anointed to bring her favor, and the marriage girdle was untied. The month of June (named for her) is still the popular marriage month. She was also guardian of women from birth to death. The Matronalia, her most famous festival, was celebrated on March 1 by every matron and virgin. And ever woman had her own tutelary juno, conceived of as a kind of guardian spirit. As Juno Lucina (Light-bringer) she was invoked during childbirth as the goddess who brings from darkness into light. A table was spread for her in the house where a child was born, and a gold piece was deposited in the treasury of her ancient temple in the sacred grove at Rome on the birth of a boy. In Rome a temple was erected in 344 B.C. by Camillus to Juno Moneta, the epithet being explained by later Romans as derived from the warning of the goddess on the occasion of an earthquake. A mint was established in this temple in the 3rd century B.C. and thus the epithet Moneta in various forms became associated with matters of finance. As Juno Regina she headed the state cult along with Jupiter. Her chief temple on the Capitoline Hill close to that of Jupiter contained her sacred geese. As Juno Curitis she was regarded as a war-goddess, especially worshiped by the Sabines, and she was represented as clad in a goat-skin mantle bearing a shield and an uplifted spear, and accompanied, like Athena, by a sacred serpent. As Juno Lanuvina she had a special cult and priesthood at Lanuvina, where her sacred serpents ate the cakes offered by virgins and refused all others. The raven was sacred to her as the protectress of citadels.

In the Aeneid, Juno was the implacable enemy of Aeneas because: 1) she feared that the Trojans would destroy her favored city of Carthage, 2) she still hated all Trojans for the Judgment of Paris, and 3) she resented the taking of Ganymede who was made a favorite of Jupiter. It was she who bribed Aeolus to unloose the winds that shipwrecked the Trojans on the shores of Carthage. When Dido fell hopelessly in love with Aeneas, Juno thought to unite them in marriage. First, however, she arranged a plot with Venus to unite them without marriage. She sent a storm which isolated them in a cave where Dido submitted to Aeneas. When, on orders from Jupiter, Aeneas later left Carthage without marrying Dido, Juno, in pity for her desperate plight, sent Iris to part Dido's agonized soul from her body. It was Juno who incited the Trojan women to burn the ships while Aeneas was celebrating funeral games in honor of Anchises in Sicily; who sent Alecto to arouse the Latin women under Amata against Aeneas; who goaded Turnus to war and opened the gates of war herself when Latinus refused to do so. Jupiter allowed her to delay the death of Turnus in the war with Aeneas, but nothing could change Aeneas' ultimate fate, which was to found a great race in Italy. Juno at last gave up her struggle to prevent the fulfillment of Aeneas' destiny, asking only that the Latins be allowed to keep their name and language, so that the line would be Roman and the very name of Troy erased. To this Jupiter consented.

Juno Inferna (in-fēr'na). A Roman name for Proserpina as a goddess of the lower world.
Junones (jō-nō'nēz). In Roman mythology, guardian deities of women.

Juno Stygia (sti'ji-a). In Roman mythology, a name for Proserpina, goddess of the Under-world.

Jupiter (jō'pi-tēr). [Also: Jove.] In Roman mythology, the supreme deity, predominantly a sky-god. The name Jupiter (Iuppiter), also found in Latin as Diespiter, reveals its original conception as a sky-god by its linguistic connection with diēs (Latin: "day"), and dēus (Latin: "god"). The second element of the name represents the Latin word for "father." It is related to Greek Zeus. Jupiter was both brother and husband of Juno. As a son of Saturn (Uranus) and Ops (Rhea), he was identified with the Greek Zeus, and was the embodiment of the might and national dignity of the Romans. The central seat of his cult was the Capitoline Hill at Rome, where as god of the state he had the title of Optimus Maximus (Best and Greatest). He was the bringer of light, of the dawn as well as of the full moon, and the days of the month when the moon was full were sacred to him. His priests sacrificed a white lamb on these days in his honor. He was the "Thunderer," whose weapon was the thunderbolt, and all places struck by lightning were sacred to him. As god of the sky, he was the originator of all atmospheric changes. Farmers honored him at the time of the spring sowing as well as at the time of the harvest, and a special festival was celebrated in his honor in his capacity as rain-god. He controlled and directed the future, and sacrifices were offered to secure his favor (with that of Janus) at the beginning of every undertaking. Except for Mars, he was the most honored as the god of victory in war. He was also the guardian of property, whether of the state or of individuals, and also guardian of honor, the keeping of oaths, treaties, vows, and the laws of hospitality. It was Jupiter who brought blessings and good fortune to the family as well as to the nation. White, the color of the light of day, was sacred to him: hence white animals were offered to him in sacrifice, his priests wore white caps, his chariot was drawn by four white horses, and the consuls were dressed in white when they sacrificed to him upon assuming office. The eagle was especially consecrated to him. As the most honored god of Rome, elaborate festivals were celebrated for him. Among them were the Roman Games, the oldest and greatest festival, originally celebrated in September by victorious generals in honor of Jupiter. Originally of one day's duration, the Roman Games finally came to cover a span of 15 days.

In the Aeneid, Jupiter consoles Venus for the ills besetting her son Aeneas by predicting the success of Aeneas in Latium; a 30-year reign for his son Ascanius; a 300-year rule by the Trojan dynasty; and after that the birth to a priestess and Mars of twin sons who would found the Roman nation. He also prophesied that the time would come when the children of Troy would enslave the children of Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Achilles, and rule in Argos, and foretold the birth of Julius Caesar, named after Iulus, who would rule from sea to sea. Jupiter sent Mercury to Aeneas in Carthage to command him to leave Dido and get on with his destiny; if he did not care about himself, he must consider the heritage of Ascanius. He sent torrential rains to quench the fires that the Trojan women had set to burn the fleet in Sicily. As did Zeus in the Iliad, Jupiter said he would not interfere in the fighting between Aeneas and Turnus for a time when Venus and Juno expressed their grievances about the fate of these two respectively. Although he allowed Juno to put off the death of Turnus for a time, he assured her that this would not change the outcome of the war, and ultimately he commanded her to give up her attempts to prevent Aeneas from fulfilling his destiny. Fate was on the side of Aeneas. However, he conceded to Juno that the new race which Aeneas would found should be known as a Latin race and keep its Latin tongue, in order to erase the name of Troy and Trojan, so hated by Juno. Thus it was that the line became established as Roman.

Justitia (jus-tish'i-a). In Roman mythology, the personification of Justice, similar to Greek Dikê (Dice).

Juturna (jō-tēr'na). A Roman goddess of springs. She is named in the Aeneid as the sister of Turnus. She was loved by Jupiter and by him made goddess of lakes, rivers, and springs, and was also given immortality. In the war between the Trojans under Aeneas, and the Latins under Turnus, Juno sent Juturna to give Turnus whatever help she could. She inflamed the Latins by sending a false omen, and thus inspired Tolumnius to break the truce which had been declared. In the mêlée that followed she replaced Turnus' charioteer and drove his war car away from the fighting in order to protect him. At length he recognized that his charioteer was his sister in disguise, leaped out of the chariot and returned on foot to the battle. When Turnus later fought in single combat with Aeneas, she recognized the owl that plagued her brother during the fight as one of the Furies sent by Jupiter. Knowing herself defeated by Jupiter in her struggle to preserve Turnus, she lamented the immortality that caused her to outlive her brother, and abandoned him to his fate. There was a pool sacred to Juturna in the Forum at Rome.

Juvenal (jō've-nal). [Full Latin name, Decimus Junius Juvenalis.] Roman rhetorician and satirical poet of the age of Trajan; fl. c50-130 A.D. Little is known of his life. Sixteen of his satires (in five books) are extant; they display an epigrammatic style that is bitingly used to expose the flagrant vices of the Roman society of his day.

Juventas (jō-ven'tas). In Roman mythology, the goddess who protected the iuvenes, men of military age. She had a shrine in the cella of Minerva in the great temple on the Capitoline, and a temple close to the Circus Maximus. Juventas has been erroneously identified as the Roman counterpart of Hebe (q.v.) and as a goddess of youth.

Knights, The. Comedy of Aristophanes which was exhibited in 424 B.C. and won first prize. It was a comedy with a political target—Cleon, an Athenian demagogue and leader of the democratic party, who opposed efforts to make peace with Sparta during the Peloponnesian Wars. In the play an elderly gentleman, Demus, falls completely into the power of his scheming Paphlagonian slave, a leather-monger. (The slave represents Cleon, whose father was a tanner.) After a wild struggle, in which the participants fling the most uninhibited abuse at each other, the Paphlagonian loses his control over Demus to a vendor of black puddings, who has won by out-lying, out-cheating, and out-stealing the Paphlagonian. In the end, the black-pudding vendor is transformed into an honest man, Demus recovers control of his own destiny, and an eloquent appeal to patriotism closes the play.

Labdacus (lab'də-kus). In Greek legend, a son of Polydorus, king of Thebes, and Nycteis. He was king of Thebes himself, and was the father of Laius, and the grandfather of Oedipus. Labdacus gave his name, Labdacidæ, to Oedipus and his children.

Labeo (lā'bē-ō), Attius. First-century A.D. Latin poet, reported to have made Latin hexameter translations, evidently of no great merit, of the Iliad and the Odyssey. (JJ)

Laberius (la-bir'i-us), Decimus. Roman knight, born c115 B.C.; died at Puteoli, Italy, in January, 43 B.C. He was the author of mimes or popular farces, comic and satirical poems, an epic poem on Caesar's Gallic War, a prose work containing anecdotes, and others. Titles, some lines, and a prologue (given when Caesar compelled him, though a knight, to act in a mime) are extant.

Labienus (lab-i-ē'nus), Quintus. Roman general; son of Titus Labienus. As a republican opposed to Antony and Octavian, and commander of Parthian mercenaries, he invaded (41-40 B.C.) Syria and Asia Minor where after some successes, he was defeated and killed in 39 B.C.

Labienus, Titus. Roman general; killed in battle, 45 B.C. He was early a partisan of Caesar and helped him to secure the office of Pontifex Maximus (63 B.C.). He was distinguished as Caesar's legate in the Gallic War, and acted for Caesar whenever the latter had to be away in Rome. As a general in Gaul, he defeated the Treviri (54 B.C.), made an expedition against Lutetia (Paris, 52), and defeated the Aedui (52 B.C.). When civil war broke out, he joined Pompey (49 B.C.). After the defeat at Pharsalus he fled to Africa. From there he went to Spain and joined the forces of the younger Pompey, and was killed at the battle of Munda, 45 B.C.

Labors of Heracles or Hercules. See Heracles, Labors of.

Labyrinth (lab'i-rinth). "Place of the double ax," from labrys "double-bladed ax." In Greek legend, a vast maze built at Cnossus by the Athenian artificer Daedalus at the command of Minos, ruler of Crete. It was built as a place in which to confine the Minotaur, the child with a bull's head and human body born of the union of Queen Pasiphaë with a handsome bull in the royal stables. On the walls and furnishings of Minos' great palace at Cnossus the double ax appears repeatedly, suggesting that it was a symbol of Minos' regal authority, so that "Hall of the Double Axes" would be an appropriate epithet for this extensive structure. The concept of a labyrinth as a maze would thus have arisen later, in consideration of the Labyrinth's hundreds of rooms and endless corridors, and the difficulty of a stranger in finding his way about it. Lacedaemon (las-ē-dē'mon). In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus and the Pleiad Taygete. Some say he married the niece of Taygete, also named Taygete, who bore him a son, Himerus, and a daughter, Cleodice. But others say he married Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, and inherited her father's kingdom. He named the people of his kingdom (formerly called Leleges) Lacedaemonians after himself, and named the Mountain Taygetus after his mother. He founded a city in Laconia, and named it Sparta after his wife, from which the name finally was applied to the entire kingdom. There was a hero-shrine of Lacedaemon at Alesiae in Lacedaemon. See Laconia and Sparta, both in ancient Greece.

Laches (lā'kēz). Athenian general; fl. last half of the 5th century B.C. He commanded an expedition to Sicily, 427 B.C. The expedition accomplished little largely because Laches and his treasurer were more interested in enriching themselves than in pursuing the interests of Athens. He later (423 B.C.) presented to the Athenian assembly the proposals for a one-year truce with Sparta, drawn up by Nicias and Plistoanax. He appears in the dialogue of Plato which bears his name.

Laches. One of the dialogues of Plato; a conversation on courage between Lysimachus, the son of Aristides, and Melesias, the son of the elder Thucydides (who are considering the question of the education of their sons), the generals Nicias and Laches, and Socrates.

Lachesis (lak'e-sis). In Greek mythology, one of the three Moerae or Fates. As first explained by Hesiod, Lachesis assigns the lot of life to each person, Clotho spins the thread of it, and their sister Atropos cuts it. (JJ)

Laconia (lā-kō'ni-ā). [Also: Lacedaemon, Laconica.] In ancient geography, the SE division of the Peloponnesus, Greece, lying S of Argolis and Arcadia, and E of Messenia. It was traversed by the Eurotas River. Chief city, Sparta.

Lade (lā'dē). In ancient geography, a small island in the Aegean Sea near Miletus. Near it, in 494 B.C., the Persian fleet defeated the Ionian Greeks.

Ladon (lā'don). In Greek mythology, a many-headed dragon or serpent that had the power of human speech and never slept. According to some accounts he was the son of Ceto and Phorcyas. Others say he was the son of Typhon and Echidna, or that he was earth-born. He was set to guard the Apples of the Hesperides, either by Hera or by Atlas, and was slain by Heracles when he came to steal the apples. He was then translated to the heavens as the constellation Serpentarius.

Ladon. In ancient geography, a river in Arcadia, Greece. Rising in the mountains near Pheneüs, it is, according to Pausanias, the most lovely river in Greece. The river-god of the Ladon was, according to some accounts, the father of Daphne beloved by Leucippus and Apollo. The nymph Syrinx fled to the Ladon, pursued by Pan, and on its banks she was transformed into a reed. Pan, not knowing which reed was Syrinx, cut the reeds he found in the place where she was last seen and made them into a musical instrument called the syrinx, or Pan's pipes.

Laelaps (lē'laps). According to legend, a marvelous hound that was given to Procris, wife of Cephalus, by Artemis. The hound had the power of always catching whatever it pursued. Amphitryon borrowed the hound to catch a vixen that had been sent to plague Thebes. The vixen had the gift of always out-running its pursuers. As Laelaps, the dog that always caught its quarry, chased the vixen that could never be caught, Zeus settled the matter by turning them both into stone. According to some accounts it was Minos who had received Laelaps from Artemis, and gave him to Procris in return for her favors.

Laelius (lē'li-us), Caius. Roman general and consul; fl. c200 B.C. He was a friend of the elder Scipio Africanus, whom he accompanied on his campaign in Spain (210-206 B.C.). In 205 B.C. he led an expedition to Africa, and in the battle of Zama (202 B.C.) distinguished himself as commander of the cavalry. He served as aedile (197), praetor (196), and consul (190 B.C.).

Laelius (lē'li-us), Caius. [Surnamed Sapiens, meaning "the Wise."] Roman statesman and philosopher, praetor in 145 B.C., consul in 140 B.C., and closely associated with the younger Scipio Africanus. He is the chief character in the De Amicitia of Cicero, which is therefore often called Laelius, and appears as a speaker in Cicero's De Senectute and De Republica. He was one of the aristocratic party in opposition to the reforms of the Gracchi.

Laertes (lā-ér'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Acrisius the Argive. He was married to Anticlea, daughter of Autolycus. Some say

he was one of the Argonauts who went on the expedition to secure the Golden Fleece. In Homer Laertes is represented as the father of Odysseus. Later writers said that Odysseus was the son of Sisyphus, but he passed as the son of Laertes. During the long absence of Odysseus at the Trojan War and after it, Laertes retired to his farm in the country and grieved for his son. He was still living when Odysseus returned, was joyously reunited with him, and helped him confront the fathers of the suitors of Penelope, whom Odysseus had slain on his return.

Laertiades (lā'ēr-tī'ā-dēz). "Son of Laertes," e.g., Odysseus.

Laestrygon (les-trig'ō-nēz). [Also: Laestrygonians.] In the Odyssey, a race of cannibal giants visited by Odysseus in a remote country, where "the nights are so short that the shepherd driving his flock out meets the shepherd who is driving his flock in," clearly an echo of some traveler's tale of northern latitudes. Eleven of Odysseus' 12 ships moored in their nearly landlocked harbor and went to scout the countryside, while only Odysseus anchored outside. The ships in the harbor were attacked and destroyed by the man-eating Laestrygonians, who devoured their crews, only Odysseus' ship escaping. Later writers placed the Laestrygonians in Sicily, S of Mount Aetna, and Roman authors blandly transferred them to Formiae (Formia) in Latium. (JJ)

Laevinus (lē-vī'nus), Publius Valerius. Roman consul, 280 B.C. He advanced with an army to meet Pyrrhus at Heraclea, and when Pyrrhus sent word to him that he would act as mediator between the Romans and the Greeks in Italy, Laevinus replied that he "neither accepted Pyrrhus as a mediator nor feared him as an enemy." At the battle which took place, 280 B.C., he was defeated by Pyrrhus with heavy losses on both sides.

Lais (lā'is). [Also: Laïs.] Name of two Greek courtesans celebrated for their beauty. The elder, probably a native of Corinth, lived in the 5th century B.C., and was famous for her beauty and for her vices. She died at Corinth, where a monument (a lioness tearing a ram) was erected to her. The younger (born probably in Sicily, and brought to Corinth when a child) lived in the middle of the 4th century B.C. Apelles is said to have induced her to follow the life of a courtesan. She is said to have been slain in Thessaly by women whose jealousy she had aroused.

Laius (lā'us, lā'yus). In Greek legend, a son of Labdacus, king of Thebes. He succeeded to the throne of Thebes but was expelled by Amphion and Zethus. He went to the court of Pelops at Pisa and was hospitably received. There he fell in love with Chrysippus, the bastard son of Pelops, and carried him off to Thebes. Pelops pursued him to Thebes but when he arrived Chrysippus was dead, some say by his own hand and some say his death was engineered by Hippodamia, wife of Pelops. Pelops forgave Laius and he was restored to the throne. He married Jocasta, daughter of Menoeceus, but time passed and she bore him no children. Laius consulted the oracle and was told he should not mourn his childlessness, for the child Jocasta bore him would kill him. Even so, Jocasta did ultimately produce a son to Laius but he, remembering the oracle, had the infant's feet pierced and bound and ordered him exposed on Mount Cithaeron. His order, unknown to him, was not carried out and the child, who was named Oedipus, "Swollen-footed," was reared by Polybus of Corinth as his own child. Hera sent a monster to punish Thebes because Laius had abducted Chrysippus. This monster, a Sphinx, ravaged Thebes by killing all who could not answer a riddle she propounded. Laius set out for Delphi to ask the oracle how he could free Thebes of the Sphinx. On the way he met Oedipus, neither knowing who the other was, and ordered him out of the road. Oedipus refused to move and angrily struck Laius' charioteer when the latter treated him violently. When he saw a chance, Laius struck the young stranger full on the head with his goad. Oedipus, enraged, set upon him, and killed him and all his companions save one, who escaped. Thus the oracle was fulfilled.

Lamachus (lam'a-kus). Athenian general, killed in Sicily, 414 B.C. With Alcibiades and Nicias he was one of the three commanders in charge of the Athenian expedition to Sicily, 415 B.C. He was not a rich man and had to be reimbursed for all expenditures he made for himself on his campaigns. Perhaps for this reason he was mocked by the comic poets. However, he was a brave and able soldier. When the Athenian expedition arrived in Sicily to aid the Egestaeans against the Selinuntines, allies of Syracuse, the commanders learned to their dismay that the Egestaeans were unable to advance the gold they had promised. Lamachus, with a purely military view, advised the Athenians to attack Syracuse at once, although this had not been the announced target of the expedition. He argued that Syracuse was the real enemy, and that the Athenians should take advantage of the unprepared state of the Syracusans and the panic into which the sight of the Athenian flotilla would throw them; for after a time, he warned, the Syracusans would recover their composure and prepare themselves for battle, and the advantages of surprise would be lost. The advice of Lamachus was ignored. In a skirmish before the city of Syracuse Lamachus was killed, 414 B.C.

Lamia (lā'mi-ā). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Belus. She was a beautiful Libyan queen who was loved by Zeus. Zeus gave her the power to take out and replace her eyes at will. Hera, out of jealousy, killed all Lamia's children except Scylla; thereafter, because she could not revenge herself on Hera, Lamia sought to destroy the children of men. She is usually depicted with a serpent's body and beautiful woman's head. In later belief she was regarded as a seducer of young men. Keats's poem Lamia treats of this story.

Lamia. Athenian courtesan; fl. in the early 3rd century B.C. She possessed great influence over Demetrius Poliorcetes (Demetrius I of Macedonia).

Lamia. Town in C Greece, near the head of the Gulf of Lamia (an arm of the Aegean Sea). It was an ancient city of Malis, where Antipater was besieged in 323 B.C.

Lamian War (lā'mi-ān). War (323-322 B.C.) in which Athens and its allies were defeated by Macedonia under Antipater; so named from the siege of Lamia by the allies.

Lampadion (lam-pā'di-on). Conventional name for a lively provocative courtesan in later Greek comedy.

Lampetia (lam-pē'shi-ā). In the Odyssey, a daughter of Helius and the nymph Neaera.

She and her sister Phaethusa tended Helius' cattle on Trinacria (Sicily), and it was she who informed Helius of the theft and slaughter of some of his cattle by the companions of Odysseus. In consequence, Zeus, at the request of Helius, sent a great storm which destroyed all of them except Odysseus, who had not eaten of the flesh of the divine cattle.

Lampsacus (lamp'sā-kus). [Modern village name, Lapseki.] In ancient geography, a city in Mysia, Asia Minor, on the E shore of the Hellespont. It was colonized by Ionian Greeks from Phocaea, fell to Persia following the Ionian revolt (499 B.C.), allied itself to Athens at the end of the Persian Wars (479 B.C.) and paid Athens a large tribute. Its location on the Hellespont made it important to Athens as one of the cities that controlled the grain route. When Lampsacus revolted against Athens (411 B.C.), the revolt was put down. The Spartan Lysander besieged and took the city (405), but with the signing of the King's Peace (387), it fell again to Persia. It was occupied for Alexander the Great by his general Parmenio (335), and ultimately, c196 B.C., became an ally of Rome. Ancient Lampsacus was a center of worship of the nature-god Priapus, a god of fertility.

Lamus (lā'mus). In Greek legend: 1) a son of Heracles and Omphale, queen of Libya to whom Heracles had been sold as a slave. Omphale freed Heracles, married him, and bore him Lamus. 2) The king of the Laestrygonians in Italy. His people overwhelmed 11 of Odysseus' ships when they stopped there on the way home to Ithaca, and devoured their crews.

Lanuvium (lā-nū'vi-um). [Modern village name, Lanuvio, formerly Civita Lavinia.] In ancient geography, a town in Latium, Italy, about 20 miles SE of Rome. It was a center of the worship of Juno Sospita, the succoring goddess.

Laocoön (lā-ok'ō-on). In Greek legend, a priest of Apollo at Troy who had offended the god by marrying and becoming the father of children, and who had profaned the image of the god. He was chosen by the Trojans to propitiate Poseidon in the last year of the

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

Trojan War, because the Trojans had slain their former priest of Poseidon. When the Wooden Horse was seen on the beach before Troy, Laocoön hurled his spear into its side and urged the Trojans not to take it inside the walls. It was a trap, he declared, as he uttered the words, "I fear the Greeks, especially when they bring gifts." While the Trojans hesitated, a great serpent sent by Apollo to punish Laocoön for his earlier offenses came slithering out of the sea, and grasped Laocoön and his two sons in its coils. The serpent crushed them to death and carried them off to the shrine of Athena. The Trojans erroneously concluded that Laocoön had been punished for doubting the holiness of Athena's gift—as they thought of the Wooden Horse—and for dishonoring it by thrusting his spear into its side. They thereupon resolved to take the Wooden Horse inside the walls to Athena's shrine, with disastrous results.

Laocoön. In Greek legend, a son of Oeneus of Calydon by a serving woman. He was the half-brother of Meleager, whom he accompanied on the expedition of the Argonauts to Colchis.

Laocoön. Sculpture in the Vatican Museum, Rome, showing the Trojan priest of Apollo and his two young sons attacked by two great serpents, as narrated by Aeneas to Dido in Vergil's Aeneid, Book II, and frequently elsewhere. It is an important work of Hellenistic sculpture—Pliny the Elder regarded it as the greatest of all sculptures. According to Pliny, the sculptors were three, Agesander, Athenodorus, and Polydorus, all of Rhodes. It was discovered at Rome in 1506. (JJ)

Laodamas (lā-od'a-mas). In Greek legend, a son of Eteocles and grandson of Oedipus. He became king of Thebes after the death of his father. In the defense of Thebes when it was attacked by the Epigoni, Laodamas killed Aegialeus, the only one of the Epigoni to be killed, but was in turn slain by Alcmaeon.

Laodamas. In the Odyssey, a Phaeacian, the son of Alcinous. Unaware of the identity of Odysseus, he challenged him to take part in the games and athletic contests which were held when Odysseus was cast ashore on Phaeacia.

Laodamia (lā-od-a-mī'a). In classical legend, a daughter of Acastus. She was the wife of Protesilaus, and missed him so when he went to Troy that she made a wax image of him to keep her company. When she learned that he had been slain at Troy by Hector she prayed to the gods to let him revisit her from Hades, if only for three hours. Zeus permitted Hermes to bring the shade of Protesilaus from the Underworld for three hours. While with his wife, Protesilaus exhorted her to follow him when it was time for him to return to the Underworld. At the end of the three hours Laodamia stabbed herself so that she could go with him.

Laodamia. In the Iliad, a daughter of Belerophon, and the sister of Isander and Hippolochus. She was the mother of Sarpedon of Lycia by Zeus. Artemis slew her in anger.

Laodice (lā-od'i-sē). In the Iliad, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba. According to Homer, she was the fairest of Priam's daughters. She was the wife of Helicaon, son of Antenor. When Acamas journeyed to Troy with Diomedes to demand the return of Helen, Laodice fell in love with him and bore him a son, Munitus. When Troy fell, she prayed that she might be swallowed up by the earth rather than live a life of dishonor as a slave and concubine of the Greeks. The earth parted and she was swallowed up as she had prayed.

Laodice. The name Homer gives to Electra, daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra.

Laodicea (lā-od-i-sē'a, lā'ō-di-sē'a). [Full Latin name, Laodicea ad Lycum.] Ancient city in Phrygia, Asia Minor, in the valley of the Lycus, a tributary river of the Maeander (modern Menderes), about 50 miles N of Aradus. It was founded under the Seleucids, by Antiochus II (c250 B.C.) and named after his wife, Laodice. It was an important early Christian center, and in the Apocalypse is one of the congregations to which an epistle is addressed. Its great heap of ruins still attest to its former splendor.

Laodicea. [Full Latin name, Laodicea ad Mare.] Ancient city on the coast of Syria about 50 miles S of Antioch. It was known for its commerce in wine and fruit from the surrounding country, and in modern time has given its name to Latakia tobacco. (AH)

Laodocus/Lapithae

Laodocus (lā-od'ō-kus). In Greek legend, a son of Apollo and Phthia. He lived in the land of the Curetes. Aetolus, son of Endymion, forced to flee from his country, came to the land of the Curetes, slew Laodocus and his brothers, Dorus and Polypoetes, seized the land, and named it Aetolia for himself.

Laomedon (lā-om'ē-don). In Greek legend, a son of Ilus and Eurydice, and a descendant of Dardanus. He was a king of Troy. To punish Apollo and Poseidon, Zeus sent them to work for Laomedon and they built the walls of Troy. But when their year of service was up, he refused to pay them. Instead, he threatened to cut off their ears, bind them, and ship them abroad to be sold as slaves. In revenge, Poseidon sent a sea-monster to ravage Troy. Heracles rescued Hesione, Laomedon's daughter, who had been chained to a rock to appease the monster, and offered to slay the beast in return for the famous horses of Tros, immortal horses which had been given to Tros by Zeus to atone for the loss of Ganymede, and which had been handed on to Laomedon. Laomedon agreed, but once again refused to honor his agreement. In a fury, Heracles attacked Troy and killed Laomedon and all his sons except Podarces (Priam).

Laothoë (lā-oth'ō-ē). In the Iliad, a daughter of Altes, king of the Leleges. She was Priam's concubine and the mother of his two youngest sons, Lycaon and Polydorus.

Laphria (laf'ri-ā). An epithet of Artemis, possibly deriving from a word meaning "spoils taken in war." Pausanias mentions that this surname is a foreign one and that the image of Artemis in this shrine was brought in from another place. But some say the Calydonians called her Laphria because a man named Laphrius set up an image of the goddess in Calydon. Others say she was given this epithet because her wrath, originally strong, against Oeneus and the Calydonians rested more lightly (elaphroteron) as time passed. A festival called Laphria was held in her honor annually at Patrae. At this festival the Patraeans set up a circle of green logs around her altar, and on the fire that was lighted within the circle they hurled great numbers of live wild beasts.

Laphystius (la-fis'ti-us). Epithet of Zeus, from his sanctuary on Mount Laphystius in Boeotia. It was at the altar of Zeus Laphystius that Athamas was preparing to sacrifice his children, Phrixus and Helle, when a golden-fleeced ram came and carried them off. In obedience to an oracle, the people were about to sacrifice Athamas for his attempted murder of his children, when Cytisorus, the son of Phrixus, came to the land from Colchis and rescued him. This rescue brought the anger of the gods on the descendants of Athamas, and henceforth it was forbidden to the oldest son of his race to enter the temple of Zeus Laphystius; if one defied the prohibition, he was to be sacrificed. When Jason returned from Colchis with the Golden Fleece, he dedicated it in the temple of Zeus Laphystius.

Laphystius, Mount. A mountain near Orchomenus, in Boeotia. Athamas had his palace at the foot of this mountain. It was on its summit that he was preparing to sacrifice his son Phrixus when the latter was rescued and carried off on the back of a miraculous winged ram with fleece of pure gold.

LAPITH AND CENTAUR

Lapithae (lap'i-thē) or Lapiths (lap'iths). A Thessalian people descended, according to some accounts, from Lapithes, a son of Apollo and Stilbe. Others say the Lapithae were descendants of Ixion. One of their kings was

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, Pirithous. On the occasion of his marriage to Hippodamia the centaurs, who as cousins of Pirithous had been invited to the wedding, got drunk from drinking wine unmixed with water and attacked the bride. A fierce struggle broke out between the Lapithae and the centaurs when the Lapithae resisted the attacks of the centaurs on their women. This episode resulted in the expulsion of the centaurs from Mount Pelion. Later the centaurs invaded the territory of the Lapithae and overwhelmed them. Those Lapithae who escaped fled to Mount Pholoe in Elis from which they were also subsequently driven by the centaurs. The remnants of the Lapithae finally settled in Malea.

Lapithes (lap'i-thēz). According to some accounts, a son of Apollo, and a descendant of Oceanus and Tethys. He ruled the region about the Peneus River, the land of his grandfather, the river-god Peneus. His sons, Phorbas and Periphas, became kings after him and named their subjects Lapiths, or Lapithae, after their father.

Lararium (lär-är'i-um). A part of a Roman house in which the Lares were placed. In effect, it was a private shrine or chapel. The lararium was next to the family hearth, which was in early times located in the atrium (the entrance hall of a Roman house, in early times used as a ceremonial room and for such general domestic purposes as cooking and dining; later, except among the poor, reserved as a general reception room). The togaed image of the Lar familiaris stood, between the images of the two Penates, in the lararium. The images were greeted each morning by the family with a prayer; after the principal meal of the day was served, a reserved portion of it was placed on a ceremonial table in the lararium as a gift to the family household gods. To celebrate special family occasions, as birthdays or the safe return from a journey, garlands were hung about the images, and offerings, including wine and animals, were made to them. A lararium was found in the House of the Menander (Casa del Menandro) at Pompeii.

Larentalia (lar-en-tä'li-a). Ancient Roman festival celebrated Dec. 23, during which offerings were made to the dead, especially at the shrine of Acca Larentia, nurse of Romulus and Remus, field-goddess, and protestress of the city. The flamen Quirinalis offered sacrifices on the spot where Acca Larentia was said to have disappeared.

Lares (lär'ēz). In Roman religion, a class of benevolent spirits presiding over the house and family. They were looked upon also as protectors of the state and city, and as very powerful for evil if not duly respected and propitiated. The public Lares, originally two in number, were the guardians of the unity of the state, and were honored with temples and an elaborate ceremonial. After the time of Augustus, at least, each division of the city had also its own public Lares (Lares compitales). The private Lares differed for each family, and were worshiped daily in the house, being domiciled sometimes on the family hearth but usually in a special niche with the Penates. Food was offered to them at every meal. They received also special recognition upon every occasion of festivity, public or private, and on certain days devoted particularly to them, and claimed tribute alike from the bride upon entering the family and from the youth upon attaining his majority. The chief of the private Lares in each family, the domestic or household Lar (Lar familiaris) was the spirit of the founder of the family. To the family spirits were often added in later times, among the household Lares, the shades of heroes, or other personalities who were looked upon with admiration or awe. In their character as malignant divinities, the Lares were commonly classed as lemures or larvae. The division of Lares into compitales and familiares is the basis of two theories as to their origin: 1) they were originally farm-land deities; 2) they were the ghosts of the dead.

Larissa (lä-ris'a). According to tradition, a daughter of Pelasgus the Argive. The citadel at Argos was named for her, as were also two cities in Thessaly: one on the Peneus River and one on the sea.

Larissa. [Also: Larisa.] A city in Thessaly, NE Greece, situated on the Peneus River. According to legend, it was here that Acrisius was killed by his grandson Perseus. The discus Perseus was hurling in an athletic contest went wild and struck and killed Acrisius, thus fulfilling the prophecy that a son of Danaë would slay her father. Larissa became the seat of the Aleuadae, a Thessalian family prominent in organizing the Thessalian Confederacy in the 6th century B.C. The Aleuadae welcomed artists and writers from southern Greece to their court. In the Persian War Larissa was allied to Xerxes. The Aleuadae Dynasty was overthrown toward the end of the 5th century B.C. Philip II of Macedon brought Larissa under his control, c344 B.C. In 196 B.C. it became the capital of the Thessalian Confederacy organized by the Romans.

Larissa Cremaste (krē-mas'tē). In ancient geography, a town in Phthia, SE Thessaly, Greece, situated near the coast opposite the northern tip of Euboea. According to some accounts, this was the site of Achilles' city. The ancient citadel was taken by Demetrius Poliorcetes, 302 B.C.

Larius, Lacus (lā'ri-us lā'kus). [Modern name, Lake Como.] Lake in N Italy, traversed by the Addua River and famous for its scenery.

Lars Porsena (lārz pōr'se-nā). See Porsena, Lars.

Larvae (lār'vē). In Roman mythology, spirits of the dead who were forces for evil, as contrasted with the Lares. They haunted the living as ghosts or specters and had the power to drive the living mad. They were the spirits of the wicked. The name Lemures (q.v.) was also given these spirits.

Larymna (lā-rim'nā). In ancient geography, a city of Boeotia, Greece, situated on the coast. It was said to have been named for a daughter of Cycnus, son of Poseidon who was transformed into a swan. The city once belonged to Opus but voluntarily joined the Boeotians.

Las (lās). An ancient town in Laconia, on the Gulf of Laconia. Some say it takes its name from Las, who founded it, and who was slain by Patroclus. Others say it gets its name from the rocky hill on which it stands. It was said to have been captured by the Dioscuri. Men of Las went to the Trojan War under the command of Menelaus.

Lassithi (lā-sē'thē). [Also: Dhikti.] Modern name of a mountain in Crete. The ancient name of the mountain was Dicte, where the cave in which some say Zeus was born is located.

Lasus (lā'sus). Greek dithyrambic poet of Hermione; fl. 6th century B.C. He went to the court of Hipparchus at Athens, where he made some innovations in the dithyrambs sung at the festivals of Dionysus.

Latin League (lat'in). Confederation of the cities in Latium, existing in Italy in the earliest historic times and continuing until 338 B.C., when the Latin towns were finally incorporated in the dominion of Rome, following the Great Latin War (340-338 B.C.), which resulted from the towns' attempts to make themselves equals of Rome within the League or to secede if that were not possible. According to the earliest tradition, the League included 30 cities, among which Alba Longa held the preëminent place. After the fall of Alba, Aricia, Lanuvium, and Tusculum, with other important communities not originally included, were united with the League. The confederation held assemblies in the grove of Ferentinum, below Marino in the Alban Hills, and had a common religious sanctuary in the temple of Jupiter Latiaris on the summit of the Alban Mount (Monte Cavo), where annual sacrifices were celebrated.

Latini (lā-tī'nī). [Also: Latins.] Italic-speaking farmers who settled in Latium soon after 1000 B.C., deriving their name from the region they occupied. Before the dawn of Italian history their dialect of Italic had become a distinct language, thenceforth known as Latin. To Latin- and Sabine-speaking colonists was attributed the founding of Rome (traditionally, in 753 B.C.; excavations near the Forum have revealed burials still older). (JJ)

Latinus (lā-tī'nus). In legend, according to the Greeks, a son of Circe and Odysseus, The Romans say that his father was Heracles and his mother was the widow or the daughter of Faunus, or that he was a son of Faunus and the nymph Marica. He was a king of Latium, whose capital was Laurentum. He had established the city and named his colonists Laurentes, after a laurel tree which he found on the site and dedicated to Phoebus. He was the father of one daughter, Lavinia, by his wife Amata, and had no sons. A swarm of bees settled on the sacred laurel tree; this was considered an omen that indicated the arrival of a stranger. About the same time, Lavinia's hair caught fire at the sacred altar but did not burn. Latinus consulted the oracle and learned that he should give his daughter in marriage to a stranger rather than to Turnus, whom her mother was very anxious for her to marry. Latinus welcomed Ilioneus, the representative of Aeneas, when he came bearing gifts from Troy. He said he remembered that the Auruncan elders used to say that Dardanus was born in Latium. He decided that Aeneas was the stranger the oracle had recommended as a husband for his daughter, and sent him a present of horses that had been bred by Circe. However, Juno did not intend to let Aeneas settle in Italy so peacefully. She sent Alecto to stir up the Latin women, to goad Turnus, and to inflame the countrymen. Latinus could not subdue the desire for war, and so he gave up the reins of government. As the war went on and Mezentius, a Latin ally, was killed, Latinus called a council. On learning that Diomedes refused his aid, and in fact counseled the Latins not to wage war on the Trojans, he proposed to cede land to Aeneas, or to provide him with ships that he might seek a home elsewhere. But Turnus refused to take this advice. He urged continuance of the war and the Latins met with disaster. When Turnus offered to meet Aeneas in single combat at last, Latinus again offered to make peace, but as Turnus again refused, Latinus accepted the vow of Aeneas that if he should be victorious, peace and equality would be established between the Latins and the Trojans. Aeneas was victorious, and because of this vow the Latins and Trojans lived thereafter in peace.

Latium (lā'shi-um). In ancient geography, the part of C Italy lying along the Mediterranean SE of Etruria and NW of Campania. The name was originally restricted to the land of the Latini or Latins, chiefly comprised in the Roman Campagna. Its chief cities formed the Latin League, which was at war with Rome, 340–338 B.C., and was incorporated with Rome after 338 B.C. In an extended sense Latium (also Latium Adjectum or Novum) was the region from the Tiber to the Liris or to Mount Massicus, including the territories of the Latini, Hernicans, Volscians, and Auruncans, and (in part) of the Aequians. According to legend, Saturn fled to this region from Jove and gave it the name Latium to suggest the refuge he had found. Under Saturn's beneficent rule a golden age flourished in Latium. It was the home of the Latins, and became the home of the Trojans when the latter, under the leadership of Aeneas, were guided there by destiny to found a second Troy.

Latmus (lat'mus). In ancient geography, a mountain range in Caria, Asia Minor, E of Miletus. There was a sanctuary to Endymion here because it was on this mountain, according to legend, that Endymion slept forever while Selene, the moon-goddess, came to gaze on his ever-youthful beauty.

Latona (la-tō'nā). In mythology, the mother of Apollo and Diana. A Latin name of Leto.

Laughing Philosopher. An epithet of Democritus.

Laurentum (lō-ren'tum). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, situated near the coast between Ostia and Lavinium, about 16 miles S of Rome: the capital of ancient Latium. According to the Aeneid, it was founded by the Lauretes, men who colonized Latium under Latinus. They got their name from the sacred laurel tree which was found in the spot where the city was built.

Laurium (lō'ri-um). [Also: Laurion; modern name, Lavrion.] Low hills at the SE extremity of Attica, Greece. They were celebrated in ancient times as the site of silver mines that helped Athens to arrive at commercial greatness. Shafts of these mines, galleries of which remain, went down as much as 400 feet. From the silver mined here the Athenians minted coins that circulated throughout the world, and enjoyed such a high reputation that it was considered unwise to change the design. For this reason, lest a newer design be looked upon with suspicion in the remote parts to which Athenian traders ventured, the ancient coins, with the head of Athena on one side and her owl on the other, retained their original archaic design. In the time of the traveler Pausanias (2nd century A.D.), who described the shafts and galleries of the mines, the silver ore had been exhausted. Centuries later the mines were reopened, and produced lead and zinc. Near Laurium is the modern seaport of Lavrion.

Lausus (lō'sus). In the Aeneid, a son of the Etruscan king Mezentius. As commander of 1000 men he joined Turnus in his war against Aeneas. In a duel with Pallas, son of Evander, with whom he was evenly matched as to age, skill, and weight, Turnus intervened and slew Pallas. Later Lausus went to the aid of his father when the latter was wounded by Aeneas. He saved his father's life but in so doing lost his own. Aeneas, in pity for his youth and filial devotion, honored the youth by sending his fully-armed body back to Mezentius on his shield.

Lavinia (lā-vin'i-ā). In Roman legend, the only daughter of Latinus, king of Latium, and Amata. Her mother wished her to marry Turnus, king of the Rutuli, but an oracle had advised Latinus to give her to a foreign leader. It was thus that Latinus welcomed Aeneas, believing he was the alien of whom the oracle had spoken. In the course of sacrifices at the altar Lavinia's hair caught fire and blazed up without being consumed. This was interpreted to mean that she would have a glorious fate but her people would suffer war. She married Aeneas and became the ancestress of the inhabitants of Lavinium, a city named for her.

Lavinium (lā-vin'i-um). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, about 17 miles S of Rome. According to the Aeneid, it was built by Aeneas and named after his Latin wife, Lavinia.

Lay of Ethiopia (ē-thi-ō'pi-ā). See Aethiopsis.

Lay of Telegonus (tel-ē-gō'nus). See Tele-gonia.

Leander (lē-an'dēr). In Greek legend, a youth of Abydos, the lover of Hero. Each night he swam the Hellespont to visit her secretly. Marriage was forbidden them because Hero was a priestess of Aphrodite at Sestos. One stormy night the light in the tower, by which his course was guided, was extinguished, and he perished. His body was washed ashore, and on discovering it Hero threw herself into the sea and was drowned.

Learchus (lē-ār'kus). In Greek mythology, a son of Athamas, king of Orchomenus in Boeotia, and Ino, daughter of Cadmus of Thebes. Driven mad by Hera, his father mistook him for a stag and pierced him with an arrow.

Lebadia (le-bā'di-ā) or Lebadea (le-bā-dā'ā). A town in Boeotia, Greece, famous for its oracle of Trophonius. The town was said to have been named for Lebadus, an Athenian who settled there. The oracle was on the slope of a mountain across the Hercyna River and beyond a sacred grove in which there were many sanctuaries. According to tradition, for a long time the Boeotians were ignorant of the oracle of Trophonius within their borders. Once, during a drought, they sent to the oracle at Delphi to learn how the drought might be broken. The priestess instructed them to go to Trophonius. They were at a loss where he could be found, and Saon, a Boeotian, searched in vain. At last he saw a swarm of bees and decided to follow them. Where the bees disappeared into the ground, he found the oracle of Trophonius, and it was he, they say, who established the rites to be observed there. The procedure for appealing to the oracle was most involved. After elaborate purification ceremonies, the suppliant ate the flesh of a ram that had been sacrificed to the shade of Agamedes, brother of Trophonius. He was then led to the Hercyna River by two boys 13 years of age. They bathed and anointed him. He then drank from a spring, called the Water of Lethe, to make him forget the past. Then he drank from another spring called the Water of Memory, so that he would recall whatever he was told by the oracle. Dressed in a prescribed costume and wearing fillets on his head like a sacrificial victim, he was led to the cave where the oracle was housed. Holding barley and honey cakes in his hands he descended a ladder into a pit, until he reached a narrow opening. There unseen hands pulled him through and he received a stunning blow on the head. While he was still unconscious from the blow, a voice spoke and prophesied. As soon as the prophetic voice ceased the suppliant was returned, feet first, through the opening, hauled up the ladder, and seated on the chair of Memory, where he repeated all that the voice had said while he was unconscious. When he recovered consciousness, the suppliant found that he no longer had the barley and honey cakes: they were taken from him while he was in the second cavern, before the prophetic voice spoke. The ceremonies for consulting the oracle were so shattering that a long time passed before the suppliant recovered his ability to laugh; and especially solemn people were said to "have been to Trophonius." The oracle of Trophonius was one of many consulted by Croesus, King of Lydia, before he decided to make war on Cyrus, King of the Persians. Trophonius is one of the chthonian deities, the worship of whom is in sharp contrast to that of the Olympian gods.

Lebedos (leb'ē-dos). In ancient geography, an Ionian seaport in Lydia, Asia Minor, about 25 miles NW of Ephesus. It was one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia, and according to tradition, was colonized by Andraemon, son of Codrus, legendary king of Attica, as leader of an expedition of Ionians and Boeotians.

Lechaeum (le-kē'um). One of the harbors of Corinth. According to tradition, it was named for Leches, child of Poseidon and Pirene. There were a sanctuary and a bronze image of Poseidon there.

Lecheates (lek-ē-ā'tēz). Epithet of Zeus. Near Aliphera in W Arcadia was a stream called Tritonis. The people of Aliphera claimed that it was here that Athena was born from the head of Zeus, and they worshiped her above all other deities. Because of this, they set up an altar of Zeus Lecheates (In Childhood) at Aliphera.

Lecythus (les'i-thus) or Lekythos (lek'i-thos). A small oil- or perfume-vase of ancient Greece, of tall and graceful proportions and narrow neck. In Attica a particular class of lecythus was used, especially in funeral rites. The neck and the foot of these Attic lecythi are covered with black glaze, and the body has a clear white ground upon which are drawn with a brown outline figures and designs, often of remarkable delicacy and elegance. Unlike nearly all other examples of Greek vase-painting, these figures and designs are frequently filled out with bright and naturalistic colors.

Leda (lē'da). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Thestius, king in Aetolia. Her father gave her in marriage to Tyndareus of Sparta. Some say she found a blue and silver egg, dropped by Nemesis, lying in a marsh. She took it home and hid it. From it Helen was born, the daughter of Zeus. Others say that Hermes threw the egg between Leda's knees and that from this she bore Helen. But the most common account is that Zeus fell in love with Leda, transformed himself into a swan, and in this form embraced her. She subsequently bore an egg from which Helen and Polydeuces, her children by Zeus, were born. By her husband she was the mother of Castor, twin-born with Polydeuces, and Clytemnestra. But the paternity of her twins, Castor and Polydeuces, is disputed. Clytemnestra was the daughter of Leda and Tyndareus, Helen of Leda and Zeus. Homer says that Tyndareus fathered Castor and Polydeuces also, but others make one or both the sons of Zeus. According to some accounts, Leda hanged herself because of her shame over the notorious elopement of Helen with Paris. Odysseus saw her shade when he visited the Underworld on his way home after the Trojan War. Pausanias, traveling in Greece in the 2nd century A.D. says that in the sanctuary of the Leucippides in Sparta there was an egg suspended by a ribbon from the roof-tree, and that this was supposed to be the egg that Leda had brought forth.

Leges Regiae (lē'jēz rē'ji-ē). Ancient Roman traditional laws. Upon being subsequently written down, they were arbitrarily ascribed to various kings.

Leibethra (li-bē'thrā). See Libethra.

Leitus (lē'i-tus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a captain of Boeotians at the siege of Troy. He was wounded by Hector in the struggle for possession of the body of Patroclus. However, he recovered, and was the only one of the Boeotian chiefs to return home safe from Troy. He brought back with him the bones of Arcesilaus and buried them near the oracle of Trophonius at Lebadaia. The tomb of Leitus was at Plataea.

Leleges (lē'ē-jēz). Ancient people who lived on the coasts of Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands of the Aegean. According to the Spartans, they were descendants of Lelex, the first king of the people later known as Lacedaemonians, but in his time called Leleges. They are sometimes associated with the Carians of SW Asia Minor. Homer (Iliad) speaks of them as a warlike and war-loving people of western Asia, who were allies of the Trojans in the Trojan War. Like "Pelasgi," the term is often used loosely by the Greeks to mean "aborigines," the older stratum of population found in the Aegean Lelex (lel'eks). According to Lacedaemonian tradition, he was the first king of the Lacedaemonians, and called his people Leleges after himself. Some say he was a son of Poseidon and Libya, the daughter of Epaphus, and that he came to Megara from Egypt and became king of Megara. This was a Megarian tradition. The son of Lelex was Myles, who succeeded him as king.

Lemnos (lem'nos). [Also: Limni, Limno, Limnos.] Island in the NE Aegean Sea. The surface is hilly and fertile, and in antiquity produced considerable grain crops. It has hot springs and a harbor on the S coast at modern Moudhros. It was sacred to Hephaestus in ancient times because, when he was hurled out of heaven by Zeus, he landed on the island, and the islanders who found him took care of him. According to legend, the Lemnian women, under their queen Hypsipyle, murdered all the men of the island for cohabiting with their Thracian female captives. Afterward, the island was purified every year of the guilt of this mass murder, which included the slaying of all male children as well as their fathers. Ceremonies of purification lasting nine days were held, during which time all fires on the island were put out. At the end of the nine days and after sacrifices had been offered to the dead, new fire was brought from Delos. The Argonauts stopped at Lemnos for supplies soon after they began their voyage to Colchis to secure the Golden Fleece. They found the island populated only by women. They were hospitably greeted and stayed for some time, Jason fathering the twin sons of Hypsipyle, their queen, and the other Argonauts leaving an island soon repopulated with a race called, for their fathers, the Minyans. Students see in the myth evidence of a former gynocracy (rule by women). Both Aeschylus and Sophocles wrote plays, now lost, on the story. When the Greeks sailed against Troy to recover Helen, they also stopped at Lemnos. It was here that Philoctetes was bitten by a serpent, according to some accounts, and because the wound would not heal and gave off a noisome smell, Philoctetes was abandoned in a lonely part of the island. However, the Greeks needed his arrows, given to him by Heracles, and in the tenth year of the war they returned to Lemnos and fetched Philoctetes, nearly dead from his wound and starvation, back with them to Troy.

Lemnos was conquered in the reign of Darius I by the Persians. It was gained for Athens by Miltiades c500 B.C. According to Herodotus, the history of this conquest was as follows. Some Pelasgians who had settled near Athens were banished and went to settle in Lemnos, where they drove off the descendants of the Argonauts. Later, the Pelasgians, wishing to avenge themselves on the Athenians, made a raid on Brauron while the Athenian women were celebrating the festival of Artemis there, and carried them off to Lemnos and made them their concubines. The sons born to these women were brought up by their mothers in the Attic manner, and they banded together against the legitimate sons of the Pelasgians and their wives. As boys the sons of the Athenian women banded together against the sons of the Pelasgians and sought to rule them, therefore the Pelasgians feared what they might do when they grew up. The Pelasgians resolved to slay all the sons of the Athenian concubines, and their mothers as well. For this slaughter, and for the extirpation of the males of Lemnos by the Lemnian women under Hypsipyle, evil and savage actions came to be known as "Lemnian deeds," a phrase which became proverbial in Greece for acts of atrocity. After the murder of the Athenian women and their sons the land of the Pelasgians in Lemnos ceased to be fertile; their women and cattle were less fruitful. The Pelasgians sent to the oracle at Delphi to learn how they could recover their former prosperity, and were told they must grant the Athenians whatever satisfaction they demanded for the abduction of the Athenian women from Brauron and their subsequent murders. The Pelasgians sent to the Athenians to learn what recompense would satisfy them. The Athenians told them to deliver up their land to them in a condition of flourishing prosperity. This was too high a price. The Pelasgians replied that they would do so when a north wind brought a ship from their land to Lemnos in one day. This they were sure would never happen, as Athens is far to the south of Lemnos. Nevertheless, according to Herodotus, they were compelled to fulfill their promise. Some years later Miltiades, the Athenian, while he was ruler of the Chersonese for the Athenians, sailed from the Hellespont during the time of the Etesian winds and reminded the Pelasgians of their oath. The people of Hephaestia in Lemnos yielded, and gave themselves up. Those of Myrina scorned Miltiades, but he besieged them, subdued their city, and brought Lemnos under Athenian dominion. Later, in the time of Pericles, when colonists went out to Lemnos from Athens, they took with them a bronze statue of the goddess Athena made by Phidias, and dedicated it on the Acropolis. The statue, which in ancient times was regarded as among the most beautiful of the works of Phidias, has been lost, but copies of it survive. The island remained a possession of Athens, except for a 10-year period of Spartan control, until Greece was conquered by the Macedonians. Lemnos was noted throughout antiquity, and into modern times, for a product called "Lemnian earth" which was supposed to have unusual medicinal properties. To modern times it has been used as a cure for certain wounds and infections, and in ancient times it was also highly regarded as a cure for snake bite. On a fixed day each year a priestess went to the bare hill where the earth was dug, performed certain rituals, and supervised the digging of a prescribed amount of the earth. The earth was prepared in blocks, each of which was stamped with a head of Artemis and with the word "Lemnos," whence the name. In modern times the ceremony of digging the Lemnian earth was carried out on Aug. 6th; the blocks were stamped, and then distributed for sale by apothecaries. The island of Lemnos is about 20 miles long, and has an area of about 180 square miles.

Lemovices (lem-ō-vī'sēz). Tribe in ancient Gaul, occupying territory near the Arvernian border. They are mentioned by Julius Caesar as supporting Vercingetorix in his revolt of 52 B.C. The French province of Limousin derived its name from them.

Lemures (lem-ū-rēz). [Also: Larvae.] Among the ancient Romans, the spirits of the dead considered as evil-disposed specters or ghosts, who were supposed to do mischief at night to the living, and were exorcised annually with a ceremonial ritual by the head of each household during the festival called Lemuralia or Lemuria. There were also games and other public observances of the festival. Lemuria (lē-mū'ri-ā). Ancient Roman festival celebrated annually on May 9, 11, and 13 for the lemures, or spirits of the dead. At midnight the head of the family rose and, standing in his bare feet, made a sign with his fingers and thumb to keep off any ghosts. He washed his hands three times, then turned around and put black beans into his mouth. Turning his head to one side, he spat out the beans and thus redeemed his own family. It was believed that the ghosts followed him as he spat out the beans and, if no one was watching, picked them up. The father afterward washed again, struck a brass gong, and begged the ghosts to leave with the words, "Shades of my fathers, depart!" Nine times he repeated this command, and having done all as required, considered that his house was purified of the ghosts of his ancestors. The third day of the Lemuria was celebrated especially by merchants to insure a year's good luck in business.

Lenaea (le-nē'ā). In Greek religion, one of the four Attic festivals in honor of Dionysus. It was celebrated in the ancient sanctuary of that god, called the Lenaeum, believed to be to the west of the Acropolis. It was the second of the series of Dionysiac festivals, and took place at the end of January and the beginning of February (on the 12th, 13th, and 14th days of the month Gamelion). There was a great public feast, followed by a procession with jesting and mockery to the theater, where, on the occasion of this festival, dramatic contests in both tragedy and comedy were held. See Dionysia.

Lenaeus (le-nē'us). An epithet of Dionysus, derived from the Greek word lene, "maenad," or lenos, "vat."

Lentini (len-tē'nē). See Leontini.

Lentulus (len'tū-lus), Publius Cornelius. [Surname Sura.] Roman politician; executed at Rome, Dec. 5, 63 B.C. He was praetor (75 B.C.), and a conspirator with Catiline in 63 B.C. He planned to kill Cicero and burn Rome. He divulged the plot to the Allobroges in the hope of securing their assistance and they betrayed the plot. The conspirators in Rome were seized; they confessed and were executed. He received his surname, Sura, because when Sulla accused him of carelessness with public funds (81 B.C.), instead of defending himself he held out the calf of his leg (sura). This was in imitation of boys who did this to receive punishment when they committed a fault in their games.

Leo (lē'ō). The fifth sign of the zodiac—the Lion—which the sun enters about the 23rd of July. Also, a zodiacal constellation, supposed to represent a lion. It is easily found, for the pointers of the Great Bear point southerly to its brightest star, Regulus, distant about 45 degrees from the southernmost of them. Four stars in the body of Leo form a characteristic trapezium, and those about the neck and mane make a sickle.

Leochares (lē-ok'ā-rēz). Athenian sculptor, who was active about the middle of the 4th century B.C. He was a pupil of Scopas and associated with him on the mausoleum of Halicarnassus. He is probably represented by the Ganymede and eagle of the Vatican, supposed to be a copy of his celebrated work.

Leonidas (lē-on'ī-dās). King of Sparta, early in the 5th century B.C. He was reputed to be the 20th generation in direct descent from Heracles, and became king of Sparta, c490

B.C., on the death of his two elder brothers, who died childless. When Xerxes marched with his host against Greece and invaded the mainland as far as the borders of Locris, Leonidas went to defend the narrow pass at Thermopylae (480 B.C.), through the mountains south of the Sinus Maliacus. Through it ran the main road into Greece by which the Persian land forces meant to enter Locris and press on to the Peloponnesus. Under his command Leonidas had a force of 4000 soldiers, including 300 Spartans, 700 Thespians, and groups of varying numbers from Arcadia, Corinth, Mycenae, Thebes, and other cities. The plan was to send him more soldiers as soon as the Olympic Festival, which fell at this time, was over. However, before reinforcements arrived, Xerxes learned from his spies the small size of the force which opposed him. He questioned Demaratus, a former Spartan king who had fled to Xerxes before the Persian invasion and who now accompanied him. Did Demaratus think these Spartans, whom his spies had observed combing their hair and going through gymnastic exercises, would dare fight the host of the Persians? Demaratus assured him that the Spartans were the bravest of the Greeks, that it was their custom to dress their hair when they were about to risk their lives in battle, and that they were trained to give up their lives in glorious combat rather than retreat or surrender. Xerxes was incredulous. He thought it was ridiculous that such a small force would attempt to resist his vast army. He waited four days, thinking the Greeks would surely retire. Finding that they did not do so, he sent the Medes and Cissians against them. The Greeks fought like gods in the narrow pass, caused immense slaughter among the barbarians, and compelled them to withdraw. Xerxes next sent his Persian Immortals against them. This was a band of 10,000, called Immortals because when one of their number fell he was replaced immediately, that the number might remain always at exactly 10,000. They too suffered enormous casualties and fell back. The next day the Persians attacked again, and were again driven back. Now as Xerxes pondered what should be done, a Malian, one Ephialtes, out of desire for gain betrayed the Greeks. He went to Xerxes and offered to lead the Persians across the mountains by a path he knew so that they could attack the Greeks from the rear. Xerxes gladly accepted his services. At nightfall he sent a band of Persians off under the guidance of Ephialtes. Leonidas was first warned of the destruction that was coming by the seer Megistias, who learned of it from his sacrificial victims. The seer's warning was confirmed by scouts. On learning of the destruction that was imminent, Leonidas decided that he and his Spartans could not honorably withdraw, but he allowed the soldiers from all the other cities to retire, except the Thebans, who had come unwillingly in the first place, and whom he kept as hostages. The Thespians remained of their own accord, refusing to desert Leonidas. According to Herodotus, who gives us a description of the heroic defense of the pass, Leonidas had earlier been told by an oracle that either Sparta or its king must fall before the barbarians. He chose to remain and perish at their hands, thus fulfilling the oracle, that Sparta might be spared. The next day, the Persians fell upon them again. Leonidas and his forces met the attack with unparalleled courage, knowing they were doomed to die. They boldly sallied out from the narrow pass and in a furious onslaught slew many of the barbarians before them and flung others into the sea. On this wild day the brave Leonidas perished in furious battle. Many valiant Spartans and brave Persians, among them kin of Xerxes, also died. After inflicting immense casualties and losing many of their own number, the Greeks, except the Thebans who surrendered, again withdrew to the pass. Here they were attacked on their other side by the Persians who had crossed the mountain. A smaller band now, they formed a tight group on a hillock near the entrance to the pass and continued to defend themselves. They fought with immortal valor until not one Greek survived. A stone lion in honor of Leonidas was set up to mark the spot where the Spartans perished, and the names of the 300 Spartans were engraved on a pillar, set up in Sparta, which existed at least until the 2nd century A.D. In honor of the 4000 of the original group, before Leonidas sent the allies away, an inscription marked the spot, which read:

Here did four thousand men from Pelops' land

Against three hundred myriads bravely stand.

The Spartans alone were immortalized in another inscription:

Go, stranger, and to Lacedaemon tell

That here, obeying her behests, we fell.

It is said that Xerxes, examining the field after the battle, came upon the body of Leonidas and knew him to be the Spartan king and commander. He ordered the head cut off and the body hung on a cross. This was a measure of his wrath against Leonidas, for ordinarily fallen enemies were honorably treated. It is also said that Xerxes tried to conceal the number of men he had lost, 20,000, in this engagement with first 4000 and then 1000 Greeks. He buried 19,000 of his dead in trenches which he camouflaged with branches. The bodies of 1000 he left scattered about the field. But this attempt at deception fooled no one. Many years after his death the bones of Leonidas were removed to Sparta by Pausanias, the victor at Plataea. In after times, speeches were annually delivered over the tombs of Leonidas and Pausanias, and contests were held in which none save Spartans could compete.

Leonidas of Tarentum. Greatly admired Greek epigrammatist of the 3rd century B.C. About 100 of his epigrams appear in the Anthology. (JJ)

Leonnatus (lē-ō-nā'tus). General of Alexander the Great; died 322 B.C. He was one of the ablest of Alexander's generals. On the return from India Alexander pursued the Malli and attacked them in their city, the modern Multan, 325 B.C. He recklessly mounted the wall of the city and leaped down among his enemies before his men had gained entrance into the city. Leonnatus was one of three who succeeded in scaling the wall to go to his aid. He guarded the king, who had been wounded as he faced his enemies, until rescue arrived. On Alexander's death (323 B.C.), Leonnatus received the satrapy of Hellespontine Phrygia. He fell in battle against the Athenians and their allies while seeking to relieve Antipater who was blockaded in Lamia.

married Menelaus. He was a leader of the Greeks at Troy and, with Polypoetes, held off Asius as he besieged the Greek fortifications. By slaying Orestes, Hippomachus, Antiphates, Menon, and Iamenus, he halted the Trojan attack.

Leontini (lē-on-tī'ni). [Modern name, Lentini.]

In ancient geography, a city of Sicily, situated on a plain between two hills, about 21 miles NW of Syracuse. It was founded by Chalcidian Greeks from Sicilian Naxos, 729 B.C. Hippocrates of Gela took it, 498 B.C., and to it Hiero of Syracuse removed the inhabitants of Catana and Naxos. In 433 B.C. Leontini entered into an alliance with Athens to counteract the growing power of the Corinthian city of Syracuse, and in 427 B.C. an Athenian expedition was sent out to Sicily, largely owing to the urging of Gorgias of Leontini, but the expedition accomplished little. In 423 B.C. the city was taken by Syracuse. The restoration of Leontini was one of the objects of the second expedition undertaken by Athens against Sicily, 415 B.C. The expedition failed signally to accomplish its objects and brought disaster to Athens. After being devastated by the Carthaginians, 406 B.C., the independence of Leontini was restored briefly by a treaty of peace between Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, and the Carthaginians, but in 404 B.C. the city surrendered to Dionysius rather than risk annihilation at his hands. In the Second Punic War it was besieged and taken by the Romans under Marcellus, 214 B.C.

Leonymus (lē-on'i-mus). A legendary general of Croton. He was wounded in battle, and his wound did not heal. On the advice of the oracle at Delphi he sought out the spirit of Ajax on the island of Leuce, the "White Island," according to tradition, located at the mouth of the Ister. There he saw the two Ajaxes, Achilles, Antilochus, Patroclus, and Helen. He was cured of his wound and returned. It was Leonymus who brought back the message from Helen that Stesichorus, the poet, had been struck blind by her because of the infamous poems he wrote about her.

Leos (lē'os). According to legend, a herald, who informed Theseus that the sons of Pallas had divided their forces to attack Athens. One of these forces was hidden in ambush. Because of the information Leos gave him

Theseus surprised and killed them. Because he had informed on the sons of Pallas, their descendants in Pallene never intermarried with the people of Agnus from which Leos came. They would not permit their heralds to make the customary introduction to their proclamations, "Akouete leoi!" (Hearken, ye people!) because the word leoi reminded them of the treachery of Leos.

Leos. According to some accounts, a son of Orpheus. During his time Attica was afflicted by a crippling famine. The oracle of Delphi said the famine would be ended if there was a human sacrifice. Leos offered his three daughters—Praxithea, Theope, and Eubule—for the good of the state, and the famine was ended. Some say the three girls gave their lives of their own accord for the public good. In any event, the famine was over, and ever after the three maidens were worshiped at a shrine called the Leocorium in the district of the Ceramicus at Athens. It was beside this shrine that Hipparchus was slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton.

Leosthenes (lē-os'the-nēz). Athenian general; died 322 B.C. He was commander of the combined Greeks armies in the Lamian War, 323 B.C., defeating Antipater and forcing him to take refuge in Lamia, the siege of which city gave the war its name. Leosthenes was killed in the course of the siege.

Leotychides (lē-ō-tik'i-dēz). King of Sparta, c491-c476 B.C. He was the son of Menares and was reputed to be a direct descendant of Heracles. All his ancestors except the seven immediately preceding him had been kings of Sparta. Cleomenes, co-king of Sparta with Demaratus, sought to depose Demaratus, and agreed to make Leotychides king in his place if the latter would help him against the Aeginetans. Leotychides was the more willing to destroy Demaratus because Demaratus had stolen the bride to whom he was betrothed and married her himself. Leotychides brought charges against Demaratus, claiming he was not the true son of Ariston. The priestess of Delphi, bribed by Cleomenes, confirmed his charges, and Leotychides became king in his place. In fulfillment of his agreement he then assisted Cleomenes in a successful attack on the Aeginetans. Leotychides commanded the Spartan fleet that sailed against the Persians at Mycale in Asia Minor, and defeated them there in 479 B.C., traditionally on the same day as the Greeks at Plataea defeated the Persian forces under Mardonius. Later he commanded the Spartans in a war against Thessaly and might have conquered the whole region but for his probable acceptance of a bribe. Discovered in his tent with a large sum of silver, he was brought to trial and fled, or was banished, from Sparta. His house was destroyed and he took refuge at Tegea where he subsequently died, c469 B.C.

Lepidus (lep'i-dus), Marcus Aemilius. [Surnamed Porcina.] Roman consul (137 B.C.) and orator. He was sent into Spain during his consulship, and conducted an unsuccessful war against the Vaccaei.

Lepidus, Marcus Aemilius. Roman politician; died c77 B.C. He was the father of Lepidus the triumvir (died 13 B.C.). He was praetor of Sicily, 81 B.C., took the side of Sulla in the civil war, but then abandoned him and with Pompey's help became consul, 78 B.C. He unsuccessfully attempted to alter Sulla's constitution and was then ordered to a provincial post by the Senate to remove him from Rome. On his way to his post, Transalpine Gaul, he began to raise an army in defiance of the Senate, which thereupon declared him an enemy of Rome. Pompey and Catulus led the resistance when he marched on Rome, 77 B.C., and defeated him in the Campus Martius. He went to Sardinia and died shortly thereafter.

Lepidus, Marcus Aemilius. Roman politician; died 13 B.C. He was consul, 46 B.C., and took the side of Caesar in the civil war. When Caesar was assassinated (44 B.C.), Lepidus was at the head of an army preparing to go to Gaul. In the disturbances that followed Caesar's death he allied himself with Mark Antony, and became a member of the Second Triumvirate with Octavian and Antony in 43 B.C. Octavian and Antony took away his provinces of Spain and Gaul and relegated him to a minor role in the affairs of government. He was later given command of 20 legions in Africa and became so convinced of his strength that he demanded an equal role in the Triumvirate, but without success. In 36 B.C. he sailed to Sicily to raise rebellion against Octavian but was betrayed by the soldiers, who went over to the latter. Lepidus was sent into permanent exile, which he passed at Circeii.

Lepini (lā-pē'nē), Monti. Italian name of the Volscian Mountains.

Lepontine Alps (lē-pon'tin, -tīn). [Italian, Alpi Lepontine.] That part of the Alps which extends from the Simplon Pass E to the Splügen Pass. It comprises the St. Gothard, Ticino, and Adula Alps. Highest peak, Monte Leone (about 11,655 feet).

Lepreum (lep'rē-um). City of Elis on the coast of the Cyparissian Gulf. Some say that the city was founded by Minyans who had come from the island of Lemnos and settled there. They say the city was named for Lepreus, who challenged Heracles to a series of contests and was killed. Others say the city got its name from the disease that afflicted the inhabitants. The disease was called leprosy but was not the same as the modern disease of that name. It was a skin affection in which the skin became whitish in color, rough, and scaly. The people of Lepreum wished to be thought Arcadians, but they were in fact Eleans, and when they won in the Olympic Games, were announced as Eleans from Lepreum. Near Lepreum was the spring of Arene, said to have been so named for the wife of Aphareus.

Lepreus (lep'rē-us). According to tradition, a son of Caucon. He founded the city of Lepreum near the Messenian border of Elis. This city, named after him, or as some say because of the leprosy that attacked the earliest settlers of the district, became the chief seat of his father's worship. Lepreus incurred the enmity of Heracles because he advised Augeas to bind Heracles when the latter asked to be paid for cleaning the Augean stables. Later, on learning that Heracles was on his way to the city, Lepreus, at his mother's urging, agreed to receive Heracles and ask his forgiveness. Heracles agreed to do so, but challenged him to three contests: throwing the discus, drinking the greatest quantity of water, and eating an ox. Heracles won the first two, but Lepreus ate his ox the faster. Immediately he challenged Heracles to a duel, in which Lepreus was clubbed to death.

Libyan coast just E of the present town of Homs, said to have been founded by Sidonians. After the Second Punic War it was conquered by the Numidians, but in the wars waged by Jugurtha for control of Numidia, it appealed to Rome for protection and became an ally. It was the birthplace of Septimius Severus, Emperor of Rome 193–211 A.D., who embellished it with handsome buildings and extensive public works, including Septimius' great arch. Beginning in the 4th century it was repeatedly raided from the desert and its population dwindled; its ruins remain today, however, the most imposing of Roman Africa. The most recent explorations have indicated the presence of a Punic settlement underlying the imperial city.

Lepus (lē'pus). ["The Hare."] An ancient southern constellation, situated south of Orion and east of Canis Major. Its brightest star is in a line from the middle star of Orion's Belt through the sword of Orion.

Lerna (lēr'nā). In ancient geography, a marshy region and town in Argolis, Greece, S of Argos, and situated on the Gulf of Argolis. It is said that out of love for Amymone, daughter of Danaus, Poseidon caused a never-failing spring to gush forth here, which became the source of the never-dry river of Lerna. Some say the marsh of Lerna was the home of the Nereids. On the banks of the river the many-headed Lernaean Hydra was born under a plane tree. It lived in the marsh and was so devastating that the name Lerna became synonymous with evil in the saying, "A Lerna of evils." To the marsh came Heracles, who sought out the monster, and with the aid of Iolaus slew it. In the marsh was the bottomless Alcyonean Lake that once the Emperor Nero tried, and failed, to sound. Some say this lake was an entrance to Hades. Into it, they say, Dionysus plunged when he went to Hades to seek his mother. His descent to Hades was remembered annually with secret rites on the banks of the lake at night. Vine-wreathed trumpets pealed forth to summon the god up from the depths. According to some accounts, the heads of the sons of Aegyptus, murdered on their wedding night by their brides, the daughters of Danaus, were buried at Lerna. The Danaids were afterward purified for the murders in the waters of Lerna by Athena and Hermes but this did not save them from punishment in Hades. Danaus raised a shrine to Athena on the bank of the river Pontinus that flows through the marsh. In a sacred grove on the slopes of Mount Pontinus, west of the marsh, were images of Demeter, Dionysus, and Prosymna, the latter said to be one of the nurses of Hera. Lerna was a place where murderers went for purification. The river Lerna was also called Amymone, after the daughter of Danaus loved by Poseidon.

Lernaea (lēr-nē'ā). Epithet of Demeter. Mysteries were celebrated in honor of Lernaean Demeter (Of Lerna) at Lerna. Here, some say, Hades disappeared into the earth with Persephone.

Lerus (lē'rus) or Leros (lē'ros). [Also: Lero.] Small, rocky island in the Aegean Sea, about 32 miles S of Samos and lying N of Calymna. In the course of the Ionian revolt against Persia, which began 499 B.C., Aristagoras, one of the chief instigators, was forced to flee from Miletus to Myrcinus in Macedonia by the successes of the Persians. Hecataeus the historian proposed to the Ionians that they retire to Lerus with its deep and well-protected harbors, fortify it, and prepare to resist the Persians from there, or make it a base for a later return to Miletus. His advice was not taken. Area of the island, about 28 square miles.

Lesbia (lez'bi-ā). Name by which Clodia, the favorite of Catullus, is referred to in his poems.

Lesbian Adventures (lez'bi-ān), The. [Also: Lesbiaca.] Greek romance, attributed to Longus.

Lesbos (lez'bos). [Also: Lesvos, Mytilene, Mitylene, Mytilini; Italian, Metelino; Turkish Midillü.] Mountainous and fertile island in the N Aegean Sea, lying just off the coast of Asia Minor opposite ancient Mysia. It was to this island, according to legend, that the dismembered head of Orpheus floated after it had been tossed into the Hebrus River by the maenads. His lyre also landed here and remained until, at the request of Apollo and the Muses, it was translated to the heavens as the constellation Lyra. In the Trojan War, Lesbos belonged to Priam's realm and was assaulted and taken by the forces of

Achilles. In later times the noble families of Lesbos claimed descent from Agamemnon. The island was colonized by Aeolians and was one of the strongest Aeolian centers. In the late 7th and early 6th centuries B.C. Pittacus, known as one of the Seven Sages of Greece, became tyrant and put an end to the internecine wars that divided the island. Later in the 6th century B.C. Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, defeated the Lesbians in a sea fight when they came out against him to aid Miletus. The Lesbians he captured in the battle were put in chains and compelled to build the moat around the castle at Samos. The island came under the dominion of the Persians and revolted, along with the Ionian cities, in 499 B.C. through hatred of the satrap Coes set over them by Darius. They furnished men and ships to Histiaeus, a leader of the revolt. However, in the battle of Lade (494 B.C.) for the relief of Miletus to which the Lesbians sent 70 ships, the Lesbians sailed away without joining the battle, and the following year Lesbos again fell to the Persians. After the Persian War Lesbos joined the Confederacy of Delos, under Athenian leadership, as an ally that contributed ships and was not required to pay tribute. In 428 B.C. Lesbos, a free ally, revolted against Athens. The Athenians sent a fleet, besieged Mytilene, which had now become the chief seat of resistance as well as the center of affairs of the island, and compelled its surrender. The Athenians voted in assembly to put the entire adult male population of Mytilene to death and to sell the women and children into slavery. A ship was sent to Mytilene bearing the order, but the day after the vote was taken in Athens reaction set in, the vote was rescinded, and a second ship, whose crew was promised large rewards if the first ship was overtaken, set out for Lesbos to countermand the first terrible order. The second ship arrived at Mytilene almost at the same time as the first ship, whose commander had not been in a hurry to deliver his fatal message. The ring-leaders of the revolt were executed, the Lesbian fleet was taken over by Athens, and the walls of Mytilene were pulled down, but the population of Mytilene was spared. A second revolt, 412 B.C., was also put down. In the last years of the Peloponnesian War the island was frequently attacked by the Spartans and their allies and parts of it were taken. Most of it was won back for Athens by Thrasybulus. It joined the second Athenian Confederacy in 377 B.C. and remained loyal. Later in the 4th century B.C. it fell to Macedonia. It was taken by Mithridates of Pontus (88 B.C.), and when he was defeated by the Romans, it became part of the Roman province of Asia. The five chief cities of ancient Lesbos were Mytilene, Methymna, Antissa, Eresus, and Pyrrha. The island was celebrated in ancient times as a seat of literature. In the 7th century B.C. it produced the musician Terpander, the cyclic poet Lesches, and the poet Arion of Methymna who was credited with inventing the dithyramb, or cyclic chorus. The lyric poets Sappho and Alcaeus were contemporaries of Pittacus in the 6th century B.C. The philosophers Theophrastus (c372-c287 B.C.) and Cratippus (1st century B.C.) were also natives of Lesbos. Area of the island, about 630 square miles.

Lesches (les'kēz) or Lescheus (les'kūs). Greek cyclic poet, born at Pyrrha near Mytilene, and active in the 7th century B.C. He was the reputed author of a lost poem entitled The Little Iliad, in four books. It was designed to be a sequel to the Iliad of Homer, and related the events which followed the death of Hector, namely, the fate of Telamonian Ajax, the exploits of Odysseus, and the fall of Troy.

Lesser Eleusinia (el-ū-sin'i-a). An annual festival at Athens, held as a prelude to the Great Eleusinia in the last days of February and early days of March.

Lethe (lē'thē). In Greek mythology: 1) The personification of oblivion; a daughter of Eris. 2) The river of oblivion, one of the streams of Hades, the waters of which possessed the property of causing those who drank of them to forget their former existence. The dead drank upon their arrival in Hades; and souls destined for reincarnation had to drink of it to forget everything they had seen before returning to earth. Ariosto places Lethe in the moon; Dante places it in purgatory.

Leto (lē'tō). [Latin, Latona.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of the Titans Coeus and Phoebe. Some say she was the gentle wife of Zeus, before he married Hera, and bore him the twins Apollo and Artemis. But others say Zeus pursued her after he was married to Hera, and that he transformed himself and Leto into quails before he ravished her. Hera was wild with jealousy when she learned Leto was to bear the children of Zeus. She sent the serpent Python to pursue her. She ordered that no place on earth where the sun shone should receive Leto. As the time for the birth of her children approached, Leto was rejected by heaven, earth, and sea; she fled before Python hopelessly. Some say the South Wind bore her to Ortygia, a tiny island near Delos, and that there she bore Artemis without pain; but others say Poseidon sent a dolphin that carried her over the sea on its back. As soon as Artemis was born she helped her mother across the sea to Delos, another tiny island, which was the only spot on earth to offer her hospitality. There, leaning against a palm tree on the side of a mountain and shaded from the sun, or as some say, in a cave, Leto bore Apollo after nine days of labor. Up to this time Delos had been a floating island; it now became anchored or, as some say, four pillars sprang up from the bottom of the sea to hold it in place because of the kindness to Leto. As the birthplace of Apollo it became one of his favorite and most sacred shrines. In a later time no one was permitted to be born there: women near the time of their confinement were removed to a nearby island. And no one was permitted to die there: the very ill were also carried to a nearby island so that they might not pollute the sacred place. Some say both Artemis and Apollo were born on Delos. According to some accounts, Hera continued to harass Leto, and compelled her to flee from Delos shortly after her children were born. She arrived at last in Lycia. Exhausted, she came to a lake in a valley. She knelt to drink of its waters for she was faint from hunger and thirst. Peasants gathering rushes on the brim of the lake tried to prevent her from drinking, and ended by muddying the waters so that she could not drink. To punish them, Leto said they should live forever in this lake of theirs that was so precious to them: she transformed them into frogs. An altar was raised to Leto on that spot. Apollo at length killed the Python and Leto went to Delphi. On her way she stepped into a sacred grove to perform some rites. Tityus, the giant son of Elara and Zeus, attacked her and attempted to violate her. Apollo, hearing her cries, rushed to her defense and with his arrows slew Tityus. Apollo and Artemis were ever devoted protectors of their mother's honor. When Niobe boasted of her lineage, her beauty, her riches—and above all—of her children, and called on the people of Thebes to worship her instead of Leto who had only two children, Leto called on Apollo and Artemis to avenge the insult and the insolence of Niobe. Apollo and Artemis swept down and killed all the seven sons and seven daughters of Niobe. As the mother of the Olympians Apollo and Artemis, Leto went to dwell in Olympus and was worshiped in connection with her children.

Letrini (let-rī'ni). [Modern name, Pirgos or Pyrgos.] Town in Elis, said to have been founded by Letreus, son of Pelops. In the temple of Artemis the Letrinians worshiped the goddess as Alphaea, because it was at Letrini that she daubed her face and the faces of her nymphs with white clay to escape the embraces of the river-god Alpheus.

Leucaeus (lō-sē'us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Of the White Poplar." Some say Heracles brought the white poplar to Elis from Thesprotia, where he found it growing on the banks of the Acheron River, and that he burned the thigh bones of victims being sacrificed to Zeus at Elis on the wood of the white poplar. Thenceforth the Eleans used only the wood of the white poplar in sacrificing to Zeus. There was a temple of Zeus Leucaeus at Lepreum in Elis.

Leucas (lō'kas). [Also: Leucadia, Leukados, Levkas; Italian, Santa Maura.] One of the Ionian Islands, W of Aetolia and Acarnania in Greece. The island is separated from the mainland by only a narrow channel, and the ancients considered it as a peninsula which had been artificially made into an island by a man-made channel. Some say the island was named for Leucadius, a brother of Penelope, who was a king in Acarnania. And some say Leucas is the island described in the Odyssey as Ithaca, the center of the island kingdom of Odysseus. Those who hold this view claim that Homer's description fits

Leucas and profess to recognize the site of Odysseus' palace at Nidri on the east coast. The great bay of Ithaca described by Homer is identified with the bay of Vlikhon. Other spots specifically described in the Odyssey have been identified by those who hold the view that Leucas was the home of Odysseus. The surface of the island is hilly and mountainous. A rocky promontory (Cape Doukato) was the site of a temple of Apollo which, according to some accounts, was built by Cephalus. It was from this cliff that Cephalus, grieving for his wife Procris whom he had unwittingly slain, leaped into the sea. Aeneas and his companions stopped on their way from Troy to Italy and held Trojan Games on Leucas. Near the ancient temple of Apollo on the promontory in the SW part of the island is a steep cliff, known as Sappho's Leap, from which the poetess Sappho is said to have thrown herself into the sea. The ancient city of Leucas was founded by colonists from Corinth in the 7th century B.C. These colonists are said to have made Leucas into an island by cutting a canal across the isthmus. The canal later was silted up, for in 425 B.C. the Peloponnesian fleet was hauled across the Isthmus. In the time of Augustus the canal was cleared and the channel deepened. Bronze-age tombs and pottery found on the island indicate that it was occupied in Mycenaean times.

Leuce (lō'sē). In Greek mythology, a nymph who was pursued by Hades. To prevent him from violating her, she was transformed into a white poplar tree and stands beside the Pool of Memory in the Underworld.

Leuce. In ancient geography, a wooded island off the mouth of the Ister river (Danube) in the Euxine Sea. According to some accounts in Greek mythology, Poseidon, at the request of Thetis, gave this island to Achilles and to it he retired after he was slain at Troy. His shade was joined by his companions Patroclus, Antilochus, the two Ajaxes, and Helen. There was a temple of Achilles there that contained an image of him and one of Helen. According to tradition, seamen were permitted to land and make sacrifices, but had to leave the island before sunset. No one could live on the island and women were absolutely forbidden to set foot on it. Achilles and his companions made merry there, and mariners sailing nearby claimed they could hear the voices of Achilles and his friends singing the verses of Homer, and sometimes the clashing of shields and the sound of horses stamping their hoofs were said to be wafted over the waves.

Leucerae, Lacus (lō-sēr'ē lā'kus). [Modern name, Lake Lecco.] Southeastern arm of Lacus Larius (Lake Como), NW Italy. Length, about 13 miles.

Leucippe. According to legend, the mother of Teuthras, king in Mysia. When her son was smitten with madness and a violent skin disease for killing a boar that had fled to the temple of Artemis, Leucippe, taking the seer Polyidus with her, appeased the goddess with rich sacrifices. When Teuthras was restored to sanity and his skin disorder was cured, Leucippe built an altar to Artemis. She caused a boar, with the head of a man, to be made of gold. This image, when threatened, sought refuge in the temple of Artemis and cried, "Spare me!", even as did the real boar which Teuthras had impiously slain.

Leucippe. Daughter of Thestor, sister of Theonoë and Calchas. See Thestor.

Leucippides (lō-sip'i-dēz). In Greek mythology, the daughters of Leucippus: Phoebe, a priestess of Athena, and Hilaira, a priestess of Artemis. They were betrothed to their cousins, Idas and Lynceus, but were carried off by Castor and Polydeuces and became the mothers of sons by them.

Leucippus (lō-sip'us). In Greek mythology, a son of Oenomaus. He loved the nymph Daphne, but she was a follower of Artemis and scorned men. Leucippus disguised himself as a maiden and was accepted as a companion of Daphne and her friends in their hunting expeditions. Apollo also loved Daphne, and he advised the maidens to bathe naked to be sure that all were maidens. When the disguise of Leucippus was thus revealed Daphne and her companions set upon him and tore him to pieces.

Leucippus. In Greek legend, the son of Gorgophone and Perieres, brother of Aphareus, and grandson of Perseus. He shared the rule of Messene with his brother when Perieres died. He was the father of the Leucippides: Phoebe and Hilaira.

Leucippus/Libera

Leucippus. Greek philosopher, active c450 B.C. He originated an Atomic theory, according to which the atom is the irreducible solid, the basic substance of which all matter, whatever its shape, size, or ability to move, is composed.

Leucon (lō'kon). In Greek mythology, a son of Athamas, king of Orchomenus in Boeotia, and Nephele, a cloud-born woman. He sickened and died because of his father's crimes.

Leucopetra (lō-kop'e-tra). [Modern Italian name, Capo dell' Armi.] In ancient geography, a promontory at the SW extremity of Italy.

Leucopetra. In ancient geography, a village on the Isthmus of Corinth. Here (146 B.C.) the Romans under Mummius defeated the Achaean League under Diaeus.

Leucophryne (lū'kō-frī'nē). An epithet of Artemis. She was worshiped as Leucophryne by the Magnesians of Asia. The sons of Themistocles dedicated a bronze statue of Artemis Leucophryne on the Acropolis because their father had been made governor of Magnesia in Asia by the Persian king. The epithet Leucophryne was taken from Leucophrys, a town in the valley of the Maeander River, where there was a very holy sanctuary of Artemis. At Magnesia on the Maeander was a magnificent Ionic temple of Artemis Leucophryne that was the third largest temple in Asia. The image in it wore a mural crown. The lower part of the body of the image resembled a pillar, and fillets hung from the outstretched arms of the upper part.

Leucophrys (lū-kō'fris). An ancient name for the island of Tenedos. It was renamed Tenedos for Tenes, son of Cynus, who landed there safely with his sister Hemithea when they had been cast into the sea in a chest by his father because of a false accusation, made against Tenes by Phylonome, second wife of Cynus.

Leucothea (lō-koth'ē-a). A sea-goddess, formerly the mortal Ino who had been metamorphosed into a goddess when she leaped into the sea to escape from her husband Athamas whom Hera had driven mad. She gave Odysseus a veil to buoy him up when Poseidon in a great storm destroyed the raft on which he had left the island of Calypso. Leucothea advised Odysseus to abandon the fragments of the raft and with the help of the veil to swim to Phaeacia, after which his troubles would be over. See also, Ino.

Leucothoë (lō-koth'ō-ē). In Greek mythology, a Babylonian princess who was transformed into a sweet-smelling plant by Apollo.

Leuctra (lōk'tra) or Leuctrum (-trum). A city on the eastern coast of the Gulf of Messenia. It was claimed by the Lacedaemonians. The Messenians, who also claimed it as formerly a part of Messenia, said it was named for Leucippus, a descendant of Perseus.

Leuctra. In ancient geography, a locality in Boeotia, Greece, about seven miles SW of Thebes. It is celebrated for the victory (371 B.C.) gained here by the Thebans under Epaminondas over the Spartans under Cleombrotus. The battle is significant as the decisive end of Spartan military supremacy in Greece and as a tactical turning point in military history, Epaminondas's victory being the result of his concentration of overwhelming force at a single point in the enemy line. He did this by strengthening the left wing of his phalanx to a depth of 50 men and by having it advance ahead of the other wing.

Leucus (lō'kus). A legendary Cretan who became the paramour of Meda, wife of King Idomeneus, while the king was away at the Trojan War. He murdered Meda and her daughter, and took the throne of Crete. When Idomeneus returned to Crete after the war, Leucus banished him, using as a pretext the occurrence of a pestilence following his arrival.

Leucus. In the Iliad, a valiant companion of Odysseus. He was slain at the siege of Troy by Antiphus, a son of Priam.

Leukothea (lō-kō-thē'a). See Leucothea.

Levadia (le-vā'thyä), or Levadhia, Levadeia, Livadia. See Lebadia.

Levana (le-vā'nä). In Roman religion, a goddess of childbirth and protectress of children.

Liber (lī'bēr). In Italian mythology, a god of the vine and wine, worshiped as a fertility god, who became identified with the Greek Dionysus. He was honored, with his female counterpart, Libera, at the festival Liberalia, celebrated on March 17.

Libera (lib'ē-rä). In Italian mythology, a goddess of the vine and wine, partner of the wine-god Liber, worshiped as a fertility god-

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hér ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, dess. She became, in this capacity, identified with the Greek Persephone.

Liberalia (lib-ē-rā'li-ā). An ancient Roman festival celebrated annually on March 17 in honor of Liber and Libera.

Liberalis (lib-ē-rā'lis), Antoninus. See Antoninus Liberalis.

Libertas (li-bēr'tas). The Roman personification of Liberty. She was represented wearing the Phrygian cap which symbolized liberty and sometimes with the dagger. There was a temple to Libertas on the Aventine Hill.

Libethra (li-bē'thra). In ancient geography, a place at the foot of Mount Olympus where the remains of Orpheus, gathered by the Muses, were said to have been buried; the nightingales were said to sing more sweetly here than anywhere else in the world. According to legend, an oracle of Dionysus came to Libethra from Thrace, saying that when the bones of Orpheus were seen by the sun, their town would be destroyed by a boar. The people forgot the oracle. One day a shepherd leaned against the pillar on which the urn containing the bones of Orpheus was supported. The shepherd fell asleep, and presently began to sing sweetly in his sleep. Other shepherds heard him and crowded up to listen. They jostled each other in their eagerness, crowded about the pillar, and overturned it, so that the urn fell to the ground and broke open. The bones within it were exposed to the sun. The following night a torrential rain fell. The river Sys (Boar) flooded its banks, breached the walls of Libethra, overturned the sanctuaries of the gods and the houses of men, and drowned the inhabitants and their animals. At a later time, Macedonians from Diium came to the place, took the bones of Orpheus, and carried them to their own city.

Libitina (lib-i-ti'na). Ancient Italian goddess of gardens and vineyards. By confusion with the word "libido" she was mistakenly regarded as a goddess of passion. Later Venus became identified with her as Venus Libitina, especially in her aspect as goddess of death and of burials. In this aspect she was later identified with Proserpina. By tradition, a piece of money was deposited in her temple for every one who died in Rome.

Libra (lī'bra). The seventh sign of the zodiac—the Balance—which the sun enters about September 23. Also, a zodiacal constellation, representing an ordinary pair of scales. This constellation was not commonly used among the Greeks, its place being occupied by the Chelae, or Scorpion's Claws. It is found, however, in all the Egyptian zodiacs, going back to 600 B.C.; but there is reason to believe that it is not as old as the rest of the zodiac (that is, 2000 years or more B.C.).

Library. Before the time of Aristotle, we hear of individuals who possessed private collections of books; and evidence of an industry of copying manuscripts and of a market in used books suggests a reading public; but it was Aristotle who first set out deliberately to collect copies of those works which interested him. The Greek kings of Egypt set the pattern for large state libraries. Either Ptolemy I Soter (ruled, first as satrap, later as king, 323–283 B.C.), or Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–246 B.C.) established the Library at Alexandria which was said eventually to have possessed several hundred thousand volumes. (It should be noted that the unit usually translated "book," the volumen, literally, "roll," is the optimum size of a papyrus scroll convenient to handle, corresponding to a "book" of Herodotus, Thucydides, or Livy, or to 30–40 pages of modern print.) Under the direction of successive eminent scholars, the Library and the associated Museum at Alexandria became an institute for advanced research, and as a center of Hellenistic literary production and criticism was without rival in the ancient world, though the library founded by Eumenes II at Pergamum enjoyed wide fame and was reputed to contain 200,000 rolls. According to Strabo, Aristotle's disciple Theophrastus left the manuscripts of the master's works to one Neleus of Scepsis, whose descendants, to keep them out of the hands of the kings of Pergamum, stored them in a cellar. In one perhaps not fully reliable account, the Library of Alexandria was destroyed by fire while Caesar was besieged there, and subsequently, it is said, Antony presented the Pergamene books to Cleopatra as the nucleus of a new collection. In Rome, by the 1st century B.C., large private libraries had become commonplace (Lucullus, Cicero, Atticus, Varro, Caesar); Augustus established in Rome two libraries of Greek and Latin works; a special type of building suited to library practice was designed, and examples are known at Athens, Ephesus, Leptis Magna, and elsewhere. One of the most startling events of archaeology was the discovery at Herculaneum, in 1752, of a private library of 1800 or more rolls, complete with book-cases and a reading table; unfortunately, the papyrus had so deteriorated that the rolls have defied the most painstaking attempts to unroll them. (JJ) Liburnia (lī-bēr'ni-ā). 1) In ancient geography, a country in Illyria, along the Adriatic Sea, corresponding to the W part of modern Croatia, Yugoslavia. The inhabitants were celebrated as navigators and pirates. 2) A fast, light cutter developed by the inhabitants of Liburnia, originally for piracy, the liburna or liburnica. The Romans adopted it and it became an indispensable part of the imperial fleet.

Liburnum (lī-bēr'num) or Liburni Portus (lī-bēr'nī pōr'tus). [Modern name, Livorno; English, Leghorn.] Seaport of C Italy, on the Ligurian Sea.

Libya (lib'i-ā). In ancient geography, a name of varying signification, denoting Africa, or Africa excluding Egypt, or Africa excluding Egypt and Ethiopia.

Libyan Desert (lib'i-ān). [In Egypt, Western Desert.] In ancient times, the Sahara; now restricted to an extremely barren and partly sandy desert region extending from the W side of the Nile valley to E central Libya. Area, about 750,000 square miles.

Libyans (lib'i-ānz). Inhabitants of ancient Libya, a Hamitic-speaking group. Their extinct languages and dialects, called Old Libyan, belonged to the Hamitic group of languages.

Libyan Sea. [Latin, Libycum Mare.] In ancient geography, that part of the Mediterranean which extends from what is now Tunisia E to Egypt.

Licata (lē-kā'tā). See Phintias.

Lichas (lī'kas). In Greek legend, a herald of Heracles. He escorted the captive Iole to Deianira, and tried to protect Deianira from the knowledge that Heracles had transferred his affections to Iole and intended his wife to share her house with his captive. Deianira gave the ceremonial robe which she had anointed with what she thought was a love charm to Lichas to take to Heracles. When Heracles put it on he was soon consumed as by a fire, for the love charm turned out to be a poison. Lichas, although he was innocent of any evil intent—as indeed, was Deianira—hid from his master's fury, but Heracles found him and, condemning him for being the bearer of the fatal robe, flung him into the Euboean Sea. Lichas turned to stone as he whistled through the air, and his stone body formed a small reef onto which sailors feared to step because they did not want to hurt Lichas.

Lichas. According to Greek tradition, a Spartan who was sent to the oracle at Delphi to learn how he could find the bones of Orestes, after the Spartans had learned from the oracle that they would not be victorious in their wars against the Tegeans until they secured the bones of Orestes from Tegea. The priestess told Lichas to go where two winds meet, where stroke meets stroke, and where evil rings upon evil. There he would find the bones he sought buried in the earth. The oracle instructed him to bring them to Sparta and make Sparta the master of Tegea. Lichas went to Tegea and came to a smithy. The smith was forging a sword of iron, instead of the usual bronze. When Lichas commented on this unusual sight, the smith told him stranger things had happened than the forging of an iron sword. He volunteered that he had found an enormous coffin containing an equally enormous skeleton when he was digging a well beneath the smithy floor. Lichas remembered the oracle and deduced that the winds referred to were those that came from the smith's bellows, the strokes were those of the hammer, and the evil upon evil was the iron sword beaten by the iron hammer, as iron was the symbol of the cruel days of the Iron Age. He returned to Sparta with the information he had gathered. The Spartans sent him back to Tegea, disguised as a fleeing slave, and he sought refuge with the smith. During the night he stole the bones from the coffin and escaped with them to Sparta. In this way the Spartans secured

the bones of Orestes, and under their protection secured ascendancy over the Tegeans.

Licinian Laws or Rogations (lī-sin'i-an). Laws proposed by the Roman tribunes Caius Licinius Calvus Stolo and Lucius Sextius in 376 B.C. and passed in 367 B.C. They provided that one of the consuls must be a plebeian; that no person could occupy more than 500 jugera (somewhat more than 300 acres) of the public land; that interest on debts should be deducted from the principal and the balance paid in three years; and that plebeians should be admitted to the College of the Sibylline Books. There were provisions limiting the cattle on the public lands and limiting the slave labor on large estates.

Licinius (lī-sin'i-us). [Full name, Caius Licinius Calvus Stolo.] Roman tribune (377 B.C.) who proposed the Licinian Laws. The laws brought a peaceful end to the struggle between patricians and plebeians. Licinius, who was active 377-361 B.C., was consul in 364 and 361 B.C. He was afterward fined for possessing more of the public land than was allowed by his own laws.

Lictor (lik'tor). Among the ancient Romans, one of a number of officers required to be free-born (though freedmen were admitted to the office under the empire), whose functions were to attend a magistrate, bearing the fasces, in some cases with the ax and in others without it, in order to clear the way and enforce due respect, and also to arrest offenders and to scourge or behead condemned persons. According to tradition, Romulus established the custom of having the lictors precede the magistrate. Some say that the idea was taken from the Etruscans and that the number represented the 12 Etruscan cities. Magistrates were entitled to a number of lictors according to their rank, a dictator having 24, a consul 12, a praetor six (at first only two within the city walls), etc. The flamen Dialis, or priest of Jupiter, and the vestals also had lictors, but, it is believed, without fasces.

Licymnius (lī-sim'ni-us). In Greek legend, a son of Electryon and Midea. He was the uncle and companion of Heracles. In his old age he unfortunately stumbled between Tlepolemus, the son of Heracles, and a servant he was punishing. Tlepolemus accidentally struck him with a club and killed him.

Ligarius (li-gār'i-us), Quintus. Roman commander; fl. in the middle of the 1st century B.C. He was an adherent of Pompey, and was defended before Caesar by Cicero.

Liguria (li-gū'ri-a). In ancient geography, the country of the Ligurians, in NW Italy and SE France. At the time of Augustus it was included between the Mediterranean and the rivers Varus, Padus, Trebia, and Magra. Originally it extended beyond these limits. It was at war with Rome from c200 B.C. to c120 B.C., and was finally subjugated in 14 B.C.

Ligurians (li-gū'ri-anz). Ancient eponymous inhabitants of Liguria, occupying a region from the Mediterranean coast into SE Gaul. One group of Ligurii, of mixed Celtic and Germanic stock, was subjugated by Rome.

Ligurian Sea. [Italian, Mar Ligure; French, Mer Ligurienne; Latin, Mare Ligusticum.] That part of the Mediterranean Sea which lies between Liguria and Corsica.

Lilybaeum (lil-i-bē'um). [Modern name, Marsala.] In ancient geography, a city on the W coast of Sicily. According to Greek tradition, it was founded by Eryx, the son of Aphrodite and the Argonaut Butes. In actuality, it was founded in 396 B.C. by the Carthaginian general Himilco to take the place of the Carthaginian stronghold of Motya, which had been destroyed (398 B.C.) by Dionysius the Elder of Syracuse and recaptured by Himilco (397 B.C.). Lilybaeum became the chief stronghold of the Carthaginians in Sicily; it resisted Dionysius and Pyrrhus (368 B.C. and 276 B.C. respectively) and the Romans during the First Punic War (264-241 B.C.), who occupied it only at the end of the war. It was used as the place of Scipio's embarkation for Africa in the Second Punic War (218-201 B.C.).

Limenia (lim-e-nī'a). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as goddess of the sea, meaning "Of the Harbor."

Limnae (lim'nē). In ancient geography, a section of Athens, Greece, important as the seat of the earliest cult of Dionysus and the first rudimentary dramatic performances at Athens.

Limnae or Limnaeum (-um). A place in Laconia sacred to Artemis Orthia (Upright), because the wooden image of Artemis was said to have been brought from Tauris by Orestes and Iphigenia to this spot.

Limnaea (lim-nē'ā). An epithet, meaning "Of the Lake." It was applied to Artemis when she was identified with Britomartis of Crete.

Limnatis (lim-nā'tis). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Of the Lake." There was a sanctuary of Artemis Limnatis on the road to Epidaurus. At another temple of Artemis Limnatis on the border between Messenia and Laconia, Spartan maidens who were visiting the shrine were attacked, some say, by Messenian youths, and this brought on a war between Messenia and Sparta.

Limni (lēm'nē) or Limno (lēm'nō) or Limnos (lēm'nós). See Lemnos.

Limnoria (lim-nō'ri-ā). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Nereus and Doris.

Limon (līm'on). In Greek legend, a son of Tegeates of Tegea and Maera, and the brother of Scephrus. When Apollo was investigating the rulers who had refused to receive Leto before her children were born, he came to Tegea with his sister Artemis. Scephrus took him aside and talked privately with him. Limon thought Scephrus was accusing him to Apollo, rushed forth and murdered his brother. Artemis pursued Limon and shot him with her arrows. Afterward, at the festival of Apollo Agyieus (God of the Streets) the pursuit of Limon by Artemis was commemorated by having the priestess of Artemis pursue a man.

Lindus (lin'dus). In ancient geography, a city on the southeast coast of the island of Rhodes, situated on a commanding and readily defended height. Cadmus is said to have stopped there in his search for Europa and to have built a temple to Poseidon. According to some accounts, the city was founded by the Telchines and named after one of the Danaids who died there on the flight to Argos. Homer wrote that Tlepolemus, the son of Heracles, fled to the island of Rhodes after accidentally killing Lycymnius, and that Lindus was one of the three cities his followers founded on the island. He also names it as a contributor to the nine Rhodian galleys that Tlepolemus brought to the side of the Greeks in the Trojan War. Prehistorically colonized by settlers from Crete, it was a Dorian city from about 1000 B.C., and was a member of the Dorian Hexapolis—six Dorian cities on or near the coast of Asia Minor. In the centuries preceding the Persian Wars it was an important port of over 100,000 inhabitants, owing to its strategic location and wide commerce throughout the Mediterranean. It was also the mother city of many colonies on the neighboring islands and on the coast of Asia Minor. Cleobulus, one of the Seven Sages of Greece, was tyrant of Lindus in the 6th century B.C. A lofty promontory, rising abruptly from the sea, formed the acropolis of the city, and was crowned with a Doric temple of Athena Lindia. Remains of the temple, of majestic propylaea, and of a theater, may still be seen. Lindus was the capital of the island of Rhodes until 408 B.C., when the three principal cities of the island—Lindus, Camirus, and Ialysus—jointly founded the city of Rhodes and made it the capital. With the growth of the city of Rhodes as a religious, political, and commercial center, Lindus lost its commanding importance in the ancient world. Modern Lindos, a village of about 1000 inhabitants, occupies the site of the ancient city at the base of the acropolis.

Linus (lī'nus). In Greek mythology, a son of Apollo and Psamathe, daughter of Crotopus of Argos. Psamathe feared the wrath of her father and left her child on a mountain to die, but he was found and brought up by shepherds. Psamathe, learning of this, was relieved to know her son lived, but when he was a youth, he was torn to pieces by dogs that belonged to her father, and Psamathe was unable to disguise her grief. Crotopus realized that the slain youth was his daughter's son and condemned her to death. In grief and anger over the double loss, Apollo sent a monster, Poena, who stole young children from their mothers. This monster brought great sorrow to the land, and at last Coroeus slew it. Argos was then afflicted by a plague. The Argives sent to the oracle at Delphi to learn how they could free themselves from the plague, and were told they must sacrifice to Psamathe and Linus. They did this but the plague continued. At last Coroeus confessed that he had slain Poena. He was commanded by the priestess at Delphi to take a tripod and set forth from Delphi; where the tripod should fall to the ground, he was to raise a temple. Coroeus followed her instructions. The tripod fell to the ground on Mount Gerania; there he raised a temple of Apollo and founded the city of Tripodisci, named for the tripod. The plague now ceased, and thenceforth Linus was honored by a festival, called Arneis (Feast of Lambs) because he had been reared by shepherds among lambs, and by the singing of songs of lamentation called "Lini" in his memory.

Linus. According to some accounts, the son of the muse Calliope and Oeagrus, and thus a brother of Orpheus. Others give him different fathers, including Apollo, Hermes, and Amphimarus, a son of Poseidon, and different mothers, including the muses Urania and Clio. In any event, he was regarded as a great poet and as the musician who invented melody and rhythm; and it is said he was slain because of Apollo's jealousy of his talents. This Linus was the teacher of Thamyris and Orpheus. His portrait adorned the walls of a cave on Mount Helicon, and to it sacrifices were offered just before the annual sacrifices to the Muses. The body of Linus is supposed to have been buried at Thebes.

Linus. In Greek mythology, a son of the river-god Ismenius and one of the Muses. He was a skilled musician who had been taught by Apollo and who in turn taught Orpheus. He tried to instruct Heracles, but was slain when Heracles, in a fit of impatience, hurled the lyre at his head.

Linus. Song of lamentation for the death of vegetation or for the "killing" (i.e., cutting or reaping) of the vine and grain, anciently sung in Phoenicia and W Asia at the time of vintage and harvest. Sappho identified Linus with Adonis, and the Linus song with the Adonis songs, sung all over W Asia, Asia Minor, and into Greece and the Mediterranean region as the Adonis cult spread. Sir James G. Frazer suggested that the name Linus was a corruption of the words ai lanu, meaning "woe to us," expressing grief for the death of Adonis, symbolized in the cutting of the grain. Herodotus mentions a like song of mourning being sung by Egyptian reapers.

Lion of Chaeronea (ker-ō-nē'ā). Colossal marble figure of a seated lion, erected by the Thebans over the common tomb of their troops who fell in the Battle of Chaeronea in 338 B.C., when Philip II of Macedon crushed the united armies of the Greek states and ended Greek resistance. In the 19th century a brigand chief, hoping that the marble contained gold treasure, blew it up; in 1902 the fragments were reassembled, and the figure was eventually restored and replaced on its original pedestal. (JJ)

Lipari Islands (lip'ā-ri; Italian, lē'pā-rē). Group of islands in the Tyrrhenian Sea, N of Sicily. The chief islands are Lipari (Lipara), Stromboli (Strongyle), Salina (Didyme), Vulcano (Thermessa or Vulcania), and the small islands of Alicuri (Ericussa), Filicuri (Phoenicussa), and Panarea (Euonymus or Hicesia). See Aeoliae Insulae.

Lipoxais (lī'pok-sā'is). Traditionally, the eldest son of Targiteus, the first inhabitant of Scythia. He was the founder of the Scythian race called the Auchatae. See Colaxais.

Litae (li'tē). The daughters of Zeus, personifications of Prayer, especially prayers of repentance. In the Iliad they are described as halting of foot and with downcast eyes. They are appointed to follow in the footsteps of Sin, but Sin, being swift of foot, outruns them and causes many to falter and fall. The Litae come to heal the fallen, and if they are welcomed by the sinner, Zeus listens when the Litae intercede; but if they are repelled, they request that Zeus punish the offender.

Liternum (li-tēr'num). In ancient geography, a town in Campania, Italy, situated on the W coast about 14 miles NW of Naples, between Cumae and the mouth of the Volturnus River. It was noted principally as the place to which Scipio Africanus the Elder withdrew towards the end of his life. He died at Liternum and his tomb was there.

Lituus (lit'ū-us). In Roman antiquity, a staff with a recurved or crooked tip, used by the augurs in the ill-understood ritual of divination known as quartering the heavens. It was supposed to be of Etruscan origin.

Lityerses (lit-i-ēr'sēs). In Greek legend, a Phrygian farmer, bastard son of King Midas. He compelled his guests to engage in reaping contests with him in his fields. Whoever reaped less than he did had his head cut off and wrapped in a sheaf. Daphnis, who had come to Lityerses' home in search of Pimplea, was compelled to enter a reaping contest with him, but Heracles took his place, killed Lityerses and hurled his body into the Maeander River.

Livia Drusilla (liv'i-a drö-sil'a). First Roman empress, born 56 B.C.; died 29 A.D. She was the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus and was married first to Tiberius Claudius Nero (the father of her sons Tiberius and Drusus), who was compelled to divorce her (38 B.C.) in order that she might become the wife of Octavian, the future emperor Augustus. She was accused of committing various crimes, even of hastening the death of her husband, in her endeavor to secure the succession to her son Tiberius. For a time after the accession of Tiberius she was all-powerful in the state, but was soon forced to retire from public affairs by her son.

Livius (liv'i-us), Titus. Latin name of Livy.

Livius Andronicus (an-dro-ni'kus, an-dron'i-kus), Lucius. Early Roman dramatic poet and actor, called by some the founder of Roman epic and dramatic poetry. He was a Greek, born (c284 B.C.) in the colony of Tarentum in southern Italy. When Tarentum was conquered, he was taken to Rome as a slave (242 B.C.). His master, from whom he took his name, freed him, and he entered upon the occupation of teaching Latin and Greek. He translated the Odyssey for his pupils' use and his translation became the Roman textbook used for centuries. In 240 B.C. he presented a drama in the Greek style in Rome with such success that it became the impetus for the development of dramatic poetry in Rome. His plays, also, were translated from the Greek.

Livius Drusus (drö'sus), Marcus. See Drusus, Marcus Livius.

Livy (liv'i). [Latin name, Titus Livius.] Roman historian, born at Patavium (Padua), 59 B.C.; died there 17 A.D. He went to Rome in his youth and soon became acquainted with the most important men of his time, including Augustus, although Livy was well-known for his republican principles. He has been called the most important prose writer of the Augustan Age. He wrote a comprehensive history of Rome from the founding of the city to the death (9 B.C.) of Drusus, in 142 books, of which only 35 are extant (1-10 and 21-45), although the content of the lost books (except for two) is known through epitomes. His history has sometimes been criticized on the ground that he had a tendency to include a good story without adequate basis, and was rather too ready to accept statements and data without thorough critical evaluation. An object of his work was to revive the patriotism of his contemporaries by presenting to them, in brilliant and vivid style, a stirring account of their great heritage. His work abounds in descriptions of events and of the people who took part in them; the speeches he put into their mouths show that his own training in rhetoric had been thorough. His work, renowned in Roman days, has served as a constant source of information of early history ever since. Livy also wrote several philosophical dialogues and a work on rhetorical training, now lost. He spent the greater part of his life (over 40 years of which were given to his history) at Rome.

Lochia (lō-kī'a or lō'ki-a). An epithet of the goddess Artemis as the protectress of women in childbirth.

Locri (lō'krī or lok'rī) or Locri Epizephyrīi (ep'i-ze-fir'i-i). [Modern name, Gerace.] In ancient geography, a city on the SE coast of what is now Calabria, founded before 680 B.C. by colonists from Opuntian and Ozolian Locri in Greece and probably also by Lacedaemonians. The severe law code prepared for the city by the famous lawgiver Zaleucus, about 650 B.C., appears to have been the first written legal code in Europe, widely copied in Magna Graecia. At one time closely allied with Syracuse, it survived the usual wars with its Greek neighbors, the Bruttians, Pyrrhus, Rome, and the Carthaginians without fatal injury, and was well-known to Polybius. Excavations have revealed a Doric temple of about 500 B.C. and traces also of an Ionic temple of the 5th century B.C., built over the foundations of a predecessor. (JJ)

Locri Epicnemidii (ep'ik-nē-mid'i-i). Ancient Greek people dwelling along the Malian Gulf, north of Phocis; so named from Mount Cnemis.

Locri Epizephyrīi (ep'i-ze-fir'i-i). See Locri. Locri Opuntii (ō-pun'shi-i). Ancient Greek people living N of Boeotia and opposite Euboea; so named from Opus, their chief town. The name is sometimes taken to include also the country of the Locri Epicnemidii. According to Pindar, the Locrians were named for Locrus, a descendant of Deucalion, who named his people for himself. His foster son was Opus (or Opous), for whom the chief city was named. In the Trojan War Ajax the Less, an Opuntian Locrian, brought 40 ships to the Greek expedition against Troy. Because it was claimed (some say, falsely, by Odysseus), that he violated the sanctuary of Athena in seizing Cassandra who had taken refuge there during the sack of Troy, the wrath of Athena fell on the Opuntian Locrians. Ajax himself perished at sea on the way home, some say by a thunderbolt hurled at him by Athena, and his fellow countrymen reached their homeland only after great difficulty. They annually honored their former leader by launching a ship fitted with black sails and laden with gifts. Once the ship was launched, it was burned to the water's edge. The Locrians were afflicted with a terrible plague which they learned was caused by Athena. In order to free themselves of the plague they had to send two maidens to the temple of Athena at Troy each year for 1000 years, or as some say, two maidens who must be replaced when they died so that there were always two Locrian maidens in the temple. The maidens were chosen by lot from the 100 noblest families of Locris. They were sent at different times of the year so that the Trojans would not know when to expect them, and they arrived in the Troad in secrecy. If they were caught, they were slain; their bones were burned with the wood of wild trees that had never born fruit, and their ashes were scattered on the sea. If they escaped capture by the Trojans they entered Troy secretly, some say by the conduit or sewer which Odysseus is said to have used to enter Troy during the Trojan War. Once inside the temple they were safe. Wearing the single tunic of the slave, with their heads shorn and their feet bare, they served as priestesses, sweeping and sprinkling the sacred precinct. Once one of the Locrian priestesses was killed in the temple, and the Locrians stopped sending the girls to Troy. They were immediately smitten with plague again, and so they resumed their penance of sending the maidens to Troy. There is abundant historical evidence that this custom was well known to the Greeks of the Classical and Hellenistic periods, that it persisted for 1000 years, and that it ended not before the 1st century A.D., warranting our assumption that this was a real penance imposed for a real offense, e.g., Ajax the Lesser's violation of Cassandra at the altar of Athena, an example of continuity not matched elsewhere in ancient history.

Locri Ozolae (oz'ō-lē). Ancient Greek people living along the N coast of the Corinthian Gulf, W of Phocis. Its chief towns were Amphissa and Naupactus.

Locris (lō'kris, lok'ris). In ancient geography, name applied to a division of C Greece, occupied by the Locri Epicnemidii, the Locri Opuntii, and by the Locri Ozolae. Locris was the home of Oileus, the Argonaut who was the father of Ajax the Lesser. The Locrians were allies of the Greeks in the Trojan War. As skilled bowmen, they wore no helmets and carried no shields, and were therefore valueless for close fighting.

Locrus (lō'krus). According to tradition, a descendant of Deucalion. He was king of the Locrians, whom he named after himself.

Locusta (lō-kus'tā). [Also: Lucusta.] Professional poisoner living at Rome c54 A.D. Juvenal speaks of her as the agent for ridding many a wife of her husband, and Tacitus as "long reckoned as among the instruments of government." She was employed by Agrippina to prepare a poison for the emperor Claudius. She was executed in the reign of Galba (c68 A.D.).

Longinus (lon-jī'nus), Dionysius Cassius. Greek critic and philosopher, born c210 A.D.; executed 273 A.D. The great work entitled On the Sublime, an essay on literary style, has been traditionally credited to him, but modern criticism has demonstrated the improbability of his having written it. This essay is probably the work of a writer who lived in the 1st century A.D.

Longinus, Caius Cassius. See Cassius Longinus, Caius.

Longus (long'gus). Greek romancer and sophist, who was active probably in the 3rd or 4th century A.D. He is the reputed author of the pastoral romance Daphnis and Chloë, which is noted for its poetic quality, grace of language, and loyalty to an older principle of beauty in literature for its own sake.

Lotis (lō'tis). In Greek mythology, a nymph who fled from a pursuer and was turned into a lotus tree. There are several variations on this story, in one of which it was a naiad who fled and was turned into a water lily.

Lotophagi (lō-tof'ā-jī). "Lotus-Eaters"; in the Odyssey, the name of a people in whose country storm-driven Odysseus lands with his crews. There they are offered a plant called Lotus. Some of Odysseus' men eat of this and lose all desire to return to their friends and native land, so that Odysseus has to have them brought back by force and shackled to their rowing-benches. The Greeks applied the name lotus to a number of different plants, none reported to have narcotic effect; the ripe seed pod of the opium poppy, however, somewhat resembles the seed pod of the true lotus, suggesting that possibly back of Homer's allusion lay some traveler's encounter with opium. One reading the Odyssey passage uncritically would conclude that the land of the Lotus-Eaters was along the North African coast, Cyrenaica or Tripolitania; the geography of Odysseus' adventures defies systematic analysis, but later geographers agreed in locating the Lotophagi in Cyrenaica. (JJ)

Lotus (lō'tus). A name given by the Greeks to several distinct species of plants, shrubs, and small trees, whose flowers, leaves, fruit, seeds, or tubers were used as human or animal food. A people (of North Africa?) who use a kind of lotus for food, and offer it to Odysseus' men with unfortunate results, are called Lotophagi or "Lotus-Eaters." (JJ)

Loxias (lok'si-as). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Crooked" or "Ambiguous." Apollo was the god who interpreted the will of Zeus to men, but they did not always interpret his prophecies correctly, whence this epithet. One of the most famous examples of misinterpretation was that of Croesus, king of Lydia, to whose question whether he should make war on the Persians, the priestess of Apollo replied that if he did so, he would destroy a great empire. Croesus, well-satisfied with this answer, waged war on Cyrus. A great empire was destroyed, but it was the empire of Croesus. Later Croesus reproached the priestess, and was told that he had not asked which the empire would be. Croesus humbly accepted the blame for his own hasty and ill-informed act. Cassandra, to whom Apollo had given the gift of prophecy but turned it into a curse by decreeing that no one would believe her true prophecies, particularly used the epithet Loxias when invoking Apollo.

Luca (lō'kā). [Modern name, Lucca.] City in N Italy, NE of Pisae. Presumably established in Etruscan times, but its first certain appearance in history is in 56 B.C., when Caesar summoned Pompey and Crassus to Luca and there organized with them the First Triumvirate. Later, perhaps in Augustus' time, a veteran colony was sent there. Careful study has recovered the plan of the central city and traces of the forum and buildings: theater, amphitheater, temple, and aqueduct; and the churches of S. Giovanni, S. Frediano, and S. Alessandro incorporate shafts and capitals of ancient columns removed from other Roman structures. (JJ)

Lucan (lō'kən). [Full Latin name, Marcus Annaeus Lucanus.] Roman poet and prose writer, born at Corduba, Spain, 39 A.D. He was the grandson of Seneca the rhetorician, and the nephew of Seneca the philosopher. From an early age he gave evidence of his rhetorical and poetic talents. He was appointed to public office by Nero, but the latter's favor soon changed to jealousy. Nero had a high regard for his own poetic talents, and forbade Lucan to recite his poems in public, as he was becoming too popular. To avenge his treatment by the emperor Lucan took part in the conspiracy of Piso. He was betrayed, and by a promise of pardon was induced to turn informer, but, after denouncing his mother and his other accomplices, he was condemned to death. He anticipated his punishment by causing his veins to be opened (65 A.D.). Lucan was the author of the Pharsalia, in ten books, an epic poem on the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. The poem follows such rigid chronological order, beginning before the Battle of Pharsalus and ending with the capture of Alexandria, that some refuse to recognize it as a poem at all, but regard it rather as a history. In this work Lucan showed himself to long for the lost days of liberty and to be a follower of Pompey.

Lucania (lō-kā'ni-a). In ancient geography, a division of S Italy. It was bounded by Campania, Samnium, and Apulia on the N and NE, the Gulf of Tarentum on the E, Bruttii on the S, and the Tyrrhenian Sea on the SW. The surface is mountainous. The inhabitants were Lucanians (a branch of the Samnites) and, on the coast, Greeks. It was reduced by Rome in the 3rd century B.C.

Luceria (lō-sē'ri-a). [Modern name, Lucera.] In ancient geography, a town in Apulia, SE Italy. According to some accounts, the golden armor of the Trojan Diomedes was deposited in the temple of Athena here. Others say Diomedes erected the temple of Athena, and that the Palladium, brought from Troy, was preserved in it. In the wars between the Romans and the Samnites (321 B.C.) Luceria took the side of Rome. It was later colonized by the Latins.

Lucian (lō'shan). Greek satirist, born at Samosata, Syria, c120 A.D.; died c200 A.D. He was born of a poor family and gained an education and training for rhetoric by his own persistent efforts. He traveled in Greece, Italy, and southern Gaul, earning his living as an orator and advocate. In middle life he went to Athens. In his impoverished old age he was given a governmental post in Egypt, which he retained to his death. He wrote satirical dialogues in the style of Plato, but with the emphasis on the comic rather than the philosophic. For a time he studied and followed the ideas of the sophists, but became disenchanted by the aridity of their thought in his time, by their disputes, and by the wide gulf which seemed to him to separate sophist teaching and practice. He was a keen observer, learned, honest, and possessed of a highly developed sense of the ridiculous. Because he was an independent thinker, attacking with pungent satire the religious beliefs of his time, according to Suidas he was called "the Blasphemer," and was torn to pieces by dogs (doubtless a pious invention). He wrote rhetorical, critical, and biographical works, romances, dialogues, and poems. Outstanding among his works are The True History, a parodied travelogue, and the satirical Dialogues of the Gods and Dialogues of the Dead. In these he mocked the popular religious beliefs, aimed specially pointed barbs at Eastern superstitions that had filtered into the west, and at the oracle-mongers who fattened on these superstitions, and attacked also the popular beliefs concerning life after death. Auction of Philosophers is his satiric evaluation of various schools of thought. He did not think much of them.

Lucifer (lō'si-fēr). The morning star; the planet Venus when it appears in the morning before sunrise; when it appears in the evening, it is called Hesperus, or the evening star. In Greek mythology Lucifer was personified, as the father of Ceyx, for example. The name Lucifer means "light-bringer," and is a Latin translation of one of the Greek names for the planet Venus, Phosphorus. Later, Lucifer is a name of Satan before his fall.

Lucilius (lō-sī'li-us), Caius. Latin satirical poet, born at Suessa Aurunca, Campania, Italy, c180 B.C.; died at Naples, 103 B.C. He was born to a distinguished and wealthy family, and received a good education. When he went to Rome, he became acquainted with the most distinguished men of his time, partly, no doubt, on account of his relationship to Pompey, and he was on intimate terms with Scipio the Younger and Laelius. He was the author of Saturae, satirical poems that covered a wide range of topics, including the political, social, and intellectual life of his times, as well as material drawn from his own experiences and his studies. In his poems he attacked individuals, no matter how powerfully placed, if he felt they merited attention. On occasions when something worthy of praise came to his attention, he was sincerely laudatory. With his exaggerations and mockery of so many facets of life, he presents a lively picture of the time. Fragments of his work survive. Horace was among later writers who used the satires of Lucilius as a model.

Lucina (lō-sī'na). In Roman mythology, the goddess who presided over childbirth, an aspect of Juno, and as such called Juno Lucina. The name was also applied to Diana corresponding to the Greek goddess Ilithyia, and to Hecate.

Lucretia (lō-kré'sha). [Also: Lucrece.] In Roman legend, the wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. She was violated by Sextus, the son of Tarquinius Superbus; on her husband's return she told of the deed and killed herself. Subsequent agitation organized by Junius Brutus culminated in a popular uprising which brought about the expulsion of Rome's seventh and last king, and the establishment of the republic, in or about 510 B.C. (JJ)

Lucrinus, Lacus (lō-kri'nus lā'kus). [Modern name, Lake Lucrine.] In ancient geography, a small salt-water lake in Campania, Italy, about nine miles NW of Neapolis.

Lucretius (lō-kre'shus). [Full name, Titus Lucretius Carus.] Roman philosophical poet, born at Rome, probably c94 B.C.; died there Oct. 15, 55 B.C. For his friend Memmius, an orator and poet, he wrote De Rerum Natura (On the Nature of Things), the first Latin treatment of Greek philosophy. It is a didactic and philosophical poem in six books, treating of physics and cosmology, of psychology, and (briefly) of ethics from the Epicurean point of view. The point of it is to prove that all things come to be and disappear according to natural law and are unaffected by the supernatural. This being the case, the fears and terrors aroused by superstitions are unnecessary. According to his thesis, the basic substance is the atom, from which proceed not only material things, as the earth and the substances of it, but the soul and spirit as well, and with the dissolution of the atom these also perish. Death prevented Lucretius from polishing his work, yet it is marked by simplicity and power, and passages of great beauty, in spite of the scientific approach with which he attacked his subject. It is said that Lucretius committed suicide, probably in a fit of insanity. According to a popular but doubtless erroneous tradition, his madness was due to a love philter administered by his wife.

Lucullus (lō-kul'us), Lucius Licinius. [Surnamed Ponticus.] Roman general, born c117 B.C.; died 56 B.C. He served under Sulla in the East, and was curule aedile in 79 and consul in 74 B.C. He defeated Mithridates VI of Pontus in Asia Minor, 74-71 B.C., defeated Tigranes near Tigranocerta in 69, and was recalled to Rome in 66 B.C. He was afterward famous for his wealth and his luxury. His villas at Tusculum and near Neapolis (Naples) were famous for their splendor, and he is said to have spent fabulous sums on his table (a rich banquet is still called a Lucullan feast). One anecdote tells that his dining-rooms were coded, so that a message to his chef naming only the room in which dinner was to be served indicated the degree of extravagance and ostentation with which he wished to celebrate the occasion. He is said to have been the first to introduce cherries into Italy. He was also a collector of books and a patron of learning.

Lucumo (lū'kū-mō). Among the ancient Etruscans, the head of a patrician or noble family, uniting in himself the characters of priest and prince; in general, one of the Etruscan nobility.

Lugdunensis (lug-dū-nen'sis). [Also: Gallia Lugdunensis.] In ancient geography, a province of the Roman Empire, situated in Gaul. It extended from Lugdunum (modern Lyons) N to the line of the lower Seine (including Paris), and NW through Brittany to the ocean, including the upper course of the Seine and nearly the entire course of the Loire. It was conquered (58-51 B.C.) by Julius Caesar.

Luna (lō'na). [Modern site name, Luni.] In ancient geography, a city in Italy, on the coast E of what is now La Spezia. It was founded by the Etruscans and became a Roman town in the 2nd century B.C.

Luna. In Roman mythology, the goddess of the moon. She had at Rome an ancient sanctuary on the Aventine Hill and a temple on the Palatine. The latter was illuminated at night. She figured in calendar computation especially, but had no strong cult. She was also identified with the goddess Diana.

Lunar Calendar. A system of time-reckoning formerly much in use among primitive peoples, in which the principal division was the lunar or synodic month, determined by visual observation of new moon or full moon. The average length of this period is 29.5306 days, so that the lunar month was sometimes 29, sometimes 30, days in length. A lunar year of 12 lunar months, c354.36 days, is incommensurate with the solar year of c365.2425 days, falling about 11 days short and causing a cumulative error which most early societies were at pains to correct. The Mohammedan calendar, however, consists of precisely this type of lunar year, of 12 lunar months, without intercalation, usually 354

days in length, so that the Mohammedan months revolve through the tropical year, and 100 western or Gregorian years are equal to about 103 Mohammedan years. (JJ)

Lunisolar Calendar. Any primitive system of time-reckoning in which the lunar or synodic month, which averages c29.5306 days in length, is required to serve as a division of the solar or tropical year of c365.2425 days. Since these figures are incommensurate (12 lunar months of 354.3672 days falling nearly 11 days short of the tropical year), frequent correction is required to hold the solar and lunar years in rough correspondence. This correction most often took the form of an extra "intercalary" or "embolic" month added every second or third year, preferably in some cycle so that the intercalations might be known in advance. A cycle much honored in theory, though nowhere demonstrated in certain use, was the octaeteris or eight-year cycle, in which five years had 12 lunar months and three intercalary years had 13 months. In the course of eight years an error of 1.5894 days was produced under this system. Far more accurate was the enneadekateris or 19-year cycle in which 12 years had 12 months and seven years had 13 months. In the course of the 19 years an error of about two hours accumulated. This latter calendar, first proposed in Babylonia in the 5th century B.C. or earlier, and certainly employed early in the 4th century B.C., was widely adopted in Asia, and adaptations of it are still in use. Hellenistic astronomers speak also of cycles of 38 and 76 years, but these are merely multiples of the 19-year cycle, of which they represent minor refinements. The 19-year cycle is sometimes called the Metonic Cycle, from Meton, an Athenian astronomer who was said to have introduced it in the 5th century B.C., but the evidence from the records of centuries of observations available there, indicates that the computation had been performed earlier in Babylonia. (JJ)

Lupercal (lŏ'pér-kal). Cave or grotto near the W angle of the Palatine Hill, in ancient Rome, dedicated, according to tradition, by the original Arcadian settlers to Lupercus, a fertility deity, or to Inuus, or to Pan. It was said to be the den of the she-wolf that suckled Romulus and Remus. As time went on the Lupercal was adorned architecturally, and its decoration was renewed by Augustus. Near the Lupercal was the Ficus Ruminalis, the fig tree beneath which Romulus and Remus were left by the retiring waters of the Tiber, and above it was the primitive thatched hut preserved to imperial days as a relic of Romulus. According to the Aeneid, the Lupercal predated the founding of Rome. Evander pointed it out to Aeneas shortly after the latter landed in Latium.

Lupercalia (lŏ'pér-kā'li-ā). One of the most ancient of Roman festivals, celebrated every year on February 15. The origin of the festival is older than the legend of Romulus and Remus and the wolf, with which, as with the Greek cult of Lupercus (or Faunus, or Inuus, or Pan), it was associated. It was a festival of expiation and was regarded also as a purification ceremony of the Palatine city and the surrounding land, and its purpose was to bring fertility to fields, herds, and individuals. It is said that in earlier times human victims were sacrificed in the Lupercal cave near the Porta Romana, after having been conducted around the walls. In historic times the sacrificial victims were goats and a dog (both symbolizing fertility). The blood of the sacrificial victims was smeared on the foreheads of two youths and then wiped off with wool moistened in milk. After a feast, the celebrants of the festival, naked except for a goatskin apron, ran around the old line of the Palatine walls, striking all whom they met with thongs cut from the skins of the slaughtered animals. These blows were reputed to endow women with fertility. The month of February takes its name from this festival, from februum, pl. februa, a word of Sabine origin meaning "a means of purification" and used to describe the thongs, the blows of which purified, and februare, "to purify."

Lupercus (lŏ-pér'kus). In Roman mythology, a fertility god, often identified with Faunus, or with Inuus, or with Pan, as the protecting deity of shepherds. The festival called Lupercalia was celebrated in his honor.

Lupus (lŭ'pus). An ancient southern constellation—the Wolf—representing a beast held by the hand of the Centaur.

Lusia/Lycaeus

Lusia (lō-sī'ā). Epithet of Demeter. The Thelpusians say that when Poseidon, in the form of a stallion, ravished Demeter, who had taken the form of a mare and sought refuge from him among the herds of Oncus in Arcadia, she was so infuriated by his outrage that they gave her the name Erinyes (Fury). But afterwards, they say, her anger abated, and she cleansed herself by bathing in the Ladon River. For this reason they gave her the name Lusia (Bather). In her sanctuary in their land they placed two images: one of Demeter Erinyes and one of Demeter Lusia.

Lusitania (lō-si-tā'ni-ā). In ancient geography, the country of the Lusitanians, comprising the modern Portugal N to the river Durius (Douro), and adjoining parts of W Spain. In a later, more extended use, it was one of the Roman provinces into which Hispania was divided by Augustus.

Lusius (lō'si-us). In ancient geography, a river in Arcadia. The name means "Bathing-river," and was given to it because Zeus was bathed in its waters after his birth. The river flows through the city of Gortys. At some distance away from its source it is called the Gortynius River, and it is noted for the coldness of its waters.

Lyaeus (lī-ē'us). In Greek mythology, the "Loosener," the god of wine and song who loosens care; an epithet or surname of Dionysus.

Lycabettus (lik-a-bet'us, li-kā-) or Lykabettos (-os). Rocky hill rising in the E part of Athens to a height of about 910 feet above the sea. According to legend, it was originally a huge stone. When Athena, who was carrying it to fortify the Acropolis, heard of the death of Agraalos and her daughters by leaping from the Acropolis, in grief at their deaths she dropped the stone and formed Mount Lycabettus. It is a very conspicuous object in the landscape, presenting from most points of the city the general form of an abrupt, slightly concave cone; there is, however, beyond a slight depression, a long ridge N of it. Upon the top stands today a small chapel of Saint George. On the S slope is the large reservoir built by Hadrian and Antoninus Pius which still supplies the city.

Lycaeus (lī-sē'us) or Lycaeum (-um). Mountain in S Arcadia. Some Arcadians called it Olympus and others called it Sacred Peak, because, they say, there is a place on the mountain called Cretea, and here, where no living creature cast a shadow, Zeus was born to Rhea and was reared by the nymphs Thisoa, Neda, and Hagno. Here was a course where the Lycaean Games were held. On the spot where Zeus was born was a precinct sacred to Lycaean Zeus forbidden to mortals. Whoever ignored the rule and entered was destined to die within a year. On the summit of the mountain, from which a view over the whole Peloponnesus was possible, was an altar of Lycaean Zeus, on which sacrifices to the god were made in secret. On the east side of the mountain was a sanctuary of Apollo, at which an annual festival was held in his honor. As part of the festival sacrifices that were made in the market-place were carried to this sanctuary to the music of flutes. The mountain was also a center of the worship of Pan, who had a sanctuary there.

Lycaeus. Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Wolfish." Some say it comes from Mount Lycaeus, in Arcadia, and that the name was given him by Lycaon, who also founded the Lycaean Games in his honor. Others say it was given to him because Lycaon and his impious sons were changed into wolves by Zeus. There was a sanctuary of Lycaean Zeus at Megalopolis in Arcadia, and altars in many places, especially in Arcadia. The cult of Zeus Lycaeus is thought to have been an ancient pre-Hellenic cult with cannibalistic ritual, later syncretized with Zeus worship. Some say that in rites performed to Lycaean Zeus on Mount Lycaeus a human victim was sacrificed. Parts of the human victim were mixed with parts of animal victims and were cooked together. The mixture was then eaten at a banquet of the worshipers. It was believed that whoever happened to eat of the human flesh at this banquet was changed into a wolf for a Great Year, that is, for eight years. If, at the end of that time, he had eaten no human flesh during his wolfish incarnation, he was metamorphosed back to mortal form again in the ninth year. Pausanias tells of one Demarchus who spent eight years with the wolves as the result of these rites, regained his mortal form and, in the tenth year after being transformed into a wolf, won the boxing prize at the Olympic Games. His name was inscribed on the list of winners and noted by Pausanias there, but Pausanias points out that on the slab at Olympia his transformation into a wolf was not mentioned in connection with his exploits. Therefore Pausanias doubts that it ever happened, for surely if it had, such a remarkable event would have been mentioned.

Lycaon (li-ká'on). According to Greek tradition, a son of Pelasgus, the first king of Arcadia, who succeeded his father as king. Some say he founded the city of Lycosura on Mount Lycaeus, and that it was he who gave Zeus the name Lycaeus and established the Lycaean Games in his honor. The Lycaean Games were older than the Panathenaea but not so old as the Olympic Games. Lycaon had 50 sons who became the founders of many of the cities of Arcadia. The youngest of them, Oenotrus, was said to have sailed to Italy and to have colonized Oenotria, of which he became king. This, according to some accounts, was the first expedition from Greece to found a colony. Besides his 50 sons, Lycaon was the father of one daughter, Callisto, beloved of Zeus. Some say it was a deed of Lycaon, typical of the general wickedness of mankind, that caused Zeus to send a flood to punish the race of men. Zeus, visiting the world in the guise of a mortal, came to the house of Lycaon. He informed Lycaon of his divinity, but Lycaon doubted that he was really a god, and decided to test him. He cut up and cooked a child (his own son Nyctimus, according to some accounts) and served the flesh to Zeus. For this impiety Zeus destroyed his house and transformed Lycaon into a savage wolf. Some say he also struck all the sons of Lycaon, except Nyctimus whom he restored, with his thunderbolt. But others say the sons of Lycaon were also turned into wolves. And some say, that at the sacrifice to Lycaean Zeus a man was transformed into a wolf. If, after nine years, he had not tasted human flesh, he became a man again. But if he had eaten human flesh, he remained a beast.

Lycaon. In Homeric legend, a son of Priam and Laiothoe, and half-brother of Hector and Paris. While cutting shoots from a fig-tree in his father's orchard, he was captured by Achilles. Achilles sold him to King Euneus of Lemnos for a mixing bowl. Next he was ransomed by Eëtion of Imbrus and sent to Arisbe, from which he escaped. He returned to Troy but 11 days later he was again captured by Achilles, who this time, in spite of Lycaon's pleas, slew him and hurled his body into the Scamander river. Apollo assumed the form of Lycaon to rally Aeneas against Achilles when the Trojans fled before him after the death of Patroclus.

Lycaonia (lik-ä-ō'ni-a, li-kā-). In ancient geography, a province in S central Asia Minor. It was bounded by Galatia on the N, Cappadocia on the E, Cilicia on the S, Pisidia on the SW, and Phrygia on the W. Sometimes it included Isauria, and sometimes it was included in Cappadocia. Chief city, Iconium.

Lyceum (li-sē'um). Gymnasium and exercise-ground of ancient Athens, lying on the right bank of the Ilissus, at the place now called Ilissia, a short distance E of the palace garden. It was a sanctuary of Apollo Lycius (Wolfish). The story is that once when Athens was infested by wolves, Apollo ordered the people to sacrifice. They did so, and the smell of the sacrifice drove the wolves off. On the spot where the sacrifice was offered they dedicated the sanctuary and placed an image of Apollo Lycius in it. By the time of Pisistratus the Lyceum had become the chief gymnasium of Athens. It was noted for its fine groves of plane trees. Aristotle and his disciples formed the habit of discussing their philosophy while following the shady walks of this gymnasium, and hence received the name of Peripatetics. The Lyceum was burned in 200 B.C. by Philip V of Macedonia. The trees of the peaceful groves were cut down by Sulla (87-86 B.C.) to make siege engines when he was besieging Athens.

Lychnidus (lik'ni-dus) or Lychnitis (lik-nī'tis). In ancient geography, a lake in Illyria. The modern name of the lake (on the border of Albania and Yugoslavia) is Ohrid.

Lycia (lish'a). In ancient geography, a division of SW Asia Minor, bordering on the Mediterranean and on Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. The Lycians were one of the peoples of Asia Minor who invaded Egypt in the time of Ramses II and Merneptah. Its 23 cities formed the Lycian League. According to legend, Apollo had his winter palace in Lycia. Leto, his mother, was forced to flee from Delos after giving birth to her children, on account of the wrath of Hera. She wandered to Lycia and, being thirsty and worn, stopped at a pond to drink. Peasants who were gathering reeds at the edge of the pond tried to prevent her from drinking or from giving water to her children. They would not yield to her pleas and when she tried to drink, they muddied the water so that it was unfit to drink. To punish them for their malice Leto prayed that they might live in the pond forever, and the gods answered her prayer by changing them into frogs.

Lycians (lish'anz). [Also: Lukki.] Inhabitants of ancient Lycia, in SW Asia Minor. These people are first met as the Lukki in the Tel el-Amarna tablets of 1400 B.C. and in the list of invaders of Egypt from the E Mediterranean. Their occupation of Lycia took place probably at a later date. The attempt by the Lydians to subdue them failed, but they later were conquered by Harpagus, a general of Cyrus. Although they had to acknowledge the suzerainty of Persia, they remained practically independent. They were incorporated into Alexander's empire, and in the 3rd century B.C. belonged to the Ptolemies. At the beginning of the 2nd century B.C. Lycia was annexed by the Seleucid king Antiochus III; after his defeats by Rome the Romans (189 B.C.) turned the administration of Lycia over to Rhodes, but after three revolts the Lycians achieved independence (169 B.C.) and established federal institutions which survived until suppressed by Rome in the 1st century A.D. According to Homeric legend (Iliad), in the Trojan War the Lycians, under the command of Sarpedon and Glaucus, were allies of Troy. After the fall of Troy, according to the Aeneid, some of the Lycian allies accompanied Aeneas on his flight to Italy. Classification of the language of the Lycians was long a matter of conjecture, but it is now classified as belonging to the extinct Anatolian subfamily of Indo-European languages.

Lycius, Lyceius or Lyceus (lī-sē'us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Wolfish" or "Wolf-god." It refers to his function (as god of shepherds and herdsmen) as wolf-slayer. At one time also when Athens was overrun with wolves, Apollo was said to have rid the city of them. Danaus made the original temple of Apollo Lycius, in which was a wooden image, at Argos. He did this in gratitude for Apollo's help in securing the throne. When Danaus came to the land and sought the throne, Gelanor was king. The people debated whether to make Danaus king in his place. During the night a wolf came down from the hills and destroyed a bull in a herd of cattle outside the town. The Argives took this as an omen, that Danaus would destroy their king, and to prevent this, Gelanor stepped aside and Danaus became king. Danaus thought that the wolf that helped him was Apollo in disguise, or that Apollo had sent the wolf. But some have said that Lycius means "God of Light."

Lycomedes (lī-kō-mē'dēz). In Greek legend, a king of Scyros. He welcomed Theseus when that hero was blown to his shores by a storm but when Theseus decided to stay in Scyros, on land that belonged to him, Lycomedes, under the pretext of showing him the land, treacherously led Theseus to a cliff and pushed him over. Afterwards Lycomedes announced that Theseus had fallen off the cliff while under the influence of wine. In another legend, Thetis, who knew that if her son Achilles went to Troy he would never return, tried to prevent Achilles from going to fight against the Trojans by sending him to the court of Lycomedes disguised as a girl. Lycomedes sheltered him but was unable to prevent Odysseus from finding him and carrying him off to Troy. Achilles left behind a son, Neoptolemus, by Lycomedes' daughter, Deidamia, whom Lycomedes brought up. When the oracles declared that Troy could not be taken without the aid of Achilles' son Lycomedes allowed Neoptolemus to depart for Troy.

Lycon (lī'kon). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, slain by Peneleos.

Lycophron (lī-kō-fron). In the Iliad, a Greek who, having committed a murder, fled from his home in Cythera to the home of Telamonian Ajax, and later accompanied Ajax to the Trojan War. He was slain by Hector when the Trojans attacked the Greek ships.

Lycophron. A son of Periander, tyrant of Corinth (c625-585 B.C.). He learned that his father had been responsible for the death of his mother, Melissa, and withdrew from his father's court and refused to have anything to do with him. Periander sought to compel his return by forbidding the Corinthians to help him in any way, and Lycophron, harried from house to house, was reduced to near beggary in the streets. He went at length to Corcyra, a Corinthian colony. Periander wished Lycophron, as the more capable of his two sons, to succeed him as ruler of Corinth and sent many messengers, including his daughter, to try to persuade Lycophron to return. He at last agreed to do so when Periander promised that he would withdraw from Corinth if Lycophron would come back and take over the government. However, before Lycophron could depart for Corinth the Corcyraeans slew him to punish Periander for carrying off 300 Corcyraean boys of the noblest families.

Lycophron. Greek poet and grammarian; born at Chalcis in Euboea; fl. in the 3rd century B.C. He worked at Alexandria in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 B.C.). At Ptolemy's request he arranged the works of the Greek comic poets for the Library, and afterwards wrote a work on Greek Comedy, which is now lost. His only extant poem is the Alexandra or Cassandra, comprising about 1400 iambic verses, in which Cassandra predicts the results of the voyage of Paris to Sparta, the fate of the heroes at Troy, and the ultimate fall of the city.

Lycosura (lī-kō-sū'ra). In ancient geography, a city in S Arcadia, near the border of Mesenia. According to tradition, it was founded by Lycaon, son of Pelasgus. Pausanias says it was the oldest city in the world, that from it the rest of mankind learned how to build cities, and that a sacred deer, weakened by great age, lived in Lycosura, about whose neck was a collar, on which was written,

"I was a fawn when captured at the time when Agapenor went to Troy."

Lycothereses (lī-kō-thēr'sēz). In Greek legend, a king of Illyria. He married Agave, daughter of Cadmus, who had fled to his country after the murder of her son Pentheus. Agave killed Lycothereses and gave his kingdom to her father, who had also fled from Thebes and had become ruler of the Encheleans.

Lyctaea (lik-tē'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Hyacinthus the Spartan. See Hyalanthides.

Lycurgus (lī-kér'gus). In Greek mythology, a son of Dryas. He was king of the Edonians in Thrace, and an opponent of the worship of Dionysus. When Dionysus and his attendants landed in his kingdom on their return from Asia, Lycurgus attacked them with an ox goad and scattered the god's followers. Dionysus himself escaped by fleeing under the sea to Thetis for protection. Lycurgus' arrogance in attacking a god aroused the wrath of Zeus who, according to some accounts, struck him blind. According to other accounts, he was driven mad by the gods and killed his own son with an ax under the mistaken impression that he was cutting down a vine. Thrace became barren after this horrible crime and the Thracians learned that their land would become productive again only when Lycurgus was punished. His people then seized and bound him and left him on Mount Pangaeus where he was torn to pieces by wild horses.

Lycurgus. According to Homer's Iliad, a king in Arcadia. He trapped Areithoüs, the "Maceman," in a narrow place where he could not swing his club, slew him, and took his armor and his mace.

Lycurgus. In Greek legend, a king of Nemea. He bought Hypsipyle, queen of Lemnos, from the Lemnian women as a slave and made her nurse to his son Opheltes.

Lycurgus. Spartan legislator, the traditional author of the laws and institutions of Sparta. Some say he lived in the 9th century B.C.; Others say he lived in the 7th century B.C.; and still others say he was not a historical person at all, but a legendary figure to whom was ascribed the authorship of the Spartan way of life which was so consistent that it was thought to have been developed by one person. According to Plutarch, Lycurgus was descended from the Heraclid Aristodemus, and was a descendant of Soüs and of the Eurypontid line of Spartan kings. He lived at a time when Sparta was in a state of anarchy. King Polydectes, his half-brother, died and left a wife who was about to bear a child. Lycurgus declared that if the child was a boy, he would be the king. Polydectes' widow proposed to Lycurgus that she should destroy her unborn child and marry him, and that he should claim the throne. He was shocked, but pretended he would be delighted to marry her at some later time, and persuaded her not to interfere with the natural course of her pregnancy. In due course she bore a son. Lycurgus proclaimed him king, named him Charilaus, and acted as his regent. The widow of Polydectes made accusations against him, and for the sake of peace in Sparta he went into voluntary exile. He went to Crete where, impressed by the sober and temperate character of the Cretans, he studied their laws with the view to applying them to Sparta. Some say he went from Crete to Asia Minor, where he first came in contact with the poems of Homer and transcribed them for his own people. And some say he also visited Egypt and that it was there that he got the idea, later introduced into Sparta, of separating the military class from the rest of the people. At last he returned to Sparta, resolved to make certain reforms and to restore order to his country. He went to consult the oracle at Delphi, to learn whether his plans were wise. As he entered the shrine the priestess exclaimed,

"O thou great Lycurgus . . .

Whether to hail thee a god I know not,
or only a mortal,

But my hope is strong that a god thou wilt prove, Lycurgus."

Because of this oracle some afterwards claimed that Lycurgus was indeed a god, and there was a temple of Lycurgus erected in Sparta. But at the time, the response of the priestess encouraged him and he introduced his reforms. Some say it was he who established a body of 30 overseers or administrators, which included the two kings. These ephors, as they were called, proposed measures to the citizens who assembled before them. The citizens could vote to adopt or reject their proposals, but could not modify them nor propose measures of their own, and the ephors might withdraw their own proposals if they wished. The effect of having 28 ephors to act with the kings was to weaken the absolute power of the kings, but Sparta did not become a democracy through this because the voice of the citizens was so limited in state affairs. Another change attributed to Lycurgus was of great importance to the future development of Sparta. He is said to have called in all the gold and silver and to have established a system of iron money. The purpose was to reduce all the citizens to the same level and to eradicate the evils of greed and robbery which gold and silver brought in their train. The iron from which money was made was first quenched in vinegar so that it could not be worked and therefore had no practical use; it was so cumbersome that large amounts could not be transported or hidden; it was worthless in trade with other Greek states and therefore weakening luxuries were not imported into Sparta from other areas. Conditioned to valueless iron money, the Spartans became impervious to bribery. It was not until the time of Agis (died 399 B.C.) that gold and silver again came into use in Sparta. The entire education and training of Spartan youth was designed to create a military state, not for the purposes of conquest, but to protect Sparta in the midst of her enemies. Children were considered to belong to the state. Those that were puny at birth were exposed on Mount Taygetus. Lycurgus established rules for the training and physical development of young women so that they would bear strong sons, and of young men so that they would become excellent and obedient soldiers. The males were brought up together according to prescribed rules from the age of seven. Even as men they ate together in a common mess. Not all the citizens favored the changes brought about by Lycurgus. The wealthy especially opposed them. Lycurgus was attacked and chased into the market place, where his attacker put out one of his eyes with his spear. The Spartans were ashamed that their leading citizen had been injured, and turned his attacker over to him. Lycurgus punished him mildly by compelling him to serve him at table, and ultimately converted him into one of his greatest admirers. Lycurgus raised a temple to Athena Ophthalmitis in gratitude that he still had one eye, and the Spartans made a law that no one should carry as much as a staff in the public assemblies. To provide a livelihood for the citizens whose lives were entirely devoted to military training, the land was redistributed in lots which would produce certain amounts of grain, oil, and wine. It is said that once when he returned to Sparta from a journey at harvest time and saw all the stacks of grain standing, equal and alike, Lycurgus remarked with pleasure that "all Laconia looks like one family estate just divided among a number of brothers." The land was worked by helots, a slave class that was continually threatening to revolt. As part of the training of a Spartan youth, he was permitted to seek out and slay any helot who he thought might become a leader of rebellion.

When Lycurgus had brought about these changes and thought that they were good, he won a promise from the Spartans that they would observe his laws until he returned. He went to Delphi to learn from the priestess whether his laws were good. The priestess of Apollo assured him that they were, and that Sparta would thrive as long as they were followed. Lycurgus sent on the words of the priestess to Sparta. He sacrificed again to Apollo and said farewell to his relatives and friends. Determined to compel the Spartans to observe his laws until he returned, he resolved not to return at all and, some say, starved himself to death. But others say he went to Crete, the place of origin of many of his laws, and died there. His ashes were scattered on the sea, they say, so that his bones could never be collected and returned to Sparta and release the Spartans from their oath. And, of course, some say that there never was any such person as Lycurgus at all, but all admit that he, or his legend, had great effect on the development of the Spartan character.

Lycurgus. One of the Ten Attic Orators, born at Athens, c396 B.C.; died 324 B.C. He was the son of Lycophron of the aristocratic family of the Eteobutadae. With Demosthenes and Hyperides he was a leader of the anti-Macedonian party. He was thrice appointed manager of the Athenian finances for terms of five years each. During his tenure he improved the revenues of the city and beautified Athens with magnificent buildings. He was also responsible for causing copies of the plays of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides to be deposited in the public archives. Only one of his speeches, Against Leocrates, is extant. A man of unblemished patriotism and integrity himself, he accused Leocrates of cowardice for leaving the city after the battle of Chaeronea, and demanded the death sentence as punishment; Leocrates, however, was spared.

Lycus (lí'kus). In Greek legend, a son of Pandion the Younger and Pylia. He was the brother of Aegeus, Pallas, and Nisus. Pandion, king of Athens, was expelled from his kingdom. After his death his four sons marched against Attica and defeated their enemies. They then divided Attica among them. Aegeus, being the eldest, became king of Athens. Lycus became ruler of Euboea. But the brothers were not satisfied. They claimed Aegeus was an adopted son of Pandion and therefore not a true descendant of Erechtheus with no claim to the throne. Lycus intrigued against Aegeus, and at length became so threatening that Aegeus banished him. He went to Cilicia in Asia Minor where Sarpedon, brother of Minos of Crete, had made himself king. Lycus succeeded Sarpedon on the throne and the country was renamed Lycia after him.

Lycus. According to legend, a king of the Mariandyni in Mysia. He entertained Heracles and won his support in a war against the Bebryces, in which the Bebrycian king Mygdon was slain. He named Heraclea, land in Paphlagonia which was regained in this war, in honor of Heracles. When Heracles left, the Bebryces under the new king Amycus, attacked again and retook the land. Later, Lycus welcomed the Argonauts when they visited his kingdom on their way to Colchis. He built a shrine to Polydeuces, one of their number, because he had killed Amycus in a boxing contest, and sent his son Dascylus to join the Argonauts in gratitude to them for having defeated his ancient enemies, the Bebryces, in war.

Lycus. A legendary ruler of Thebes. He was the husband of Dirce and uncle of Antiope. To carry out his promise to Antiope's father, he attacked Sicyon, whither Antiope had fled, killed the king and took Antiope captive. Much later, he was slain by Antiope's sons, Amphion and Zethus, because of his cruel treatment of their mother. See Antiope.

Lycus. In Greek legend, a son of Lycus and Dirce. During the absence of Heracles he killed Creon, the father of Heracles' wife Megara, made himself king of Thebes in Creon's place, and threatened to destroy Megara and the children of Heracles. Lycus dared do this because Heracles was occupied on the labor for Eurystheus of bringing Cerberus from Hades, and he had been gone so long that it was thought he would never return. However, he did return, his task successfully completed. And when he learned of Lycus' deeds, he killed him.

Lydia (līd'i-ā). [Early name, Maeonia.] Ancient country, later a Roman province, on the W coast of Asia Minor, bordering on the Aegean Sea and on Mysia, Phrygia, and Caria. The earliest known inhabitants were Phrygians. Later it was invaded by Semites, who gave it the name of Lydia (compare the Old Testament Lud, descendants of Shem, Gen. x. 22). The name Maeonia was afterward confined to the E part of the country near the upper Hermus River, and Lydia to the W. About 700 B.C. a revolution overthrew the Semitic reign, and brought the native dynasty of the Mermnadae to the throne, with Gyges as first king. Under them Lydia rose to the position of a mighty kingdom extending from the coast to the river Halys (modern Kizil Irmak), with Sardis as capital. The prosperous Greek cities were brought either to subjection or alliance. But under the fifth and best-known of the dynasties, Croesus, the Lydian empire was brought to a sudden end by the Persian conqueror Cyrus, who in 546 B.C. captured Sardis and the king himself. From the Persians Lydia passed over, through Alexander the Great, to Syria, and later to Eumenes of Pergamum. During the Roman period Lydia formed a separate province, with Sardis as capital.

Lydians (līd'i-ānz). People of ancient Lydia, in W Asia Minor. They are noted for having had a high level of civilization, attaining great wealth, and perhaps for instituting the first coined money. Their language, Lydian, is classified as belonging to the extinct Anatolian sub-family of Indo-European languages.

Lygdamus (līg'dā-mus). Pseudonym of a Roman poet (late 1st century B.C.) of no exceptional talent, a member of Messalla's literary circle. Six elegies by him have survived and now constitute Book III of the Tibullan collection. (JJ)

Lygodesma (lī'gō-des'mā). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Willow-bound." This epithet was given to her because, some say, the Taurian wooden image of the goddess brought back by Orestes and Iphigenia was found in a clump of willows, and tendrils of the willows had twined themselves about the image and held it upright. Another epithet applying to this Taurian image was Artemis Orthia (Upright), because the willows held it erect.

Lykabettos (līk-ā-bet'os). See Lycabettus.

Lyncestes (līn-ses'tēz), Alexander. See Alexander (fl. 4th century B.C.).

Lynceus (līn'sūs). In Greek mythology, the son of Aegyptus and the husband of Hypermnestra. On the advice of Artemis, Hypermnestra spared her husband on their wedding night. She was the only one of the 50 daughters of Danaus to spare her husband. Danaus had given each of his daughters a slender dagger and had ordered them to kill their bridegrooms. Hypermnestra helped Lynceus to escape to Lyncea, where he lighted a beacon to inform her that he had arrived safely. She also lighted one to show that his message had been received, and this act was commemorated annually by the lighting of signal fires. Lynceus and Hypermnestra were subsequently reunited.

Lynceus. In Greek legend, the son of Aphareus and Arene and the brother of Idas. His sight was so keen he could see through the bole of a tree. See Idas.

Lyra (lī'rā). [Also: the Harp.] An ancient northern constellation, representing the lyre of Hermes or of Orpheus. The brightest star in this constellation is Vega (Lyrae), the fourth brightest star in the sky.

Lyrcea (līr-sē'ā). In ancient geography, a place in Argolis to which Lynceus, husband of Hypermnestra, escaped when all his brothers (the sons of Aegyptus) were slain by their brides, the daughters of Danaus. When he arrived at Lyrcea, once called by his name Lyncea, he raised a flaming beacon as a signal to Hypermnestra that he was safe. On her part, she raised a beacon at Larissa, the citadel of Argos, in reply. By the time of the Greek expedition to Troy, Lyrcea lay in ruins.

Lyre (lir). The national instrument of ancient Greece, belonging essentially to the harp family, but with a sounding box. It was said to have been invented by Hermes on the same day he was born. He met a tortoise as he was stealing out of the cave that was his birthplace, scooped out its shell, and covered it with ox-hide; this was the sounding box. To this he attached two horns separated by a cross-piece and strung seven strings from the cross-piece across the tortoise shell. He gave the lyre to Apollo—who made it his instrument—to atone for stealing Apollo's cattle, also on the day he was born.

Lyrnessus (lir-nes'us). Mentioned by Homer in the Iliad as a city in Mysia allied to Troy. Early in the Trojan War it was attacked and sacked by Achilles, who murdered King Mynes and carried off his wife Briseis as his captive.

Lyrus (li'rus). According to some accounts, a son of Aphrodite and Anchises, and the brother of Aeneas. He died childless.

Lysander (li-san'dér). Spartan commander, killed near Haliartus in Boeotia, 395 B.C. He was the son of Aristoclitus of the line of the Heraclidae. Reared in poverty and in the strict Spartan discipline, he showed himself unusually subservient, according to Plutarch, to men of influence and power with the object of furthering his own ambitions. He was appointed navarch (admiral) of the Peloponnesian fleet in 408 B.C. He sailed to Ephesus where the Spartans were cordially received, and set up a base there. At this time he became friendly with Cyrus the Younger, the son of the Persian king, Darius II, and the satrap at Sardis with jurisdiction over Cappadocia, Phrygia, and Lydia. Lysander won his complete confidence and promises of help for the Spartan cause by his refusal to accept any gift from Cyrus for himself. In 407 B.C. he defeated an Athenian fleet at Notium. According to Spartan law, he now had to give up his post as navarch, having served the legal term of one year. Callicratidas was appointed the new navarch but (again according to Plutarch) Lysander wished to hamper Callicratidas and sowed disaffection among his men before turning over his command. In 406 B.C. Callicratidas was defeated at Arginusae by the Athenians and fell in the battle. The Spartan allies and Cyrus the Younger wanted Lysander reappointed as admiral, but because of the Spartan rule that no man could twice be navarch, it was impossible to give him the title. He was, however, given the power. He went to Sardis and obtained funds from Cyrus the Younger, over whom he continued to exercise his influence. Cyrus entrusted him with the administration of his satrapy and the collection of the tribute therein while he went off to see his dying father, Darius II. Thus restored in funds and power, Lysander sailed forth. The Athenians sought to engage him at Ephesus, but he refused to meet them in battle there. Instead, after sailing to Attica where he conferred with Agis II, the Spartan king, he recrossed the Aegean, laid siege to Lampsacus on the east shore of the Hellespont, took it, and gave it over to his men to plunder. The Athenians determined to engage him and met him at Aegospotami. In the battle that finally took place there (405 B.C.) it was said that twin stars appeared on each side of Lysander's ship as he sailed into battle. These stars represented the Dioscuri, ever-protecting deities of Sparta. Lysander was completely victorious in the battle at small cost to Sparta. Three or four thousand Athenians were taken prisoner and put to the sword; only 20 Athenian ships escaped. Lysander was prevented from pursuing those by the quick action of the Athenian admiral Conon. It was the custom of the Greeks to unship their sails in preparation for a naval battle, and the Peloponnesians had deposited theirs at Cape Abarnis near Lampsacus before the battle of Aegospotami. Conon swooped down on the Cape and seized the sails. However, the complete defeat of the Athenians at Aegospotami was the effective end of the Peloponnesian War. Lysander sailed to blockade Athens. He set up Spartan harmosts (governors) over the Athenian cities of Greece and Asia, established Spartan supremacy, and restored Melos which had been taken and depopulated by the Athenians (416-415 B.C.), and also restored Scione, which had suffered the same fate (421 B.C.). At this moment the power of Lysander was supreme. Athens, on the verge of starvation because of the blockade, was compelled to ask for peace. According to the terms of it the Long Walls and the fortifications of the Piraeus were demolished to the piping of flutes; Athens surrendered all but 12 of her ships; her possessions were taken away from her; she was compelled to readmit those who had gone into exile, and to become a subordinate ally of Sparta. To memorialize his victory, Lysander set up twin golden stars of the Dioscuri as a trophy at Delphi. (These were the stars which were said to have disappeared in 371 B.C., just before the Battle of Leuctra in which the Spartan supremacy won in the time of Lysander was destroyed by the Thebans under Epaminondas.) Lysander sailed off to reduce Samos, but intervened in Athenian politics to establish the Tyranny of the Thirty (404 B.C.) and to write a new constitution. He placed Spartan harmosts over the cities which had been freed from Athens, choosing for these posts friends whom he wished to reward, regardless of their capacity or honesty. His arrogance increased as he was successful in his ambitions. At Samos he was awarded, and graciously received, divine honors, the first living man to be so honored. The Samians changed the name of their festival of Hera to Lysandria in a slavish desire to win his favor. To please his friends, he wantonly ordered the death of their enemies. To exiles whom he distrusted, he promised amnesty if they returned; once they did so, he had them executed. He pillaged the coasts of Asia to reward his friends and to send rich treasure back to Sparta, but took nothing for himself. Such actions roused strong resentment in the Persian satrap and he complained to Sparta. Lysander was recalled. With him he carried a letter from the Persian satrap Pharnabazus who had been a faithful ally of the Spartans in their war against Athens. Lysander thought the letter justified his actions, but at the last moment Pharnabazus had substituted a highly critical account, denouncing Lysander, and it was this letter that he handed to the Spartan ephors with his own hand. The accusations of the letter and the fact that he had been duped by Pharnabazus into delivering it himself made Lysander's position in Sparta equivocal. With some difficulty, he secured permission to depart on a visit to the temple of Zeus Ammon in Libya. He subsequently returned, and such was his fame for his victory over the Athenians that he was influential in securing the throne for Agesilaus II on the death of Agis II. He encouraged Agesilaus to wage war on the Persian king, and accompanied him on an expedition to Asia, fully expecting that he would be the actual commander of the expedition because of his supposed influence with Agesilaus and his experience in the area. Agesilaus soon disabused him of that notion. He refused to aid those who came to him recommended by Lysander; on the other hand, he ostentatiously helped those known to be unfriendly to Lysander; finally, while he gave others of his train positions of command, he appointed Lysander as his official Carver-of-Meats. Lysander understood the insult, asked leave to depart and was granted permission. Unhonored, he sailed back to Sparta plotting revolution. He planned to unseat Agesilaus by changing the Spartan rule from hereditary kingship to elective kingship. To justify his proposals he sought favoring oracles from Delphi. The priestess there, as at Dodona, was impervious to both persuasion and bribery. The priests of Ammon were so incensed by his attempts to corrupt them that they sent word to Sparta denouncing him, but the Spartans acquitted him. In lieu of valid responses he gathered a number of spurious oracles to place before the Spartans. His intrigue failed and was not discovered until after his death. Sparta became involved in a war against Thebes in support of Phocis, the Spartan ally. Lysander marched out from the revived Spartan colony of Heraclea near Thermopylae, against Thebes. The Spartan king Pausanias, coming with a second force from the south, was to join him at Haliartus, in Boeotia. Lysander arrived first and attacked the town. The soldiers within it rushed out in a surprise raid, repulsed the Peloponnesians, and killed Lysander (395 B.C.).

A skillful diplomat and an able general, Lysander was for a time supreme in Greece. His great capacity was betrayed by his personal ambition, his harshness when he had won supreme power, and his irresponsible choices of subordinates. Personally incorruptible and scornful of wealth, he undermined the ancient Spartan discipline, which depended on iron money that had no real value and hence presented no temptation, by sending into the state great treasure taken by plunder. He thus opened up Sparta to the corruption brought by wealth and completely changed the Spartan character. Honest men considered him unscrupulous and deceitful, treacherous to his friends as well as to his foes. He justified his deceit in war by saying, "Where the lion's skin will not reach, it must be patched out with the fox's." Some say the image of a long-haired, bearded man that was set up in the treasury of the Acanthians at Delphi was that of Lysander to honor him for his part in winning Acanthus from Athens (424 B.C.).

Lysias (lis'i-as, li'si-as). One of the Ten Attic Orators. He was born in the Greek colony of Syracuse, c450 B.C., and died in 380 B.C. His father Cephalus, whose portrait appears in Plato's Republic, was invited by Pericles to come to Athens. There, at the Piraeus, he had a shield factory, and was the owner of some property. When he was 15 years old, Lysias went to Thurii, in Italy, and studied rhetoric. In 413 B.C. he took part in the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, after which he returned to Athens and went into his father's business with his brother Polemarchus. When the Thirty Tyrants took control of Athens (404 B.C.), they attacked the wealthy aliens. Polemarchus was killed, much of his property was confiscated, and Lysias escaped to Megara. Henceforth Lysias espoused the cause of democracy and gave money to support it. In 403 B.C. the Tyrants were expelled. Lysias was given Athenian citizenship, but it was withdrawn shortly thereafter. Unable to take a part in the politics of the city, he occupied himself with writing speeches for others to deliver. One of the speeches, still extant, which he himself made was Against Eratosthenes. Eratosthenes was one of the tyrants, who had been given amnesty on the restoration of the democracy. Lysias was noted for being able to make the speeches he wrote for others sound as if they had been prepared by the person who gave them. It was said of him that he was never more persuasive and convincing than when he had a shaky case. Of his more than 200 speeches, 34 which bear his name are extant, though of some the authenticity has been challenged. Titles or fragments of a hundred others remain. They show him to have been somewhat cynical, able, and possessed of tact and agility. In style he avoided bombast, used simple and lucid language, and achieved his effects by vivid narrative description, concise points, and a faithful or skillful presentation of the character of the person who gave the speech.

Lysicrates (li-sik'ra-tēz), Choragic Monument of. tion. The Monument of Lysicrates is circular in plan on a square stepped base. It has six Corinthian columns, the intercolumniations closed by curved slabs of marble so that the columns appear engaged, carrying an Ionic architrave, sculptured frieze, and cornice. Above this is a single conical roof block terminating in a rich ornamental anthemion which supported the tripod. The dedicatory inscription names the archon Evaenetus, in whose year the contest was held, corresponding to 330 B.C. (335 B.C., according to others). The monument stands beside what was then called the Street of Tripods, approaching the Theater of Dionysus from the east.

Of other choragic monuments near the theater, that of Thrasyllus, 320 B.C., survives in ruinous condition above the topmost seats of the theater, marked by a cave cut into the rock of the Acropolis. Another, erected by a choragus named Nicias, 320/319 B.C., was later dismantled, and many of its stones were used to build the lower gate (Beulé Gate), of Roman date, at the western entrance of the Acropolis, in whose structure they can still be seen. Lysimachus (lī-sim'ā-kus). Macedonian general under Alexander the Great. He was born probably at Pella, in Macedonia, c360 B.C.; and was killed at the battle on the plain of Corus, Asia Minor, 281 B.C. He was buried at Lysimachia, a town he founded in the Thracian Chersonese between Cardia and Pactye. He was a member of Alexander's bodyguard and served with distinction in the campaigns in Asia. According to one implausible account, Alexander, angered at Lysimachus, shut him up in a chamber with a lion. Lysimachus overpowered the beast and emerged unscathed. Ever after, Alexander treated him with great respect. Following Alexander's death Lysimachus received the kingdom of Thrace. He joined Cassander, Ptolemy, and Seleucus in the league against Antigonus in 315 B.C., assumed the title of king in 306 B.C., and was one of the victors at Ipsus in 301 B.C., when Antigonus was killed. In the division of Antigonus' realm, Lysimachus received a large part of Asia Minor. He destroyed Lebedos and Colophon and refounded Ephesus with inhabitants he removed from the former cities. Demetrius, son of Antigonus, took advantage of his absence in Greece (297 B.C.) to renew the war. By the peace which ended the war Demetrius became king of Macedonia, but in 288 B.C. Lysimachus, with Pyrrhus, invaded Macedonia, and drove Demetrius out. Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, held the throne for a time, but was soon driven out in his turn by Lysimachus, who thus obtained Macedonia for himself. Before the battle of Ipsus Lysimachus had married Amastris, the widowed queen of Heraclea in Pontus. She later divorced him and he married Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy, to strengthen himself against Seleucus, who now appeared to threaten him. Amastris was slain by her sons. Lysimachus had them put to death. Arsinoë asked him to give her Heraclea, and he did so. Then to secure the succession for her own children, Arsinoë plotted against Lysimachus' eldest son Agathocles. He was accused of conspiring to seize the throne. Lysimachus believed the accusations and had him put to death. The widow of Agathocles fled to Seleucus, who at once invaded the territory of Lysimachus in Asia. The towns the latter had taken in Asia Minor rose up in revolt. He crossed the Hellespont to engage Seleucus. A battle took place in the plain of Corus in Lydia, and Lysimachus was killed (281 B.C.). It is said that his body, left lying on the field of battle, was guarded for several days by his dog, until it was recovered and delivered to his son Alexander.

Lysippe (lī-sip'ē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Antia and Proetus. With her sisters, Iphianassa and Iphinoë, she was driven mad for offending either Dionysus or Hera. Melampus, who finally came to terms with their father, effected their cure after pursuing them to Sicyon. Later Lysippe married Melampus.

Lysippus (lī-sip'us). Greek sculptor, a native of Sicyon, who was active c372-316 B.C. According to Pliny he revised the canon of Polyclitus, making the head smaller and the legs longer, and adjusting details to a greater elongation. This new canon has been preserved in the Apoxyomenus of the Vatican, a young nude athlete scraping from his skin with a strigil the olive oil which took the place of soap in the bath, thought to be a copy of the bronze original placed by Agrippa

before his baths in Rome. Lysippus also developed and fixed the extreme athletic type in Heracles, whom he repeatedly represented. A small table figure of Heracles in bronze was made for Alexander, who carried it about with him in his campaigns. It was afterward owned by Hannibal and Sulla. The Torso Belvedere is supposed to have been copied from this figure by Apollonius of Athens. Among the statues in bronze which Lysippus was said to have made was a colossal figure of Zeus at Tarentum. This was taken to the Capitol at Rome, removed from there to the Hippodrome in Constantinople, and melted down in the 11th century. There was also a colossal statue of the sun-god in a four-horse chariot, as well as a statue of Heracles, second in size only to the colossus of Rhodes. Through Chares of Lindus the characteristics of Lysippus were transmitted to the great Rhodian school which produced the Laocoön. Lysippus was the favorite sculptor of Alexander the Great, and author of most of his portraits in sculpture. An anecdote purporting to prove that, in an admittedly long and busy career, Lysippus made 1500 sculptures challenges credence.

Lysis (lī'sis). Dialogue of Plato; the narration by Socrates of a conversation on friendship which took place in a palestra outside the walls of Athens, between himself, the youthful friends Lysis and Menexenus, Hippothales, and Ctesippus.

Lysistrata (li-sis'tra-tā). Comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 411 B.C. It concerns a strike called by the women, in which they refuse to have anything to do with the men until the latter make peace with Sparta. (Lysistrata, a coinage of Aristophanes, means "She who disbands the army.") The broad humor, founded largely upon the ostensibly uncontrollable appetite of the human male for the female, reinforced by its practical immunity as a recognized classic from censorship, has obtained for the Lysistrata repeated revivals in the present century. —M—

Ma (mä). Mother goddess of ancient Cappadocia in Asia Minor, identified with Cybele. The focus of her cult was her sanctuary at Comana, where her festivals were celebrated and where she was attended by a great troop of priests, priestesses, and sacred prostitutes. Roman soldiers, after they occupied Cappadocia, identified her with their own Bellona, and called her Ma Bellona.

Macareus (mak'ā-rös). In mythology, a son of Aeolus, keeper of the winds, and Enarete. He and his five brothers and six sisters lived happily on the island where the winds were confined. Unaware that incestuous unions were displeasing to the gods, the brothers and sisters considered themselves married to each other. When Aeolus discovered this, he threw the child of Macareus and his sister Canace to the dogs, sent Canace a sword, with which she killed herself, and forced four of his other sons to seek homes in other lands.

Macaria (ma-kar'i-a). In Greek legend, the daughter of Heracles and Deianira, the only daughter he ever had. In the war between Theseus (or Demophon, his son) and Eurystheus that followed the persecution of Heracles' children by the latter, an oracle prophesied that the Athenians would win only if one of Heracles' children was offered as a sacrifice. Macaria volunteered to serve as the sacrifice, and when it was suggested that lots should be drawn she scorned the suggestion, saying she wished to offer her life of her own free will, and not to give it up as a result of chance. She was sacrificed and the Athenians, who had given sanctuary to the harassed children of Heracles, won. The Macarian Spring at Marathon, where Macaria died, is named for her.

Macedonia (mas-e-dō'ni-a). [Also: Macedon.] In ancient geography, a country in SE Europe, of varying limits. It lay N of the Aegean Sea and Thessaly, E of Illyria, and W of Thrace, separated from Illyria by the Scardus Mountains. The chief rivers were the Axios (Vardar) and Strymon; the chief cities, Edessa, Pella, and Thessalonica. Macedonia was not originally a part of Hellas. It first became powerful under Philip II, who united the country and made the Macedonian army the best-trained army of his time. Philip, who became the master of Greece, was succeeded by his son Alexander the Great, the conqueror of the entire geographical area that came to be known as the Near East, making Macedonia the motherland of one of the greatest empires of history. After his death, its possession was contested by Alexander's successors, and was finally won (c278 B.C.) by Antigonos II (Antigonos Gonatas). The Macedonians were defeated by Rome at Cynoscephalae in 197 B.C., and finally at Pydna in 168 B.C., and Macedonia was made a Roman province in 146 B.C. Parts of it are now in Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece.

Macedonian Empire (mas-ē-dō'ni-an). Empire built up by Philip II (who reigned 359–336 B.C.) and his son Alexander the Great (336–323 B.C.). It included at its greatest extent Macedonia, Greece, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Assyria, part of Armenia, and the countries comprised in what are now Iran, Afghanistan, Baluchistan, W India, and a large part of C Asia. The empire was divided under Alexander's successors, the chief divisions being Macedonia, Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Bithynia, Rhodes, and Greek states.

Macedonians. Natives or inhabitants of ancient Macedonia, in which Hellenic culture and the Greek language were influential.

Macedonian Wars. Wars between Rome and Macedonia: 1) 214–205 B.C., when Philip V fought in alliance with Carthage; 2) 200–197 B.C., when Philip V was defeated by Flamininus at Cynoscephalae (197 B.C.); 3) 171–168 B.C., when Perseus was defeated by Aemilius Paulus at Pydna (168 B.C.); 4) 149–148 B.C., soon after which Macedonia was made a Roman province.

Machaon (mā-kā'on). In Homeric legend (Iliad) a son of Asclepius and a brother of Podalirius. He was famed as a surgeon and his brother as a physician. Both went from Oechalia with the Greeks to Troy. Machaon, regarded as one of the most valuable of all the Greeks for his skill in healing, was wounded by a three-barbed arrow shot by Paris, and was taken off the field of battle by Nestor. According to some accounts he was finally slain by the Amazon queen Penthesilea; according to others it was Eurypylos, son of Telephus, who killed him. Nestor took his bones back to Pylus where they became the center of a healing sanctuary.

Machaerus (mā-kē'rus). According to some accounts, a Phocian who killed Neoptolemus, at the command of the priestess, at the shrine of Apollo at Delphi, because Neoptolemus had impiously attempted to steal the sacrificial offerings on the altar.

Macrae (mak'rē). A place in Attica where, according to some accounts, Poseidon slew Erechtheus with his trident for killing Eumolpus, Poseidon's son and a priest of Eleusis, in the war between the Athenians and the Eleusinians. Here the earth opened and swallowed up Erechtheus.

Macrians (mak'ri-anz). A people who dwelt near the Propontis. They were neighbors and enemies of Cyzicus and the Doliones. On the fatal night when the Argonauts were blown back to the kingdom of Cyzicus, the Doliones attacked them in the belief that they were Macrian raiders.

Macris (mak'ris). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Aristaëus and Autonoë. She was one of the nymphs of Nysa to whom Hermes brought the infant Dionysus to be cared for. The nymphs cared for him in a cave, sometimes said to be on Mount Helicon (the precise location of Nysa has never been settled), and fed him on honey. She was driven out of Euboea by the wrath of Hera and fled to Drepana, the island which was later called Corcyra, where she was kindly received by the Phaeacian natives. There she dwelt in a cave with a double entrance and granted great wealth to the Phaeacians. A town on the coast was named for her and the island itself was sometimes also called by her name. When the Argonauts landed in the island on their way home from Colchis, Jason and Medea were married in the cave of Macris.

red-figure technique, active at the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 5th centuries B.C. He decorated all but three of 30 vessels signed by Hieron as potter. Two hundred and forty extant works have been attributed to him, among them a skyphos (Boston) showing Paris carrying off Helen, on one side, and Menelaus recovering her on the other. This vessel, signed by Macron as painter and Hieron as potter, is the only extant one on which the signature of Macron appears in its entirety.

Madness of Heracles, The or Hercules Furens. A drama by Euripides, presented c416 B.C. The scene is before an altar of Zeus in front of the royal palace of Thebes. Amphitryon, the foster father of Heracles, tells of the dangers with which he, Megara, the wife of Heracles, and the children of Heracles are threatened, now that Heracles has been gone so long in the Underworld to fetch Cerberus that men think he will never return. These dangers arise from the fact that evil-hearted and discontented men have brought Lycus, a Euboean, into Thebes. He conspired against Creon, slew him, and usurped his throne. Lycus has determined to slay all that remain of the house of Heracles lest in the future they attempt to avenge Creon's death. Megara adds that they must resign themselves to death, as they have no friends and nowhere to turn. Amphitryon cannot resign himself. In spite of old age and terrible misfortune, he rejoices in life and "loves its hopes." He clings to a belief that Heracles will yet return and save them.

Lycus enters. He mocks Amphitryon's hopes of rescue by Heracles. The family of Heracles must die. Amphitryon calls Lycus a coward who would murder innocent children in their father's absence. He asks that they be allowed to go into exile, and says the Thebans are disgraced because they will not help the family of the man who did so much for their city. Lycus ignores him and commands that funeral pyres be erected for Heracles' family and for the Theban Elders who sympathize with Amphitryon but are too old and weak to fight. Megara counsels Amphitryon to die nobly since she is sure there is now no hope for them. She leads her children into the palace to dress them in burial clothes. Before following her, Amphitryon rails at Zeus: the god makes less of an effort to protect his children than does the mortal father.

The chorus of Theban Elders sings of Heracles' 12 great labors for Eurystheus. At the end of their song they lament that old age prevents them from defending his family against Lycus. Megara, Amphitryon, and the children come out of the palace dressed in burial shrouds. In desperation, Megara involuntarily calls on Heracles to help them. Miraculously, he appears. They tell him of their terrible plight. He asks if he has no friends who would help his family, and sadly concludes that misfortune has no friends. He vows to destroy Lycus and the Thebans who have permitted his excesses. Since no one saw him enter the city, he will hide until Lycus comes and then attack him. He tells his family that he remained so long in the Underworld in order to rescue Theseus; then they all go into the palace.

Lycus enters. He says the time has come and asks Amphitryon where Megara and the children are. He follows them into the palace while Amphitryon gloats as he imagines the fate that awaits Lycus at the hands of Heracles. Presently he hears Lycus cry out. His cries alternate with the song the chorus of Elders sings of the retribution for the tyrant.

Iris and Mania (Madness) now appear. Iris says that now that Heracles' labors for Eurystheus are finished, Hera wants to stain him with the blood of his own kin. She commands Mania (a daughter of Uranus and Nyx) to take possession of Heracles. Mania pleads with Iris not to devise evil against Heracles, who has done such great things for the gods, as well as for mortals. But Iris warns her that she must not interfere with Hera's desires, and orders her to do as she is bid. Mania calls Helios to witness that she is carrying out orders against her will, and enters the palace. The chorus laments over the misfortunes the gods send Heracles. An uproar breaks out in the palace. A servant runs out and announces that in a fit of madness Heracles has slain his children under the impression that they are the sons of Eurystheus. Megara is dead also, and he would have killed Amphitryon but Athena appeared and hurled a great rock at him which knocked him unconscious, whereupon Amphitryon and the servants bound him. Now Amphitryon, grieving, comes from the palace and warns the elders to flee; Heracles has regained consciousness, burst his bonds, and is coming out, calling for his friends. He asks Amphitryon why he is weeping, and is gradually made to understand the horror he has wrought in a spell of madness. In despair, Heracles decides to kill himself. He warns Theseus, who now approaches, to keep away, lest he be tainted by Heracles' blood-guilt. Theseus had heard of the crimes of Lycus and had come to help Heracles. He sees the bodies of Heracles' children and learns what has happened from Amphitryon, as Heracles crouches with his head covered. Theseus seeks to comfort Heracles. He tells him to unveil his head, that he is his friend and remains so in misfortune. He attempts to hearten Heracles by telling him that a "royal-souled man" bears the blows of heaven and does not flinch. He persuades Heracles not to set his mind on suicide, and in response to his statement that no land will accept him because of his crimes, he invites Heracles to Athens, promises to purify him and to give him half of his kingdom. Athens, he says, will be honored for having helped a hero. Heracles expresses bewilderment about the motives of the gods, who have brought him such sorrow, and even wonders if the gods exist. He accepts the generous offer of Theseus, because it is braver to live than to die. He commits his children to Amphitryon for burial and laments. Theseus offers his hand to Heracles as a helper and a friend.

Maeander (mē-an'dēr). [Modern Turkish, Menderes.] In ancient geography, a river of W Asia Minor, flowing, with many windings, generally SW and W through Phrygia and Ionia to the Aegean Sea. The name is the origin of the word "meander." According to legend, Maeander, son of Cercaphus and Anaxibia, was at war in Phrygia. He vowed to the goddess Cybele that if he was victorious, he would sacrifice the first person who congratulated him on his return. He was victorious, and on his return he was met and congratulated by his son, his mother, and his sister. In fulfillment of his vow he sacrificed them. He then hurled himself into the river which afterward bore his name.

Maecenas (mē-sē'nas), Caius Cilnius. Roman statesman and patron of literature, died 8 B.C. He was descended from an ancient Etruscan family and belonged to the equestrian order. He appears in 40 B.C. as the agent of Octavian (afterward emperor under the title of Augustus) in negotiating a marriage with Scribonia, daughter of Libo, the father-in-law of Sextus Pompeius. He was entrusted with the administration of Rome during the absence of Octavian on an expedition against Pompey in 36 B.C., and after the battle of Actium in 31 B.C., when Octavian made himself master of the Roman world, urged him to establish an empire instead of restoring the Republic. He remained, with Agrippa, the chief adviser of Augustus down to 16 B.C., when he became estranged from his master and retired to private life. He was the friend and patron of Horace and Vergil, and wrote a number of works of which only fragments are extant. His name has become a synonym for the generous patron of the arts.

Maenads (mē'nadz). [Known also as Bacchae or Thyiades.] The female followers of Dionysus; priestesses of Dionysus. Their tradition sprang from those who accompanied the god when he roamed all over the world in a frenzy of madness inspired by Hera. The maenads celebrated the festivals of Dionysus with mad songs and boisterous courses in gay companies amid the crags of Parnassus and Cithaeron, particularly on the occasion of the great triennial festival of Dionysus. During the celebration they donned the nebris (fawnskin), chewed laurel leaves, and carried the ivy-twined, pine-cone-tipped thyrsus. Their faces and arms were sometimes painted or tattooed as a disguise during their orgies on the mountain tops when they became the lovers of Pan. The maenads, inflamed by wine and Dionysiac ecstasy, helped Agave tear her son Pentheus to pieces under the impression he was a young lion, because he had doubted the divinity of Dionysus. At the instigation of Dionysus, they attacked Orpheus at Dium in Thrace. They first murdered their husbands, who were in a temple where Orpheus was a priest of Apollo, and then tore Orpheus limb from limb, and hurled his head into the Hebrus River. Dionysus saved their lives from the vengeance this provoked by transforming them into oak trees, and ever after the maenads in that region were tattooed by their husbands as a warning against the murder of priests.

Maenalus (men'a-lus, mē'na-). In Greek mythology, the eldest son of Lycaon. According to some accounts, it was he who suggested that Lycaon place human flesh before Zeus when the god came to test the piety of Lycaon and his sons, to determine whether the god would recognize human flesh. persuade the Thebans to restore Polynices to the throne. As Tydeus made his way back to the camp of the Seven against Thebes, these 50 leaped on him from ambush. He slew them all except Maeon, who was allowed to escape and return to Thebes to tell what had happened. In the subsequent battle of the Seven against Thebes it is said that Maeon, in gratitude for being spared by Tydeus, buried the fallen hero's body with full funeral honors.

Maeonia (mē-ō'ni-a). An ancient name of Lydia, the country on the W coast of Asia Minor. The Maeonians were allies of Troy in the Trojan War. Here in 190 B.C. the Romans under Lucius Scipio, who had his famous brother Scipio Africanus the Elder as one of his lieutenants, defeated a vastly superior force under Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. Antiochus fled, sued for peace, and by the terms of it was compelled to withdraw behind the Taurus Mountains.

He was defeated by Scipio Africanus at Silpia in 206 B.C. He later landed in Liguria and was defeated in Cisalpine Gaul by the Romans (203 B.C.). On his journey back to Carthage he died of his wounds.

Maia (mā'ya, mī'a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione. She was the eldest of the Pleiades, mother by Zeus of Hermes, and the nurse of Arcas after the death of Callisto. In Roman mythology she became identified with a primitive Italian goddess who was associated with fertility and growth. Malli (mal'i). An ancient tribe of Dravidian stock, of NW India. They were a free and warlike tribe, dwelling on the banks of the Hydraotis (Ravee) River, near the confluence of the Hydaspes and Acesines. On his way home from India Alexander the Great passed through their territory. They resisted his advance and withdrew to their city, which may have been on the site of modern Multan. The city was taken, but the Malli took refuge in their citadel, from the walls of which they hurled a shower of arrows on Alexander and his men attempting to scale the wall with ladders. Alexander, eager to enter the citadel, seized a ladder and climbed up under cover of his shield. So many of his men sought to follow him that the ladder gave way, and he found himself on the wall with only three companions. His men shouted to him to jump back. Instead, he leaped in among the hostile Malli and sought to hold them off single-handed. His three companions on the wall followed him. One was killed instantly. Alexander slew the leader of the enemy with his sword, but was overcome by a hail of missiles and by a wound in the breast, and at last fell to the ground, faint from loss of blood. His loyal companions protected him: Peucestas held a shield over him while Leonatus held off the enemy until the army forced the gates and stormed in to the rescue. The soldiers, infuriated, massacred the population within the citadel in revenge for the wounds sustained by Alexander. The king was, in fact, terribly weakened, and rumor quickly spread that he was dead. News of his death reached the main body of the army, encamped lower down on the Ravee River, and caused despair. To reassure his men, Alexander had himself placed in a barge and carried down the river to the camp. When the army saw his litter in the barge, they thought it held his corpse until he waved to them. Once ashore, he even walked a few steps and the army went wild with relief and delight. Some of his friends rebuked Alexander for the adventure at Malli. A general, they said, had no right to endanger his army by leaving it without a commander by taking such personal risks. Alexander agreed that they were right. After the taking of the citadel, the Malli made complete submission to Alexander and were added to his empire.

Mallia (mā'li-ā). In ancient geography, a city on the N coast of Crete, E of Cnossus. Remains of a palace, built in the same period as the first palaces of Cnossus and Phaestus but on a smaller scale, have been found there.

The Tullianum consists of a large oblong upper chamber and a small underground circular chamber, built at different periods. Jugurtha, Lentulus, and others met death in this prison, and according to tradition Saint Peter and Saint Paul were imprisoned here. The name Mamertinus was given to it in medieval times.

Mamurius/Mania

Mamurius (ma-mur'i-us). In Roman legend, a smith who made shields which were exact reproductions of the ancile (sacred shield) that fell from heaven. He made 11 copies of this shield, so exact that they could not be told apart. The purpose was to prevent recognition of the original shield and its possible theft. Mamurius was sometimes considered as a god himself and was sometimes identified with Mars. A special festival was held in his honor in March, during which hides were beaten with clubs in imitation of a smith's hammering.

Mandane (man'da-nē). A daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. Her father dreamed that such a stream of water flowed from her that it covered all Asia. The interpretation of the dream by the Magi caused Astyages to give his daughter in marriage, not to a Mede, but to the Persian Cambyses, a member of a people at that time subject to the Medes. After she was married, Astyages dreamed that from her womb grew a vine that overshadowed all Asia. The Magi interpreted this to mean that his daughter's son would be a king if he did not die too soon. Terrified lest his grandson rule in his place, Astyages sent at once for his daughter. When she arrived, he saw that she was about to bear a child. He set guards about her with instructions to destroy the child the instant it was born. In due course Mandane was delivered of a son. He was immediately taken from her, and it was many years before she knew that the child she bore was not dead, as she had been led to believe. Her son was Cyrus the Great. He led a revolt against Astyages and became master of the Medes, and thus the dream was fulfilled.

Manes (mā'nēz). In Roman antiquity, the spirits of the dead considered as tutelary divinities of their family; the deified shades of the dead, according to the belief that the soul continued to exist and to have relations with earth after the body had perished. Three times a year a pit called the mundus was officially opened in the comitium of the Roman Forum, to permit the Manes to come forth. The Manes were also honored at certain festivals, as the Parentalia and Feralia; offerings were made to them, and a flame was maintained on the altar of the household for them.

Manetho (man'ē-thō). Egyptian priest, a native of Sebennytus and a priest of Serapis at Alexandria. At the bidding of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (308-246 B.C.), founder of the Museum of Alexandria, he compiled, in Greek, the Aegyptiaca, a history of Egypt from earliest times to the death of Alexander the Great (323 B.C.). His compilation, however, survives only in quotations in later writers. The dynastic chronology which we now use is derived from his reconstruction of the Egyptian king-lists in old, middle, and new kingdoms (31 dynasties), though in part his reconstruction is irreconcilable with contemporary inscriptions and other evidence. (JJ)

Mania (mā'ni-a, mā'n'ya). In Roman religion, the goddess of the dead, called Mother or Grandmother of Ghosts. Woolen effigies of men and women were offered to her at the Compitalia (crossroads festival) in the hope that she would accept them in place of living persons. These effigies themselves were called maniae, as were also certain loaves and cakes made in human form and eaten at a similar festival at Aricia, near Rome. Mania has been referred to by various Latin writers as the mother of the Lares.

Maniae (mā'ni-ē). In ancient geography, a place, near Megalopolis in Arcadia, where there was a sanctuary called Maniae (Madnesses). Here, they say, Orestes was overtaken by the Furies, who caused him to go mad for the slaying of his mother. Nearby is a small earthen mound, surmounted by a stone finger and called the "Tomb of the Finger." In his madness Orestes saw the Furies as black goddesses. He bit off a finger and appeased them and then they appeared to him as white as he recovered his senses. Another sanctuary nearby marks the spot where he cut off his hair and offered it as sacrifice when he recovered his sanity. Orestes offered a sin-offering to the black goddesses to avert their wrath, and a thank-offering to the white goddesses in gratitude for the return of his senses. From this it became the custom to sacrifice to the Graces before sacrificing to the Furies. The spot where he recovered his senses was called Ace (Remedies). All this took place before Orestes was tried by the court of the Areopagus.

Manilian Law (ma-ni'li-an). In Roman history: 1) a law carried by the tribune Caius Manilius in 67 B.C. The law, which extended the voting privileges of freedmen, was annulled by the Senate because of violation of constitutional provisions. 2) to win the support of Pompey, Manilius proposed the conferring on him of extraordinary powers in the East, including the command of the Mithridatic War. Cicero supported this proposal in his oration Pro Lege Manilia (For the Manilian Law). Manilius was later tried on a charge, the nature of which is uncertain but probably involved maiestas (lowering the dignity of the Senate). Although he was defended by Cicero, Manilius was found guilty.

Manilius (ma-ni'li-us), Caius. Roman tribune (67 B.C.); fl. in the first half of the 1st century B.C. He proposed the Manilian Law in connection with the voting privileges of freedmen and the law conferring on Pompey the command of the Mithridatic War.

Manilius, Marcus. Roman poet, contemporary of Augustus and Tiberius, author of the Astronomica, a didactic poem on astrology in expert Latin hexameters, of which books 1-5, 4258 lines, survive. The critical edition of the Astronomica, in five volumes, the revised edition of which was completed in 1937, was a life work of the English poet and great Cambridge scholar A. E. Housman. (JJ)

Manlius Capitolinus (man'li-us kap'i-tō-lī'nus), Marcus. Roman patrician, consul 392 B.C.; died 384 B.C. When Brennus and the Gauls attacked Rome, 390 B.C., most of the inhabitants fled. Brennus found the gates open and unguarded. He pillaged and burned the city and put to the sword those whom he took captive. Manlius and some companions fled to the citadel on the Capitoline Hill and successfully resisted Brennus who laid siege to the Capitol. In the course of the siege, Pontius Cominius, an envoy from the exiled dictator Camillus, secretly penetrated the enemy ring about the Capitol, and by a way he knew ascended the lower slopes of the Capitol and was hauled to the top by the defenders. He left by the same route, and returned safely to Camillus. A few days later one of the Gallic soldiers noticed the broken branches and gouged places in the hill which marked the path taken by Cominius up the slope, and he pointed this out to Brennus. The leader of the Gauls realized that there was a way to the top, and sent a force of Gauls up to attack the Capitol at night. According to tradition, the Gauls made their way in safety to the top, but as they were about to attack the Romans, some sacred geese in the temple of Juno heard them, cackled, and woke the sleeping Romans, who leaped up to defend themselves and the Capitol. The Gallic party was slain, and next day their leader was hurled from the rock into the enemy camp. Because he was the commander and preserved the Capitol from the Gauls, Manlius was given the surname Capitolinus (but some say his father before him had that name, and it had nothing to do with the defense of the Capitol). After the Gauls had been driven out of Rome, Manlius began (385 B.C.) to champion the cause of the plebeians against the patricians with a view to making himself ruler of Rome. In the following year he was arrested by Camillus, who had been appointed dictator by the Romans, and cast into prison. But Manlius had so won the people that when they learned of his imprisonment they went about the streets clad in mourning, and Camillus was forced to release him. Manlius continued his seditious activities against the Republic and was brought to trial. The Campus Martius, where the trial was held, was in full view of the Capitol. Marcus Manlius stretched out his hands toward it and recalled how he had gloriously defended it against the Gauls. This aroused so much sympathy that the judges dared not convict him. On the other hand, he could not be acquitted because proof of his crimes against the state was plain. Camillus settled it by transferring the place of the trial. Manlius was convicted of treason and hurled to his death from the Tarpeian Rock on the Capitol, so that this place was the scene of his greatest glory and his deepest shame. The house of Manlius on the Capitoline Hill was razed, a temple of Moneta was erected in its place, and henceforth it became the rule that no patrician should have a house on the Capitoline Hill. The events of Manlius' life were pictured on the shield which Vulcan made for Aeneas to protect him in his wars against the Latins.

Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus (im-pir-i-ō'sus tōr-kwā'tus), Titus. Roman hero of the 4th century B.C. He was elected military tribune in 362 B.C., and in 361 served under the dictator Titus Quintius Pennus against the Gauls. During this campaign he slew a gigantic Gaul in single combat in the presence of the two armies, and despoiled him of a torques (chain) which he placed around his own neck (whence the surname Torquatus). He was appointed dictator in 353 and again in 349 B.C., and was consul in 347, 344, and 340 B.C. During his third consulship, while engaged with his colleague Publius Decius Mus in a campaign against the Latins, he put to death his own son, who, contrary to orders, had fought and killed in single combat an enemy from the opposing army.

Manlius Torquatus, Titus. Roman general, died 202 B.C. He was consul in 235 and 224 B.C., and dictator in 208 B.C. During his first consulship he conquered the Sardinians, after whose subjugation the Romans enjoyed a brief period of universal peace, the temple of Janus being closed for the first time since the reign of Numa Pompilius at the very beginning of Roman history. He opposed the ransoming of the prisoners taken by Hannibal at Cannae in 216, and gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginians in Sardinia in 215 B.C.

Manlius Vulso (vul'sō), Cnaeus. Roman consul (189 B.C.); fl. 2nd century B.C. He defeated the Galatians in Asia Minor.

Mannus (man'us). Mythological ancestor of the ancient Germanic peoples. He is mentioned by Tacitus as being the father of three sons from whom the various Germanic tribes sprang.

Mantineia (man-ti-nē'ā). [Also: Mantineia.] In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, Greece, SW of Corinth. The original city of this name, some say, was founded by Mantineus, son of Lycaon, on another spot. In obedience to an oracle Antinoë, daughter of Cepheus of Tegea, led the inhabitants to a new location. She was guided to the new site by a serpent, for which reason the river flowing beside the city was named Ophis (Snake). The burial mound of Antinoë became the Common Hearth of the Mantineans.

Near an altar of Hera in the city was the tomb of Arcas. The daughters of Pelias, who fled hither after their father's death at Medea's hands, died in Mantinea and were buried here. At Mount Alesium nearby, was a famous sanctuary of Poseidon, said to have been built by Agamedes and Trophonius, into which it was forbidden to mortals to enter. In their temple at Mantinea, which was divided into two equal parts, the Mantineans had an image of Asclepius by Alcamenes in one part, and images of Leto and her children by Praxiteles in the other part. There were also in Mantinea sanctuaries of Zeus Savior, Zeus Giver-of-Gifts, the Dioscuri, Demeter, Athena, and Hera. Men of Mantinea went to the Trojan War under the leadership of Agapenor, son of Ancaeus the Argonaut. In the Persian War they were among the allies of Leonidas at Thermopylae and at the battle of Salamis (480 B.C.). In the Peloponnesian Wars Mantinea joined Elis to fight against Sparta and was defeated (418 B.C.). In 385 B.C. the Mantineans were defeated again by Sparta and their city was taken. Pausanias says the Spartans took the city by diverting the waters of the Ophis River against the walls made of unbaked brick. The bricks crumbled, and the Spartans rushed in and razed the city to the ground. It was restored by the Thebans, under Epaminondas, after 371 B.C., but the Mantineans treacherously negotiated with the Spartans to make a separate peace and betrayed their benefactors. Later they fought with the Spartans against the Thebans at Mantinea (362 B.C.) and were defeated. In honor of Alexander the Great's general, Antigonos, the Mantineans changed the name of their city to Antigonea, but its ancient name was restored during the reign of the emperor Hadrian.

Mantius (man'shus). In legend, a son of Melampus the seer. He was the father of Clitus, carried off by Eos for his beauty, and of the seer Polyidus.

Manto (man'tō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the seer Tiresias. She also had the gift of prophecy. When Thebes was taken by the Epigoni, Manto, who had not fled from the city as her father advised the Thebans to do, was taken captive by Alcmaeon, the leader of the Epigoni. By Alcmaeon she became the mother of Amphilo-chus and Tisiphone. Later Manto was sent as part of the booty of Thebes to the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Apollo sent her to Colophon in Ionia, where she married Rhacius, king of Caria, and became the mother of the seer Mopsus, either by Rhacius or Apollo.

Manto. In Roman mythology, a seeress, the mother of Ocnus by the river-god of the Tuscan river. Ocnus founded the city of Mantua and named it for his mother.

Mantua (man'tū-ā). [Italian, Mantova.] An ancient Etruscan town situated on a lake formed by the river Mincius. According to the Aeneid it was founded by Ocnus, a son of the Tuscan river-god and the seeress Manto, for whom the city was named. The town was further developed by the Romans and has long been known as the birthplace of the poet Vergil.

Maracanda (mar-ā-kan'dā). Ancient name of Samarkand, city in ancient Sogdiana, C Asia. Alexander the Great stopped here (327 B.C.) for some time on his expedition into India, and destroyed the ancient city. It was at Maracanda that Clitus, a friend of Alexander's, during a long evening of drinking, expressed resentment of the influence of the Orientals over Alexander. Rash words and insults were flung out; Alexander seized a spear and ran Clitus through.

Marathon (mar'ā-thon). According to Greek tradition, a son of Epopeus. He fled from the violence of his father in the Peloponnesus to Attica. After his father's death he returned to the Peloponnesus and succeeded him as ruler of Ephyræa. He was succeeded by his son Corinthus, for whom the city of Corinth was named.

Marathon. A plain in Attica, Greece, near the modern village of Vrana, about 18 miles NE of Athens, between Mount Pentelicus and the sea. Pisistratus landed there when he returned from exile in Eretria, prepared his assault on Athens there, and from there made his successful march on Athens when he became tyrant for the third time (c546 B.C.). The plain is celebrated as the site of the battle of September, 490 B.C., between the Greeks (10,000 Athenians and 1000 Plataeans) under Miltiades, and 30,000 or more Persians under Datis and Artaphernes.

Hippias, son of Pisistratus, who had been expelled from Athens, led the Persians to the plain because it was considered ideal terrain for the Persian cavalry. The Athenians, having learned of the approach of the Persians at Marathon, marched their forces thither under ten generals. The Athenians sent Phidippides (or Philippides) to Sparta with an urgent request for aid, but for religious reasons the Spartans could not march out of Sparta until the moon was full. In the meantime the Athenians drew up their battle lines in a precinct of Heracles, and were joined by the Plataeans. Five of the Athenian generals advised against risking a battle because they were so greatly outnumbered. The other five, including Miltiades, son of Cimon, wanted to engage the enemy at once. Miltiades feared that in case of an even division, those who favored withdrawal would prevail. For this reason he persuaded Callimachus, the polemarch (war-archon) to vote for the attack and break the tie. Under Miltiades as commander the battle array was set; sacrificial victims gave favorable omens. The Athenians made a running charge out onto the plain against the Persians. According to some accounts, a fully-armed image of Theseus led the Athenians in their rush against the Persians. The latter thought that the few Greeks running against them without horses or archers were mad, and prepared to receive them. The Greeks fought gloriously in close array, and it was some time before the Persians crashed through the center of their line, the weakest part, and were victorious in that sector. But the Athenians on the right wing and the Plataeans on the left wing were victorious. They permitted the Persians they had overcome to flee, while they reformed their line and fell upon the Persians who, thinking they had won, were pursuing the Greeks of the center of the line. With their reformed line the Athenians and Plataeans overcame the Persians. (Ever after this day, it was the custom of the Athenians, in the sacrifices and festivals they held every fifth year at Athens, for the heralds to call down the blessing of the gods on the Plataeans equally with the Athenians.) The Greeks pursued the Persians to the shore, cutting down many, and seized seven of their ships, but the remainder of their fleet escaped. The Persian fleet made a feint at Athens at Phalerum, the harbor of the city, and then sailed away to Asia. Athens was safe. In the Battle of Marathon the Persians lost, according to Herodotus, 6400 men, and the Athenians lost 192. After the fall of the moon 2000 Spartans hurried up, so eager to lend their aid that they had made the march from Sparta in three days. They found the battle was over. However, they were anxious to see what the Persians looked like and went to the plain of Marathon and examined the slain. They praised the skill and bravery of the Athenians, then turned around and went home again. This victory ended Darius' attempt against Greece and is classed among the decisive battles of the world. The soros, a conical mound 40 feet high and 200 in diameter, which covers the Athenian dead, marks the central point of the famous battle. All doubt as to its identification was set at rest by an excavation made by the Archaeological Society of Athens, which disclosed ashes, charred remnants of the funeral pyre, and fragments of pottery dating from the beginning of the 5th century B.C. The modern marathon race is run over a distance approximating that run by the messenger carrying news of the victory in battle to Athens, a distance of 26 miles, 385 yards.

Marcellus (mār-sel'us). The name of an illustrious Roman family. In the Aeneid, Aeneas saw the spirits of three members of the family waiting to be born when he visited Anchises in the Underworld. They were: 1) Marcus Claudius, who was born before 268 B.C. In 222 B.C. he became consul for his first of five terms, and defeated the Gauls at Clastidium, slaying with his own hand their leader, Viridomarus or Britomartus. He defended Nola against Hannibal in 216 B.C. For his daring and swift action in the Second Punic War, he came to be known as the "Sword of Rome," as Fabius Cunctator, his great colleague, became the "Shield of Rome." He captured Syracuse in 212 and, taking command in Apulia, contended against Hannibal in southern Italy until his death (208 B.C.) in a skirmish near Venusia (Venosa). 2) Marcus Claudius, consul in 51 B.C., was an adherent of Pompey and an opponent of Caesar. He exiled himself to Mytilene after the battle of Pharsalus (48 B.C.). An appeal by the Senate in his favor caused Caesar to pardon him. He was killed on his way back to Rome, 45 B.C. 3) Marcus Claudius, the son of Octavia, born 42 B.C. He was the nephew of Augustus, and the adopted son and favorite of the emperor, whose daughter Julia he married. His early death (23 B.C.) was noted by Vergil (Aeneid) and other writers; Augustus read the funeral oration.

Marcomanni (mār-kō-man'i). Group of ancient Germanic tribes, a branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Caesar as in the army of Ariovistus. They were in frequent conflict with the Romans down to the 4th century A.D., when the name disappeared.

Marcus Andronicus (an-drō-nī'kus). See Andronicus, Marcus.

Marcus Cornelius Fronto (kōr-nēl'yus fron'tō). See Fronto, Marcus Cornelius.

Mardonius (mār-dō'ni-us). Persian general, son-in-law and nephew of Darius, and cousin of Xerxes. After Darius had put down the Ionian revolt (494 B.C.), he sent Mardonius to resubdue Thrace and Macedonia, and to punish Athens and Eretria for the aid they had lent the Ionians. Mardonius succeeded in subduing Thrace, and Macedonia submitted, but on the way to punish the two Greek cities a violent storm shattered the Persian fleet off the promontory of Athos, and Mardonius returned to Susa, having carried out the more important part of his task. Darius died before he could punish the Greeks, who in the meantime had added to the Persian desire for vengeance by defeating Datis and Artaphernes at Marathon (490 B.C.). The desire to punish the Greeks burned fiercely in Mardonius, who besides hoped to win glory in an expedition against Athens. It was he, according to Herodotus, who continually urged Darius' successor Xerxes to make a punitive expedition against Greece. In the war that Xerxes undertook, after enormous preparation, the Persians captured and burned Athens, but suffered a humiliating defeat by the combined Greek fleet at Salamis (480 B.C.). Xerxes decided to return to Persia, and left Mardonius, at his earnest request, with a large land force to prosecute the war. The Persian forces under Mardonius withdrew to Thessaly and spent the winter. The Greek states that had so valiantly resisted at Salamis fell into violent disagreement on the best way to resist further Persian attacks. Mardonius, aware of this, tried to separate Athens from her Peloponnesian allies. He sent a distinguished ambassador to offer to repair the damage Athens had suffered from the Persians, and proposed an alliance with Athens, as with an equal and independent state. The terms were generous. According to Herodotus, the Athenians answered him in this manner, "We know, as well as you do, that the power of the Persians is many times greater than our own: we did not need to have that cast in our teeth. Nevertheless, we cling so to freedom that we shall offer what resistance we may. Seek not to persuade us into making terms with the barbarian—say what you will, you will never gain our assent. Return rather at once, and tell Mardonius that our answer to him is this, 'So long as the sun keeps his present course, we will never join alliance with Xerxes. Nay, we shall oppose him unceasingly, trusting in the aid of those gods and heroes whom he has lightly esteemed, whose houses and images he has burnt with fire.' And come not again to us with words like these; nor, thinking to do us a service, persuade us to unholy actions." On learning of this answer Mardonius broke camp and marched to Thebes and thence to Athens, which he found abandoned as the Athenians had again withdrawn to Salamis. Again he offered terms, and again his terms were rejected, as the Spartans rallied to the Athenians. A Spartan force was sent out under Pausanias. Mardonius, seeing his overtures were fruitless, burned Athens and resolved to withdraw from Attica, since the ground was not suitable for his cavalry, and was not advantageous for a retreat in case he should suffer defeat. He decided to return to the friendly neighborhood of Thebes, but first he marched into the region of Megara, the farthest point in Europe to which the Persians penetrated, ravaged it, and afterward withdrew to Thebes. The Greeks under Pausanias advanced to Plataea. Mardonius came out to meet them, but on both sides the victims of sacrifices gave unfavorable omens and the battle was delayed. At last Mardonius resolved to ignore the omens, to still the fears roused by various oracles, and to begin the battle. In the struggle that followed, after much maneuvering and many harassing attacks by the Persian horse, Mardonius fought like a lion, and as long as he lived, his men defended themselves and killed many Greeks. But Mardonius was slain (479 B.C.) by a Spartan, and after his death the Spartans drove the Persians back, pursued them, and hacked them to pieces. When the battle was over, it was proposed to Pausanias, the victorious Spartan general, that he behead the corpse of Mardonius and hang the body on a cross, as Xerxes had done to Leonidas after Thermopylae. Pausanias replied that such actions were more fitted to barbarians than to Greeks, and even in barbarians they were detestable. Moreover, the great victory more than avenged Leonidas. The next day the body of Mardonius disappeared, and none could say who had taken it, although Herodotus says he knew of many who were paid large sums by the son of Mardonius on this account.

Margites (mar-jī'tēz). [Eng. trans., "The Booby."] Greek comic poem of uncertain date, with a fool and dandy for hero. Aristotle considered it the beginning of true comedy.

Mariandyni (mar''i-an-dī'nī). A people of Bithynia, dwelling on the south shore of the Euxine Sea. They founded Heraclea in honor of Heracles, who had subdued their enemies, the Bebryces. Later they welcomed the Argonauts; and built a shrine in honor of Polydeuces because he had killed their enemy Amycus, the new king of the Bebryces.

Marica (mā-rē'kə) or Dea Marica (dē'ā). A nameless divinity worshiped in a grove at the mouth of the Liris River (modern Garigliano), below Minturnae, in S Latium. Excavations during the 1920's in swampy soil on the right bank of the Liris exposed the foundations of an Italic temple, referred to the 4th century B.C., and numerous humble votive offerings of terra-cotta. In Roman mythology the Dea Marica was said to have been the mother by Faunus of Latinus, and hence an ancestress of the Latins. During the empire Venus, in her role of sea-born goddess, was associated or identified with the Dea Marica, as if Marica were the equivalent of Marina, "Of the Sea." Modern scholars, however, explain Dea Marica as "Goddess of the Marsh," the spirit of the teeming wild life of the Minturnese swamps. It was in these swamps that Caius Marius was captured in 88 B.C., and through the grove sacred to the Dea Marica that he was conducted to the ship which took him to safe refuge in Africa. (JJ)

Maris (mä'ris). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a companion of Sarpedon of Lycia, in the Trojan War. He was a Carian, and was slain by Thrasymedes while defending the body of his brother.

Maritime Alps (alps). [French, Alpes Maritimes; Italian, Alpi Marittime.] Division of the Alps which lies on the border of France and Italy, between the Ligurian Apennines and the Cottian Alps. Peak elevation, about 10,817 feet; length, about 120 miles.

Marius (mār'i-us), Caius. Roman general, born near Arpinum, Italy, 157 B.C.; died Jan. 13, 86 B.C. He was the son of poor and obscure parents, which probably accounted for his lifelong opposition to the aristocratic conservative party at Rome. He served with distinction under Scipio Africanus the Younger in the Numantine War in Spain (134 B.C.), and won the affection and respect of his commander. It is said that one evening when Scipio was sitting around the camp-fire talking with his men, one of them asked where Rome would find another such general when Scipio was gone. Scipio put his hand on Marius' shoulder and said, "Here, perhaps." This incident was supposed to have been a great inspiration to Marius. He became tribune of the people in 119 B.C. During his term of office he proposed a law to improve the election procedure, but also opposed a proposal for free distribution of grain to the people. When his term as praetor (115 B.C.) expired he cleared Spain of robbers; then he returned to Rome, where he won popularity and married Julia, the aunt of Julius Caesar. He was legate under the consul Caecilius Metellus, and fought with him against Jugurtha in Africa (109–

108 B.C.), winning great distinction and the devotion of his soldiers, whom he had organized into a well-disciplined force. Metellus became alarmed at his growing power and found excuses to delay him from returning to Rome to seek the consulship. But Marius returned in time and promised, if given command of the war in Africa, that he would either kill Jugurtha or take him alive. He became consul, 107 B.C., and soon alarmed the conservatives by his bold and insolent speeches. His policy was one of attack on the patricians to win the support of the delighted commons. He returned to Africa to finish the war (107–105 B.C.), but did not have the honor of capturing Jugurtha. This distinction fell to Sulla, a general serving under Marius, and this event was the beginning of the rivalry between them that ended in civil war. In 102 B.C. Marius illegally became consul, while he was outside Rome, and went to subdue the Cimbri and Teutones. He defeated (102 B.C.) the Teutones at Aquae Sextiae (Aix), and the Cimbri at the Raudian Fields near Vercellae (101 B.C.). For these successes in protecting Rome from the invaders he was named "Third Founder of Rome." He returned to Rome and sought the consulship again with the most servile flattery of the people. With the aid of two lawless mob leaders he had Metellus, whom he feared, expelled from Rome, and won the consulship for the sixth time, 100 B.C. In his efforts to get the office he had become even more objectionable to the aristocrats. He lost the favor of the people when he was unable to save one of the leaders who had helped him to win it. In the Social War he defeated (90 B.C.) the Marsi, but Sulla had also won great successes in the Social War, and was more than ever a threat to Marius. When the war was over, Rufus Sulpicius demanded that Marius be named commander of the war against Mithridates, and he invaded the Senate with his personal armed guard to enforce his demand. Sulla escaped to the house of Marius, from which he departed in secret to rejoin his army, and Marius was named to command the Mithridatic War. However, when tribunes went to take over Sulla's army, they were stoned. In Rome, Marius attacked the friends of Sulla, put many of them to death, and seized their property. Sulla now marched on Rome at the head of his loyal army, and Marius fled (88 B.C.). He took ship from Ostia and sailed along the coast, but when the provision for his party ran out, his companions deserted him. He was put ashore and was found by a search party hiding in the marshes of the Liris River. Marius did not give up hope. An ancient oracle, which he quoted many times, said he would serve as consul seven times. Up to this time he had held the office six times, in 107, 104, 103, 102, 101, and 100 B.C. Until the oracle was fulfilled, he believed he was safe. He was ordered executed, but the people of Minturnae, where he was imprisoned, freed him and put him aboard a boat for Carthage. There he was joined by his son Marius the Younger. He learned that Cinna had seized power in Rome after Sulla's departure for the East, and was engaged in destroying the friends of Sulla to increase his own power. Marius decided to join Cinna, and soon after landed in Tuscany, where he gathered a force and joined Cinna (87 B.C.). He seized the grain ships and the port of Ostia, marched to Rome and bathed the city in blood as he gave full rein to his desire for revenge on Sulla and the aristocrats. In 86 B.C. he became consul for the seventh time, and the oracle was fulfilled. His thirst for blood was unassuaged, and even Cinna was shocked by his crimes. He had been consul for only a few days when news of Sulla's victory over Mithridates and his approach to Rome came to him. Marius had no more heart to fight him. He retired to his home and soon after sickened and died. According to Plutarch, the Romans were delirious with joy when they learned of his death.

Marmax (mär'maks). Said to have been the first suitor for the hand of Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus. As demanded by Oenomaus, he engaged in a chariot race with Oenomaus and he was the first of the many suitors to be killed by Oenomaus. Oenomaus also butchered Marmax' horses and buried them in a tomb with their master beside the river Parthenia in Pisa. The river took its name from one of the mares. The tomb of

Marmolada (mär-mō-lā'dā). [German, Marmolata.] Highest summit of the Dolomites, in N Italy. Elevation, about 10,965 feet.

Marmore (mär'mō-rā), Cascade delle. [English, Falls of Terni.] Series of cascades in Umbria, C Italy, SE of Interamna Nahars (Terni), in the Velinus River near its mouth. The spot has been celebrated for its beauty. Height of the falls, about 65 feet, 330 feet, and 190 feet, respectively.

Maro (mā'rō) or Maron (mā'rōn). In the Odyssey, a priest of Apollo at Ismarus in the land of the Cicones. When Odysseus and his companions were returning from Troy, they sacked the city of Ismarus but spared Maro and his family. In return Maro gave Odysseus some casks of wine of extraordinary strength. Odysseus later freed himself from Polyphemus by furnishing the latter with a plentiful supply of the undiluted wine.

Maro. Cognomen of the Roman poet Vergil (Publius Vergilius Maro). The name is thought to be an Umbrian word meaning "magistrate."

Marpessa (mär-pes'ā). In the Iliad, known as the "beautiful-ankled" daughter of Evenus. Her father sought to prevent her marriage by challenging her suitors to a chariot race with him. He was invariably the winner and the unlucky suitors were slain. Idas, with the help of winged horses, succeeded in defeating Evenus and carried Marpessa off. Apollo, who also loved her, fought Idas, but Zeus intervened in the unequal struggle between a mortal and a god. He gave Marpessa the privilege of choosing between them, and she chose Idas. She feared Apollo would tire of her and preferred to risk her life and love with another mortal like herself. She was the mother of Meleager's wife, Cleopatra.

Marrucini (mar-ō-sī'nī). Ancient Italian people dwelling near the Adriatic, north of Samnium, allied to the Marsi, an Italic people east of Rome. Their principal cities were Aternum (today Pescara) and Teate (today Chieti). They were subjugated by the Romans in 305 B.C. Their language is classified as a Sabelian dialect of the ancient Italic languages.

sons, Romulus and Remus, and thus be an ancestor of the Roman nation. Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus (who was identified with Romulus) comprised an early triad. Mars was probably an ancient Italian god of fertility and vegetation before he was a Roman god, and in the primitive ten-month calendar the first month of the year, March, was named for him and was sacred to him. His transition from god of agriculture to war-god has not been satisfactorily explained, but it has been observed that wars usually started in the spring. It has also been claimed that 1) as a war-god, he guarded the fields of the people; 2) as a god whose function had not been clearly established, an agricultural people, frequently at war, identified him with both of these activities. His attributes are the sword, spear, and shield, and the wolf and the woodpecker are sacred to him. Sacrifices were offered to Mars before and during campaigns and generals solemnly invoked him before proceeding into battle. His priests (the Salii) danced dressed in armor in the great March festival. Bellona (Roman war goddess) was his charioteer, and wife, sister, or daughter. In later mythology, Mars became completely identified with the Greek Ares.

Marsi (mär'si). Ancient Italian people, inhabiting the area east of Rome. Their language is classified as a Sabellian dialect of the ancient Italic languages. Dwelling in the Apennines, they were among the most warlike of the Italian tribes and, according to Roman legend, were allies of Turnus in his war against Aeneas. Their friendship with Rome was of long standing and in 340 B.C. Roman soldiers were permitted to pass through their territory. Their demand for Roman citizenship in the Social War was granted.

Marsi. Ancient Germanic tribe first mentioned by Strabo, and also listed by Tacitus in his Germania as among the tribes descended from Mannus. The Marsi took part in the uprising under Arminius (9 A.D.), but disappeared after the campaigns of Germanicus. They were probably a part of the Sugambri, whom they adjoined on the southeast, west of the Cherusci and Chatti.

Marsian Hills. A name for the Apennines.

Marsic War. See Social War.

Marsus (mär'sus), Domitius. Roman poet of the Augustan Age, born c54 B.C.; died c4 B.C. He was the author of a collection of epigrams (Cicuta) and comic tales, a work on oratory, an epic (Amazonis), and erotic elegies.

Marsyas (mär'si-ās). In Greek mythology, a satyr (or in some accounts a Phrygian or a peasant) follower of Cybele who was defeated by Apollo in a musical contest in the following manner: Athena had made a flute which she played at a banquet of the gods. Although the music was beautiful, Hera and Aphrodite could not stop laughing. Athena then played beside a stream. She saw from the reflection of her face in the water how playing the flute distorted her features, and threw away the flute with a curse on the person who picked it up. Marsyas found it and when he put it to his lips the flute played by itself, remembering the sweet strains Athena had drawn from it. Marsyas was delighted and went about the land entertaining the natives. He became so proud of his music-making that he declared Apollo himself could not do better. This boast came to the ears of Apollo, and the god challenged Marsyas to a contest, with the Muses acting as judges. As the Muses could not choose a victor, Apollo turned his lyre upside down and continued to play sweet hymns to the gods. Marsyas could not draw any sounds at all from his flute in an upside down position and the Muses awarded Apollo the victory. For his presumption in vying with a god Apollo flayed Marsyas alive and fastened his skin to a tree near the river in Phrygia which bears his name. Some even say the river was formed from the tears which the nymphs and satyrs shed over his death.

Martial (mär'shāl). [Full Latin name, Marcus Valerius Martialis.] Latin poet, born at Bilbilis, Spain, c40 A.D.; died in Spain, c104. In the reign of Nero he went to Rome to study law, but instead took up writing poetry. He was a friend of Juvenal and Quintilian and worked under the patronage of Titus, Domitian, and other influential persons. Even so, when he returned to Spain (98) he was impoverished, but won wealthy patrons in his own land. With mordant wit he described the low moral tone of his times, but he was abjectly sycophantic when he dealt with his patrons in high places. His 14 books of epigrams (86–98 A.D.) contain sharp pictures of the degenerate life of his time and formed the model for later epigrammatists.

Masinissa or Massinissa (mas-i-nis'a). King of Numidia, born c240 B.C.; died 149 B.C. He fought as ally of the Carthaginians in Spain, but later went over to the Romans. As an ally of Rome he served (204–203 B.C.) with Scipio against Syphax. Syphax was defeated and his capital fell, one of the prisoners being his queen Sophonisba, who had once been betrothed to Masinissa. Scipio refused to sanction their marriage and, rather than see Sophonisba paraded in triumph through Rome, Masinissa sent her a bowl of poison which she drank. He later served (202 B.C.) at Zama, the decisive battle of the Second Punic War. He became (201 B.C.) ruler of all Numidia and ruled in peace for 50 years.

Massagetae (mas-aj'e-ti). In ancient times, a large tribe, thought by some to be a branch of the Scythians, dwelling beyond the Caspian and Aral Seas. Their dress was similar to the Scythians, according to the description of Herodotus, and like the Scythians they fought on horseback as well as afoot, with bows, spears, and battle-axes. Their land abounded in gold, which they used to adorn their heads, girdles, and breastbands, and with which they adorned the bridles and bits of their horses. They used bronze for their spears and arrow-heads, and made bronze breastplates for their horses. Among the Massagetae each man took a wife, but wives were shared in common by a simple device; when a man desired another woman, he hung his quiver above her wagon and this gave him license to embrace her as he pleased. The Massagetae considered it a great calamity to die of sickness or infirmity. Their custom was, if a man survived battle and lived to a great age, for the relatives of an aged man to come together and slay him, and a number of his cattle as well. The flesh of man and cattle was cooked together and eaten by his survivors. The Massagetae worshiped the sun above all gods and sacrificed horses to the sun, on the principle that the swiftest of gods must be honored with the swiftest of creatures. A warlike, nomadic tribe, they sowed no crops but lived on meat, milk, and fish. They drove the Scythians across the Rha River (Volga) into the land of the Cimmerians, who in their turn were pushed out by the Scythians. Cyrus the Great attacked the Massagetae, who were led by their queen Tomyris, and according to the general account met his death fighting them.

Massicus (mas'i-kus), Mons. [Modern Italian name, Monte Massico.] In ancient geography, a range of hills on the border of Campania and Latium, Italy. It was famous for its wines.

Massilia (ma-sil'i-a). [Greek, Massalia; now, Marseilles.] An ancient Greek colony in southern France. It was founded by Phocaeans c600 B.C., and, according to legend, was visited by Heracles when he went to fetch the cattle of Geryon.

Massinissa (mas-i-nis'a). See Masinissa.

Massylians (ma-sil'i-anz), or Massyli (ma-sil'i). A people of the northern part of Numidia. In the Aeneid, they are mentioned as noted horsemen who lived near Dido's Carthage.

Matera (ma-te'ra). Town in S Italy, situated above a steep ravine about 37 miles W of Tarentum. It was of strategic importance because of its location, and was occupied by Hannibal and then by the Romans. In the vicinity are found numerous prehistoric remains and caves.

Mater Matuta (ma'ter ma-tu'ta). See Matuta.

Mater Turrita (tu-ri'ta). A Roman name for Cybele. It comes from the mural or turreted crown in the form of a miniature city wall, which Cybele was often represented as wearing.

Matralia (ma-tra'li-a). In ancient Rome, an annual festival celebrated on June 11 only by the citizen matrons in honor of the goddess Mater Matuta. The goddess was associated with the Greek goddess Leucothea, and the rites commemorated incidents of the Leucothea myths. In the performance of the sacred rites the women led a female servant into the sanctuary, flogged her, and drove her out again. This commemorated the persecution of Ino (who was later transformed into Leucothea by Zeus), by her husband's second wife. During the celebration of the Matralia the women embraced their nephews and nieces rather than their own children, in Matronalia (mat-rō-nā'li-ā). In Roman antiquity, a festival celebrated by matrons on the first of March in honor of Juno.

Mattiaci (ma-tī'a-sī). Ancient Germanic tribe, a branch of the Chatti (first mentioned by Pliny), in the Taunus region, southward to the Moenus (Main) River, near Aquae Mattiacae (Wiesbaden). The Mattiaci are mentioned by Tacitus as being a people of keen spirit, but "dutiful to Rome."

Matuta (ma-tū'ta). [Also: Mater Matuta.] In Roman mythology, a goddess of birth, associated with Janus. She has been interpreted also as an old goddess of dawn, but no mythology supports this. Her festival, the Matralia, (q.v.) was celebrated on June 11 by Roman matrons.

Mauretania (mô-re-tā'ni-ā). [Also: Mauritania.] In ancient geography, the NW part of Africa, corresponding to the N parts of Morocco and of W and C Algeria. Juba II of Numidia was confirmed (25 B.C.) king of Mauretania by Augustus. It was annexed (42 A.D.) to the Roman Empire by Claudius, and was divided into the provinces Mauretania Tingitana in the W and Mauretania Caesariensis in the E.

Mausoleum (mô-sō-lē'um). A magnificent tomb at Halicarnassus (Budrum) in SW Asia Minor, built for Mausolus, king of Caria, and his sister, wife, and queen, Artemisia, begun before Mausolus' death in 353 B.C. The names of the architects, Pythius and Satyrus, have been recorded, along with those of four famous sculptors, Bryaxis, Leochares, Scopas, and Timotheus. Vitruvius and Pliny have left summary descriptions from which it appears that the Mausoleum consisted of a colonnade, square in plan, surmounted by a pyramid, the latter crowned by a platform on which rested a marble four-horse chariot with statues of Mausolus and Artemisia by Pythius. Ancient critics acclaimed the whole as a great masterpiece and classed it among the seven wonders of the ancient world, so that thereafter any conspicuous monumental tomb might be called a mausoleum. The British Museum contains remains of three friezes and abundant other sculptures. (JJ)

Mausolus (mô-sō'lus). King or dynast of Caria, who died 353 B.C. He first appears in history in the revolt of the satraps against Artaxerxes II (Artaxerxes Mnemon) in 362 B.C. He married his sister Artemisia, who after his death completed at Halicarnassus the celebrated monument named after him, the Mausoleum. A Greek statue of Mausolus from the Mausoleum (352 B.C.) is in the British Museum.

Mavors (mā'vōrs). An old Latin name of Mars.

Maximus (mak'si-mus). A title, "greatest," given to Fabius, surnamed Rullianus, and to his descendants, the most illustrious of whom was Fabius Cunctator. Fabius Rullianus, who died about 290 B.C., was a consul and general, who distinguished himself in the Third War against the Samnites, over whom he gained the decisive victory of Sentinum in 295 B.C.

Maximus, Quintus Fabius. See Fabius Maximus, Quintus.

Maxyes (mak'si-ēz). Libyan tribe mentioned in ancient geography, situated in the eastern part of what is now Tunisia. As depicted on the Egyptian monuments and as described by Herodotus, its members let their hair grow long on the right side of their heads, shaved it close on the left, and painted their bodies red.

Mechaneus (mē-kā'nūs). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Contriver." An image of Zeus Mechaneus at Argos was the spot, some say, where the Argives who set out against Troy took an oath that they would continue to prosecute war until they either took Troy or died in the attempt. This image, with images of Artemis and Athena, was set on a bronze vessel in which, some say, the bones of Tantalus were held. According to Pausanias, these must have been the bones of that Tantalus who was married to Clytemnestra and was slain by Agamemnon. The bones of the Tantalus who was the friend of the gods and who was slain for abusing their friendship, rested in a tomb on Mount Sipylus.

Mecisteus (me-sis'tūs). In Greek legend, a brother of Adrastus, king of Argos. He is sometimes named as one of the Seven against Thebes. His son Euryalus the Argonaut was among the Epigoni who successfully attacked Thebes and avenged their fathers.

was away at the Trojan War, Meda was falsely informed that he had taken a concubine whom he was planning to bring back to Crete as his new queen. In a rage of jealousy Meda thereupon took Leucus as her lover. This led to her disaster, for shortly thereafter Leucus murdered her and her daughter, and seized the throne of Crete.

Medea (mē-dē'a). In mythology, a daughter of Aeëtes, king of Aea in Colchis, and Idyia. She was the granddaughter of Helius, and was noted as a sorceress, skilled in the use of drugs and poisons. To aid Jason, who had come to Colchis to secure the Golden Fleece and restore it to Hellas, Hera and Athena appealed to Aphrodite. Aphrodite bribed her son, Eros, to pierce Medea's heart with one of his arrows at the instant when her eyes fell on Jason as he entered her father's courtyard. Out of loyalty to her father and her country Medea tried to resist the surge of love for Jason which overwhelmed her, but she was powerless, as Hera and Athena had meant her to be; she yielded to her love and betrayed her father. She met Jason at night in the grove of Hecate. On coming face to face with the object of her love she was nearly speechless. But in return for his oath in the name of Hecate to take her away with him and to marry her, she told him how he could fulfill the task her father had set for him. She gave him the charm of Prometheus, an ointment which would render him and his weapons invulnerable for one day. This would protect him from the fire-breathing bulls that Aeëtes had commanded him to yoke. Once the bulls were yoked he must plow the field and sow the dragon's teeth in the furrows. Armed men would spring up from the dragon's teeth, she said, and he must hurl a stone among them, whereupon they would set to fighting among themselves until all were dead. The next day Jason followed her instructions to the letter, and all turned out as she had predicted. He performed the task Aeëtes had set for him, on the successful completion of which Aeëtes had promised to give him the Golden Fleece. Aeëtes, however, was in a furious rage. He knew well that Jason could not have accomplished this trial of his courage without Medea's help. He planned to seize and destroy Jason, burn the Argo, and attack the Argonauts. Medea learned of her father's intention. She hurriedly sent for Jason, went with him to the orchard of Ares where the Golden Fleece was hanging, lulled the dragon that guarded it while Jason snatched the Fleece, and together they fled to the Argo and hurriedly put to sea. According to some accounts, Apsyrtus, the young brother of Medea, accompanied them; Medea slew him and cast the pieces of his dismembered body into the sea. Aeëtes, pursuing the Argonauts with a fleet, stopped to gather up the fragments of his son's body, and was soon out-distanced by the Argo. Other accounts say that Apsyrtus did not accompany Medea, but that he commanded a ship in pursuit of her. Jason would have surrendered Medea in violation of his oath to her. She persuaded him to adopt a different course. She sent word to her brother that she wished to return to Colchis with him, and arranged to meet him at a temple in a lonely grove. Apsyrtus met her at the appointed spot and as they talked, Jason leaped out from ambush and killed Apsyrtus. In either case, Medea's passion for Jason led to her brother's death. After suffering many hardships in their voyage, the Dodonian oak which Athena had placed in the hull of the Argo spoke and informed them that their woes would not cease until Jason and Medea had been purified by Circe for the murder of Apsyrtus. Accordingly, they proceeded to Circe's isle and were purified. They next successfully passed the isle of the Sirens as well as Scylla and Charybdis, and came to the island of the Phaeacians. Here they were received by Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, and here the Colchians, still pursuing Medea, caught up with the Argonauts. Again, Jason would have surrendered Medea. She appealed to Arete, wife of King Alcinous. That worthy queen persuaded her husband to make a decision: if Medea was still a chaste maiden, he would restore her to her father; he would not separate husband and wife. A marriage was hastily arranged. To marriage music supplied by Orpheus, Jason and Medea were married in a cave, which became known as the sacred cave of Medea. The Golden Fleece and flowers decorated the marriage couch. The frustrated Colchians abandoned their pursuit. When the Argo at last came in sight of the mainland of Greece a disastrous storm overtook it and lashed the ship for days. It was swept onto the shoals of Syrtis, and then borne on a great wave into the desert near the Tritonian Lake, where it was left high and dry. The Argonauts, encouraged by nymphs, placed their ship on rollers and propelled it over the desert to the Tritonian Lake. From there Triton guided them back to the sea. In the last stage of the journey the Argo sailed by Crete where, according to some accounts, Medea slew Talos, the bronze man who guarded the island, by pulling out the pin in his ankle which stoppered the life-giving ichor in his body.

suicide. No one knew of the successful return of the Argo, and Jason resolved to take advantage of surprise to kill Pelias and seize the throne, which was rightfully his anyway. Medea offered to get rid of Pelias by her own arts and, as had happened so many times, Jason was more than willing to let Medea do it. Medea appeared to the daughters of Pelias and informed them that she would make their father young again. To prove her powers she transformed an old ram into a skipping lamb by cutting up its body and boiling it in a cauldron with magic herbs. The daughters of Pelias were convinced by this demonstration and followed Medea's in-

By the time the Argo landed at Pagasae, the port from which it had originally sailed, King Pelias, who had sent Jason for the Golden Fleece, thought that he and his companions had all perished on the voyage, as he had hoped they would do. He had forced Aeson, father of Jason, to die by drinking bull's blood, and had killed Jason's young brother. Jason's mother had committed structions. They approached their father as he slept under the influence of one of Medea's drugs, and cut his throat. They then cut him into pieces which they boiled in the cauldron. But Medea had put no magic herbs in this cauldron, and Pelias was irretrievably dead. His daughters, with the most loving intentions, had become his murderers. According to another story, when Jason and Medea returned to Iolcus, they found Aeson alive, but weak and old. Jason asked Medea to take some of the years he might expect to live from him, and give them to his father. Medea assured him she could do better than this. She swept off in a winged chariot drawn by dragons and disappeared for nine days. In this time she had no contact with mortals, but spent her time collecting drugs and herbs known only to her and Hecate. At the end of the period she returned, sacrificed to Hecate, and cast Aeson into a deep sleep. She cut his throat, letting all the aged blood drain out, dismembered his body, and boiled the pieces in a cauldron in a liquid prepared from the magic herbs she had gathered. Aeson emerged from the cauldron restored to the physical condition he had enjoyed 40 years before. On seeing the magic restoration of Aeson, the daughters of Pelias begged Medea to do the same for their father. Medea agreed. But as noted before, Medea put no magic herbs into the cauldron with Pelias' body. After the death of Pelias, Jason seized the throne, but fearing vengeance he resigned it to Acastus, son of Pelias, and went with Medea to Corinth, where they lived happily for ten years, and Medea was highly thought of by the Corinthians. At the end of that time Jason decided to abandon Medea and their children, seven boys and seven girls, according to some accounts, and marry Glauce (or Creusa), daughter of King Creon of Corinth. Medea was in a frenzy when she learned of this proposal. She pleaded with Jason not to make a mockery of her love, and not to violate his sacred oath. She reminded him of all she had done for his sake—betrayed her father, killed her brother and Pelias, helped him to win the respect of the Corinthians, to say nothing of having borne him many children. Jason was obdurate. He offered to make some provision for Medea and their children but persisted in his plan to marry Glauce. Medea plotted a horrible revenge that would cause Jason great suffering and discredit him with the Corinthians. Pretending that she finally saw the wisdom of his plan, she sent Glauce a magnificent robe and chaplet as a wedding gift. The instant Glauce donned them, she was consumed to ashes. Creon, attempting to rescue his daughter, was destroyed by the flames which shot out from her body. The people of Corinth, in a raging desire for vengeance, seized the children of Medea from the altar in Hera's temple where they had gone as suppliants, and stoned them to death. For this reason, in expiation, each year thereafter seven boys and girls, with shaven heads and clad in black garments, were sent to spend a year in Hera's temple. Jason was scorned for having broken his oath to Medea, and reviled for the consequences of his broken oath. He wandered forlornly about Greece until his death. Euripides, some say bribed by the Corinthians to hide their own dishonor, wrote that Medea herself killed her children, as the worst possible revenge on Jason. Aegeus, king of Athens, had passed through Corinth, and had promised Medea sanctuary should she ever need it. In return she had promised to give him a son by her magic arts. She now fled from Corinth in a winged chariot drawn by dragons, which was sent to her rescue by Helius. Some say she went first to Thebes, where she cured Heracles of his madness. She then went to Athens, where Aegeus received her kindly, as he had promised, and married her. All went well until Theseus, the son of Aegeus, came to his father's court. Aegeus did not know his son, who had been born and brought up in Troezen. But Medea instantly recognized him, and feared him as a rival of her own son, Medeus. She prepared a wine-cup, poisoned it with aconite and prevailed on Aegeus to give it to the unknown youth. At the last instant Aegeus recognized the sword the young man was carrying as his own, and realized that this young stranger was his son. Medea fled; some say that Aegeus even provided an escort for her in gratitude for giving him the son as she had promised. With her she took Medeus, who some say was her son by Aegeus and others say was the only one of her children by Jason to escape the wrath of the Corinthians after the murders of Glauce and Creon. According to some accounts, she went to Italy after leaving Athens, and taught the tribes the art of snake-charming. At last she learned that her uncle Perses had seized her father's kingdom. She went to Colchis, taking Medeus with her, brought about the death of Perses, and restored Aeëtes to his throne. Medeus conquered additional territory for the kingdom and gave his name to the Medes. Some say that Medea was made immortal by Hera, because she had repulsed the advances of Zeus, and that she went to the Elysian Fields. There she married Achilles and lived as a queen.

Medea. Tragedy of Euripides, produced 431 B.C. It deals with Medea's passionate reaction to Jason's decision to abandon her and her children and marry Glauce, the daughter of King Creon of Corinth.

The scene is before Medea's house in Corinth near the palace of the king. A nurse mourns the day when Jason sailed to Colchis, won the love of Medea, and caused her to use her supernatural powers against her own father in order to help him. Now all the love is turned to hate, for Jason has betrayed Medea and taken a royal bride, Glauce, the daughter of King Creon. In vain Medea reminded him of his promises and of all she had done for him. Now she has given herself up to grief and is like a stone, except when she thinks of her father and her native land. Even her children have become hateful to her. The nurse knows her well and is fearful of what she may do in her ungovernable wrath. The man who incurs it cannot think he will escape lightly.

Medea's children come in with a tutor, who tells the nurse he has heard Jason is preparing to yield to his new father-in-law's demand that he send Medea and her children out of Corinth. The nurse cannot believe he would be so treacherous, but asks the tutor to keep the children out of their mother's sight. She has seen Medea eyeing them savagely. From inside Medea is heard cursing her children and their father Jason, and calling down ruin on his house. The nurse shudders. She cannot understand why the children must share in their father's crime. She grieves for them, and notes that the high-born cannot easily change their moods. As for her, she would rather live to old age in security and with moderation than share the splendors and agonies of high birth.

A chorus of Corinthian women enters. They have heard Medea's cries and grieve for the sorrows of a house they have come to love. As they hear Medea long for death and revenge and call on Themis, goddess of justice, to bring Jason and his bride to destruction, they cluck among themselves at her lack of restraint. They advise the nurse to bring her out that they may give her the benefit of their advice. Medea comes out and justifies her grief to the Corinthian ladies. All she asks of them is their silence if she can devise a way to avenge herself on Jason, and on the king who gave him his daughter. The ladies agree to keep silent, for they think justice is on her side.

King Creon comes and orders Medea and her children into exile. He banishes the already homeless one because he fears her, and the evil she may do his daughter with her sorceries. She answers that she has been given a bad reputation, and begs him not to fear her. It is her husband she hates, but as for Creon, she wishes him prosperity and asks to be allowed to remain. He agrees, against his better judgment, to let her stay one more day to arrange her affairs, but then she must go.

When the chorus commiserates with her after Creon's departure, she answers that all is not yet lost, she will find a way to avenge herself on Jason and his bride. She swears by Hecate to destroy them both, and the king too. She, the daughter of a king and a granddaughter of Helios, will not be made an object of scorn by those of a lesser race.

Jason comes and berates her for the wild words that, he says, have caused Creon to exile her. He doesn't care what she says about him, but it was a mistake to include the king in her angry denunciation. She might have stayed in comfort if she had kept her temper. Now he has come to help her to prepare for her journey into exile, for though she hates him, he has no hard feelings toward her.

Medea reviles him. She recites the whole story: how she helped him to yoke the fiery bulls, slew the dragon, betrayed her father, killed her own brother, and slew his old enemy Pelias when they returned with the Golden Fleece to Iolcus. All these terrible deeds she committed for love of him. He has broken his oaths of faithfulness to her and has rewarded her by abandoning her and her children. And where can she go now, having betrayed her native land for his sake? Jason is irritated by her claim that it was to her he owed his safety and success. But whether or no, Medea has had many advantages: she lives in Hellas, a civilized land of law instead of in barbarian Colchis. His marriage to the king's daughter will bring a powerful friend to her and to her children. It was a great step for him, an exile from Iolcus, to marry the daughter of the king of Corinth. He tries to convince her it was policy, not lack of love for her, that brought about his marriage. It was all done with the well-being of Medea and her children in mind. Medea scorns his arguments, and refuses his offers of help. Jason calls all to witness that he has done his best and departs.

Seeing the rage to which her former love for Jason has brought Medea, the chorus asks to be spared the shafts that cause such jealousy and wrath. As Medea sits before the house in despair, Aegeus, king of Athens, enters with his retinue. He is on his way from the oracle, where he sought to learn if he would ever have a son. Medea tells him the reason for her sad state. She asks him to receive her in his country, and promises that she will work her spells so that he will have a son. Aegeus says he will not take her away by force, for Corinth is his ally, but if she can reach his country by herself, he will receive her and be her champion.

Now that she is assured of asylum, Medea plots her revenge. She will destroy Creon, Glauce, and her own children. The chorus implores her not to slay her children. Medea sends for Jason. When he comes, she asks to be forgiven for the harsh words she had spoken. She has thought it over, she says, and decided he was right. She repents of her rage, and calls the children out to say goodbye to their father. Jason is gratified that she has apparently come to her senses. He promises to have the welfare of the children always in mind. She gives the children a robe and a golden chaplet and instructs them to present these gifts to the princess. She asks Jason and the children to plead with Creon and his daughter to allow them, at least, to remain in Corinth.

When the children return with their tutor to say they have presented the gifts to Glauce and that their prayer to remain in Corinth has been granted, Medea is gloomier than ever. She knows now, since the gifts have been delivered, that she must slay her children. As she talks to them, her love for them almost sways her from her dark purpose but she hardens her heart. If she doesn't kill them, the Corinthians will when they learn how she has slain Glauce and Creon. With a cry that she fully understands the fearful deed to which she is being driven by rage, she takes the children into the house. Almost immediately she returns. A messenger comes from the palace and tells her to fly, for the princess had put on the robe and chaplet and has been consumed by the poison Medea's sorcery had embedded in them. Medea asks to hear the details, and learns that Creon, trying to help his daughter, was also destroyed by the poison. Now she will take the final step. She enters the house and murders her children. The chorus, mourning for them, yet cannot decide to go to their assistance. Jason comes rushing up. He has learned of the death of Creon and Glauce and wants to save his children from the wrath of the Corinthians. He cannot believe the chorus when they tell him Medea has killed them. He longs to kill her. She appears above the house, riding in a chariot drawn by winged dragons, sent by Helios to save her. She has the bodies of her children with her, and refuses to deliver them to Jason for burial. She will bury them herself, where their tombs cannot be defiled. As for Jason, she predicts a long, unhappy life for him and an inglorious end. Though the death of her children brings great grief to her, she is satisfied that Jason's is more grievous. He has earned suffering, for he is a breaker of oaths and of the laws of hospitality. She leaves in her chariot to go to the asylum King Aegeus had promised her.

Medes (mēdz). Inhabitants of Media, ancient country in what is now NW Iran. They first appear in history as Amadai in 836 B.C., when Shalmaneser, the Assyrian conqueror, received tribute from them. In 715 and 713 B.C. Sargon subjected them. In the second half of the 7th century they won their independence and were united under a single dynasty. The Medes were eventually defeated by the Persians under Cyrus, and absorbed into the Persian Empire. According to legend, the Medes were the descendants of Medeus, the son of Medea, who added the territory which they occupied to his grandfather's kingdom of Colchis, after Medea fled with Medeus from Athens and returned to Asia.

Medeus (mē'dē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Medea by Aegeus, king of Athens, to whom Medea fled after Jason abandoned her. Medea's plot to poison Theseus, the heir of Aegeus, was thwarted and she fled to Asia, taking Medeus with her. Together they killed Perses and restored Aeëtes, Medea's father, to the throne of Colchis. Medeus enlarged the kingdom and gave his own name to his new subjects, the Medes. According to other accounts, Medeus was Medea's oldest son and his father was Jason. He was educated by Chiron. Still others say he was the son of an Asiatic king whom Medea married after she fled from Aegeus and Athens.

Media (mē'di-a). Ancient country comprising the NW part of the Iranian highland, extending from the Caspian Sea to the Araxes (modern Aras). It was bounded on the NE by Hyrcania, on the E by Parthia, on the S by Susiana and Persis, and on the W by Assyria. It nearly corresponded to the modern Iranian regions of Azerbaijan, Ardilan, and Iraq Ajemi. Later the SE part of the country was called Great Media, and the NW, or Atropatene, Little Media. The Medes (Hebrew and Assyrian, Madaï; Old Persian, Mada) are enumerated in Gen. x. 2 as among the descendants of Japheth; and they, together with the Persians, constituted the most important and powerful Indo-European population in W Asia. It is assumed that the country was originally settled by another (perhaps Turanian) tribe, and that the Medes gradually advanced from the NE to the W and SW. Media came into contact with Assyria at least as early as the end of the 9th century B.C., when it is mentioned as a conquered and tributary land. Tiglath-pileser III was the first Assyrian king who annexed Median territory; and Sargon II transplanted Israelitish war captives to Median cities, and claims in his annals of 713 B.C. to have received tribute from 45 Median chiefs. Sennacherib also received tribute from the Medes. Under Esarhaddon the Medes entered into alliance with the Mineans and the Cimmerians against Assyria, apparently without success. But from that time the Medes grew more united and more powerful against tyrannical Assyria. The Assyrians had held Upper Asia from 1229–709 B.C. when the Medes successfully revolted, shook off Assyrian rule, and became self-governing. But their land was torn by robbery and lawlessness. According to Herodotus, Deïoces (c709–656 B.C.) made himself king of the Medes by following such a course of scrupulous justice in settling disputes and punishing the lawless that his name spread from his own village throughout the area, and he was requested by the Medes to become their king and restore law and order. Deïoces accepted the throne, demanded a palace for himself and a personal bodyguard, and caused the strongly fortified city of Ecbatana (or Agbatana) to be built. To widen the distance between himself and ordinary men and to increase the respect in which he was held, he made himself inaccessible to those who sought his favor or counsel, organized an elaborate ceremony for his audiences, and, having secured his power, ruled justly and consolidated the Medes into a nation. At his death he was succeeded by his son Phraortes (reigned 647–625 B.C. or, as some think, 678–625 B.C.). Phraortes attacked the Persians and brought them under his sway. He extended his conquests over lesser neighboring tribes, and at last attacked Assyria, but died in the expedition after a reign of 22 years (or, as some think, 53 years). He was succeeded by his son Cyaxares (625–584 B.C.), who was even more warlike than his predecessors and organized his confused forces into systematic companies. Cyaxares marched against Nineveh to complete the attack his father had begun, but was diverted from the expedition when Media was attacked and overrun by the Scythians. For 28 years thereafter the Scythians dominated Asia. At the end of that time Cyaxares regained control, expelled the Scythians, and recovered his empire. After the Scythians had been driven out, the Medes, in alliance with the Babylonian Nabopolassar, advanced once more against Nineveh, and brought about its downfall (612 B.C.). In the division of the Assyrian Empire, Assyria proper and Mesopotamia as far as Haran fell to Media, which, however, could not develop into a dominant power on account of the rise of the new Babylonian Empire under Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar. Under Cyaxares the Medes made war on Alyattes, king of the Lydians, because the Lydians refused to give up some Scythians who had fled as suppliants to the Lydians from the Medes. The war went on for five years, with neither side gaining an overall victory, although each side had won individual battles. One day (May 28, 585 B.C.) in the midst of the fighting, the sun was suddenly darkened; day became night. Alarmed by this omen (an eclipse of the sun, which had been foretold by Thales of Miletus), both sides sought peace. The matter was handed over to outside mediators and peace was arranged. To seal the peace, the daughter of Alyattes was given in marriage to Astyages, the son of Cyaxares. After a reign of 40 years Cyaxares died and was succeeded by this son. Astyages became the grandfather of Cyrus and was overthrown by him (550 B.C.), after which the fate of Media was bound up in that of Persia. Still it seemed to have preserved a kind of independence or particularism while united to Persia. Thus, the Old Testament writings speak of an empire of "the Persians and Medes." Only the Book of Daniel seems to assume the existence of a Median empire between the last Babylonian king, Nabonidus (Belshazzar), and Cyrus. After the destruction of the Persian Empire and in the division of Alexander's conquered territories Media fell to Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian monarchy, and later to the Parthian Empire. The old Medes were, according to the classical writers, a warlike people; in Isa. xiii. they are described as hard and cruel. The religion of the Medes was, according to Strabo, the same as that of the Persians, i.e., dualism. They worshiped, besides the sun-god Mithras, the moon, a goddess corresponding to Aphrodite, fire, the earth, winds, and water. The oldest capital of Media was Rhagae, on the site of modern Tehran. Deïoces moved the capital to his new city of Ecbatana (modern Hamadan), in the W part of the country, which remained the summer residence of the Persian and Parthian kings. To Media belonged also Behistun (ancient Baghistan), famous from the trilingual cuneiform inscription discovered there.

Tigris to the Euphrates, built as a defense of Babylonia.

Mediolanum (mē-di-ō-lā'num). [Modern name, Milano; English, Milan.] In ancient geography, a town of the Insubres, in Cisalpine Gaul, situated in the plain between the Addua and Ticinus rivers. It was taken (222 B.C.) by the Romans under Scipio, and fell under Roman dominion permanently in 194 B.C.

Mediterranean Sea (med'i-tē-rā'nē-ān). [Latin, Mare Internum, Mare Mediterraneum.] Sea, the most important extension of the Atlantic, separating Europe on the N from Africa on the S, and communicating with the Atlantic Ocean by the Strait of Gibraltar, and with the Black Sea by the Dardanelles, Sea of Marmara, and Bosphorus. It is divided into two major basins, the western reaching from Gibraltar to Sicily and Tunisia, and the eastern from there to Syria. Its chief branches are the Tyrrhenian Sea, Ionian Sea, Adriatic Sea, and Aegean Sea. The chief islands are the Balearic Islands, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, Malta, the Ionian Islands, Crete, Cyprus, and the Dodecanese Islands. The chief tributary rivers are the Ebro, Rhône, Po, and Nile. The Mediterranean has an important influence on the climate of the surrounding islands; it has given its name to a type of climate which characterizes these lands, with hot, sunny, dry summers and mild winters. Most of the rainfall occurs in autumn, winter, and early spring. The lands surrounding the Mediterranean basin are generally mountainous, and this enhances the scenery, already famous because of the brilliant blue of the skies and the water. The water of the Mediterranean is about ten percent more saline than that of the oceans. Tides are small; the connection with the Atlantic at the Strait of Gibraltar is only about nine miles wide. Each of the two major basins has a deep zone; the greatest known depth of the E Mediterranean, W of Crete, is about 14,450 feet; of the W Mediterranean (Tyrrhenian Sea), about 12,240 feet. Length, about 2200 miles; greatest width of sea proper, about 700 miles; area, about 963,600 square miles; average depth, about 4890 feet.

stepmother's brother, and from there joined the Greeks in the war against Troy. When Philoctetes had to be left behind because of a snake bite which could not be cured, Medon took his place as captain of the Phthians. He was slain by Aeneas.

Medon. In the Odyssey, a herald of Penelope's suitors and a supporter of Odysseus. He warned Penelope that the suitors were lying in wait for Telemachus with the intention of capturing and slaying him as he returned from his voyage to Pylus. Because of this friendly deed Odysseus spared Medon, when he returned and slew the suitors and their servants.

her head, he attacked her with averted face, seeing only her reflection in the shield of Athena, who also guided his hand. From the decapitated body of Medusa, Pegasus and Chrysaor, the children of Poseidon, sprang full-grown. Perseus later gave the head to Athena, who used it on her aegis. According to some accounts, Athena also flayed Medusa's body and used the skin for her aegis; and drained the blood from the body and divided it with Asclepius. Athena used the blood to bring about war and death. Asclepius used his half to heal, and even to restore life. When Heracles went to the Underworld to fetch Cerberus, all the spirits fled in terror from him except fierce Medusa and valiant Meleager. In Roman mythology Medusa was said to have been, by Vulcan, the mother of the half-human giant Cacus.

Medusa (mē-dū'sa, -za). In Greek mythology, one of the three Gorgons, daughters of Ceto and Phorcys, who dwelt in Libya. Medusa, the only one of the three who was mortal, was originally a beautiful maiden who was transformed into a hideous winged monster by Athena because with Poseidon she had violated one of the temples of that goddess. Her hair was changed into writhing serpents and her face was so fearful to look upon that whoever saw it was changed into stone. Accordingly, when Perseus sought her to cut off her head, he attacked her with averted face, seeing only her reflection in the shield of Athena, who also guided his hand.

Megacles (meg'a-klēz). An Athenian noble of the Alcmaeonid family. He was archon at the time of the uprising of Cylon (c632 B.C.) and was responsible for the death of the followers of Cylon in violation of a pledge to spare their lives if they surrendered. For violating the oath and insulting the gods, Megacles and the Alcmaeonids were tried for sacrilege, their property was confiscated, and they were driven into perpetual exile. The bodies of those Alcmaeonids who had died between the time of the murders and the sentencing for sacrilege were dug up and reburied outside the city. Although the curse on the Alcmaeonids was not allowed to be forgotten for over 200 years, members of the family returned to Athens under an amnesty enacted by Solon.

Megacles. An Athenian noble, son of Alcmaeon. He lived in the 6th century B.C. He married Agariste, daughter of Cleisthenes of Sicyon, who bore him Cleisthenes, future ruler of Athens, and Hippocrates, later grandfather of Pericles. He was the leader of the party of the Coast in Athens, in opposition to Lycurgus, leader of the Plain. While they contended, Pisistratus at the head of a third party, the Hill, gained control. After a period of struggle in which Pisistratus was driven into exile, Megacles agreed to aid Pisistratus to return on condition that the latter marry his daughter. Pisistratus agreed and gained control of Athens a second time. However, as he already had two sons, and as the Alcmaeonids were under a curse for having slain the followers of Cylon, he refused to have children by the daughter of Megacles. Megacles was furious when he learned of this insult. He allied himself to the enemies of Pisistratus and drove him into exile a second time. But when Pisistratus was again restored (c544 B.C.), the Alcmaeonids fled and their property was seized.

Megaera (me-jě'ra). In late Greek mythology, one of the three Erinyes, or Eumenides, born of the blood of Uranus which fell on Gaea when Cronus mutilated him. Megaera was called "the Jealous One."

Megalesian Games (meg-a-lě'shan). In Roman antiquity, a magnificent festival with a stately procession, feasting, and scenic performances in the theaters, celebrated at Rome in the month of April in honor of Cybele and lasting for six days. The image of this goddess was brought to Rome from Pessinus in Galatia, about 203 B.C., and the games were instituted then or shortly afterward, in consequence of a sibylline oracle promising continual victory to the Romans if due honors were paid to her.

Megalopolis (meg-a-lop'ō-lis). In ancient geography, a city of Arcadia, Greece, situated on the Helisson River, not far from Mount Lycaon. The city was founded by Epaminondas after the battle of Leuctra (371 B.C.), in which he had defeated the Spartans. The new city was intended to form a link (with Messene, also a new city founded by Epaminondas, and with Mantinea) in a chain of strong cities to blockade Sparta. It was built on both banks of the river and was encircled by a double wall. The encircling mountains gave it added protection. The villages and towns of Arcadia were joined in a league, and populations of whole villages and levies from the chief cities (Tegea, Clitor, Mantinea, Orchomenus) were moved to the great new city, whose name means "Great City." The new inhabitants brought their local cults and images with them; altars were set up, temples were raised, a stadium was laid out, and public buildings were erected. The Arcadian cities and villages of the league were to be governed by an assembly in a federal system. The sessions of the assembly were held in the Thersilion. But the great plan of Epaminondas and the Arcadian League for a federal system and a strong city was a failure in practice. The peasants who had moved from their old homes became discontented and returned to their villages. The city was subjected to siege many times and was at last destroyed. When the traveler Pausanias passed that way in the 2nd century A.D. the city lay in ruins. Remains of a large theater, capable of accommodating 20,000 spectators, and of a great sanctuary of Zeus Soter (Savior) have been uncovered. The extraordinary design of the Thersilion, a vast roofed assembly hall whose supporting columns were artfully arranged in lines radiating from the bema (speaker's platform), has evoked the admiration of historians of architecture.

Megamede (meg-a-mě'dē). In Greek legend, the wife of Thespius, king of Thespieae in Boeotia, and the mother of his 50 daughters.

Megapenthes (meg-a-pen'thēz). In Greek legend, a son and successor of Proetus, king of Tiryns. He exchanged kingdoms with Perseus when the latter, in grief over the accidental slaying of his grandfather Acrisius, left Argos. Megapenthes took Argos and Perseus took Tiryns.

Megara/Megara

from succeeding to the throne of Sparta on account of his birth. After the death of Menelaus, Megapenthes and his twin brother, Nicostratus, according to some accounts, forced Helen to flee to Rhodes.

Megara (meg'a-ra). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes. She was given in marriage to Heracles by her father, as a reward to him for conquering Erginus and the Minyans, who had been exacting tribute from the Thebans. Hera, ever jealous because Heracles was the son of Zeus, drove him mad, and in his frenzy he killed his children by Megara. Later, he gave Megara to his beloved nephew, Iolaus, for a wife, because he feared to have more children by her himself after his terrible experience. According to some accounts, Heracles killed Megara also during the spell of madness in which he killed his children.

Megara. Town on the Isthmus of Corinth in central Greece, situated between the Halcyon Sea, the Corinthian Bay, and the Saronic Gulf. The town, whose name is the plural of the Greek word megaron (the great central hall of the bronze-age palaces), is about 21 miles west of Athens. The ancient city, whose early inhabitants were Carians, was situated on the route leading from central Greece to the Peloponnesus. According to ancient tradition, Megara once belonged to Athens, for its king, Pylas, left it to Pandion, king of Athens. Nisus subsequently became king, founded the port of Nisaea, and named the area Nisa after himself. During his reign his land was attacked by Minos, king of Crete, who harried the Greek states that would not join him in a war against Athens to avenge the death of his son, Androgeus. The Boeotians said that Megareus, a son of Poseidon, went to help Nisus in the war, that he was killed and buried on the citadel, and that the place was named Megara for him. But the Megarians themselves, according to tradition, told a different story. They said their land was first ruled by Lelex, who came there from Egypt, and that Sciron, a descendant of Lelex, married a daughter of the Athenian king Pandion. Sciron (later slain by Theseus) struggled with Nisus for the throne of Nisa (Megara). Their dispute was arbitrated by Aeacus, who awarded the throne to Nisus but gave command of the army to Sciron. The Megarians said that Megareus, the son of Poseidon mentioned above, was connected to their history by marriage with Iphinoë, daughter of Nisus, and that he succeeded his father-in-law on the throne and named the kingdom for himself. For the Megarians preferred to forget that their land was ever attacked and destroyed by Minos, as indeed it was. They said that Megareus succeeded Nisus, and that he was in turn succeeded by Alcathous, son of Pelops, who had slain the Cithaeronian lion and married the daughter of Megareus. But their story was intended to cover their shame at their defeat by Minos, for when Alcathous came to Megara from Elis after the Megarians had lost everything in the war with Minos, it was necessary for him to rebuild the walls of the city that had been razed by the Cretans. He raised an altar to the gods called Prodomeis (Previous Builders), and with the help of Apollo built new walls. Near the wall was the stone where Apollo rested his lyre while he helped Alcathous. This stone, when struck by a pebble, gave out the musical note of the lyre. Megara had two citadels, one called Caria, after Car, the son of Phoroneus. Some say Alcmena, on the advice of an oracle, was buried in Megara and that her tomb was here. Hyllus, son of Heracles, slain in a duel with Echemus, was also buried here, as was Hippolyte the Amazon. She fled to Megara after the defeat of her Amazon forces by Theseus and died of a broken heart and was buried in a shield-shaped tomb. Near her tomb was the grave of Tereus. Pandion, who was buried on the Rock of Athena Aethyia (Gannet), had a shrine in Megara, and there were also shrines of Ino, whom the Megarians say was washed ashore in their land and buried after being found by two maidens, and of Iphigenia, who they say died in Megara. Some say Calchas the seer was a Megarian, and that Agamemnon raised a sanctuary of Artemis when he succeeded in persuading Calchas to accompany the Greeks to Troy. Among the many sacred places in Megara was a rock called Anaclethis (Recall) where Demeter called to Persephone when she was searching for her after she had been abducted by Hades. The Megarian women regularly performed a ritual that commemorated this incident of Demeter calling for Persephone. Among the temples of Megara was a temple of Artemis Agrotera and Apollo Agraeus raised by Alcathous in gratitude for his success in killing the Cithaeronian lion, and a temple of Artemis Savior in gratitude for her help in resisting a group of Persians from the forces of Mardonius in the Persian War (480 B.C.). They say that when Codrus was king of Attica the Dorians invaded his kingdom on their way back to the Peloponnesus. They captured Megara and gave it to their Corinthian allies, and thus made it Dorian.

The Megarians were among the first to send out colonies to the Euxine (Black) Sea region. They founded Chalcedon on the Thracian Bosphorus first; then, scolded by the oracle for their blindness, founded Byzantium (667 B.C.) on the opposite and more advantageous shore. The founding of this city that controlled the entrance to the Euxine Sea, assured the penetration of Greek colonists in the region. They also founded Selymbria on the north coast of the Propontis, and Heraclea on the coast of Bithynia. This last, according to legend, had been named Heraclea by Lycus, king of the Mysians, because Heracles had helped him in a war against the Bebryces. The Megarians colonized it in obedience to instructions from the priestess at Delphi. She told them to found a colony on the Pontus (another name for the Black Sea) in a land dedicated to Heracles. In the west the Megarians established the colonies of Hybla Minor (Megara Hyblaea) and Selinus in Sicily. Theagenes, tyrant of Megara (640-600 B.C.), beautified the city and brought water to it by an aqueduct, parts of which remain. His daughter married Cylon, a noble who attempted to seize the citadel at Athens (c632 B.C.). He failed, and in the ensuing wars with Athens Megara was weakened and lost much of its power and influence. Under the inspiration of Solon, the Athenians wrested Salamis from Megara and further weakened it, for this island, in the possession of one, was a threat to the other city. Following a dispute with Corinth, Megara accepted an Athenian garrison and constructed (459 B.C.) the Long Walls that linked the city with her port Nisaea. Shortly afterward, Megara quarreled with the Athenians again and drove out the garrison. In retaliation, Pericles promulgated (432 B.C.) a decree that excluded Megara from Athenian markets. This was a disastrous economic blow. In addition, the Athenians annually ravaged the land and blockaded their coasts. Megara appealed to Sparta, and this was one of the causes of the Peloponnesian Wars, in which Megara served as a battleground for Sparta and Athens. Ultimately, the city fell into the hands of the Macedonians and afterward the Romans controlled it. Megara was the birthplace of Euclid, the founder of the Megarics, or Megarian school of philosophers, and of Theognis, the poet. The Megarians were noted for their gay temperament, and Megara was said to be the birthplace of comedy. The area surrounding Megara is called the Megarís (q.v.) or Megarid.

Megareus (me-gar'ē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Oenope and Hippomenes. He was an ally of Nisus, father of Scylla and ruler of Nisa (afterwards Megara), and married Iphinoë, another daughter of Nisus. Megareus had two sons, one of whom, Euippus, was killed by a lion that was ravaging Mount Cithaeron. Megareus promised his throne and his daughter, Euaechme, to whomever should kill the lion, and gave both to Alcathous who accomplished this deed. Nisa then became known as Megara, after Megareus. He was buried near the acropolis of the city.

Megarics (me-gar'iks). School of Greek philosophy, founded by Euclid of Megara, which combined the ethical doctrines of Socrates and the metaphysics of the Eleatics.

Megarís (meg'ā-ris). In ancient geography, a district in Greece which formed part of the isthmus connecting the Peloponnesus with C Greece and lay SW of Attica and NE of Corinthia. The surface is largely mountainous. Chief town, Megara.

Megaron (meg'ā-ron). The great central hall of the Homeric house or palace. In large houses of this early time there was a megaron for the men and the entertainment of guests, and another, more secluded, for the women of the household. The plan and disposition of such megara, with the ceremonial family hearth in the middle, was clearly exposed in the excavations of Schliemann and Dörpfeld at Tiryns in the Peloponnesus.

Megarus/Melampus

Megarus (meg'ā-rus). In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus who, according to some accounts, was saved from the flood with which Zeus engulfed the world to punish mankind. He was awakened by screaming cranes and fled to Mount Gerania which was not covered by the flood waters.

Megasthenes (mē-gas'thē-nēz). Greek historian, active c300 B.C. He spent considerable time (315-291 B.C.), as the ambassador of his friend and companion the Syrian ruler Seleucus (Seleucus Nicator), to Sandrocottus (Chandragupta), king of the Prasii in India, whose capital was probably near the modern Patna. Based on information he got about the people and the country while he was there, he wrote a geographical and historical work on India which was the chief source of the later Greek information on the subject, especially Arrian's Indica.

Meges (mē'jēz). In the Iliad, a son of Phyleus "the Horseman." He was a nephew of Odysseus and commanded the Epeans against the Trojans. He slew many but was himself saved by wearing his father's mail-plated corselet. As a son of Phyleus he was also spoken of as "Phylides."

Megistias (mē-jis'ti-ās). An Acarnanian seer, said to be a descendant of Melampus. He was in the train of Leonidas at the defense of the pass of Thermopylae (480 B.C.). From observing his sacrificial victims he foresaw the imminent doom of the Greeks. Scouts soon confirmed his deduction with news that the Persians were coming by a path over the mountain to attack the Greeks in the rear. Leonidas gave Megistias permission to retire with the allies when they left him alone with the Spartans and Thespians to resist the Persians. Megistias scorned to desert Leonidas himself, but sent his only son back with the allies. He died along with the Spartans and Thespians in their heroic defence of the pass, and was memorialized by the poet Simonides as follows:

The great Megistias' tomb you here may view,

Whom slew the Medes, fresh from Spercheus' fords.

Well the wise seer the coming death foreknew,

Yet scorned he to forsake his Spartan lords.

Meilichius or Milichius (mī-lik'i-us). Epithet of Zeus. At the altar of Zeus Meilichius (Gracious), near the Cephissus River in Attica, Theseus was purified by the descendants of Phytalus for the slaying of his kinsman Sinis. There was an altar of Zeus Meilichius at Sicyon. The white marble image of Zeus Meilichius at Argos was made by Polyclitus. This image was dedicated as part of the purification for a mass murder. One thousand picked men had been chosen to protect Argos against the continual attacks of Sparta. This elite corps was unbounded in its arrogance toward their fellow countrymen. The leader of the group seized a maiden as she was being conveyed to her bridegroom, carried her off to his camp, and ravished her. While he slept the young woman put out both his eyes and then fled to the people of Argos as a suppliant. The people refused to give her up to the followers of the blinded chief, and a battle between the 1000 men and the people took place, in which the people won and put to death all the 1000 soldiers. The image of Zeus Meilichius by Polyclitus was dedicated as an offering and as part of their purification, for having shed the blood of their kinsmen.

Mela (mē'lā), Pomponius. Roman geographer, born at Tingentera, Spain, and active about the middle of the 1st century A.D. He was the author of De Situ Orbis, or De Chorographia (in three books), a compendium of geography and of manners and customs, based mostly on ancient Greek sources. His geography is in the form of a voyage, starting from North Africa and describing the countries of the then known world as the supposed voyage continued until it ended at West Africa. His is the earliest extant account of the ancient world written in Latin.

Melaenis (me-lē'nis). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of death-in-life, meaning "Black." But some say she was called Melaenis because men invoke her for their love-making at night.

Melampus (me-lam'pus). In Greek mythology, a son of Amythaon of Pylus and Idomene, and the brother of Bias. The brothers went with Neleus when the latter invaded Messene and captured the city of Pylus. According to some accounts Melampus was the first mortal who enjoyed the power of foretelling the future. In his youth he rescued some young serpents whose parents had been killed by servants who wanted to kill the offspring also. Melampus buried the parent serpents. In return the young serpents licked his ears as he slept; and when he awoke he had the power to understand the language of birds and beasts and thus learned many secret things. Furthermore, Apollo taught him the art of augury by means of the entrails of sacrificial victims. Melampus was also said to have been the first to mix wine with water, to build temples to Dionysus and to establish certain mysteries in his honor, and the first to act as a physician. He was strongly attached to his brother Bias. Bias fell in love with Pero, a daughter of Neleus and the sister of Nestor. Neleus, compelled to choose among the many suitors for Pero's hand, agreed to award her to that one who could steal the prize cattle of Phylacus of Phylace, in Thessaly. Melampus agreed to help his brother obtain the cattle and win Pero. By his prophetic powers he learned that whoever tried to steal the cattle would win them as a gift, but only after having served a year in prison. Melampus went to the building where the cattle were housed, prepared to spend a year in prison before he would gain them. The ferocious dog that guarded them gave the alarm and Melampus was captured by the minions of Phylacus and imprisoned. He had been confined exactly a year when he overheard some woodworms talking in the beams of his prison. One of them asked another how much longer they must gnaw at the beams. The other answered that they would have gnawed through the beam by the following morning. Melampus instantly set up a clamor to be removed to another cell, saying the building would collapse before morning. Although his guards scoffed at his story, Phylacus permitted him to be moved. Next day his former prison collapsed as the woodworms finished gnawing through the beams. Phylacus was much impressed by this evidence of Melampus' gift of prophecy. He agreed to free Melampus and give him the cattle if he could cure his son Iphiclus of his childlessness. Melampus undertook to do so. He sacrificed two bulls to Apollo and invited the birds to feast on their carcasses which he left lying on the altars. Two vultures flew down to eat the sacrificial victims. Melampus listened to their speech and learned from it that Iphiclus had been frightened as a child when he watched his father gelding rams and saw him with the bloody knife. Phylacus plunged the knife into the trunk of a tree and ran to comfort his child. Since then Iphiclus had been impotent. The vultures agreed that the only cure for his condition would be to scrape some of the rust from the knife, which remained buried in the tree trunk where Phylacus had thrust it, mix the rust with wine, and give it as a potion to Iphiclus for ten successive days. But the vultures concluded that probably there was no one other than themselves wise enough to employ such a cure. However, Melampus, having overheard them, at once prepared the potion as they had suggested and gave it to Iphiclus. In the course of time he was cured and had a son. Phylacus now willingly gave Melampus his cattle. Melampus gave them to Bias and his grateful brother was able to present them to Neleus and win Pero. Melampus now went to Argos. There the daughters of Proetus, co-king of Argos, were afflicted by madness because they had denied the divinity of Dionysus, and went raging about the countryside. Melampus, at the request of Proetus, offered to cure his daughters in return for one-third of his kingdom. Proetus scorned to accept such a high price. The result was that increasing numbers of the women of Argos were seized with madness and roamed wildly through the mountains. Proetus had no alternative. He went to Melampus and offered to accept his terms. Melampus, seeing Proetus' need had increased, increased his price. He now demanded another third of the kingdom for his brother Bias as the price of curing the Argive women. Proetus had no choice but to agree. Melampus pursued the Argive women and drove them to a well where he purified them. He then pursued the three daughters of Proetus—Lysippe, Iphianassa, and Iphinoë—across Arcadia and overtook the first two near the river Styx. The third, Iphinoë, had died in flight. Melampus married Lysippe, and Bias, whose wife Pero had died, married Iphianassa. Proetus partitioned his kingdom as he had agreed. Melampus was the father of Antiphates, who was the father of Heracles' companion Oicles, and he was the father of Mantius, who in his turn fathered Clitus, carried off by Eos. The family of seers founded by Melampus was known as the Melampodidae. Melanion (mē-lā'ni-on). In Greek legend, a son of Amphi-damas of Arcadia. He is sometimes named as the youth to whom Aphrodite gave the golden apples so that he could win a race with Atalanta and win her as his bride. See Atalanta.

Melanippe (mel-ā-nip'ē). In Greek mythology, the name given to the foal which Thea, transformed as the mare Euipe, bore. After it was born Poseidon transformed the foal into an infant girl who was given the name Arne. See Arne.

Melanippe. In Greek legend, an Amazon queen, a daughter of Ares. She ruled a city near the Thermodon River. According to some accounts, when Heracles came to the land of the Amazons in quest of Hippolyte's girdle, he captured Melanippe, sister of Hippolyte, and held her until Hippolyte ransomed her by giving him the girdle.

Melanippus (mel-ā-nip'us). In Greek legend, a Theban who was one of the defenders of the city when it was attacked by the Seven against Thebes. He wounded Tydeus but Amphiaraus cut off Melanippus' head and gave it to Tydeus and told him to gulp Melanippus' brains. Tydeus did this and thus Melanippus, although dead, caused the death of Tydeus.

Melanippus. A legendary son of Theseus and Perigune. He was the father of Ioxus, who took out a colony to Caria.

Melanippus. In the Iliad, named as a son of Hicetaon. He went from Percote and lived in Priam's palace in Troy, where he was treated as one of the king's own children. In the Trojan War he was slain by Nestor's son, Antilochus.

Melanippus. Beloved of Comaetho, with whom he profaned the temple of Artemis in Patrae. See Comaetho.

Melanthus (mē-lan'thi-us). In the Odyssey, a goatherd of Odysseus. He was not faithful to his master in the 20 years while Odysseus was away, but instead toadied to the suitors of Penelope. When Odysseus returned disguised as a beggar, Melanthius met him on his way to the palace, and reviled and attacked him. In the fight between Odysseus and the suitors, Melanthius was captured as he tried to slip away and fetch weapons for the suitors. He was strung up to a beam where he could watch the combat. When it was over and all the suitors were dead Melanthius was taken down, his nose, hands, and feet were cut off, he was disembowelled and the severed members were thrown to the dogs.

Melantho (mē-lan'thō). In the Odyssey, a beloved handmaid of Penelope, who was treated almost as a daughter. She proved faithless while Odysseus was away at the Trojan War and in the years of wandering after it, and became the mistress of one of Penelope's suitors, Eurymachus. When Odysseus returned disguised as a beggar, she mocked him. After Odysseus had slain the suitors, he killed those of his servants who had been faithless during his absence, among them Melantho.

Melanthus (mē-lan'thus). Another name for Thymbraeus, a son of the priest Laocoön. See Antiphas.

Melanthus. In Greek legend, a king of Messenia, who was descended from the royal Messenian family of Neleus. He was driven out of his kingdom by the Dorians, and went to Athens. There he became king, as the successor of Thymoetes, the great-grandson of Theseus. Melanthus was succeeded on the throne of Athens by his son Codrus, the last king of Athens.

Melanthus of Sicyon (sish'i-on). [Also: Melanthius.] Greek painter (4th century B.C.), especially noted as a colorist, one of the great Sicyonian school founded by Eupompus. He was a pupil of Pamphilus. Like his teacher, he based his work on the scientific training which characterized the artistic activity of the Peloponnesian cities. He wrote a work much used by Pliny in the compilation of his thirty-fifth book.

Melas (mel'as). In Greek legend, a son of Phrixus and Chalciope, and a grandson of Aeetes, king of Colchis. See Phrontis.

son of Oeneus, king of Calydon, and Althaea. When he was seven days old, the Fates told his mother that he would live until a log of wood then on the fire was completely consumed by the flames. Althaea immediately snatched the burning brand from the fire, quenched it, and hid the charred remains. As a youth, Meleager accompanied Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece, and was wounded by the Colchians as the Argonauts fled with Medea and the Fleece. He married Cleopatra, daughter of Idas and Marpessa. However, when the hunt for the Calydonian Boar was organized, Atalanta joined it and Meleager fell in love with her. According to some accounts, he had a son, Parthenopaeus, by her. Some of the greatest warriors of Greece joined in the chase for the boar. Atalanta, who hunted at Meleager's side, was the first to wound it; others also drew its blood, and Meleager dealt the death blow. He awarded the boar's hide and tusks to Atalanta as a prize for drawing first blood. Two of his uncles objected to giving Atalanta the prize, and in a rage, Meleager slew them. A war with the Curetes for possession of the boar's hide followed. Meleager refused to defend Calydon because his mother had put a curse on him for the death of his uncles, her brothers. He scorned the rich gifts the Calydonians offered him, withdrew from the battle, and amused himself with his wife. At last, the Curetes being about to scale the walls of Calydon, Meleager yielded to the entreaties of his wife, his mother and his friends. He joined in the battle and repulsed the Curetes, at the same time killing two more of his uncles. Althaea, maddened by the death of all her brothers, took the half-burned brand which she had snatched from the fire so many years ago and hurled it into the flames. As it was consumed, Meleager felt a fiery breath scorch him and he died. He was a celebrated warrior, and when, in after years, Heracles visited Hades and frightened the spirits of the dead into fleeing before his sword, Meleager held his ground. Medusa was the only other spirit who dared face the mighty Heracles in the Underworld.

Meleager. Macedonian general, distinguished under Alexander the Great. He was killed c323 B.C.

Meleager. Greek epigrammatist of Gadara

in Palestine, who was active about the 1st century B.C. He was a scholar, teacher, and poet, who wrote love poems of great sweetness, and elegies of great tenderness. His collected epigrams, entitled Stephanos (Wreath), form the nucleus of the earliest anthology known in world literature.

Meleagrides (mel-ē-ag'rī-dēz). The sisters of Meleager of Calydon. They grieved so at his death that Artemis took pity on them and changed all, save Deianira and Gorge, into guinea hens.

Melete (mel'ē-tē). In older Greek mythology, one of the Muses: the muse of Practice.

Meletus (mē-lē'tus). Athenian tragic poet; fl. 5th century B.C.

Melia (mē'li-ā). In Greek mythology, a nymph who was the mother of Phoroneus and Aegialeus by Inachus, the god of the river of that name in Argos. Aegialeus died childless and Phoroneus founded the city in Argos which afterward bore that name.

Melia. In Greek mythology, a nymph, the daughter of Oceanus. Apollo carried her off and she bore the god two sons: Tenerus, to whom his father gave the art of divination, and Ismenus, for whom the river at Thebes was named.

Meliboea (mel-i-bē'ā). In Greek legend, a maiden of Ephesus who flung herself from the roof on her wedding day, because her parents would not let her marry Alexis, the man of her choice. She was miraculously saved in her fall and lived to escape and marry Alexis.

Meliboea. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Niobe and Amphion. According to some accounts, she was spared when the other daughters of Niobe were slain by Artemis, because she offered up a propitiatory prayer to Leto. According to these accounts she was given the name Chloris which means "pale," and under this name became the wife of Neleus.

Melicertes (mel-i-sēr'tēz). In classical mythology, a son of Athamas, king of Orchomenus, and Ino, daughter of Cadmus of Thebes. His father, inspired with madness by Hera, sought to kill him, but his mother snatched him up in her arms and leaped into the sea with him. The gods transformed him into a sea-god and he was henceforth known as Pala-

mon. As a sea-god he rode on the back of a dolphin to Corinth. His identification with the Phoenician Melkarth is uncertain. He was worshiped on the coast, especially at Megara and the Isthmus of Corinth, where his mortal body was cast ashore. His uncle Sisyphus founded in his honor the Isthmian Games, held every four years; whenever they were neglected, famine struck the locality. By the Romans he was identified with Portunus, god of harbors.

Melic (mel'ik) Nymphs. In Greek mythology, nymphs who sprang from the blood of Uranus when he was mutilated by Cronus. They were distinguished by the spears of ash they carried, and were also said to be the nymphs of ash trees. With many others, they are sometimes said to have taken care of the infant Zeus in a cave on the island of Crete.

Melië (mel'i-ē). In Greek mythology, a nymph of Bithynia, the mother, by Poseidon, of Amycus, king of the Bebryces.

Melissa (me-lis'a). In Greek mythology, a Cretan nymph who helped her sister Amalthea care for the infant Zeus by feeding him on honey, while her sister supplied goat's milk. Her name, which means "bee," was also applied to other nymphs and sometimes to priestesses.

Melissa. In Greek legend, the wife of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, who murdered her in a fit of jealousy. Herodotus recounts that she sent Periander word from the land of the dead that she was unclad and cold because her clothes had not been burnt for her at the time of burial; whereupon Periander gathered together many costly garments and burned them in a pit for her.

Melisseus (me-lis'ös). According to some accounts, a king in Crete, and the father of Adrastea and Ida, the nymphs who nursed the infant Zeus.

Melissus (me-lis'us). Greek philosopher and admiral, who was active in the middle of the 5th century B.C. As an admiral of the Samian fleet he once defeated Pericles. He was a disciple of Parmenides and a representative of the Eleatic school. Fragments of his writings have been preserved.

Melita (mel'i-ta). [Modern name, Malta.] Island in the Mediterranean Sea, about 60 miles S of Sicily. It was colonized by the Phoenicians c1000 B.C. Greek colonies were established in the 8th century B.C. but the Greeks were driven out by the Carthaginians and the island remained a Carthaginian stronghold until taken by Rome in 218 B.C., during the Second Punic War. The Acts of the Apostles, Chs. 27, 28, tell how Saint Paul was shipwrecked on the island (c60 A.D.) and converted many of the inhabitants to Christianity. It was occupied successively by Vandals, Goths, Byzantines, Arabs, and Normans, and when the Turks expelled the Knights of St. John from Rhodes, the Emperor Charles V, in 1530, presented Malta to them; they have since been known as the Knights of Malta. Among the ancient remains are substantial stone ("megalithic") structures of the second millennium B.C., and some have proposed to identify Melita with Ogygia, the island on which the nymph Calypso detained Odysseus. (JJ)

Melite (mel'i-tē). In Greek mythology, a water nymph of the Phaeacians, the daughter of the river-god Aegaeus. When Heracles went to the land of the Phaeacians to be purified, he fell in love with Melite and she became the mother of his son Hyllus, who emigrated across the Cronian Sea and was ultimately killed by the Mentores of Illyria.

Melitene (mel-i-tē'nē). In ancient geography, a district in E Cappadocia, Asia Minor.

Melkarth (mel'kärth). [Also: Melcarth, Melkart.] Tutelary god of the Phoenician city of Tyre, an aspect of the Canaanite Baal. He was annually burned in effigy on a great pyre by the people of the city and in the Tyrian colonies. The Greeks identified Melkarth with their own Heracles, who cast himself upon a burning pyre. In Cyprus Melkarth was worshiped side by side with Adonis. He is represented riding on a sea-horse, on the ancient coin of Tyre. His temple at Tyre was celebrated for its magnificence. Women were not allowed to enter the temples of Melkarth (nor those of Heracles).

Melos (mē'los). [Italian, Milo.] Volcanic island of the Cyclades, SE Greece. The great harbor which the island partially encircles was caused by volcanic action. Remains of three prehistoric cities have been found at Phylakopi on the island. The two oldest date from the early Minoan period (3400-2100 B.C.) and the Middle Minoan period (2100-1580 B.C.) and indicate a Minoan civilization that developed independently of Crete. The latest of the three cities dates from the Mycenaean period. Obsidian produced on Melos was early used in the manufacture of knives and spear-points, and was an important item of export. Melos was a Dorian colony from ancient times, and was never under the control of Athens as the other islands were following the Persian War. In the Peloponnesian Wars it remained neutral until an Athenian armament came to attack it. Thucydides presents a discussion between Athenian and Melian envoys, which clearly indicates the desire of Melos to remain at peace and in liberty and the undisguised intention of Athens to force the island into submission. The crux of the Athenian argument was that "the strong do what they can and the weak suffer what they must." The Melians, relying on the justice of their cause and the gods, decided to resist (416 B.C.). After a siege of some months they surrendered. All the adult males were put to death by the Athenians, and the women and children were enslaved. Later the Athenians sent out colonists and took the island for themselves. Melos is noted for the Venus of Melos (Venus de Milo) found in the ruins of the ancient city of Melos in 1820, now in the Louvre at Paris. Area of the island, about 57 square miles.

Melpomene (mel-pom'e-nē). In Greek mythology, one of the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. Originally the muse of song and musical harmony, she was looked upon later as the especial patroness of tragedy. She is generally represented as a young woman, bearing the tragic mask and often the club of Heracles, and with her head wreathed with vine leaves in token of her relation with the dramatic deity, Dionysus. According to some accounts, Melpomene was the mother of the Sirens by Achelous. See Muses.

Melus (mel'us). In Greek mythology, a companion of Adonis, son of Cinyras of Cyprus. He married Pelia, a kinswoman of Cinyras, but he and his wife grieved so when Adonis was killed in his youth by a boar, that Aphrodite transformed Melus into an apple tree and Pelia into a dove.

Memnon (mem'non). A mythical Aethiopian king, the son of Eos and Tithonus, who came to the aid of the Trojans. The Trojans, shattered by the loss of Hector and then of their ally Penthesilea, the Amazon queen, were considering flight or the surrender of Helen. The arrival of Memnon with his Aethiopians inspired them with new courage. In the furious battle Memnon killed Antilochus, son of Nestor, but ordered Nestor to withdraw as he did not wish to fight an old man. For a time Memnon was irresistible, and as he forced the Greeks back to their ships, Nestor called on Achilles to avenge Antilochus. When Achilles and Memnon, both descendants of gods and endowed with great prowess, met face to face, their fates had already been sealed. Memnon's black fate came to his side. Achilles plunged his sword through Memnon's breast and "snapped the chord of life." Myrmidons stripped him of his armor, while the Trojans fled in terror. Grief-stricken Eos veiled her face and the earth was in shadow as her other children slipped down and rescued Memnon's body. Drops of blood which fell from his corpse became a river, the Paphlagonia, whose waters, so it was said, annually flowed with blood on the anniversary of Memnon's death. His Aethiopian soldiers, whom the gods did not desert, were transformed into birds that flew off mourning their lord. The Greeks and Trojans watched in awe as the whole Aethiopian horde vanished. The body of their fallen leader was carried to the banks of the Aesepus River, where his transformed soldiers darted and wheeled with wailing cries about his tomb. From the ashes of his funeral pyre a great flock, the Memnonides, rose in the air and circled the pyre three times. The fourth time the flock divided. The birds of the two groups made fierce attacks on each other until they fell into the ashes of the funeral pyre as offerings to the dead hero. Annually the Memnonides are said to rise, fight, and fall on Memnon's tomb. On the death of her son, Eos vowed she would withdraw her light from the world. The Horae, however, conducted her to Zeus, who commanded her to resume her daily course. This she did, but each morning she weeps tears of dew in memory of her son. The ancients depicted Memnon as a youth of marvelous strength and beauty. His original home was said to be at Susa in Elam, where his temple or monument, the Memnoneum, was situated. The Greeks gave his name to one of the colossi of Amenophis III at Thebes in Egypt, a great stone statue called "the vocal Memnon" because the stone, when reached by the rays of the rising sun, was said to give forth a sound resembling that of a breaking chord.

Memnonides (mem-non'i-dēz). According to legend, the ashes that rose from the funeral pyre of Memnon were transformed into birds that annually rise, fight, and fall on his tomb. See Memnon. Other accounts say the Memnonides are maidens, companions of Memnon, who mourned so over his death that the gods in pity transformed them into birds, and that they also annually visit the tomb and drop water from the Aesepus River on it.

Menaechmi (mē-nēk'mī). Comedy of Plautus, the plot of which turns upon the comical mistakes arising from the resemblance of twin brothers. It was translated into English in 1594 by "W.W." (William Warner) and frequently since. Shakespeare used its plot as the basis of his The Comedy of Errors.

Menaechmus (mē-nēk'mus). Greek mathematician; fl. at Athens, c365-350 B.C. A pupil of Eudoxus, friend of Plato, and tutor of Alexander the Great, he is best known as the probable discoverer of the conic sections. None of his works has survived.

Menander (mē-nan'dēr). Athenian comic poet, born at Athens, 342 B.C.; said to have been drowned c291 B.C. He was the son of a wealthy and distinguished family and received a good education. He lived so comfortably in Athens, enjoying his friends, especially Epicurus, that when Ptolemy I of Egypt invited him for a visit, he refused to go. Menander, who made his first appearance in 322 B.C., was the chief of the writers of the New Comedy. He was highly regarded by the ancients for his wit, his skill in plot devising, his inventiveness, and his vivid characterization. His works abound in maxims, which were separately collected in anthologies in a later day. He wrote more than 100 plays, each with its love story. The titles of some 80 are known, with numerous fragments available to modern scholars. Earlier papyrus finds in Egypt brought to light whole scenes and enabled scholars to reconstruct a few plots, notably Epitrepontes

(The Arbitration) and Perikeiromene (She Is Shorn of Her Locks). In the former a foundling infant, aided by slaves, recovers his rights and finds his parents who had been estranged because of him. In the latter, a soldier-lover maltreats and loses his mistress but regains her as wife after he repents. The appearance in 1959 of the first edition of the Dyscolus (The Grouch), edited from a papyrus now in a private collection in Switzerland, caused an international sensation among classical scholars. Lacking only a few lines, it is the only complete play of Menander published up to this time (1961); opinions of its literary and dramatic merits are divided. According to rumor, the manuscript which yielded the Dyscolus contains two, or three, additional unpublished plays. Through Plautus and Terence, Menander's influence passed to modern writers of comedy of manners. He won first prize only eight times, but was later extolled as supreme in depicting lively, natural characters in domestic difficulties. He took from Homer's Odyssey and from tragedy the theme of family reunion and recognition of lost relatives, but is original in his treatment of good women sinned against, and men reformed by love for them.

Menapii (mē-nā'pi-i). Ancient Gallic people in Gallia Belgica, formerly living in what is now Belgium and S Netherlands. They are mentioned by Julius Caesar as being the only Gallic people never to sue for peace during the whole Roman conquest of Gaul.

Mende (men'dē). In ancient geography, a city on the Pallene peninsula, in Chalcidice. It revolted from Athens, 423 B.C., and gave allegiance to the Spartan general Brasidas.

Menderes (men-de-res'). Modern Turkish name of the Maeander, and also of the Sca-mander.

Menderes, Little. See Caÿster.

Menelaëum (men-e-lā'i-um). A hill on the banks of the Eurotas River in Laconia, on which the hero-shrine of Helen and Menelaus has been found. The cult of Helen and Menelaus was observed there until the Dorian invasion, c1100 B.C. On the site, remains of a small temple of the 5th century B.C. have been found. Other remains indicate that this temple replaced a much earlier one, in which Helen and Menelaus were honored.

Nearby, traces of houses of the Mycenaean period have also been found.

Menelaus (men-ē-lā'us). In Greek legend a son of Atreus and Aërope. He was the brother of Agamemnon and Anaxibia. Following the murder of their father by Aegisthus, Menelaus and Agamemnon were sent, some say as children, to Polyphides, lord of Sicyon. Next they went to the court of Oeneus in Calydon. Ultimately they were brought back to Argos by Tyndareus and expelled Aegisthus, Agamemnon becoming king of Mycenae and Menelaus becoming king of Sparta. Menelaus was a suitor of Helen, supposedly the daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, but said to have been a daughter of Zeus, who embraced Leda in the shape of a swan. So many noble and valiant princes of Greece sued for the hand of Helen that Tyndareus feared to award her to anyone lest the disappointed suitors turn on him in wrath. Odysseus advised him to require all the suitors to take an oath that they would aid the one who succeeded in case any ill should come to him as a result of his marriage to Helen. The suitors readily took the oath, and Tyndareus then gave Helen to Menelaus. Whether he was also Helen's choice has never been definitely ascertained. She bore Menelaus a daughter, Hermione, and according to some accounts, three sons. Menelaus cordially welcomed Paris when he came to Sparta with the secret intention of carrying off Helen. After entertaining Paris royally for nine days Menelaus, with appalling obtuseness, for it was obvious that Paris was madly in love with Helen, sailed blandly off to Crete to attend the funeral of his maternal grandfather. The night after he sailed, Helen eloped with Paris, taking with her a great treasure and a son. On learning of the abduction, Menelaus appealed to Agamemnon at Mycenae to raise an army and sail against Troy. Agamemnon sent messages to the kings and princes of Greece, reminding them of the oath they had taken as suitors of Helen and declaring that the abduction was an insult to all Greece; that if it was not avenged, they risked losing their own wives. The heroes answered his call. An army and fleet were mustered which assembled at Aulis. For the first nine years the Greeks raided the coasts of Asia Minor at intervals, and for considerable lengths of time were at home in Greece. Then the fleet reassembled at Aulis, and after the sacrifice of Iphigenia to appease Artemis, they put to sea and arrived at the island of Tenedos. Menelaus and Odysseus were sent as envoys to Troy to demand the return of Helen. Their mission was unsuccessful. They would, in fact, have been murdered by the angry Trojans except for the intervention of Antenor, who sheltered the envoys and secured safe passage for their return in the name of the laws of hospitality and of war. The Greek fleet now sailed to Troy and the city was attacked. A truce was then arranged and, with the approval of both armies, Menelaus met Paris in single combat: the winner to have Helen and thus conclude the war. Menelaus had by far the best of the battle, and would have slain Paris but for the intervention of Aphrodite, who spirited him away in a mist and restored him to Helen. The truce was broken when Athena caused Pandarus to shoot at Menelaus an arrow which merely grazed him, and the war was resumed. Menelaus fought bravely, killing many Trojans. He accepted Hector's challenge to single combat but was dissuaded by Agamemnon from submitting his name for the drawing of lots, and Telamonian Ajax fought Hector. He boldly rescued Odysseus when he was wounded and cut off by the Trojans. He wounded Helenus, the Trojan seer and brother of Paris, and, aided by Athena, killed Euphorbus, who had just wounded Patroclus, and protected the body of Patroclus when he was slain by Hector and helped to carry it back to the Greek ships. After the deaths of Achilles and Telamonian Ajax, Menelaus proposed that the Greeks give up the war and return home. He cared more for his Greeks, he said, than for Helen. But this suggestion was put forth purely for psychological reasons. As he expected, the Greeks protested that this would be cowardly and vowed to fight harder than ever. Calchas the seer encouraged them by recalling that Troy was fated to fall in the tenth year of the war, which was now passing. When the Greeks decided to abandon direct siege of the city and to penetrate it by stratagem, Menelaus was one of those who entered it in the

Menestheus/Menesthius

Wooden Horse. Remembering the kindness of Antenor when he had gone as an envoy to Troy, Menelaus hung a leopard's skin in front of Antenor's house, when the Greeks stole out of the Wooden Horse, as a sign that the house and family of Antenor should be spared in the destruction of the city. During the sack of Troy he searched for Helen, vowing he would kill her. He found her with Deiphobus, to whom she had been forcibly married after the death of Paris. According to some, it was Menelaus who slew Deiphobus and horribly mangled his body. He raised his sword against Helen in the presence of Agamemnon, but was prevented, as he had expected to be, from plunging it into her breast. For Menelaus, whatever he might have said, still passionately loved Helen and could hardly wait to get her back. This was possibly owing to the interference of Aphrodite. They withdrew to his ship and he completely forgave her. He was willing to blame her infidelity, as did she, on the will of the gods. When the city was destroyed, Menelaus wanted to sail immediately. Agamemnon insisted they first sacrifice to the gods. The brothers quarreled and parted; Menelaus never saw his brother again. He put to sea but was caught in a great storm and lost all but five of his ships. Except for Odysseus, he was the last of the Greeks to return home. For eight years he was buffeted about the Mediterranean, sailing to Libya, Phoenicia, Cyprus and Egypt, and collecting a vast treasure. On the island of Pharos, in the mouth of the Nile, he was becalmed for many days. Idothea, a sea-goddess, told him he must catch the sea-god Proteus and force him to tell why Menelaus was prevented from returning home. Idothea helped him to disguise himself and some of his companions as seals and hid them among the seals of Proteus' herd, among which the sea-god took his midday nap. To prevent them from suffocating from the stench of the seal skins in which they were wrapped, Idothea filled their nostrils with ambrosia. Proteus, unaware that masqueraders had joined his herd, came to take his usual nap among them. As he slept, Menelaus seized him, and held him firmly as the sea-god rapidly transformed himself into a lion, then to a serpent, to a panther, and even to running water. Proteus was thus compelled to prophesy. He said the gods were preventing Menelaus from getting home because he had not made proper sacrifices. He must return to Egypt and sacrifice to Zeus, and then favorable winds would permit his return. He also told him that Agamemnon had been murdered by Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, that Ajax the Lesser had perished at sea, and that Odysseus was held on an isle by Calypso. Menelaus returned to Egypt as instructed, offered sacrifices, and then sailed easily to Sparta with Helen. He arrived to find that Orestes had avenged the murder of Agamemnon by slaying Aegisthus and Clytemnestra. He then raised a temple to Zeus in Sparta in honor of Agamemnon. Telemachus, son of Odysseus, later visited Menelaus in search of news of his father, and found him and his beautiful Helen living in perfect harmony in the midst of splendid prosperity. So complete was their understanding that Helen could ruefully refer to the aberration which had caused her to run off with Paris and win an affectionate smile from Menelaus. Hera made Menelaus immortal, because he was a son-in-law of Zeus, and he and Helen ultimately departed this world and went to dwell in the Isles of the Blest.

Menestheus (me-nes'thūs). Named by Homer as a son of Peteus of Athens. While Theseus was absent in the Underworld Menestheus became regent of Athens. He welcomed the Dioscuri, who had been ravaging Attica as they searched for their sister Helen, and made them honorary citizens of Athens. He was a bold fighter and strategist and as a former suitor of Helen he was bound by his oath to aid and defend her husband. It was thus that he led 50 ships against Troy when Paris stole Helen and took her there. At the end of the war he helped persuade Agamemnon that Aethra, mother of Theseus, who had been taken to Sparta when Helen was rescued by her brothers from Attica, and who had later been carried to Troy, should be restored to Athens. According to some accounts, Menestheus did not return to Athens after the war, but went to Melos where he became king. Others say he died at Troy.

Menesthius (me-nes'thi-us). In the Iliad, a son of Areithoüs, the "Maceman," and Phylome-fat, fāte, fär, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, dusa. He was a lord of Arne who joined the Greeks in the Trojan War and was slain by Paris.

Menippe (mē-nip'ē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Orion. She and her sister Metioche offered themselves up as two virgins for sacrifice in order to dispel a plague which had fallen on Boeotia.

Menippus (mē-nip'us). Cynic philosopher, born at Gadara, Palestine, active in the middle of the 3rd century B.C. He was originally a slave. He was noted for his satirical jests upon the follies of mankind, especially of philosophers. His writings, which combined prose and verse, are lost. Varro and Lucian later used Menippus as a model in their satirical writings.

Meno (mē'nō). [Also: Menon.] Dialogue of Plato; a conversation between Socrates, Meno (Menon), a slave of Meno, and Anytus upon the teachability of virtue.

Menodice (men-od'i-sē). In Greek mythology, a nymph, the mother of Hylas, Heracles' squire, by Thiodamas, king of the Dryopians.

Menoceus (mē-nē'sūs). In Greek legend, a descendant of one of the Sparti, the men who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus. He was the father of Jocasta and Creon. When a plague broke out in Thebes, some time after the marriage of Oedipus and Jocasta, the seer Tiresias said the plague would be dispelled if one of the descendants of the Sparti would give his life for the city. Menoeceus thereupon leaped to his death from the walls to save the city.

Menoceus. In Greek legend, the son of Creon, king of Thebes, and a grandson of the Menoeceus named above. In the war of the Seven against Thebes, Tiresias, the seer, again prophesied that Thebes would remain safe only if a descendant of the Sown Men freely gave his life for the city and appeased Ares, who was still angry over the death of the Sown Men brought about by Cadmus. Creon refused to sacrifice his son but Menoeceus, knowing of the prophecy, disobeyed his father's command to flee, and killed himself before the gates of the city. Others say he took part in the fighting, being young and inexperienced and knowing that he would be killed, and was slain in that way.

Menoetes (men-ē'tēz). In Greek mythology, a cowherd who tended Hades' cattle on Erythea. It was he who warned Geryon that Heracles was stealing his cattle, although Heracles had not touched any of the cattle of Hades. Later, when Heracles went to the Underworld to fetch Cerberus, he slaughtered one of Hades' cows to give blood to the spirits of the dead. Menoetes challenged him for stealing Hades' cattle as he had Geryon's, and in the wrestling match which followed Menoetes would have been crushed to death by Heracles' strong arms had it not been for the intervention of Persephone who rescued him.

Menoetius (mē-nē'shi-us). In Greek mythology, a Titan, the son of Iapetus and Clymene, and the brother of Atlas, Epimetheus, and Prometheus. He was killed by a thunderbolt of Zeus and hurled down to Tartarus when the Titans warred against the gods.

Menoetius. In Greek legend, a son of Actor and Aegina. He was an Argonaut and the father of Patroclus, whom he took from Opus in Locris to the court of Peleus after Patroclus had killed a young friend in a childish argument. When Patroclus left with Achilles to join the Greeks in the war against Troy, Menoetius charged him ever to do his best, and if he was not so skillful in arms as Achilles, at least he could fight at his side and aid him with wise counsel and gentle suggestions.

Menon (mē'non). Thessalian mercenary; killed c400 B.C. He was one of the leading generals in the expedition of Cyrus the Younger against Artaxerxes. After the death of Cyrus at Cunaxa (401 B.C.) the Greek mercenaries, who had been victorious in the battle against Artaxerxes in which Cyrus was killed, refused to surrender when Cyrus' oriental troops fled, and forced the Persians to supply them with provisions and a guide back to Sardis. The satrap Tissaphernes became their guide. After crossing the Tigris and proceeding into Media, hostility between the Greeks and their Persian escort broke out. Tissaphernes invited all the Greek generals (five of them), including Menon, as well as the leading Greek captains to a conference in his tent. When they were gathered there, he treacherously caused the captains to be taken and slain. The generals were sent off to the Persian court in chains. Menon was put to torture and finally killed.

Mentes (men'tēz). In the Odyssey, a captain of the Taphians, whose form Athena took when she went to the house of Odysseus to encourage Telemachus to journey in search of news of his father. In the Iliad, Mentes was a leader of the Cicones, whose form Apollo assumed to spur Hector to obtain possession of Patroclus' body.

Mentor (men'tor). In the Odyssey, an Ithacan to whom Odysseus, when about to depart for the Trojan War, entrusted the care of his house and the education of his son Telemachus. His name has become a synonym for a faithful adviser.

Mentores (men'tôr-ēz). A people of Illyria. According to legend, when Hyllus, son of Heracles and the Phaeacian nymph Melite, went to settle in their country, they killed him.

Mercedonius (mēr-se-dō'ni-us) or Mercedinus (mēr-se-dī'nus). Among primitive peoples, the most widely-used system of time-reckoning was the "lunisolar" calendar, in which some form of intercalation was employed to keep two incommensurate periods, the solar year of 365+ days and the lunar year of 354+ days (12 lunar months averaging 29.5306 days), in rough correspondence. In a calendar ascribed to Numa Pompilius, traditional second king of Rome (c700 B.C.), an attempt was made to correct the cumulative discrepancy of the lunisolar year by intercalating, between February 23 and 24, in every second year, a short, non-lunar, month of 22 or 23 days, called Mercedonius or Mercedinus. Such a calendar would present a relatively sophisticated type of intercalation, and modern scholars consider that this calendar was probably developed much later than the period of Numa Pompilius. (JJ)

Mercury (mēr'kū-ri). In Roman mythology, the god of commerce, who became identified with the Greek Hermes and took on various other attributes of Hermes, such as being messenger of the gods. His cult came from S Italy into Rome c495 B.C. Mercury was the tutelary deity of thieves and tricksters; he became also the god of science, eloquence, and of the arts, and the patron of travelers and athletes. It was he who guided the shades of the dead to the Underworld. He is represented in art as a young man, usually wearing a winged hat and the talaria or winged sandals, and bearing the caduceus, and often a purse.

Meriones (mer-ī'ō-nēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Molus. He went from Crete as an aide to Idomeneus, a former suitor of Helen, when the latter joined the Greek fleet waiting at Aulis to sail to Troy. Noted as an archer, he slew many Trojans, and was one of several who accepted Hector's challenge to single combat but was eliminated in the drawing of lots. When Odysseus went to spy on the Trojan camp, Meriones loaned him his bow and quiver and his famous helmet studded with boar's tusks. After the death of Patroclus he helped Menelaus to carry off his body, while the two Ajaxes held off the Trojans; and in the funeral games for Patroclus he won the archery contest from Teucer by shooting a pigeon in midair.

Mermerus (mēr'mē-rus). A son of Jason and Medea. See Alcimedēs.

Mermnadae (mērm'na-dē). Last dynasty of the Lydian kings, beginning with Gyges (c685 B.C.) and ending with Croesus (560-546 B.C.). Besides these kings it included Ardys, Sadyattes, and Alyattes.

Merope (mer'ō-pē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione, one of the seven Pleiades. She was the wife of Sisyphus, king of Corinth. When Sisyphus was taken to the Underworld for betraying secrets of Zeus he told Merope not to dress him in burial clothes. Thus he was able to convince Persephone that he had not had proper burial, and won her permission to return to earth to see that the proper rites were carried out. However, Sisyphus did not escape for long, and when he returned to the Underworld for good, Merope, ashamed because she was the only one of the Pleiades to have a husband who was a prisoner in the Underworld, left her six sisters in the heavens and is now no longer visible. According to another account, her shame is due to the fact that she, alone of the sisters, married a mortal.

Merope. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oenopion, king of Chios. She was loved by Orion who, for her sake, cleared the island of Chios of wild animals. Oenopion agreed to give Merope to Orion in marriage in return for this service, but kept delaying the fulfillment of his promise. At last Orion, in a drunken state, insulted the maiden. Oenopion called on Dionysus to punish him. While he was in a deep sleep, Oenopion blinded him. Merope is also sometimes called Aero.

Merope. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pandareus and Harmothoë, and a sister of Cleothera and Aëdon. When their father was punished by the gods for his part in a theft, the goddesses took charge of his daughters. Aphrodite, Hera, Artemis, and Athena endowed them with beauty, wisdom, strength, and skill. But they were snatched away by the Harpies one day when the goddesses were not attending them, and handed over to the Erinyes, who hounded them for their father's crimes.

Merope. In Greek legend, an Arcadian; she was the wife of Cresphontes, a king in Messenia and a descendant of Heracles. Two of her sons and her husband were killed in a rebellion, and Polyphontes, who succeeded Cresphontes, married her. Her third son, Aepytus, had been hidden in Arcadia to save him, during the rebellion. When he grew up he returned to Messenia and with the help of his mother, who at first did not recognize him, he murdered Polyphontes and assumed the throne.

Merope. The name sometimes given to the wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who brought up Oedipus and led him to believe that she was his mother. See Periboea.

Merops (mē'rops). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Percosian who excelled in the art of divining. He tried to prevent his two sons, Adrestus and Amphius, from joining the Trojans, as he knew they would never return from the war, but was unsuccessful in his attempts to help them escape their fate, which was to die at Troy.

Merops. A legendary king of Aethiopia. He was the husband of Clymene and the foster father of Phaëthon.

Mesopotamia (mes''o-pō-tā'mi-a). [From Greek, meaning "Between Rivers"; Hebrew, Aram Naharaïm.] Country between the Euphrates and Tigris. It is usually divided into Upper Mesopotamia (ancient Chaldea) and Babylonia. It is a great lowland plain, and was formerly very extensively irrigated and cultivated; in recent decades there has been a considerable extension of the irrigated area. It was invaded and conquered several times by the Egyptians and has belonged at different times to the Median, Persian, Macedonian, Syrian, Parthian and Roman empires.

Messa (mes'a). Harbor town in Laconia, on the W coast of the Taenarum promontory. It was described by Homer as "abounding in pigeons," and men from this port accompanied Menelaus to the Trojan War.

Messala (or Messalla) Corvinus (me-sā'la, me-sal'a, kôr-vī'nus), Marcus Valerius. Roman general, official, orator, historian, and patron of literature (64 B.C.-8 A.D.) He fought for Antony at Philippi (42 B.C.) but later was on Octavian's side at Actium (31 B.C.). He was consul in 31 B.C.

Messalina or Messallina (me-sā-lī'na), Valeria. Roman empress. Before 41 A.D., she became the third wife of Claudius who afterward ascended the imperial throne. Their children were Octavia, later married to Nero, and Britannicus (Claudius Tiberius Caesar). She was a woman of infamous vices, and during a temporary absence of her husband publicly married her favorite, Caius Silius. Her partner in influence over Claudius, the freedman Narcissus, informed the emperor, and she was put to death (48 A.D.) by order of Claudius.

Messana (me-sā'na) and Messene (me-sē'nē). [Modern name, Messina.] Messene was the name given (c664 B.C.) to the ancient city of Zancle in Sicily, situated on the extreme NE corner of the island, on the strait that separates it from the mainland of Italy. After the Messenians were defeated in the Second Messenian War with Sparta, many of them went to Sicily, according to tradition, on the invitation of the tyrant of Rhegium, a city diagonally S across the strait from Zancle. They defeated the Zancleans, made a treaty of friendship with them, and changed the name of Zancle to Messene, after their own country. Early in the 5th century B.C. the city came under the control of the tyrant of Rhegium, and henceforward it was known as Messana. In the struggle for control of Sicily between Carthage and the powerful Greek city of Syracuse, Messana changed sides many times. In 405 B.C. it was declared independent at the insistence of the Carthaginian general Himilco. When Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, renewed the war, 398 B.C., Himilco attacked Messana. Most of the inhabitants had fled, and Himilco took an abandoned city (396 B.C.). He pulled it to the ground, and destroyed its walls and buildings so completely that it was said no one would have known a city ever existed on the site. In the following year Dionysius rebuilt it and settled colonists from Italy and some exiles from Greek Messenia there. It fell again into the hands of the Carthaginians and was freed by Timoleon, 343 B.C. When the wars between Carthage and Syracuse broke out again, it sided with Carthage. It was seized by the Mamertines (288 B.C.), allies of Rome, who sought the aid of Rome and thus initiated the First Punic War. At the end of the war (241 B.C.) it became a free city allied to Rome. In the Roman civil wars following the assassination of Caesar, Messana was on the side of the enemies of Octavian, and was taken and sacked by the forces of Octavian (35 B.C.). Owing to its location the city sprang up many times after destruction, and it soon revived and again became a flourishing port.

Messapia (me-să'pi-a). In ancient geography, the peninsula at the SE extremity of Italy, often used as synonymous with Calabria or Iapygia. The name derives from its prehistoric Illyrian inhabitants.

Messene (me-sē'nē). According to tradition, the daughter of Triopas, son of the Argive Phorbas. She married Polycaon, son of Lelex, and accompanied him, with a band of Argives and Spartans, to the country which came to be named Messenia after her.

Messene. A city in Messenia, Greece, on the slope of Mount Ithome, about 19 miles SW of Megalopolis. According to tradition, after the defeat of the Spartans at Leuctra (371 B.C.), their Theban conqueror Epaminondas dreamed that he was instructed to restore the Messenians to their land, from which they had been driven by the Spartans. In his dream he was told to recover a secret thing which the dream directed him where to find, and on that spot to found a city for the Messenians. Epaminondas sent an envoy to find the secret thing of his dream. It turned out to be the Messenian mysteries, buried by Aristomenes before he fled from Messenia after the Second Messenian War. On this spot, which was at Mount Ithome, Epaminondas helped the Messenians, whom he had recalled from their exile, to lay out the foundations of their city (369 B.C.), and to the piping of flutes the heavy walls were raised. The walled city had the practical advantage of serving as a fortress against Sparta. In the city the Messenians dedicated a statue of Zeus the Savior in the market-place, and raised temples of Poseidon, Aphrodite, and Demeter, as well as a temple of Messene, daughter of Triopas, who had given her name to the Messenians and to their new city. The bones of Aristomenes were recovered from Rhodes at the command of an oracle, and interred in a tomb in the city. Annually certain rites were held at his tomb. A bull was bound to the pillar that stood on the grave of Aristomenes. If the bull, struggling to free himself, rocked the pillar, it was an omen of good fortune for the Messenians. If the pillar was not moved by the struggling bull, misfortune was portended. The ancient city of Messene is noted now for its extensive ruins at the modern village of Mavromati.

Messene. City in Sicily, see Messana.

Messenia (me-sē'ni-a). In ancient geography, a division of the Peloponnesus, Greece. It was bounded by Elis and Arcadia on the N, Laconia (separated by Mount Taygetus) on the E, and the sea on the S and W. It contained the fertile valley of the Pamisus and enjoyed a milder climate than its neighbor across Mount Taygetus. For these reasons it was enviously eyed by the Lacedaemonians whose land was rocky and infertile. According to tradition, Polycaon, son of the Lacedaemonian king, Lelex, married Messene, the daughter of Triopas, an Argive. With a band of Spartans and Argives Polycaon marched into the land west of Mount Taygetus and took it, and named it Messenia after his wife. When Polycaon's line died out, the Messenians summoned Perieres, the husband of Gorgophone, daughter of Perseus, to be their king. His throne passed to his two sons, Aphareus and Leucippus, who were supposed to reign as co-kings, but in fact Aphareus was the master. When his twin sons Idas and Lynceus died without heirs, the kingdom passed to Nestor, son of Neleus. The descendants of Nestor held the kingdom until the Dorian invasion and the return of the Heraclidae to the Peloponnesus. In the Dorian invasion, the sons of Aristomachus—

Aristodemus, Temenus, and Cresphontes—drew lots to decide which of the three regions of the Peloponnesus each would receive. Cresphontes, by a trick, got Messenia, which was regarded as the choicest portion of the Peloponnesus. In later times the Messenians and Lacedaemonians quarreled. The Lacedaemonians claimed that Messenians attacked a group of Lacedaemonian maidens who were on their way to a festival of Artemis at a sanctuary shared by both Messenians and Lacedaemonians and ravished the maidens, and killed the Spartan king, Teleclus, who tried to protect them. The Messenians claimed this was not the case at all. They said a band of Spartan youths, disguised as maidens, set upon them and that the Messenians killed them in self-defense. This incident was a cause of much friction, and in the next generation war broke out between the two kingdoms. The real cause of the war was the desire of the Spartans to control the rich areas of Messenia. The war, which some say began in 743 B.C., and certainly took place in the 8th century B.C., was carried on sporadically for 20 years. The Messenians protected themselves as best they could but were weakened by their losses and by disease. They withdrew to Ithome and carried on the war from there. All the omens predicted Spartan victory. The oracles told the Messenians that since they had won the land by guile (Cresphontes' trickery with the drawing of the lots), they would lose it by guile. Unfavorable omens appeared: the shield on the armed statue of Artemis fell to the ground; when the king was about to sacrifice victims to Zeus at Ithome, the citadel of the Messenians, the rams rushed into the flames of their own accord; dogs howled every night and at last fled to the Spartan camp. Aristodemus, the king of Messenia, was informed by an oracle that the willing sacrifice by her father of a Messenian virgin would save Messenia. He proposed to sacrifice his daughter, but her affianced husband, in an effort to save his beloved, said she was not a virgin but was about to become the mother of his child. Aristodemus was enraged at this slur on his honor. He slew his daughter and opened up her body to prove that she was not about to bear a child. But his impious act, carried out in a rage on the daughter he loved, did not satisfy the demands of the oracle for a voluntary sacrifice, and the death of his daughter was in vain. He was visited by evil dreams and, despairing for the fate of Messenia, he committed suicide on his daughter's tomb. About 724 B.C., according to some accounts, the war came to an end in Spartan victory. The Messenians fled from Ithome. The Spartans razed it to the ground and captured other towns. The victors compelled the Messenians to take an oath that they would never rebel and that they would give one-half of the produce of their fields to Sparta. In addition, the Messenians were compelled to attend the funerals of Spartan officials in the future, a particularly humiliating illustration of their defeat.

In the years that followed, the Messenians chafed under the Spartan yoke so that they welcomed the fiery speeches of Aristomenes, an ardent patriot who grew up in their midst at the beginning of the 7th century B.C. He urged them to revolt and free themselves from Sparta. Under his leadership the Second Messenian War broke out in the first half of the 7th century B.C. Some give the dates of it as 685–668 B.C. In this war Aristomenes performed prodigious feats, on at least one occasion driving the Spartans back in confusion, and several times escaping when he was taken prisoner. The Arcadians were allies of the Messenians, but through bribery their king betrayed the Messenians, without letting his own people, who cherished a warm friendship for the Messenians, know that he was doing so. He ordered the Arcadians to withdraw in the midst of a battle, and led them to the rear through the Messenian lines, thus throwing the Messenians into such confusion as the Arcadians fled through their midst that they were surrounded by the Spartans and suffered heavy losses. The survivors were led to Mount Eira by Aristomenes, and from there carried on their defense. The Messenians were besieged for 11 years, when they were again betrayed, this time by an adulterous woman. They fled to Arcadia, where they were warmly received and where the Arcadians, on learning that their king had betrayed their allies, stoned him to death. Aristomenes went to Rhodes, where he died, and many of the Messenians went to Sicily, where they captured the town of Zancle and changed its name to Messene (664 B.C.). The Spartans now had Messenia and divided it among themselves, except for Asine, which remained separate. Those Messenians who were left were reduced to slavery and became helots. But before Aristomenes fled from Messenia, he took a casket and buried it on a remote spot of Ithome, for an oracle had foretold that if this casket with its secret contents was kept by the Messenians, they would one day recover their country. The hatred of the Messenians for the Spartans never faltered; in 464 B.C. the Messenian helots revolted. This was at a time when Sparta was stricken by earthquakes to punish her for seizing suppliants at the sanctuary of Poseidon at Taenarus and putting them to death. The Messenian helots took refuge in their old fortress of Ithome, and held out against the Spartans for five years. At the end of that time they surrendered, and were allowed to withdraw from the fortress unharmed on condition that they never return to the Peloponnesus. The Athenians offered them a new home at Naupactus on the Corinthian Gulf (455 B.C.). The Messenians aided the Athenians in the Peloponnesian War. It was a Messenian plan that helped the Athenians capture a force of Spartans in Pylus (425 B.C.). With part of the spoil they took from the hated Spartans on this occasion, the Messenians commissioned the sculptor Paeonius to make an image of Victory, hovering in the air over a soaring eagle, which they dedicated in the Altis of Zeus at Olympia. After the Battle of Aegospotami (405 B.C.) in which the Spartans defeated the Athenians, the Messenians were driven from Naupactus. Some went to Rhegium and Sicily, but many went to Libya. At the Battle of Leuctra (371 B.C.), the image of Aristomenes appeared to aid the Thebans against the Spartans. Epaminondas, the Theban general who defeated the Spartans at Leuctra, dreamed that he was instructed to restore the Messenians to the Peloponnesus, and was told in his dream how to find the land he should give them. He sent a servant to the spot indicated to him in his dream; the servant dug there and found the casket hidden nearly three centuries earlier by Aristomenes. The secret contents which Aristomenes had hidden were the mysteries that had originally been brought to Messenia by Caucon in the misty past. Epaminondas recalled the Messenians and restored them to Ithome, where the casket was found. He helped them to lay out (369 B.C.) a new city, Messene, one side of which was formed by the old fortress of Ithome. The Messenians, who had been wandering for generations all over the Greek world, now returned home.

Messenia, Gulf of. [Also: Gulf of Korone.] Inlet of the Mediterranean, S and E of Messenia, Greece.

Mesta (mes'tä). See Nestus.

Mesthles (mes'thlēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Talaemenes and the nymph of the lake of Gygaea. He was a leader of the Maeonians, allies of Troy.

Mestor (mes'tôr). In mythology, a son of Perseus and Andromeda. By Lysidice he was the father of Hippothoë.

Mestra (mes'trā). In classical mythology, a daughter of Erysichthon of Thessaly. Poseidon, who loved her, gave her the power to change her form at will. She was the wife of Autolycus. See Erysichthon.

Meta (mē'tā). In Roman antiquity, a conical column or post, or usually a group of three such posts, at each end of the race course of a circus, marking the place where the chariot racers turned.

Metabus (met'ā-bus). In Roman legend, the father of Camilla, who became the ally of Turnus in the war against Aeneas. He was a ruler in Privernum, but was expelled by his people for his tyrannical rule. He fled with his infant daughter Camilla, and on coming to the Amasenus River, hotly pursued by his former subjects, he fastened his daughter to his spear, vowed to dedicate her to Diana if he was successful, and hurled her across the flood. She reached the other side safely, Metabus swam across and retrieved her, and both escaped. He lived the rest of his life in the forests, gave Camilla to be nursed by a brood mare, and as she grew up taught her the arts and skill of hunting and horsemanship.

Metageitnion (met-ā-gīt'ni-on). The second month of the Attic year, having 29 days, and corresponding to the last part of July and the first part of August.

Metamorphoses (met'ā-môr-fō'sēz). Poetical work by Ovid, in 15 books. The work is a collection of some 250 stories taken from Greek mythology, Roman and Latin folk tales, legends and myths, and including also some tales from the East. The unifying element in the collection is that all of the stories have to do with transformations: for an infinite variety of causes, gods, men, and animals are transformed in an infinite variety of ways. Written in hexameters, each story leads smoothly to the next one to make the work a whole rather than a collection of separate, unconnected tales. Besides being a literary production of interest, charm, and artistry the Metamorphoses is a treasury of myth and legend, gleaned by Ovid from the works of ancient poets and other writers and transformed by him into a literary masterpiece of immortal interest. His work has been an undiminished source of inspiration and influence for western European literature.

Metamorphoses. See Golden Ass, The.

Metanira (met-ā-nī'ra). In Greek legend, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis, and the mother of Abas, Demophoön, and Triptolemus. She and her family sheltered Demeter when she was searching for Persephone. See Demophoön and Triptolemus.

Metaphysics (met-ā-fiz'iks). Celebrated work by Aristotle. It consists of 13 books, more or less disconnected and imperfect, dealing with the doctrines of his predecessors and with various metaphysical topics.

Metapontum (met-ā-pon'tum). [Also: Metapontium.] In ancient geography, a city in S Italy, situated on the Gulf of Tarentum, about 25 miles SW of Tarentum. It was founded by Achaeans from the mainland of Greece at an early date. The city became an important manufacturing and shipping center, and enjoyed great prosperity. Two archaic peripteral Doric temples are known at Metapontum; one, of about 520 B.C., attributed to Apollo and now known as the Chiesa di Sansone; the other, of about 500

B.C., of which 15 columns still stand, is now called the Tavole Palatine. In addition, Pliny mentions a temple of Hera notable for having wooden columns. Archaeologists have reported a theater, tombs, and traces of fortification walls. The religious philosopher Pythagoras, forced out of Croton where he had founded his famous brotherhood, took refuge at Metapontum, where he died. The order was later revived at Metapontum, but in the late 4th century B.C. it became finally extinct. (JJ)

Metaurus (me-tôr'us). [Modern name, Metauro.] Small river in Italy, which flows into the Adriatic about 28 miles NW of Ancona. The battle of the Metaurus was a victory gained at the river, S of Ariminum (Rimini), in 207 B.C., by the Romans under the consuls Marcus Livius Salinator and Claudius Nero over the Carthaginians under Hasdrubal. Nero had eluded Hannibal in S Italy, and made a forced march of 250 miles with 7000 men. Hasdrubal was slain, and his army nearly annihilated. Hannibal was thus left in a hopeless position, unable to get reserves, in S Italy. This victory is ranked as one of the decisive battles of the world.

Metellus (mē-tel'us), Lucius Caecilius. Roman general; died c221 B.C. As proconsul he defeated the Carthaginians at Panormus in 250 B.C.

Metellus, Quintus Caecilius. [Surnamed Macedonicus, meaning "the Macedonian."] Roman general; died 115 B.C. As praetor he was distinguished for his victories in Macedonia and Greece (148-146 B.C.). He was consul in 143, and censor in 131 B.C.

Metellus, Quintus Caecilius. [Surnamed Numidicus, meaning "the Numidian."] Roman general; died c91 B.C. He was a nephew of Metellus Macedonicus. As consul and proconsul he defeated Jugurtha in Numidia in 109 and 108 B.C. He was exiled (c100 B.C.) by his political opponents.

Metellus, Quintus Caecilius. [Surnamed Pius.] Roman general; died c64 B.C. He was a son of Metellus Numidicus. He was commander under Sulla in the civil wars, was consul in 80 B.C., and commanded later in Spain against Sertorius.

Metellus, Quintus Caecilius. [Surnamed Creticus, meaning "the Cretan."] Roman general; died probably c56 B.C. He was consul in 69 B.C., and subdued Crete (68–66 B.C.).

Metellus Celer (sē'lēr), Quintus Caecilius. Roman statesman; died 59 B.C. He was praetor in 63 B.C., opposed the conspiracy of Catiline, and was consul in 60 B.C.

Metellus Nepos (nē'pos), Quintus Caecilius. Roman statesman; died c55 B.C. He was a partisan of Pompey. He was tribune in 62 and consul in 57 B.C.

Metellus Pius Scipio (pī'us sip'i-ō), Quintus Caecilius. Roman statesman; committed suicide 46 B.C. He was the son of Scipio Nasica, and the adopted son of Metellus Pius. He was consul with Pompey in 52 B.C., and Pompeian commander in Syria and Egypt.

Meter (mē'tēr). An epithet of Athena, meaning "Mother," given to the goddess by the women of Elis. After Heracles had sacked Elis and killed the men, he decided to repopulate the city, and ordered the widows of the Eleans to lie with his own soldiers. The Elean women prayed to Athena that they might conceive sons at their first embrace with the soldiers of Heracles. Athena answered their prayer and gave them sons, and in gratitude the Eleans raised a sanctuary of Athena the Mother.

Methone (meth-ō'nē). In ancient geography, a town in Messenia on the coast of the Ionian Sea. Some say it was named Methone for a daughter of Oeneus, son of Porthaon, who took refuge with Diomedes after the fall of Troy. Others say the name comes from the underwater rock reef which protects the harbor of the town. Diomedes dedicated an image to the winds in the temple at Methone, because his prayer for the cessation of harassing winds that were harming the city was answered. This was the same town that was formerly known as Pedasus, and was one of the seven gift cities offered by Agamemnon to Achilles during the Trojan War, if he would give up his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to battle to help his fellow Greeks against the Trojans. In the Peloponnesian Wars the city was besieged by the Athenians (431 B.C.), but it was saved by the arrival of a Spartan force under Brasidas. When Epaminondas restored Messenia after 371 B.C., the city was given to Nauplians.

Methone or Methana (mē-thā'nā). In ancient geography, a peninsula of the Peloponnesus, between Troezen and Epidaurus. It was captured and garrisoned by the Athenian general Nicias, 425 B.C., and served as a base from which the Athenians raided Spartan territory.

Methone. In ancient geography, a city of Macedonia, situated near the mouth of the Haliacmon River, on the W side of the Thermaic Gulf. It was called Pierian Methone, from the Pierian forest where the Muses were said to dwell. Some say it was founded by Methon, a son of Orpheus. It was colonized by Euboeans. In the Peloponnesian Wars it was loyal to Athens, and later served, at various times, as a base of operations against the Macedonians.

Methone. In ancient geography, a town of Thessaly, near the Gulf of Pagasae. It was said that men of Methone went to the Trojan War under the leadership of Philoctetes. The ruins of an ancient acropolis are to be found here.

Methydrium (mē-thid'ri-um). In ancient geography, a city in E Arcadia, Greece. According to tradition, it was founded by Orchomenus, the son of Lycaon. Its name, which means "Between the Waters," was given it because it is on a high knoll between two rivers. The people of Methydrium claimed that it was on a mountain nearby, Mount Thaumasius (Wonderful), that Rhea deceived Cronus by giving him a stone to swallow after the birth of Zeus. On the summit of the mountain was Rhea's cave, into which only women sacred to the goddess could enter. Methydrium was also noted for its temple of Poseidon Hippius. Methydrium was abandoned some time after 371 B.C. when its inhabitants went to dwell in the new city of Megalopolis.

Methymna (mē-thim'nā). In ancient geography, a city in Lesbos.

Metioche (mē-tī'ō-kē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Orion. She was the sister of Menippe, and with her sister offered herself as a sacrifice to dispel a plague from Boeotia.

Metion (mē'ti-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. After the death of Erechtheus his sons quarreled over the succession. Metion threatened to kill his brother Cecrops, who had been awarded the throne. Metion died,

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, but his sons expelled Pandion, son of Cecrops, from Athens.

Metis (mē'tis). In Greek mythology, a Titaness, the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She was the first wife of Zeus. It was she who advised Zeus to mix mustard and salt into the honeyed drink of Cronus in order to make the latter regurgitate the brothers and sisters of Zeus whom Cronus had swallowed as soon as they were born. When Metis became pregnant, Zeus learned from an oracle that her first child would be a girl, and that if she bore a second child, it would be a boy who would dethrone his father. Zeus thereupon swallowed Metis. Some time later he was passing near Lake Triton and was assailed by a frightful headache. Prometheus, or possibly Hephaestus, split his skull with an ax and out leaped fully-armed Athena, the daughter of Zeus and Metis. Metis is also known as the personification of Prudence and Insight, and Zeus claimed that she often gave him advice from within him.

Metiscus (mē-tis'kus). In Roman legend, the charioteer of the Rutulian chief, Turnus. Juturna, the sister of Turnus, assumed the guise of Metiscus and took his place in the chariot in order to drive Turnus away from the fighting and save his life.

Meton (mē'ton). Athenian astronomer of the 5th century B.C. He attacked the problem of devising a calendar which would reconcile the incommensurate periods of the sun (year) and moon (month), and announced the discovery of the enneadecateris. This was a lunisolar calendar of 235 months or 19 years, of which 12 years had 12 lunar months each and seven years had 13 lunar months each. At the end of each 19-year cycle sun and moon returned to their apparent starting-points with a variation of about two hours. For this he was acclaimed; but there is no evidence that the enneadecateris was adopted at Athens before 338 B.C. Students of the astronomical achievement of Babylonia, where records of continuous observations at least from the 8th century B.C. were available for study, have shown that the 19-year correlation was known there early in the 5th century B.C., suggesting that instead of making an independent discovery, Meton may have constructed his cycle on data already well known to Babylonian astronomers. The enneadecateris was officially adopted by the Hellenistic dynasty of the Seleucids in western Asia, who dated their era from 312-311 B.C., and it became the model for the Persian, Chinese, and Jewish calendars, and the method by which the date of Easter is calculated in advance. In recognition of his association with it, the enneadecateris is sometimes called the Metonic Cycle. (JJ)

Metope (met'ō-pē). In Greek mythology, a Stymphalian nymph, a daughter of the river-god Ladon. She was the wife of the river-god Asopus, and bore him two sons and a number of daughters, among them Aegina and Thebe.

Metope. In architecture, a slab inserted between two triglyphs of the Doric frieze, sometimes, especially in late work, cut in the same block with one or more triglyphs. It was so called (metope, "opening," "window") because in the primitive Doric architecture in wood, of which the later triglyphs represent the ends of the ceiling-beams, the metopes were left open as windows, and were thus literally apertures between the beams. The metopes were often ornamented with paintings or with sculptures in high relief, but they were more usually left plain.

Metroum (mē-trō'um). A sanctuary of the Mother of the Gods (Rhea). The most celebrated was that of Athens, which stood at the foot of the hill known as Colonus Agoraeus, on the west side of the market-place or Agora. The story is that one of the begging priests of Rhea came to Athens and initiated the women into the rites of the Mother of the Gods. The Athenians did not understand the rites, and killed the priest by casting him into a pit. At once plague broke out in Athens. The oracle told the Athenians to propitiate the murdered priest. To do so they built a shrine on the site of the murder and dedicated it to the Mother of the Gods. In the shrine they dedicated a statue of the begging priest. It was a rule of this sacred precinct that no one could enter it after eating garlic. Festivals called Galaxia, at which a mixture of barley and milk was eaten, were held here in honor of the Mother of the Gods. In the Metroum was the large jar in which Diogenes was supposed to have lived. The Metroum was the official depository of the state archives, including such documents as a copy of the accusation against Socrates, the plays of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and the will of the philosopher Epicurus. The excavations in the Agora by the American School of Classical Studies at Athens have revealed the foundations of an early temple, which was destroyed by the Persians in 480 B.C. and not rebuilt, and an altar. On this site was later built a group of buildings known as the Metroum-Bouleuterium complex, a combination of cult-place for the worship of the Mother of the Gods, the state archives, and the Bouleuterium, or council-house of the Five Hundred. Somewhere in this complex stood a famous cult statue, attributed variously to Phidias or Agoracritus. (JJ)

Mettus (met'us) or Metius (mē'shus), Fuffetius. An Alban general who was put to death for treachery by Tullus Hostilius (legendary third king of Rome, 672-640 B.C.). The scene of his death was prophetically depicted on the shield that Vulcan made for Aeneas when he fought against the Latins in Italy. According to the Aeneid, he was torn to pieces by horses.

Mezentius (mē-zen'shus). In Roman legend, a king of Caere or Agylla in Etruria. He was noted for his cruelty, one of his practices being to bind live men to corpses, face to face, so that they died a lingering death. His people revolted against his oppressive rule and he fled with his son Lausus to Turnus, the Rutulian, and joined him in the war against Aeneas. The Etrurian subjects of Mezentius, angered with Turnus for receiving him, joined the war on the side of Aeneas. Mezentius fought bravely and killed many of the enemy. He came face to face with Aeneas and was wounded by him, but was saved by the intervention of Lausus who took the death blow intended for his father and perished. In a frenzy of grief over the loss of his son Mezentius mounted a horse and again sought Aeneas. Finding Aeneas, Mezentius told him that he had indeed destroyed him by slaying his son. Aeneas wounded his horse and Mezentius, already wounded, fell. He refused to ask for mercy, since, he said, he had never thought it a crime to kill when he made war. Aeneas put him to the sword.

Micipsa (mi-sip'sa). Son of Masinissa; died

118 B.C. He was the chief ruler of Numidia after Masinissa's death in 149 B.C.

Micon of Athens (mī'kon; ath'enz). Greek painter and sculptor, active in the first half of the 5th century B.C. He was a contemporary of Polygnotus, with whom he worked in the Painted Portico (Stoa Poikile) at Athens. In the Painted Portico he painted the Battle of Theseus and the Amazons. In the picture of The Battle of Marathon in the Painted Portico, on which he also worked, were portraits of Callimachus, Miltiades, and possibly Aeschylus. On the walls of the Theseum he painted the story of Theseus proving to Minos that he was a son of Poseidon. When Theseus arrived in Crete with the tribute of young maidens and young men from Athens, Minos was attracted by one of the young girls and sought to seize her. Theseus rebuked him, claiming the right to do so as a son of Poseidon. Minos mocked him. He himself was a son of Zeus, he said, and called aloud to Zeus to give him a sign. There was an instant clap of thunder. Then Minos drew a ring from his finger and hurled it into the sea, telling Theseus that if he was indeed a son of Poseidon, he should leap into the sea and retrieve the ring. Theseus dived below the waters. Dolphins came to guide him and Nereids restored the ring. While under the sea he met Thetis, or as some say, Amphitrite, wife of Poseidon, who gave him a jeweled crown. With the ring and the crown he returned to Minos. He restored the ring to Minos and gave the crown to Ariadne as a bridal gift. Among other works by Micon was an incident from the voyage of Jason for the Golden Fleece that he painted in the temple of the Dioscuri at Athens, and a statue of the Athenian Callias, victor in Olympiad 77 (or 468 B.C.).

Micythus (mis'i-thus). Son of Choerus. He was a slave of Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium. When Anaxilas died (476 B.C.) he left Micythus the tyranny in trust for his children. Micythus managed it well, except for a war in which thousands of the citizens of Rhegium lost their lives, and when the children of Anaxilas grew up and demanded an accounting of his trust, the report he gave them was so satisfactory, according to some accounts, that they begged him to stay on as tyrant. But he refused and sailed off, accompanied by the good wishes of the common people. He went to Tegea in Arcadia, where he ultimately died. Micythus made many offerings at Olympia in fulfillment of a vow he had made for the recovery of his son, who was ill of a wasting disease. His son recovered and Micythus carried out his vow. On one of the offerings set up was inscribed his gratitude and his vow.

Midas (mī'das). In Greek mythology, a Phrygian king, the son of Cybele and a satyr. Some say he was the son of Gordius, who became king of Phrygia, but others say he was adopted by Gordius who was childless, and succeeded him as king. Midas had famous rose gardens in which, it was said, the sweetest roses in the world grew of themselves. When Dionysus passed through his lands, Silenus, who was in his train, fell behind and was captured by peasants. They took him to King Midas. Silenus amused the king by telling him fantastic tales of the strange lands he had visited with Dionysus. Midas treated him kindly and after some days restored him to Dionysus. The god was grateful to Midas and offered to grant him the fulfillment of any wish he might make. Midas asked that whatever he touched might be turned to gold. Dionysus granted his wish, although he thought it an unworthy one, and Midas at once tested it. He touched the pillars of his palace, the grain in his fields, the very earth itself: all were instantly turned to gold. Midas was delighted. However, when he was hungry and would eat, or thirsty and would drink, whatever he put into his mouth was also turned to gold. Deeply regretting his greedy wish, he prayed to Dionysus, acknowledging that he had done wrong to ask such a gift and praying that it might be taken from him. Dionysus pitied him. He told Midas to go and bathe in the headwaters of the Pactolus River to free himself of his ruinous gift. Midas obeyed his instructions. His miraculous powers were washed off in the river, whose waters and sands ever after bore grains of gold. Midas promoted the worship of Dionysus and founded the city of Ancyra. He also sent gifts to the shrine of Delphi, the first foreigner to do so, and dedicated his throne there, where it remained a thing worthy to see for a long time. But now Midas made another stupid mistake.

Apollo and Pan engaged in a musical contest with Tmolus as judge. Tmolus awarded the prize to Apollo, but Midas disagreed with the award and maintained that Pan was the winner. For having ears so unfitted to judge the god's music, Apollo caused long ass-ears to grow from the head of Midas. In deep humiliation he concealed them under a cap, but he was unable to conceal them from his barber. Midas warned the barber, on pain of death, not to reveal his secret. The barber was tormented because he could not tell his strange news to a soul. Unable to keep it to himself any longer, he went to the bank of the river, dug a deep hole there, and whispered into it, "King Midas has ass's ears." Then he filled in the hole and went away relieved. But reeds growing on the spot whispered the secret and soon it was known throughout the land. When Midas realized that his disgrace was common knowledge, he ordered the barber to be killed and then drank bull's blood, and so died himself.

Midea (mid'e-ā). In Greek legend, a woman of Phrygia. She was the mother of Licymnius by Electryon. Licymnius was married to Perimede, sister of Creon, king of Thebes.

Midea. In ancient geography, a city in C Argolis. This area of Argolis was ruled by Proetus, brother of Acrisius, and passed to his son, Megapenthes. When Perseus, cousin of Megapenthes, accidentally killed his grandfather Acrisius, he did not want to return to Argos. He exchanged his kingdom with Megapenthes and so became ruler of Midea, Tiryns, and Mycenae, which he founded. Electryon, son of Perseus, succeeded him as ruler, and when he in his turn was accidentally slain by Amphitryon, Sthenelus, father of Eurystheus, seized the kingdom. He kept Mycenae and Tiryns for himself, but gave the rest of the country, with Midea as its capital, to Atreus and Thyestes, the sons of Pelops. By the time Pausanias passed this way in the 2nd century A.D., Midea lay in ruins.

Migonitis (mī-gō-nī'tis). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as goddess of love, meaning "Uniter." Paris raised a sanctuary to Aphrodite Migonitis on the Greek mainland opposite the island of Cranaë, because on the island he first embraced Helen after he had carried her away from Menelaus in Sparta.

Milesians (mī-lē'zhānz). Inhabitants of Miletus (q.v.).

Milesian Tales (mī-lē'zhān). Short stories, usually witty and frequently erotic if not obscene, greatly in vogue among the Greeks and Romans. Aristides of Miletus (fl. c100 B.C.) wrote or more likely compiled, in Greek, a work now lost, the Milesiaca, a collection of such short stories. In the 1st century B.C. the Roman historian Cornelius Sisenna published a Latin translation, which as the Milesiae Fabulae had wide popularity. They are mostly lost, but specimens survive in Petronius' Satyricon and Apuleius' Metamorphoses ("The Golden Ass."). The best is the merry tale of the Widow of Ephesus, in the Satyricon. They are the antecedents of Boccaccio's Decameron and a never-ending stream of such compositions. (JJ)

Miletus (mī-lē'tus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Apollo and Aria (Deione, according to Ovid), born in Crete. Minos, Rhadamanthys, and Sarpedon, the sons of Europa, quarreled for the love of Miletus. The beautiful youth preferred Sarpedon. Minos went to war against them and Miletus fled with many followers to Caria in Asia Minor. There he killed the giant, Asterius, who had been ruling the land, and whose bones, when they were disinterred, measured ten cubits in length. Miletus founded the city and kingdom of Miletus and married Cyaneë, daughter of the river-god of the Maeander. She bore him the twins Byblis and Caunus.

Miletus. In ancient geography, a city in Caria, SW Asia Minor, situated on the coast opposite the mouth of the Maeander River. It was the principal settlement of the 12 Ionian cities in Asia. According to tradition, it was taken by Miletus, son of Apollo and Aria, who fled to Caria from Crete with a large fleet. There he found a city ruled by Asterius, son of the giant Anax, and inhabited by a people called Anactorians. Miletus overcame the natives, killed Asterius and buried him on the island of Lade. He seized the city and named it after himself. In later times, Neleus, son of Codrus the legendary king of Athens, is said to have led a colonizing expedition of Ionians from Attica and, having landed at Miletus, his companions mixed with the inhabitants and brought their own culture to the region. Some say Neleus and his followers destroyed the old city and built a new one.

Historically, Miletus is thought to have been founded about the 12th century B.C. by Ionian Greeks. The city was attacked by the Lydian kings from the time of Gyges (c685–c653 B.C.) to the time of his great-grandson Alyattes (c617–560 B.C.). Alyattes attacked Milesia (the walled city and its surrounding territory) year after year at the time of the harvest. He marched his forces to the piping of flutes and the strumming of harps through the countryside and burned the standing grain, but did not destroy the houses as he wanted the owners to return and plant new crops that he could again plunder. He harried Miletus in this way because he could not take the city by direct attack, since it was strongly walled and commanded the sea, and he thought by this means to force it into submission. In all this time, only Chios of the Ionian cities sent any aid to Miletus. In the sixth year of Alyattes' war (Lydians had been carrying on the war more or less regularly for 12 consecutive years), when the Lydians set fire to the grain, a violent wind carried the flames to the temple of Athena Assesia and burned it to the ground. Afterward, Alyattes fell into a lingering sickness, and on inquiry at Delphi was told that no answer would be forthcoming until he rebuilt the temple of Athena Assesia. Alyattes sent a herald to Miletus to ask for a truce, that he might have time to build the temple. At this time Thrasybulus, the most famous of the Ionian tyrants, was tyrant of Miletus. Under his rule Miletus flourished brilliantly and planted Milesian colonies on the Euxine Sea. Thrasybulus had been informed of the oracle and was expecting that Alyattes would ask for a truce. He arranged for all the meager supply of grain in the area to be brought to the market-place, and when the herald of Alyattes arrived, he found the Milesians feasting and making merry. The herald was astonished, and reported what he had seen to Alyattes. He too was astonished at the apparent prosperity of the Milesians after so many years of war and destruction of their crops, and decided it was not worthwhile to pursue his war against a people who flourished so in adversity. He ended the war and made an alliance of friendship with Miletus. He then built two temples of Athena at Assesus to make up for the one that had been burned, and recovered from his sickness. Thus, according to Herodotus, the ruse of Thrasybulus with the food was successful in ending the war.

During the reign of Croesus, son and successor of Alyattes, Miletus seems to have submitted to Lydian rule on favorable terms. When Croesus was conquered by Cyrus, Miletus alone of the Ionian cities was not subject to attack, because the Milesians, well aware of the weakness and divisions of Ionia, made an alliance with Persia on the same terms as the one they had with Lydia, rather than joining the weak league of Ionian cities in an attempt to resist. Miletus had reached a great peak of prosperity by the time Darius became king of Persia. Her goods were sent throughout the Greek world; Milesian coins bearing the figure of a lion turned up wherever trade was carried on; over 60 Milesian colonies had been founded, among them were Istria on the Adriatic, Sinope, Trapezus, Cyzicus, and many others on the Euxine Sea, and Abydos on the Hellespont. Milesian traders settled in Naucratis in Egypt, and built a temple of Apollo there. The oracle of Apollo at Branchidae in Milesian territory was famous. But Miletus had suffered much from internal disorders, and asked the Parians to compose the differences between the different factions in their country. The Parians, according to Herodotus, went through the land outside the city walls, noting down the names of the owners of any farms that were prosperous in the midst of the desolation caused by civil strife. When they had completed their survey, they proposed that those who had shown they could maintain their own property in the midst of disorder should be made the governors over the others.

In the time of Darius, Histiaeus was tyrant of Miletus. He had accompanied Darius to the Hellespont when the latter invaded Thrace, and he supported Darius because Darius maintained the tyrants. But later Darius called Histiaeus to his court at Susa and kept him there as his friend and counselor, so he said, and Histiaeus, anxious to return to Miletus but constrained to remain in Susa, became one of the inciters of the Ionian revolt against Persia. Under the guidance of his nephew and son-in-law, Aristagoras, who had succeeded him as tyrant of Miletus, the city played a leading part in the revolt (499 B.C.). The revolt was determined upon for the wrong reasons; it was badly planned and ineffectually carried out. The Persians gave it their full attention and put it down with determination. The Ionians were defeated in a sea battle at Lade by a Phoenician fleet sent against them by Persia. Then the attack was concentrated on Miletus. The city was besieged by sea and land, mines were driven under the walls, and the city was taken in 494 B.C., nearly six years after the revolt broke out. The fall of the city fulfilled an oracle that had been given by the priestess at Delphi:

Then shalt thou, Miletus, so oft the contriver of evil,

Be to many, thyself, a feast and an excellent booty.

For now the Persians killed most of the men, put the women and children into slavery, and plundered and burned the oracle and temple at Didyma (Branchidae). Herodotus, who tells of these things, fairly adds that the Milesians who were carried off to the court of Darius at Susa received no injury at his hands, but were settled by him in another part of his empire. Nor had Darius ordered the burning of Apollo's temple, and he rebuked the officer responsible because, he said, "Apollo had always told the truth to the Persians." The Athenians were grief-stricken over the capture of their daughter city Miletus, and showed their grief in their treatment of the poet Phrynichus. When his drama, The Capture of Miletus, was presented, it is said that the entire audience burst into tears. A law was passed that the drama should never be presented again to remind the Athenians of their loss, and Phrynichus was fined.

After the Persian defeat at Mycale in 479 B.C., the Persians withdrew from the coast and Miletus joined the Delian League, from which it revolted in 412 B.C. In 334 B.C. the city was captured by Alexander the Great. Miletus was a flourishing trading city, a great colonizer, and a center of literature and philosophy. It was the birthplace of the philosophers Thales and Anaximander, and of the traveler Hecataeus, and the courtesan Aspasia.

Milo (mī'lō) or Milon (mī'lon). Greek athlete, famous for his strength, born at Croton, Magna Graecia, Italy, and active in the last part of the 6th century B.C. He was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic Games and six times at the Pythian, and many stories were told of his extraordinary feats of strength, of which the best-known is his carrying a heifer, four years old, on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, then slaying it with his fist and eating the whole of it in a day. He is said to have been devoured by wolves which attacked him while his hands were caught in a cleft tree which he had endeavored to rend.

Milo, Titus Annius Papianus. Roman partisan leader, a rival of Clodius; killed in Lucania, Italy, 48 B.C. The gangs of toughs hired by the two rivals kept Rome in constant uproar during the struggle between Pompey and the conservative group on the one hand, and the democratic party on the other. Milo, an adherent of Pompey, was tribune of the plebs in 57 B.C. and had Cicero recalled from exile. The struggle came to a climax in 52 B.C., when Milo and Clodius met by chance at Bovillae; Milo's band, at his orders, set upon Clodius' and Clodius was killed. Feeling ran high and Milo, after a trial, was exiled to Massilia. Cicero's speech in his behalf was not delivered for fear of violence; the oration (Pro Milone) which we possess is an expanded version published after the trial. Milo joined with Marcus Caelius Rufus in a revolt (48 B.C.) against Caesar and was killed. He was married to Sulla's daughter Fausta.

Milo (mē'lō). Italian name of Melos.

Miltiades (mil-tī'ā-dēz). Son of Cypselus, lived 6th century B.C. He governed the cities of the Chersonese (Gallipoli Peninsula), which came into his possession, according to Herodotus, in the following manner: The Dolonci, a Thracian tribe of the Chersonese, sent envoys to Delphi to inquire of the oracle how they could settle a war they were waging against their northern neighbors. The priestess told them to take back to the Chersonese with them the first man to offer them hospitality after they left the temple. The envoys journeyed all the way from Delphi to Athens without being offered hospitality, but when they passed the house of Miltiades, he noticed their strange dress and the lances they carried and called them into his house for refreshment and lodging. After they had eaten, the Dolonci told Miltiades of the oracle and urged him to accompany them to the Chersonese. This was during the reign of the tyrant Pisistratus in Athens, and Miltiades, his political enemy, chafed under his government. He agreed to accompany the Dolonci and took with him many Athenians as colonists. Arrived in the Chersonese, Miltiades became as autocratic a ruler, over the Dolonci and the Athenians who had come with him, as Pisistratus was over the Athenians in Athens. He built a wall across the narrow neck of the Chersonese to safeguard it from attacks. Next he crossed the Hellespont (Dardanelles) and attacked Lampsacus. In the engagement he was taken prisoner, but when Croesus, king of Lydia, an admirer of Miltiades, heard of this he threatened to cut down the Lampsacenes "like a fir" unless they released Miltiades. The Lampsacenes learned from one of their wise men that the particular reference to the "fir" was made because the fir of all trees is the only one that does not put forth new shoots when it is cut down, but dies completely. They immediately freed Miltiades. After his death the people of the Chersonese made sacrifices to Miltiades as the founder of their country, and established games in his honor, in which Lampsacenes were forbidden to take part.

Miltiades. Athenian general, c550-489 B.C. He was the son of Cimon and the nephew of Miltiades, son of Cypselus, whom he ultimately succeeded as ruler of the Chersonese (c524 B.C.). When he arrived in the Chersonese to take up the government, he confined himself in his house on the pretext of mourning his brother, his immediate predecessor. According to Herodotus, the leading men of the area came to his house to offer him comfort. Miltiades had them all cast into prison, although they had shown no enmity to him, and made himself tyrant. He married

Hegesipyle, daughter of Olorus, king of Thrace. When Darius I, king of Persia, subdued Thrace and then marched into Scythia (c516–513 B.C.), Miltiades commanded the Chersonesites at the Ister (Danube) against the Scythians. Darius crossed into Scythia by means of a bridge he caused to be built over the Ister. He left Ionians to guard the bridge against his return. The Scythians circled around the forces of Darius and reached the bridge before him as he retreated from their country. The Scythians urged the Ionians to destroy the bridge and prevent Darius from using it on his return. According to Herodotus, Miltiades also advised the destruction of the bridge but was outvoted by Ionian tyrants loyal to Darius. Thus he became an enemy of the Persian king. That this story is of doubtful validity is shown by the fact that Miltiades was not disturbed subsequently by Darius. He went back to the Chersonese at the request of the Dolonci. During the Ionian revolt against Persia that broke out in 499 B.C., Miltiades seized the islands of Lemnos and Imbrus. As the forces of Darius drew nearer to the island of Tenedos, Miltiades fled to Athens (493 B.C.). On his arrival there he was accused of tyranny, but was acquitted by his fellow citizens because his conquest of Lemnos and Imbrus brought them under Athenian dominion. Darius resolved to punish Athens and Eretria for their part in the Ionian revolt and sent Artaphernes and Datis at the head of an expedition to attack them. The Persians took Eretria, enslaved the population, and burned the temples. They then pushed on toward Athens. Led by Hippias, exiled tyrant of Athens, they landed at Marathon. Before the threat of the Persian attack Miltiades was made one of the ten generals to direct the defense. He was a bitter enemy of Hippias; he was the best acquainted of all the Athenians with Persian methods of warfare, and he became the guiding spirit of the resistance at Marathon. According to the traditional account, the ten generals were equally divided on the question of resisting the Persians at Marathon. Miltiades, hot for the attack, persuaded the polemarch Callimachus who had the power (at this time in Athenian history) to supervise military matters and to cast a vote with the generals. According to Herodotus, Miltiades told Callimachus that by his vote he could make his country free or could enslave it. Callimachus voted to attack. The Persians, planning an amphibious invasion of Athens, embarked part of their army on ships and the remainder began to march on Athens. On the plain of Marathon they were met by the Greeks, led into a trap by the apparent collapse of the Greek center, and slaughtered by the more heavily-armed though outnumbered Greeks. Miltiades then turned quickly and marched back to Athens to face the threatened landing from the Persian ships, but the Persians, rather than land, drew off and gave up their expedition. After this great and decisive victory Miltiades was held in the highest esteem by the Athenians. He was given command of a fleet of 70 Athenian ships, with which he attacked, for reasons now uncertain, the island of Paros. The Parians withdrew into their city and submitted to siege. According to their account as given by Herodotus, Miltiades, unable to overcome them, received a Parian priestess, Timo, who suggested to him if he wished to take the city he must do certain things in the sacred precinct of Demeter which lay outside the walls of the city. He acted on her advice, went to the precinct, leaped over the wall, and proceeded to the sanctuary. There, according to Herodotus, he was overcome with horror at what he was about to do (Herodotus does not know what it was), and turned back, but on leaping again from the wall he injured his leg. Because of his injury and the stubbornness with which the Parians resisted, he was forced to withdraw from Paros after a siege of 26 days without adding anything to the wealth or power of Athens. On his return to Athens he was charged with having deceived the Athenians concerning the use of the 70 ships they had granted him. His life was spared because of his former contributions to Athens, but he was fined 50 talents. His wound had turned gangrenous so that he could not defend himself, and he died of it before the fine could be paid, but this was ultimately done by his son Cimon. The Parians, when they learned of Timo's treachery, asked the oracle if she should not be put to death. They were told by the oracle to spare her, as it had been decreed that Miltiades would come to an unhappy end and Timo had been merely the instrument that lured him to his destruction.

Milvian Bridge (mil'vi-an). [Also: Mulvian Bridge; Italian, Ponte Milvio; Latin, Pons Milvius or Mulvius.] Ancient bridge across the Tiber River N of Rome, built, to replace an earlier wooden structure, by Aemilius Scaurus in 109 B.C., at the crossing of the river by the Via Flaminia. It was the site of the victory of Constantine over Maxentius (312 A.D.) and of the vision of Constantine of a cross in the sky, which led him to embrace Christianity. The bridge was reconstructed in the 13th century, and was again repaired in the 19th century. Of the four original main arches, two survive, and the bridge continues in use for heavy traffic.

Milyas (mil'i-as). In ancient geography, a region in SW Asia Minor, of uncertain extent, usually including parts of Lycia and Pisidia.

Mimas (mi'mas). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle he was burned by a ladle of molten metal flung at him by Hephaestus and was killed by Heracles.

Mimas. In Roman legend, a son of the Trojan Theano, born on the same night as Paris. He was a follower of Aeneas and fled with him from Troy. In the war that the Latins waged on Aeneas and his Trojans when they arrived in Italy, Mimas was slain by Mezentius.

Mimnermus (mim-nér'mus). Greek elegiac poet, of Colophon. He was an older contemporary of Solon and was active c630-600 B.C. He was a master and creator of the romantic or erotic elegy, and was chiefly celebrated for his work Nanno, of which fragments only remain. In this collection of poems, named for a beautiful flute-player who did not return his love because he was so old, he evokes past lovers, urges youth to enjoy love while they can, and laments the passing of time that brings a chill to love. Fragments of rich and spirited war poems also remain. Because of the great romantic beauty of his language the ancients called him "the sweet singer," and his influence on later erotic elegists was great.

which it joins about 11 miles SE of Mantua. Minerva (mi-nér'va). In Roman mythology, one of the three chief divinities, the other two being Jupiter and Juno. The chief seat of the cult of all three was the great temple on the Capitoline Hill. Minerva also had a sanctuary on the Aventine Hill, especially popular with artists and poets, and one on the Caelian Hill. Minerva was originally an ancient Italian goddess adopted from the Etruscans by the Romans. She was the goddess of wisdom and inventiveness, the patroness of the arts of women, especially spinning and weaving, and a goddess of artisans, a more important patronage in Etruria than in Rome. She was also the goddess of artists, sculptors, actors, poets, physicians, teachers, and students. Her chief festival was the Quinquatrus, celebrated on March 19, the date of the founding of her temple, and lasting for five days. Sacrifices were offered, gladiatorial contests were held, and social gatherings were enjoyed by those under her patronage. In Roman myth, Minerva was the virgin daughter of Jupiter, the supreme god, and hence was identified, as the Romans came more and more under the influence of Hellenic culture, with the Greek Athena. Like Athena, Minerva was represented in art with a grave and majestic countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and wearing long full drapery, and on her breast the aegis. Minos (mi'nos, -nos). In Greek mythology, a son of Europa and Zeus, born on the island of Crete. He was the brother of Rhadamanthys and Sarpedon. Asterius, king of Crete, married Europa and adopted her three sons as his heirs. When they grew up the brothers quarreled over the affections of Miletus, a son of Apollo and Aria and, when Miletus showed a preference for Sarpedon, Minos drove him out of the country and banished Sarpedon. Minos married Pasiphaë, daughter of Helios and Persa. She bore him Acacallis (Acalles), Ariadne, Androgeus, Catreus, Glaucus, and Phaedra, and, some say, Deucalion, the father of Idomeneus. Minos was also the father of sons by the nymph Paria and was, according to some accounts, the lover of Procris, wife of Cephalus. He pursued Britomartis and others. Upon the death of Asterius, Minos wished to become king of Crete. He declared that he had received the kingdom from the gods, and in proof of his special favor in their sight he claimed that whatever he prayed for would be accomplished. As he was sacrificing to Poseidon, he prayed that a bull might emerge from the sea, which he promised he would then sacrifice to Poseidon. Poseidon answered his prayer by sending a magnificent white bull from the sea. Minos was so enchanted with the handsome specimen that he put the bull among his own herds and sacrificed another in its place. He became king of Crete and established laws which it is said he received from Zeus, who met Minos in a cave and gave him the laws. But Poseidon punished Minos for his failure to fulfill his vow by sacrificing the bull which he had sent him from the sea. He caused Pasiphaë to conceive an unnatural passion for the bull. With the help of Daedalus, the marvelous smith who had fled to Crete and had been welcomed by Minos, she was able to gratify her passion, and ultimately bore Asterius, or Asterion, called the Minotaur, a monster with the head of a bull and the body of a man. Minos, to conceal this evidence of disgrace to himself and Pasiphaë, commanded Daedalus, on the advice of an oracle, to build the Labyrinth in which to hide the Minotaur. The bull escaped from the herds of Minos and ravaged the island until Heracles came and, as one of his labors, subdued the bull and rode on its back across the sea to Hellas. The bull was turned loose in Hellas. It ravaged the plains about Marathon and became known as the Marathonian Bull. Some say Androgeus, son of Minos, journeyed to Athens and took part in the Panatheneia. He was victorious in all his contests and, out of jealousy, King Aegeus of Athens sent him to slay the bull. Androgeus was himself slain in the attempt. But others say that it was Theseus who slew the bull and that Aegeus caused Androgeus to be ambushed while he was on his way to Thebes, because Aegeus feared that Androgeus was conspiring in a revolt that was brewing against the rule of Aegeus. Androgeus bravely fought those who attacked him from ambush but was slain. Minos had by this time made himself master of the sea, the first ruler to do so, and when he learned of the death of Androgeus, he vowed vengeance on Athens. He won the support of some of the island princes to his projected war against Athens. He bribed with gold the princess Arne of Siphnus to become his ally, and sought the help of Aeacus of Aegina, but Aeacus refused to aid him and allied himself to the Athenians. Minos attacked Nisa on the Isthmus of Corinth. Scylla, the daughter of King Nisus, saw Minos as she watched the battle from a tower, and fell in love with him. She resolved to betray her father and to help Minos. In fulfillment of this resolve she crept into her father's bed chamber at night and cut off a magic golden, or some say purple, lock of his hair. This lock of hair protected the life and kingdom of Nisus. Scylla gave it to Minos who willingly accepted it, and the city fell into his hands. But he scorned Scylla for betraying her father and refused to take her with him to Crete. He could not subdue Athens, and prayed to Zeus to avenge his son's death. His prayer was answered: all Hellas was shaken by earthquakes and afflicted by famine. An oracle instructed the leaders of the Greek states to request Aeacus, king of Aegina, to pray to their gods on their behalf. When this was done, the earthquakes ceased everywhere except in Attica. The Athenians now sought advice from the oracle at Delphi. They were informed that they must submit to whatever demands Minos might make if they wished to be spared further earthquakes. Minos demanded that they send a tribute of seven youths and seven maidens to Crete every nine years. The Athenians were compelled to submit; the youths and maidens were sent to Crete and there were devoured by the Minotaur. The third time the Athenian youths and maidens came to Crete, Theseus, son of King Aegeus, was one of their number. With the help of Ariadne, daughter of King Minos, he slew the Minotaur and escaped with Ariadne and his fellow Athenians. Minos, who had welcomed Daedalus the smith when he first came to Crete, and later employed him to build the Labyrinth, now discovered that Daedalus had helped Pasiphaë to indulge her passion for the bull. He imprisoned Daedalus and his son in the Labyrinth. Some say Pasiphaë freed them but they could find no ship to take them from the island, and others say Minos had simply forbidden Daedalus to leave Crete. He escaped with his son by means of wax wings which he constructed. He flew to Italy, having lost his son in the sea on the way, and went to the court of King Cocalus in Sicily. Minos resolved to secure his return. As he did not know where Daedalus had gone he resorted to a stratagem to find him. He procured a many-chambered shell and, taking it with him as he sailed about the Mediterranean, he offered a rich reward to the man who could pass a thread through it. When he landed in Sicily, he showed the shell to King Cocalus, who undertook to have the shell threaded as Minos desired. Cocalus gave the shell to Daedalus, who succeeded in threading the shell with the aid of an ant and some honey. When the threaded shell was returned to Minos, he knew he had found Daedalus, as no one else could have found such an ingenious solution. He demanded the surrender of Daedalus.

lowers and they buried him in a fine tomb in Camicus in Sicily. Later his bones were restored to Crete. Minos was the greatest ruler of his time, and was regarded as a friend of Zeus, who made him a judge in the Underworld. He divided the good from the bad and assigned the spirits to their final home in Tartarus. Cases that were too difficult for Rhadamanthys and Aeacus, the other judges of Tartarus, were turned over to Minos. Ruins of a palace at Cnossus (q.v.) in Crete, said to have been the palace of Minos and occupied in the first half of the second millennium B.C., were excavated by Sir Arthur Evans early in the 20th century, and a maze, distinct from the palace, has been found which may have been the Labyrinth of Daedalus. Archaeologists generally agree, however, that the Labyrinth was the Palace of Minos itself (labyr-inthos, "Place of the Double Ax," from labrys, "double-ax").

Cocalus did not at once refuse. Instead he invited Minos to remain as a guest in his palace, and as Minos was resting in his bath the daughters of Cocalus, who did not want to lose Daedalus, poured boiling water or hot pitch on Minos and scalded him to death. Cocalus returned his body to his Cretan fol-ans to send him periodically as a tribute. The Minotaur was killed by the son of Aegeus, the hero Theseus, with the assistance of Minos' daughter, the princess Ariadne, who thereupon eloped with Theseus. The Cretans claimed that there was no such animal, and that Pasiphaë had an intrigue with one Taurus, a general under Minos, and that one of her children rather too closely resembled Taurus. Another, and anthropologically very attractive, explanation is that for certain rituals, as in many other primitive contexts, the priest, or priest-king of Cnossus wore an animal-head mask, in this case a mask representing a bull, and that the story of the figure with a human body and bull's head may have reached the Greek mainland with a bronze-age traveler who had happened to observe such a ritual without fully understanding it. Minthe (min'thē) or Menthe (men'-). In Greek mythology, a nymph who was transformed into a mint plant by Persephone to prevent her from being seduced by Hades. Or, as others say, she was a nymph transformed by Hades into a mint plant to protect her from the jealousy of Persephone. In either case, she became a mint plant because she had aroused the interest of Hades. Mint was used in funeral rites, and the barley water which Demeter drank at Eleusis when she was searching for Persephone was flavored with mint.

Minturnae (min-tēr'nē). The Roman historian Livy mentions three oppida (cities) of the Aurunci or Ausones, an Italic people of Ausonia, on the border between Latium and Campania, which were captured by the Romans on the same day, he says, and by the same stratagem, in 314 B.C. These three oppida were Ausona, Vescia, and Minturnae or Menturnae. A Roman citizen colony was founded at Minturnae in 295 B.C. The site of Minturnae has never been lost; it lies in the Vescian Plain, on the right bank of the river Liris (the modern Garigliano) a mile from its mouth. Before excavation enough classical remains survived above ground (three temples, a theater, an amphitheater, an aqueduct, and, if anyone had looked for them, sections of the fortification wall) to suggest the size and importance of the ancient city. On the right bank of the Liris, near its mouth, excavations by Mingazzini in the 1920's revealed the primitive temple of the obscure local Dea Marica (q.v.), now explained as the Goddess of the Marsh, with extensive deposits of votive offerings.

Excavations sponsored by the University of Pennsylvania Museum in 1931-1934 identified at the river's edge the colony of 295 B.C., in a castrum or fortified camp plan strikingly similar to the famous 4th century B.C. castrum of Ostia, but walled in polygonal limestone, much enlarged later in the 3rd century B.C. by an extension of the fortifications in ashlar tufa. The decumanus, the principal street and east-west axis of the colony, was the Via Appia, surveyed in 312 B.C. and thus anterior to the Roman settlement. In the enlarged city, a block fronting on the Via Appia became the forum, with a small temple of Jupiter and tabernae (shops or booths), which burned about 200 B.C. Following this fire the temple of Jupiter was replaced by a larger Capitolium, dedicated to the "Capitoline Triad," Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, and to replace the tabernae a large three-winged porticus, or colonnade, was erected. In the time of the Gracchi Minturnae was the scene of a slave insurrection, ruthlessly crushed by the crucifixion of the leaders. The city is famous as the locale of one of the adventures of the dictator Caius Marius, who, fleeing from Sulla in 88 B.C., was trapped in the Minturnese marshes and imprisoned in the city, where he so awed his guards and the town fathers that they released him and provided safe transportation to Africa.

Destroyed in another fire, which according to the excavators occurred about 45 B.C., the forum buildings were rebuilt in the fashion of the Augustan period. In the block east of the forum, straddling the foundations of the by then dismantled colony wall, was built a temple of Julius Caesar, enclosed, like the Capitolium, within the wings of a three-winged porticus. In a trapezoidal area north of the forum, between the porticus and the city wall, a theater was erected, the back of whose scene was the wall of the porticus. At about the same time an aqueduct in reticulate masonry, still one of the striking sights of the countryside, was built to bring water from copious springs on the slopes of the Montes Aurunci, about nine miles away to the north. A little later a new temple, dedicated probably to Augustus, or to Augustus and Livia, was squeezed into the forum, between the Capitolium and the east wing of the forum porticus; in the foundations of this temple were reused 29 altars from the compitalia, street-corner shrines which had been damaged in the fire of c45 B.C. These altars, inscribed with the names of more than 300 slaves and freedmen and the names of their patrons, are at once a directory of prominent families and a mine of information about the ethnography of Minturnae in the early 1st century B.C.

During the empire additional temples, baths, and an amphitheater were built, the forum expanded into the area south of the Via Appia, the city gates were embellished, water from the aqueduct was conducted in underground lead conduits to fountains throughout the city, and the familiar forests of statues and other dedications crowded the public areas. The country outside the walls was dotted with villas of the well-to-do, and a few hundred yards upstream the Liris was bridged with a single great masonry arch. Minturnae became Christian and had its own bishop, but before 590 A.D. the site was abandoned and the see was merged with that of Formia. The Liris bridge having fallen, ferry service was reestablished and from this the deserted site received the name of Traetto, which passed also to the medieval town growing, thanks to stones removed from the ruined city, on a hilltop three miles inland. In the 19th century the name was changed to Minturno.

As for the other oppida of the Aurunci, Ausona and Vescia, they disappeared long ago. The modern hamlet of Ausonia, on the Via Ausonia, which crosses along the base of the Montes Aurunci from the Via Appia to the Via Latina, has no connection with ancient Ausona. Suessa, or Sessa Aurunca, a Latin colony on the slopes of the extinct volcano known as Roccamonfina, may stand on the approximate site of ancient Vescia, and perhaps reflects an alternate pronunciation of the ancient name. (JJ) tum (master of the horse, or cavalry commander) under the dictatorship of Fabius Maximus Cunctator (217 B.C.). As did the Roman soldiers, citizens, and the Carthaginian enemy, he scorned the harrying tactics of Fabius against Hannibal, and urged an attack on him. In the absence of Fabius he engaged in a skirmish with a part of Hannibal's forces in disobedience of an order from Fabius, and won a victory which was greatly exaggerated in Rome. Fabius threatened to punish him but such was the joy in Rome over the success of Minucius that, in an unusual step, Minucius was named co-dictator with Fabius. The Roman army was divided between the two commanders. Minucius moved the troops in his command to a separate camp beyond a hill that separated him from Fabius. Hannibal, occupying the hill, lured Minucius into a battle, surrounded him and would have destroyed him if Fabius had not rushed to his rescue and driven off the Carthaginians. According to the accounts, Fabius uttered no word of recrimination against Minucius, but the latter publicly acknowledged his mistake, presented himself in Fabius' camp to thank him, and put himself once more under the command of Fabius. Minucius fell at the battle of Cannae (216 B.C.).

Minyades (mīn-i'ā-dēz) or Minyae (mīn-i'ē). In Greek legend, the daughters of Minyas, king of Orchomenus. They were Alcithoë, Leucippe, and Arsinoë (or Arsippe, or Aristippe). They scorned to take part in the wild revels of Dionysus, and sat quietly at home, spinning and performing their other household tasks. Dionysus appeared to them as a girl, and invited them to take part in the revels but they refused. He then appeared to them as a bull, a lion, and finally as a panther. He caused wine and milk to flow from their spindles, and followed this by causing their spindles to sprout and put forth ivy leaves. At length he drove them mad to punish them for their sacrilege, and they were overcome by an insatiable desire for human flesh. By lot, they chose Hippasus, the child of Leucippe, tore him to pieces and ate him. This is the basis for the assumption that in Orchomenus the human sacrifice was always chosen from the royal family. The murder of Hippasus was annually commemorated at Orchomenus by a feast of atonement and a ritual of seeking Dionysus. The Minyadae, according to some accounts, were transformed by Dionysus into bats. Others say that Hermes changed them into birds.

Minyans (min'yanz) or Minyae (min'yē, min'i-ē). In Greek tradition, a prehistoric people, descendants of Minyas, who founded Orchomenus in Boeotia, and there established his family. Another branch is found at Iolcus in Thessaly and the Argonauts were often called Minyans because they sought to satisfy the ghost of Phrixus, grandson of Minyas, by restoring the Golden Fleece to Hellas. Furthermore, Jason was a descendant of Minyas through his mother, who was the granddaughter of Minyas. One of the early exploits of Heracles was the defeat of the Minyans under their king Erginus.

Minyan Ware (min'yan). In the classification of ceramics which, in the absence of written records, is the principal basis of relative chronology in the Greek bronze age, two wheel-made wares widely associated with the Middle Bronze (Middle Helladic) Period are spoken of, perhaps inaccurately, as Minyan Ware. "Gray Minyan," the older of the two, dates from Middle Helladic 1, c1950-c1800 B.C. "Yellow Minyan" is associated with Middle Helladic 2, c1800-c1600 B.C. When heated sufficiently, Gray Minyan ware becomes yellow, suggesting that the change in fashion resulted simply from a technical improvement in the kiln which made possible a higher firing temperature. The cultural break which was once considered to close the Middle Helladic Period is no longer accepted. Archaeologists now consider that Middle Helladic 2 developed into the following period, Late Helladic 1 (Mycenaean 1), without a break, the earliest phases of the so-called Mycenaean pottery ware being essentially Yellow Minyan ware to which decoration in color has been added. The name Minyan was applied to the gray ware by Heinrich Schliemann, who first identified it in his excavations at Boeotian Orchomenus, legendary seat of King Minyas. (JJ)

Minyas (min'i-as). In Greek legend, a king of Orchomenus in Boeotia. He had migrated from Thessaly to Orchomenus and founded the kingdom. He was famous for his great wealth and was the first king ever to build a treasury. His daughters were transformed into bats for refusing to take part in the worship and revels of Dionysus. See Minyades.

Minyeius (min-i-ē'i-us). In ancient geography, a name given by Homer to the Anigrus River in Elis. Its waters were said to cure certain skin diseases and other maladies. Fish living in its evil-smelling waters were inedible. See Anigrus.

Misenum (mī-sē'num). [Modern name, Miseno.] A promontory at the NW entrance to the Bay of Naples, sheltering a small harbor also known as Misenum. In the period of Greek activity it served as a port of Cumae, but was presently eclipsed by Puteoli, whose greater harbor area enabled it to serve a vast and growing commercial enterprise. Misenum became a fashionable resort for well-to-do Romans, whose custom it shared with Baiae, Puteoli, and Pausilypus Mons (modern Posilipo). In 31 B.C. Agrippa established the headquarters of the imperial fleet at Misenum, and it was from here in 79 A.D. that Pliny the Elder, as fleet admiral, sailed to his death in the eruption of Vesuvius. (JJ)

Misenus (mī-sē'nus). In Roman legend, a son of Aeolus. He was a herald and trumpeter and had been a comrade of Hector in Troy. With Aeneas, he fled from Troy when the city was sacked by the Greeks at the end of the Trojan War. At Cumae in Italy while Aeneas was visiting the Sibyl, Misenus challenged the gods to a musical contest. To punish him for his arrogance, Triton seized him and drowned him. Meanwhile, Aeneas was told by the Sibyl to find the body of a comrade and bury it. He did not know at the time that Sibyl referred to Misenus, but learned of his death soon thereafter, found his body and buried it. The fame of Misenus is preserved in the headland of Campania that is named for him, Cape Misenum.

Mithra (mith'ra) or Mithras (mith'ras). In ancient Persian belief, a god of light and truth, and an ally of Ahura-Mazda in his struggle against evil and darkness. The worship of Mithra had a secret ritual which is imperfectly known at present. The sacrifice of a bull and the application of bull's blood to a candidate for initiation appear to be part of the ritual which was performed in artificial caves. The candidate underwent a number of ordeals, after which his forehead was marked. There were seven grades, each of which may have had its own initiation ceremony. The identification of Mithra with the sun is shown in various dedications. In Vedic mythology, he is Mitra, a sun-god and ruler of the day. The popularity of his cult in Asia may be shown by the frequent occurrence of the name Mithridates. His worship was introduced into Rome, chiefly by soldiers and Asiatic merchants. After Pompey had wrested Pontus in Asia Minor from the Persians, the worship of Mithra superseded the Dionysia, and was prevalent throughout the Roman Empire. In the 2nd century A.D. Mithraism was stronger than Christianity in the Roman Empire.

Mithridates or Mithradates VI (mith-ri-dā'tēz or mith-ṛa-dā'tēz). [Also: Mithridates VI Eupator; called Mithridates the Great.] King of Pontus (120-63 B.C.), born 132 B.C.; died 63 B.C. He succeeded his father at about the age of 11, but his mother made so many attempts to have him slain that he fled to the mountains and lived as a hunter until he felt strong enough to overcome his enemies. He became noted in antiquity for his courage, his strength, his skill in military arts, and for his swiftness of foot. He was a daring rider, skilled hunter, and tremendous eater, and had an enormous capacity for drinking. With these physical qualities was united a keen intelligence. He surrounded himself with Greek men of letters and awarded prizes to the greatest poets, as he did also to the best eaters. But it was an uneasy state to be among his friends, for he distrusted everyone and was ruthless to any who threatened or seemed to threaten him. In 111 B.C. he returned to Sinope and regained his throne by casting his mother into prison and putting his younger brother to death. Ultimately, he murdered his mother, his own sons, and the sister Laodice whom he had married, and once killed all the concubines in his harem to prevent their falling into the hands of his enemies. Having secured his power, he at once undertook a program of conquest. He subjugated the peoples on the eastern shore of the Euxine

Sea, and conquered what is now the Crimea and southern Russia. He next attacked Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, client states of Rome, which caused the interference of that power. He had seized the thrones of Bithynia and Cappadocia. Sulla, as propraetor of Cilicia, restored Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia (92 B.C.) and Nicomedes III was restored to his throne in Bithynia. Mithridates prepared for war on Rome in consequence, and the First Mithridatic War broke out in 88 B.C. Mithridates rapidly made himself master of all the Roman possessions in Asia Minor, except Magnesia on the Maeander, and caused a general massacre of the Roman inhabitants, said to have numbered 80,000, or according to others, 150,000. He also instigated a rising of the European Greeks, to whose aid he sent a formidable land and naval force under his general Archelaus. Mithridates was now at the height of his power. His general controlled the sea, his sons were in Thrace and on the Bosphorus, he himself had won large areas of Roman interest in Asia, and he sat in Pergamum, handing out provinces and principalities to his friends. There an omen of evil came to him. As he sat in the theater a Victory, bearing a crown in her hands, was being lowered over him so that the crown would be deposited on his head. As it was about to touch his head, the mechanism failed; the Victory fell and was smashed to pieces. The portent was followed by the defeat of Archelaus by Sulla at Chaeronea in 86 and at Orchomenus in 85 B.C. Sulla crossed the Hellespont to Asia. Mithridates was forced to sue for peace. He met Sulla at Dardanus in the Troad in 84 and was compelled to accept the peace the Roman general dictated. Mithridates surrendered his fleet, paid a heavy war indemnity, and restored all his conquests, retaining Pontus only. He did not honor all the terms of the peace, failing to evacuate Cappadocia completely, and the Second Mithridatic War broke out in 83. The propraetor Murena invaded Pontus, but was defeated and forced to withdraw. Peace was restored in 81 on the basis of the treaty of Dardanus. In 74 the Third Mithridatic War broke out, occasioned by an attempt on the part of Mithridates to take possession of Bithynia, which had been bequeathed to the Romans by his son-in-law Nicomedes III, late king of Bithynia. Mithridates defeated Marcus Aurelius Cotta at Chalcedon in 74 but was expelled from his own kingdom by Lucullus, and took refuge with his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus defeated the latter at Tigranocerta in 69, but was unable to prevent Mithridates from reconquering Pontus and ravaging Bithynia and Cappadocia because his troops mutinied. Lucullus was superseded by Cnaeus Pompeius Magnus (Pompey the Great), who defeated Mithridates in 66 B.C. and compelled the surrender of Tigranes at Artaxata. Mithridates fled to Panticapaeum (modern Kerch in the Crimea), and was planning a new campaign when his troops revolted. He tried to commit suicide by poison. He had taken small doses of poison for years, however, and his body was immune to its action. He was compelled to order a mercenary soldier to kill him. His body was sent to Pompey, who caused it to be buried in the royal tomb at Sinope.

Mithridatic Wars (mith-ri-dat'ik). Three wars between Rome and Mithridates, king of Pontus. The Romans were commanded in the First (88–84 B.C.) by Sulla and his lieutenant Fimbria; in the Second (83–81 B.C.) by Murena; and in the Third (74–63 B.C.) by Lucullus, later by Pompey the Great. In the last Mithridates and his ally Tigranes were defeated, and Pontus was annexed to Rome in 63 B.C.

Mitra (mī'trā). A long band of stuff, leather, or metal, used variously as a girdle or head-band by the women of ancient Greece. It is mentioned in the Iliad and has been found on archaic statuettes discovered in excavations at Delphi, Olympia, and elsewhere.

Mitrephorus (mit-rē'fōr-us). An epithet of Dionysus, because he wore a band around his head.

Mnemon (nē'mon). In Greek epic, a companion of Achilles, given to him by his mother Thetis, to warn Achilles that he should not kill a child of Apollo, or Apollo would bring about his death. Achilles killed Tenes, a son of Apollo, on the island of Tenedos, and then, realizing what he had done, killed Mnemon for not reminding him.

Mnemosyne (nē-mos'i-nē, -moz'-). In Greek mythology, a Titaness, the daughter of Uranus and Gaea. She was the goddess of memory. Zeus visited her nine nights and she bore him the nine Muses.

Mnemonides (nē-mon'i-dēz). A name for the Muses, from their mother Mnemosyne.

Mnesicles (nes'i-klēz). A brilliant Athenian architect of the Periclean period, known from literary sources to have been the designer of the magnificent Propylaea, or entrance-gates, of the Acropolis of Athens. The construction of the Propylaea was begun in 437 B.C. and left unfinished in 432 B.C., before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War. From his skill and versatility in adjusting the design of the Propylaea to sloping ground, it has been suggested that Mnesicles was also the architect of the split-level Erechtheum, whose builder is otherwise unknown. (JJ)

Modena (mō'dā-nā). See Mutina.

Moerae (mē'rē). [Also: Moirai.] In Greek mythology, the three birth goddesses, identified with the Fates. Homer uses the name in the singular, as of a single divinity, and also in the plural. He also calls them the "spinners of the thread of life." They are spoken of as daughters of Night and Darkness, and also as daughters of Zeus and Themis. Hesiod represented them as three: Clotho (the spinner), Lachesis (disposer of lots), and Atropos (the inevitable). The first spins the thread of life, the second fixes its length, and the third severs it. Their attributes were, respectively, a spindle, a scroll, and for Atropos, a scale or scissors. Their duty was to see to it that the fate allotted at birth was duly carried out. They were more powerful than the gods themselves, as Homer frequently states, and whoever attempted to defy the Moerae was certain to be visited by Nemesis.

Moerages (mē-raj'ē-tēz). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Leader" or "Guide of the Fates." This name was also applied to Zeus, and there was an altar of Zeus Moerages at Olympia. Images of Apollo Moerages and Zeus Moerages were set up at Delphi.

Moesia (mē'shi-ā). In ancient geography, a northeastern province of the Roman Empire, lying N of the Balkans, S of the Danube, and W of the Black Sea, corresponding to the N and C parts of modern Bulgaria and Serbia. It was made a Roman province c16 B.C., was divided under Domitian into Moesia Superior

(in the W) and Moesia Inferior (in the E), and was overrun by Goths in the 3rd and 4th centuries A.D.

Moirai (moi'ri). See Moerae.

Molione (mō-li'ō-nē). In Greek mythology, the mother of Cteatus and Eurytus, twins who were sometimes said to be joined together at the waist, by Actor. When she learned that Heracles had killed her sons in Elis, she asked the Eleans to avenge their death. The Eleans declined to take on this task, whereupon Molione put a curse on any Elean who entered the Isthmian Games. The Eleans respected the curse by refusing thereafter to take part in the Isthmian Games.

Moliones (mō-li'ō-nēz). In Greek mythology, the twin brothers Eurytus and Cteatus. They were the sons of Molione and Poseidon, but as they were brought up by Actor, the husband of Molione, they are also called the Actoridae. According to some accounts they were joined together at the waist. Nestor, relating the heroic exploits of his youth to spur Patroclus into battle during the Trojan War, tells how he was about to conquer the Moliones when they were spirited away in a mist by Poseidon. Later they defeated Nestor in a chariot race. They repelled Heracles when he attacked their uncle, Augeas, in Elis, but were later ambushed and slain by Heracles at Cleonae. The sons of Cteatus and Eurytus sailed to Troy to take part in the Trojan War. As descendants of Molione they were also known as Moliones.

Molorchus (mol-ôr'kus). In Greek legend, a peasant who dwelt near Mount Tretus, the home of the Nemean Lion. His son was killed by the lion, and as he was preparing to sacrifice to Hera to propitiate the goddess, Heracles, on his way to hunt the lion, stopped at his hut. He told Molorchus to wait 30 days. If at the end of that time Heracles had not returned, Molorchus should sacrifice to Heracles the Hero; but if Heracles returned safely, they would sacrifice to Zeus together. Heracles returned on the thirtieth day, having successfully slain the lion, and they sacrificed to Zeus as planned. Some say Heracles made changes in the Nemean Games on this occasion, and that Molorchus planted the grove in which the games were subsequently held. It is also said that Molorchus founded a city in Nemea, which he named for himself.

Molossians (mō-los'i-anz). Ancient tribe of Epirus, in N Greece. They occupied at first a district in the center but ultimately their kings ruled over all Epirus. Their breed of huge hounds was famous.

Molossus (mō-los'us). In Greek legend, the son of Neoptolemus and Andromache, eponymous ancestor of the Molossians.

Molurian (mol-ō'ri-an) Rock. A cliff over the sea near Megara on the Saronic Gulf. It was from this rocky crag that Ino is said to have leaped into the sea with her son Melicertes when she fled from her maddened husband Athamas of Orchomenus. The Molurian Rock was also famous as the spot from which Sciron hurled travelers into the sea, until he himself was thrown from it by Theseus.

Molus (mō'lus.) In Greek mythology, a son of Ares and Demonice. He was the brother of Evenus and the father of Molione.

Moly (mō'li). A fabulous herb of magic power, represented as having a black root and a milk-white flower; it is said by Homer to have been given by Hermes to Odysseus to counteract the spells of Circe.

Momos (mō'mus). [Also: Momos (-mos).] According to Hesiod, the son of Nyx (Night). He is the personification of mockery, ridicule, and censure. He criticized Hephaestus for not putting a door in the breast of the man he had made, so that the inmost secrets of his heart could be revealed. He found fault with Aphrodite because her sandals made too much noise, and criticized Zeus for putting the bull's horns where the bull could not see them.

Moneta (mō-nē'ta). A Roman epithet of Juno, meaning "Adviser" or "Warner." In gratitude for timely warnings, it was said, a temple of Juno Moneta was built on the northern summit of the Capitoline Hill. Connected with this temple were a state office and workshop for the manufacture of coins. This came to be known colloquially as the Moneta, and eventually passed into western languages, e.g., Italian, moneta, French, monnaie, and English, money, mint. (JJ)

Monopteron (mō-nop'te-ron) or Monopteros (-ros). A type of Greek or Roman temple, usually circular and without an enclosed cella, composed of columns arranged in a ring and supporting a cupola or a conical roof. The temple of Rome and Augustus on the Acropolis of Athens, east of the Parthenon, was an example of a monopteron.

Monumentum Ancyranum (mon-ŭ-men'tum an-si-rā'nūm). A long inscription in parallel Latin and Greek versions, containing the text of the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, the official biography of the emperor Augustus, which was inscribed on the walls of the temple of Rome and Augustus at Ancyra (Ankara) in Galatia, Asia Minor, and discovered there in 1855. Fragmentary copies have also been found at Apollonia and Antioch in Pisidia. (JJ)

Mopsuestia (mop-sō-es'chi-ā). [Later Latin name, Hadriana Mopsuestia; modern village name, Misis.] In ancient geography, a city of Cilicia, S Asia Minor, on the Pyramus River E of Tarsus. The city was favored by the emperor Hadrian and received special privileges from him; it was renamed in his honor.

Mopsus (mop'sus). In Greek mythology, a Lapith. He was the son of Ampycus and a nymph, and was taught the augury of birds by Apollo himself. He took part in the battle between the Lapiths and the Centaurs, and it was he who recognized as the soul of the Lapith Caeneus the bird which flew out of the pile of trees and logs under which Caeneus was buried. Mopsus also took part in the Calydonian Hunt, and later went from Thessaly to Iolcus to join Jason on the voyage of the Argo to Colchis for the Golden Fleece. On the way back from Colchis the Argonauts were driven into the shoal waters of Syrtis in Libya, and were carried by a great gale into the desert. Mopsus wandered about in search of water and was bitten by a serpent. This serpent was one of those which sprang up from the drops of blood that fell from the severed head of Medusa when Perseus was carrying it back to Seriphus, and the bite was therefore fatal to Mopsus. Afterward he was worshiped as a hero in Libya, and there was an oracle of Mopsus there.

Mopsus. In Greek legend, a son of Rhacius, king of Caria, and Manto, daughter of the famous seer, Tiresias. He was a noted seer also. In a contest with the seer Calchas, at Colophon, after the Trojan War, Mopsus gave the correct number of figs growing on a fig tree, and accurately predicted the time of birth and the number of pigs in the litter that a sow was about to produce. Calchas, who had been mistaken in both cases, died, as it had been foretold he would do when he met a seer wiser than himself. Mopsus was the founder, with Amphilocheus, of the city of Mallus in Cilicia. When Amphilocheus returned to Argos, Mopsus ruled alone. But Amphilocheus later returned to Mallus, and wished to share in the rule of the city which he had helped to found. Mopsus and Amphilocheus quarreled so violently for control of the throne that it was finally suggested they should engage in a combat to see which should rule. In the duel that followed they killed each other. Afterward a common oracle was set up of Mopsus and Amphilocheus, which became as celebrated for accuracy as the oracle at Delphi. Questions were put to it on wax tablets, and the answers were revealed in dreams.

Morgantina (môr-gan-tē'nā). City in Sicily, in the district known as Serra Orlando, near Aidone, under excavation by an expedition from Princeton University, which has revealed the market-place, public buildings, houses, fortifications, and a cemetery. The culture is native Sicilian under Greek influence; after the Roman annexation of Sicily, Morgantina rapidly declined. The identification of the site as Morgantina, not known previously, emerged from study of the coins found in the excavations. (JJ)

Morpheus (môr'fūs or môr'fē-us). In Greek mythology, one of the sons of Hypnos, or Sleep. Morpheus was the god of dreams who imitated human forms and voices, and was therefore summoned when a dream of human beings was required, as distinct from the bringer of dreams of animals or phantoms. It was Morpheus, for example, who appeared to Alcione as her husband Ceyx, to inform her that Ceyx had been drowned. He is more prominent in literary allusion than in mythology itself, and hence, by extension, is very commonly referred to as the god of sleep.

Morpho (môr'fō). An epithet of Aphrodite, meaning "Shapely." An image of Aphrodite Morpho, representing the goddess veiled and with fetters about her feet, was dedicated by Tyndareus. It was said that it represented the modesty and loyalty demanded by the marriage tie.

Moschion/Motya

Moschion (mos-kí'on). Greek tragic poet; fl. 4th century B.C. Fragments of his work survive.

Moschus (mos'kus). Greek bucolic poet of Syracuse, active in the 2nd century B.C. He claimed to have been a pupil of Bion, but this seems to be a dubious claim. He modeled his poems after those of Theocritus. The work of Moschus was more ornate and less simply based on an unaffected love and understanding of nature than that of his model. Among the eight extant poems of Moschus, one treats the story of Europa; one, which has been widely imitated, is supposedly a description by Aphrodite of the deceptive qualities of her runaway son Eros; a third is a pastoral lament for Bion. The last is doubtfully ascribed to him. His work is usually printed with that of Bion and Theocritus.

Mossynoeci (mos-i-nē'sī). A people of Pontus. They were said to perform private and intimate acts in public and public acts in private, and starved their king to death if he made a mistake in handing down his judgments. The Argonauts on their way to Colchis passed by their country but did not stop.

Motya (mot'ya). [Modern name, S. Pantaleo.] In ancient geography, a Carthaginian city of western Sicily. It was situated on an island in a small bay on the extreme western coast of Sicily. The island is almost completely enclosed in the bay: an arm of the mainland stretches across the north and ends in a long spit of land and protects the bay to the W, or sea side. The city on the island was completely walled, and was connected to the mainland by a causeway. In 398 B.C. Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, marched at the head of a large force and besieged it. To protect themselves from his siege engines, the inhabitants destroyed the causeway. Dionysius drew his ships ashore on the bay and set to work to build a new causeway, a much larger one than that destroyed, in order to attack the city, not with his fleet, but with his siege engines. The Carthaginians sent a fleet to the relief of Motya and blockaded the fleet of Dionysius in the bay. Instead of launching his galleys against the Carthaginian fleet Dionysius marched his army around the bay and attacked them from the shore with catapults that hurled great stones against the ships. This was a new weapon with which the Carthaginians were not prepared to cope. They sailed out of the bay and lurked out of reach of the catapults. Dionysius then put his own ships on great rollers and hauled them across the arm of land to the north, and launched them in the sea on the other side. The Carthaginians decided not to engage him. Leaving the Motyans to their fate, they sailed back to Carthage. Dionysius was now free to besiege the city, his mole having been completed. Because the space in the city was limited, the inhabitants built up into the air. Stone towers as high as six stories studded the city. The towers were out of reach of ordinary siege engines. Dionysius redesigned his engines, putting the operating force atop siege towers of a height to be effective against the towered city. The siege he thus mounted against Motya became a kind of aerial warfare with the besieged and besiegers struggling from the tops of the towers. Those on the siege towers rained stones on the city with catapults, while below the rams of Dionysius battered at the walls. Those defending the city retaliated with flaming pitch hurled at the wooden siege towers, but to no avail. The forces of Dionysius breached the wall and entered the city. This by no means was the end. From their towers the defenders rained missiles and fire on the invaders. The attackers brought in their siege engines and flung bridges across to the towers of the defenders, so that much of the fighting was carried on on these bridges high in the air. Many were flung to their death. Every tower had to be taken individually as the Motyans had no thought of surrender. Day after day the struggle was renewed and each night it ceased as both forces rested. The Motyans could not hope to drive off the Greeks, but they were determined to make a Greek victory costly. Many of Dionysius' men were slain, and he decided on a night attack. He entered a part of the town that was still being defended and completely surprised the Motyans. His forces poured in and massacred the inhabitants, who continued their heroic resistance to the end. At last Dionysius stopped the slaughter. Those who survived were sold into slavery, and the city was given over to his soldiers to plunder. It was a great victory for Dionysius and his new methods of siege warfare, but the next year the Carthaginians returned and recaptured Motya. They, however, did not restore it. Instead they founded a new city, Lilybaeum, on the south side of the bay.

Motyca (mō'ti-kā) or Mutyca (mū'ti-kā). [Modern name, Modica.] In ancient geography, a town of Sicily, situated on a hill between two valleys, near the Mauro River, in the SE corner of Sicily. It was a town of the ancient Sicels.

Mulciber (mul'si-bēr). In Roman mythology, an epithet of Vulcan, meaning "the Melter."

Mulius (mū'li-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a spearman of Augeas, and the husband of Agamede, daughter of Augeas. Nestor killed him in the war between the Eleans and the Pylians. Nestor recounted this exploit of his youth to Patroclus in order to goad him into joining in the battle against the Trojans when the Trojans were about to set fire to the Greek ships. Nestor lamented that he no longer had the vigor he had possessed when he killed Mulius.

Mummius (mum'i-us), Lucius. [Surnamed Achaicus.] Roman consul, active in the middle of the 2nd century B.C. During his consulship (146 B.C.) he defeated the Achaean League and captured Corinth, completing the Roman conquest of Greece. Mummius is noted for the barbarity with which he treated Corinth; according to contemporary sources, all its inhabitants were killed, its art treasures were sent to Rome, and the city was burned to the ground. The material brought to light in the extensive excavations by the American School of Classical Studies at Athens, however, indicates that the city was not completely depopulated, that some inhabitants survived or, having fled, returned to maintain life in the ruins until the city was officially refounded in 44 B.C.

Munda (mun'da). In ancient geography, a town in S Spain, of undetermined location. It is noted for the victory gained (45 B.C.) there by Julius Caesar over the sons of Pompey.

Munippus (mū-nip'us). In Greek legend, the son of Cilla, sister of King Priam, and Thymoetes. He was born earlier on the same day as Paris was born to Priam and Hecuba.

Because of a prophecy that a son born to a woman of the royal house would cause the destruction of Troy, Priam had Cilla and her infant put to death. Actually, the prophecy referred to Hecuba and Paris.

Munitus (mū'ni-tus). In Greek legend, a bastard son of Laodice, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and Acamas, son of Theseus and Phaedra. He was brought up by his great-grandmother Aethra, a captive in Troy. At the fall of Troy Acamas rescued him, but after he had landed in Thrace with his father, he was bitten by a snake and died.

Munychia (mū-nik'i-ā). One of the three harbors serving Athens in the vicinity of Piraeus. The name Munychia is also given to the citadel (height, 284 feet) of Piraeus. On the hill at Munychia was a temple of Artemis. According to legend, once a bear sought refuge in the temple; the people rushed in after it and killed it. At once plague struck the populace, and they learned it would be lifted only if one of the citizens volunteered to sacrifice his daughter. One of the inhabitants agreed to sacrifice his daughter to Artemis. He dressed her and prepared her for the sacrifice, but at the last minute substituted a goat, clad in his daughter's clothes, and sacrificed it in her place. After the death of Hipparchus Hippias fortified the hill of Munychia, in 510 B.C. The democratic opponents of the Thirty Tyrants seized the hill of Munychia, occupied the temple of Artemis, and in the following conflict (403 B.C.) inflicted such damage on the Thirty that they were thrown from power and sought refuge at Eleusis.

Munychion (mū-nik'i-on). The tenth month of the Attic year. It included the latter part of April and the early part of May. A festival of Artemis Munychia was especially celebrated at Munychia, the port of Athens, where her shrine stood, in this month. It commemorated the battle of Salamis.

Musaeus (mū-zē'us). Legendary Greek poet and seer of Attica, associated with Orpheus (as a pupil or, in some accounts, as a son). To him were attributed various poems connected with the mysteries of Demeter at Eleusis, over which he was said to have presided. According to some accounts, he initiated Heracles into the mysteries at Eleusis before he went to the Underworld to fetch

Musaeus/Museum

Cerberus. He was buried at Athens and his tomb was on the Museum, SW of the Acropolis.

Musaeus. [Surnamed Grammaticus.] Greek grammarian who flourished about the 5th century A.D. He was the author of the celebrated love epic Hero and Leander, of which the 340 verses that have been preserved show intense feeling.

Musagetes (mū-sa-jē'tēz). An epithet of Apollo as patron of the Muses.

Muses (mū'zez). Originally there were three Muses: Melete (Meditation), Mneme (Memory) and Aoede (Song). According to the earliest writers, the Muses were goddesses of memory, then inspiring goddesses of song, and later, divinities presiding over poetry, the sciences, and the arts, while at the same time having springs and streams as their special province. According to later tradition, Mnemosyne (Memory) bore nine daughters, the Muses, to Zeus, who lay with her nine nights. They were born in Pieria (and hence called Pierides), and there they frolicked around the sacred Pierian springs; or disported in their sacred grove on Mount Helicon in Boeotia, where the winged horse Pegasus had made the Hippocrene Spring for them by stamping his hoof on the earth; or visited the inspirational Castalian Spring on Mount Parnassus; or went to Olympus where they entertained the gods. As companions of Apollo they learned singing, dancing, and poetry, and shared the mastery of the lyre with him. Because they presided over the musical arts, they were sometimes called on to judge musical contests, as that between Apollo and Marsyas, or challenged to enter them themselves, as by the Sirens, who were defeated and lost their wings, or by the daughters of Pierus, who were also defeated, and changed into magpies. The Muses attended the marriages of Peleus and Thetis and Cadmus and Harmonia, where they entertained the guests at the weddings with music and song. The Muses were the mistresses of healing and prophecy, which they sometimes taught to others, as to Aristaeus, and they had many sanctuaries, sacred groves, and springs throughout the Greek world. Anyone inspired by the "violet-crowned" Muses was blessed and highly venerated, for "Happy is he whom the Muses love, and sweet flows his voice from his lips." The nine Muses and their attributes were: Clio, the muse of history, who wears a wreath and carries a scroll; Euterpe, of music, who carries a double flute; Thalia, of comedy, who has an ivy wreath, a comic mask, and a shepherd's staff; Melpomene, of tragedy, with a tragic mask, an ivy wreath, and sometimes a club or a sword; Terpsichore, of choral dance and song, with a lyre; Erato, of lyric and amorous poetry, with the lyre; Polymnia or Polyhymnia, of the inspired and stately hymn and religious dance, who is usually shown veiled and thoughtful; Urania, of astronomy, who holds a globe; and last of all, Calliope, the chief of the Muses, of heroic or epic poetry, who carries a tablet and stylus. The Muses were intimately associated in legend and in art with Apollo, who as the chief guardian and leader of their company was called Musagetes. The Romans identified their Camenae with the Greek Muses.

Museum (mū-zē'um). The name means "Sanctuary of the Muses," and so was applied not only to established shrines of the Muses but also loosely to schools dedicated to the pursuit of poetry, literature, rhetoric, philosophy, science, and music. In Athens, the Museum was a hill almost directly south of the Acropolis, the farthest E of the group of hills on the SW side of the city; named from an old shrine of the Muses located on it. On the summit stands a conspicuous monument, ornamented with niches, Corinthian columns, statues, and a relief-frieze, to Philopappus, grandson of the last king of Commagene, who became an Athenian citizen. The slopes of the hill, particularly on its southern extension, abound with curious rock-cuttings, for the most part vestiges of prehistoric Athens. These include house foundations, stairs, meeting places with seats, and the so-called prison of Socrates and tomb of Cimon. Between this hill and the Pnyx passed the road to the Piraeus between the Long Walls. The rock is deeply cut by the ruts of chariot wheels and an artificial water channel.

Museum. The most famous Museum was that of Alexandria in Egypt, founded about 280 B.C. by Ptolemy II Philadelphus as an institute for advanced research, populated by scholars attracted from the whole Greek East and supported by the revenues of the state and afterward by the Roman emperors. At its head was a presiding scholar or high-priest (hiereus) of the Muses. Associated with it, but apparently administratively distinct, was the Library, an earnest attempt to gather under one roof the world's store of written learning. It is said that as an incident of the siege of Julius Caesar in Alexandria, 47 B.C., the Library was fired; but a new collection of books was constituted, and the Museum and Library continued in existence through the 4th century A.D. Mutina (mū'ti-nā). [Modern name, Modena.] City of Italy, situated on the Via Aemilia, NW of Bononia (Bologna). Near here, 44-43 B.C., Decimus Junius Brutus was blockaded by Mark Antony, and was relieved by Hirtius, Pansa, and Octavian (the future Augustus), who defeated Antony.

Mutinus (mū-tī'nus) or Mutunus (mū-tō'nus). Ancient Italian god, personifying the sexual function of marriage. Later, in Roman mythology, he became identified with Priapus.

Mutyca (mū'ti-kā). See Motyca.

Mycale (mik'ā-lē). In ancient geography, a mountain in Lydia, Asia Minor, N of Miletus. Here were gathered about 60,000 of the forces of Xerxes, left behind to guard Ionia after the defeat of the Persians at Salamis (480 B.C.). Part of the Persian fleet, not wishing to risk another naval fight with the Greeks, also withdrew to Mycale. There the ships were dragged ashore and a rampart was built around them to protect them and to form a defense for the soldiers. The Greek fleet under Leotychides pursued the Persians to Mycale. Seeing that the Persians did not venture out to meet them, the Greeks disembarked. As the Greeks prepared for battle, a rumor spread through the camp that the Greeks had defeated the Persians at Plataea on that very day. A herald's wand was found lying on the beach, according to Herodotus, which was an indication of the miraculous means by which the news had come from Plataea to Mycale so swiftly. Heartened by the rumor and the sign, the Greeks rushed eagerly into the battle. The struggle was grim and hard-fought on both sides, with neither giving ground at first. When the Athenians on their wing succeeded in breaking through the line of Persian wicker shields, the Persians withdrew into the entrenchment they had created with the ships and the surrounding rampart. The Athenians were so hot in pursuit they swarmed into the entrenchment after them and took the fortress. The Persians fled, and the Greeks fired their ships and took great booty. Thus on the same September day in 479 B.C., or so the story goes, the Persians in Greece under Mardonius were defeated at Plataea, and the Persians in Ionia were defeated at Mycale.

Mycalessia (mī-kā-lē'shi-ā). Epithet of Demeter, from her sanctuary at Mycalessus in Boeotia. This sanctuary was said to be opened up each morning and closed each night by Heracles the Dactyl. A marvelous property of this sanctuary was that offerings of fruit placed before the image in the sanctuary in the autumn remained fresh throughout the following year.

Mycalessus (mī-kā-lē'sus). In ancient geography, a city in Boeotia. It is said to have been so-named from the Greek word for "low," because the cow guiding Cadmus in Boeotia lowed at this place. Diitrephes, the Thracian, came to Mycalessus as he led his Thracians back to their country (c413 B.C.). He took the town and put the entire population to the sword. It is for this reason that the statue of Diitrephes set up on the acropolis at Mycalessus showed him pierced by many arrows. At Mycalessus was a remarkable sanctuary of Demeter Mycalessia.

Mycenae (mī-sē'nē). In ancient geography, a city in Argolis, Greece, about 14 miles SW of Corinth. It was a very ancient settlement, dating from perhaps the 20th century B.C., and was conspicuous in Greek legend and history. According to tradition, Argolis was inhabited by Pelasgians, who fell under the domination of Danaus when he arrived from Egypt with his 50 daughters. The kingdom of Danaus in Argolis was subsequently divided among his descendants. Acrisius became ruler of Argos. His brother Proetus ruled the neighboring region of Tiryns. When Perseus, grandson of Acrisius, unwittingly killed Acrisius, he did not wish to remain in Argos. He exchanged his inheritance with his cousin Megapenthes and became ruler of Tiryns. As Perseus proceeded toward Tiryns, he was overcome by thirst. He stooped to pluck a mushroom and drank the water from its cap. Pleased that he thus quenched his thirst, he founded a city on the spot and named it Mycenae for the mushroom (mykos). Nearby the spot where this occurred is a spring, called by the ancients Persea, which still gives sparkling water to the inhabitants. Some say, however, that Perseus named his city from the cap of his sword, which happened to fall off at this spot, and which has a Greek name very similar to the word for mushroom. At all events, he fortified the city, which was on an eminence rising from the fertile plain, easily defendable and in a position to command routes to and from the sea. He secured the aid of the Cyclopes to build the wall of the city, which is sometimes called "the Cyclopean City," from the huge irregular stones that form its wall. Sthenelus, son and successor of Perseus, received Atreus and Thyestes, sons of Pelops, into his realm when they fled from their father. On the death of Eurystheus, son of Sthenelus, Atreus became king, ended the Perseid dynasty and established that of the Pelopidae, which became the equal of any kingdom in the Peloponnesus. Signs of fire found in the excavations at Mycenae are attributed to the struggles that took place when Atreus assumed mastery. Atreus was followed by his brother Thyestes, who in turn was succeeded by Agamemnon, son of Atreus and brother of Menelaus. The rulers between Perseus and Agamemnon cover the period of time between about the middle of the 14th century, when the city was founded by Perseus, and the fall of Troy, the traditional date of which is 1183 B.C. In the time of Agamemnon, Mycenae was at its apogee. Tiryns, Argos, and Midea were subject to him, as was most of the Peloponnesus and the neighboring islands. As master of a strong maritime empire he exercised influence over most of the Greek mainland and the islands, and drew supporters from the entire area when he led the expedition to Troy to recover Helen. The murder of Agamemnon on his return from his successes at Troy by his wife Clytemnestra and her lover Aegisthus, provides the material for some of the most dramatic pages of Greek tragedy. After an interval in which Mycenae was ruled by Clytemnestra and Aegisthus, Agamemnon was succeeded by his son Orestes and his grandson Tisamenus. During the reign of Tisamenus the Dorians invaded the Peloponnesus, took Mycenae, and destroyed its citadel. Thereafter, the influence and power of Mycenae was in eclipse.

MYCENAEAN WARRIOR
Mycenae crater, c1200 B.C.
National Museum, Athens

As in many cases, history and legend are closely intertwined at Mycenae. Archaeologists consider that the earliest city to occupy the site dated from about the 20th century B.C. In succeeding centuries close relations were established between Mycenae and

Crete, and remains of a distinctly Cretan character, dating from 1600–1400 B.C., have been found in tombs on the site along with other evidences of Cretan domination in this period. Following the establishment of the city of Perseus, c1350 B.C., a distinctively Mycenaean culture developed throughout the area and spread to Asia Minor in the east and to Sicily in the west. In the period of its greatness the kings of Mycenae were the peers of the kings of Egypt and Babylon. From the end of the 12th century B.C. the importance of Mycenae declined so completely that nothing more is heard of it until the Persian Wars, when 80 Mycenaeans went to the aid of Leonidas at Thermopylae and later 200 shared in the victory at Plataea (479 B.C.). The Argives, roused to jealousy by the pride which the Mycenaeans took at having their names inscribed on the tripods at Delphi after the Battle of Plataea, attacked Mycenae and destroyed it c470 B.C. The city never recovered from this attack. Only a village remained on the site. The traveler and writer Pausanias visited there in the 2nd century A.D., and saw parts of the old walls and the Lion Gate (which was never completely obscured). He also claimed to have seen the graves of Atreus and Agamemnon in the citadel, as well as the graves of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus outside the walls (for they, as murderers, could not be buried in the citadel). Modern scholars doubt that Pausanias actually saw the graves, for they must have been covered over; rather, it is thought that they were described to him by local inhabitants who knew of them by tradition. From the time of Pausanias until the 19th century Mycenae was a forgotten village. In that century the site was rediscovered by travelers, and various objects that were uncovered were carried off. It was not until the end of the century that the city as a famous and immensely valuable historical and archaeological site again came to the attention of the world. The original excavations were made by Heinrich Schliemann in 1876–77. Following the account of Pausanias, Schliemann discovered the Grave Circle of Mycenae with its royal shaft graves. Five graves were rapidly cleared and yielded a rich treasure. Later work was done on the site by the Archaeological Society of Athens.

The Mycenae of the Iliad, "that well-built city and fortress," the "golden," "wide-wayed" city especially loved by Hera, as well as the city of much earlier times, has been steadily emerging through archaeological expeditions ever since, notably those undertaken by the British Archaeological Society under Prof. A. J. B. Wace, which were interrupted in 1939 by the outbreak of World War II, and those of the Greek Archaeological Society in the 1950's. In the latest excavations (1952 and following years), a new grave circle has been disclosed, which includes the graves of the ruling families of the 17th and 16th centuries B.C. The shaft graves found by Schliemann and those in the new grave circle uncovered in 1952 were cut into the rock, sealed off, and covered over. They contained many skeletons and objects of value that decorated the bodies of the dead when they were interred. This is of interest as it shows that at the time of these burials the Mycenaeans did not burn their dead, as they did according to the Homeric poems of a later age. Rather, they buried them with all the accoutrements of the living—ornaments, utensils, and weapons. However, once the flesh had disappeared from their bones, no more concern was expressed for their souls or for their journey to the other world, and it appears that the skeletons were somewhat unceremoniously moved to one side to make room for new arrivals in the tombs. Excavations at the site of Mycenae have supplied some of the oldest materials for the study of Greek architecture and art. The site consisted of an acropolis, occupying the apex of a hill, and the lower town, the confused ruins of which are spread over its slopes. The acropolis is triangular, and is surrounded by a massive wall of huge stones (Cyclopean stones), partly shaped. It is entered by the Gate of the Lions, which dates from the 14th century B.C. This gate is at the end of a walled passage so placed that the right, or unshielded, side of an enemy would be exposed to the defenders within the citadel. The opening of the gate is about ten feet wide and high, tapering toward the top, with monolithic jambs and a huge lintel. Above the lintel a large triangular opening is formed by corbeling, and the great slab, two feet thick, which fills this, bears the remarkable relief of two facing rampant lions separated by a column. Close inside of this gate, in a double circle of upright stones 80 feet in diameter, were found shaft graves containing golden ornaments and masks, inlaid sword-blades, and other objects whose discovery astonished the scientific world. According to legend, these were the tombs of Atreus, Electra, Agamemnon, Cassandra, and others of the period. Modern scholars place the date of the tombs earlier than the time of Agamemnon, between the 19th and 16th centuries B.C. Excavations have disclosed on the acropolis a prehistoric palace resembling that at Tiryns, and remains of palaces and temples of later periods that were superimposed on it. Remains still exist of the ramp on which, perhaps, Clytemnestra placed the royal purple for the feet of Agamemnon on his triumphant return from Troy. The bath in which she almost immediately thereafter slew him disappeared when part of the acropolis was destroyed in a landslide. This is the acropolis that the tutor points out to Orestes, in Sophocles' Electra, as "a treasure-house of gold . . . the ancestral home of the family of Pelops, a house of death if ever there was one." The most important monuments of the lower town are the great "beehive" tombs, commonly called treasuries. Of these, one sometimes called "the treasury of Atreus" and sometimes "the tomb of Agamemnon," is a typical example. The interior is a circle about 50 feet in diameter and slightly less in height, covered with a pseudodome formed by corbeling in the horizontal courses of the wall. Indications are that the inner surface of the tomb was decorated with medallions in metal and painted designs. The discoveries at Mycenae threw a flood of light upon the earliest Greek art, particularly in pottery. They were the first important finds of their class, which has since been recognized in a large proportion of Greek settlements of sufficient age, and is everywhere distinguished as Mycenaean. Mycenaean ornament includes geometric decoration, foliage, marine and animal forms, and the human figure. Mycenaean art was practiced and developed through several centuries, and existed contemporaneously with the succeeding dipylon style of decoration, which began c1000 B.C. Among the objects found in the second grave circle, excavated 1952 and following years, are: bronze daggers, spears, swords, and the remains of a leather scabbard; pottery, including painted vases, amphorae, and jars; engraved gems; gold ornaments, including bands, buttons, and ear clips; beads of semi-precious stones; rock crystal bowls and pins with rock crystal heads; and gold cups. The chief objects found at Mycenae are in the National Museum at Athens.

Myconus or Mykonos (mik'ō-nos, mī'kō-nos). [Also: Mikonos.] Island in the Aegean Sea, one of the Cyclades. Area, about 33 square miles. It lies E of Delos, and according to legend was one of the moorings which anchored Delos, hitherto a floating island, to the sea floor when Leto went to Delos to bear her twin children, Apollo and Artemis. The body of Ajax the Less, which had been recovered from the sea, was buried here by the sea-goddess Thetis.

Mygdon (mig'don). In Greek legend, a king of the Bebryces. While waging war against the Mariandyni, he was slain by Heracles, their ally. He was succeeded by his brother Amycus.

Mylae (mī'lē). [Modern name, Milazzo or Melazzo.] Seaport on the N coast of the island of Sicily, about 18 miles W of Mesana. Near here the Roman fleet under Duilius gained its first naval victory over the Carthaginians in 260 B.C., and Agrippa defeated Sextus Pompey's fleet in 36 B.C.

Mylasa (mī-lā'sa). [Also: Mylassa; modern town name, Milās.] In ancient geography, an inland town in SW Asia Minor, in Caria. It was the capital of the later Carian kingdom.

Myles (mī'lēz). In Greek tradition, a son of Lelex, who succeeded his father as king in Laconia. Myles was credited by the Spartans as being the inventor of the water-mill as a means of grinding grain. He was succeeded by his son Eurotas.

Mylitta (mī-lit'a). In Babylonian mythology, a fertility and birth goddess, identified by Herodotus with the Greek Aphrodite, and by other writers with Ishtar. Her cult demanded that every woman serve in her temple as a sacred prostitute, until released by a fee from a stranger. The money for the service was given in the name of the goddess.

Mynes (mī'nēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of King Evenus. He was king of Lyrnessus and the husband of Briseis. Because he had sheltered Aeneas, Achilles raided his land during the Trojan War, killed him and his brother Epistrophus, and carried off his wife as a captive.

Myonnesus (mī-ō-nē'sus). In ancient geography, a promontory on the coast of Ionia, W Asia Minor, about 27 miles NW of Ephesus. Near it the Romans gained (190 B.C.) a naval victory over the Syrians under Antiochus III.

Myra (mī'ra). In ancient geography, a city in Lycia, SW Asia Minor, situated near the S coast. An ancient theater here is among the finest in Asia Minor.

Myrina (mī-rī'na). According to Homer (Iliad), the wife of Dardanus. A hill near Troy, "Thorn-hill," was named by the gods as her funeral mound.

Myrina. Very extensive Greek necropolis, near Izmir (Smyrna), Asia Minor, discovered c1870, and systematically excavated by the French School at Athens between 1880 and 1882, known for terra-cotta figurines.

Myrina. In ancient geography, a city of the island of Lemnos. The site is now occupied by the town of Kastron.

Myrmidon (mēr'mi-don, -don). In Greek mythology, according to some accounts, a king whose daughter was visited by Zeus in the form of an ant. Her children were therefore called Myrmidons.

Myrmidons. A warlike tribe of Phthiotis, Thessaly, that originated on the island of Aegina. According to Greek mythology, Hera sent a pestilence on Aegina, which was named for one of her rivals for the affections of Zeus. The streams were polluted and a plague of serpents appeared. Men and animals died by the thousand and the island was almost depopulated. Sacrifices to the gods had no effect. At last Aeacus, the king of the island and a son of Zeus, prayed to his father to restore his people by sending him as many men as the ants that were crawling up an oak tree in the sacred grove. Zeus answered with a flash of lightning and the next day the ants had been transformed into magnificent warriors, and the plague had lifted. Aeacus named his new subjects Myrmidons in memory of their origin. Emigrants from Aegina to Thessaly continued to hold the ant sacred in their new land. According to Homer, the Myrmidons were led by Achilles in the Trojan War, and performed their warlike duties as faithfully and tirelessly as the ants for which they were named.

Myron (mī'ron). Greek sculptor; fl. c450 B.C. He was a native of Eleutherae on the frontier between Attica and Boeotia, and a pupil of Ageladas of Argos. Polyclitus and Phidias were reputedly his fellow pupils. Myron worked, exclusively or primarily, in bronze, a medium which released the artist from the static poses of sculpture in marble and made possible the athlete statues for which he became famous. He considered the subject more from the standpoint of action than of proportion, and represents the attitudes of the active rather than the beauty of the passive athlete. In this he was considered supreme. His most representative work was probably the Discobulus or discus-thrower, described by Quintilian and Lucian, of which inadequate copies can be seen in the British Museum, the Vatican, and the National Museum (Museo delle Terme) in Rome. His group of Athena and Marsyas is represented by the Athena in Frankfurt and the Marsyas of the Lateran, as well as on coins and on a marble vase in Athens. Myron's bronze cow on the Pnyx at Athens was a popular Greek and Roman favorite. (JJ)

Myrrha (mir'a). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Cinyras, king of Paphos. Afflicted by an unnatural love for her father because her mother had boasted that Myrrha was more beautiful than Aphrodite, she tried to hang herself. Her devoted nurse saved her and took her to her father, disguised as a young girl who was in love with him. Ultimately Cinyras discovered that she was his own daughter and in horror sought to kill her. She fled and was transformed by the gods into a twisted tree that ever weeps tears of bitter resin, the myrrh tree. The trunk of the tree split open and delivered Adonis, the child of her incestuous union. Myrrha is also sometimes called Smyrna.

Myrtilus (mēr'ti-lus). In Greek legend, a son of Hermes. Accompanied by Oenomaus, king of Elis, he drove the chariot in the races which Oenomaus demanded of the suitors of his daughter, Hippodamia. As Oenomaus had horses born of the wind, he always won the races and killed the defeated suitor. When Pelops sought Hippodamia's hand, he bribed Myrtilus to let him win the race. Hippodamia, having seen Pelops and fallen in love with him, also bribed Myrtilus. Myrtilus substituted wax pins in the axles of the chariot, and as the race was nearing its end, the wheels spun off, it overturned, and Oenomaus, tangled in the horses' reins, was killed, but before he died he laid a curse on Myrtilus. Pelops then set off with Hippodamia and Myrtilus. Myrtilus now demanded his reward—half of the kingdom of Oenomaus—and Pelops answered by hurling him into the sea at Geraestus, the southernmost tip of Euboea. This part of the Aegean Sea was thereafter known as the Myrtoan Sea. While drowning, Myrtilus cursed the house of Pelops, a curse which brought many woes on his descendants. Hermes set Myrtilus' image among the stars as the constellation Auriga (the Charioteer). His body was washed ashore and buried behind a temple of Hermes in Arcadia. The ghost of Myrtilus haunted the stadium at Olympia, and charioteers made sacrifices to it so that it would not frighten their horses and bring disaster to them in their races.

Myrtle (mēr'tl). A tree sacred to Aphrodite. Myrtle nymphs cared for Aristaeus in Cyrene, and taught him to make cheese, to raise bees, and to cultivate the olive.

Myrtoan Sea (mēr-tō'an). [Latin, Mare Myrtoum.] In ancient geography, that part of the Aegean Sea S of Argolis, Attica, and Euboea.

Mys (mis). Greek artist who was active in the latter part of the 5th century B.C. He was famous for chasing designs on or working reliefs on metal. From a design of Parrhasius he engraved the battle between the Lapiths and Centaurs on the inside of the shield of the great bronze statue of Athena Promachus on the Acropolis. From another design of Parrhasius he made the Sack of Troy in relief on a cup.

Mysia (mish'i-a). In ancient geography, a district in NW Asia Minor. It was bounded by the Propontis on the N, Bithynia on the NE, Phrygia on the E, Lydia on the S, the Aegean Sea on the W, and the Hellespont on the NW. The region is traversed by mountain ranges. There were many Greek cities on the coasts. It belonged successively to Lydia, Persia, Macedon, Syria, Pergamum, and Rome. The Mysians were probably allied to the Lydians. They assisted the Khita (Hittites) against Rameses II.

Mysia. Epithet of Demeter, said to have been from Mysius, an Argive who entertained Demeter when she came to Argos in her search for her daughter. Inside the sanctuary of Demeter Mysia on the road from Mycenae to Argos was another sanctuary, of burnt brick, and in this were images of Demeter Mysia, the Maid, and Hades. The sanctuary of Demeter Mysia near Pellene in Achaea was surrounded by a grove, in which there were many springs. At this place there was a festival lasting seven days in honor of Demeter. On the third day of the festival all the men withdrew, even male dogs being excluded. The next day the men returned and the two sexes mocked and jeered at one another.

Myson (mī'son). Attic potter and painter, active early 5th century B.C. Forty-seven extant vessels are attributed to him. One of the finest of these is an amphora (Louvre) showing Croesus on his pyre. It is in the red-figure technique.

Mytilene (mit-i-lē'nē). [Also: Mitylene, Mytilini; former name, Kastro.] Town on the E coast of the island of Lesbos. In ancient times it was the chief city of Lesbos, the home of Sappho, and an important maritime power of the Aeolian Greeks. It revolted from Athens in 428 B.C., and was subjected in 427 B.C.

Myus (mī'us). In ancient geography, one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia Minor. It was in Caria, situated on the Maeander River, about 11 miles NE of Miletus. According to tradition, it was colonized by Ionians from Attica, under the leadership of Cyaretus, son of Codrus, the legendary king of Athens. The city took part in the Ionian revolt against the Persians, and was subdued. In later centuries, the arm of the sea on which Myus was located was silted over, and turned the inlet into a lake. The lake became a breeding ground for gnats, and they became such a pest that the people of Myus abandoned their city, taking their gods with them, and withdrew to Miletus.

N

Nabis (nā'bis). A son of Demaratus and tyrant of Sparta from 207 to 192 B.C. when he was killed. He was conquered by the Romans under Flamininus in 193 B.C.

Nabonidus (nab-ō-nī'dus). [Babylonian, Nabu-na'id.] Last king of Babylonia (556-c538 B.C.). He was the father of Belshazzar. He seems to have belonged to the priestly class, and was zealous in the repairing of sanctuaries, but neglected the gods Merodach (or Marduk) and Nabu (or Nebo), on account of which he estranged himself from the priesthood; this to some extent facilitated the easy conquest of the Babylonian Empire by Cyrus of Persia in 538 B.C. According to Eusebius, Nabonidus after the fall of Babylon fortified himself in Borsippa, and when this was taken by Cyrus, the conqueror generously gave him a region in Carmania as his residence. But from a cylinder (cuneiform record) of Cyrus it seems that Nabonidus was treacherously delivered into the hands of Gobryas, the general of Cyrus, and died in a mysterious manner. It appears, from inscriptions of his which have been recovered, that he had a strong historical interest, and several historical statements of great importance for the chronology of the Babylonian Empire are recorded by him.

Nabopolassar (nab'ō-pō-las'ar). [Babylonian, Nabu-bal-uṣar.] Founder of the new Babylonian Empire, active c625-604 B.C. He ruled, it seems, first over Babylonia as viceroy of Assyria. He then entered into an alliance with the Median king Cyaxares, who gave his daughter in marriage to Nabopolassar's son Nebuchadnezzar, and by their united efforts the destruction of the Assyrian Empire was brought about in 606 B.C.

Naevius (nē'vi-us), Cnaeus. Roman dramatic and epic poet, born c270 B.C. He served in the army in the First Punic War, and afterward wrote an account of it in verse. Like earlier Roman writers, his account began with the flight of Aeneas from Troy, and brought the history of Rome through the First Punic War. He also wrote tragedies modeled after those of the Greeks, and attempted to dramatize events of his own country's history, as with his drama of the youth of Romulus and Remus. He was most successful as a writer of comedy, in which he did not merely translate the Greeks but freely adapted them to his own ideas. In his comedies he treated his own times, and attacked the Roman nobles so bitterly that he was thrown into prison. He was later freed, but was banished and died in exile at Utica, in Africa, c201 B.C.

Naiads (nā'adz, nī'-). In Greek and Roman mythology, female spirits presiding over springs, rivers, streams, and fountains. The Naiads were represented as beautiful nymphs with their heads crowned with flowers, light-hearted, musical, and beneficent. Their beneficence extends to the life-giving properties of water.

Name, See Nomen.

Naos (nā'os). "Dwelling-place"; the Greek word for temple (Latin aedes), the stately residence reserved for a god on his visits to the community. The term is also applied to the principal chamber of a temple, in which stood the image of the god and where the valuable properties of the cult were stored (Latin cella). Except for a few circular temples (tholoi), Greek temples were generally rectangular, with the long axis running east to west (but north to south at Bassae) and the entrance at the east. Rarely we hear of altars within the cella. The main altar, at which important sacrifices were performed, regularly stood in the open air facing the entrance; a temple sanctuary (temenos) might, however, contain several subsidiary altars and occasionally small buildings of temple form called treasuries. The simplest form of Greek temple is a single room with an open (prostyle) or partly enclosed (in-antis) columned porch. Embellishments may take the form of porches at both front and rear (amphiprostyle), or Napaeae (nā-pē'ē). In Roman mythology, nymphs of a dell.

Naples (nā'plz). See Neapolis.

Nar (nār). [Modern name, Nera.] A shallow, sulphurous river in Umbria.

Narbo (nār'bō). [Modern name, Narbonne.] A city in Gaul near the Mediterranean coast, known in pre-Roman times as a Celtic market-town and in 118 B.C. refounded by the Romans as Colonia Narbo Martius. After Caesar's Tenth Legion had been settled there, the province of Gallia Narbonensis was established, with Narbo as its capital, a distinction later lost to Nemausus. (JJ)

Narbonensis (nār-bō-nen'sis). [Also: Gallia Narbonensis.] Province of the Roman Empire, occupying the S and SE parts of Gaul, named for its first capital Narbo. It extended from the Alps SW along the Mediterranean to the Pyrenees. The N border was near the line of the Cebenna (Cevennes), the Rhodanus (Rhône), and the Lacus Lemanus (Lake of Geneva). The area of the province corresponds approximately to French Provence. Among its leading cities were Massilia (Marseilles) and Narbo (Narbonne), on the coast; Arelate (Arles), Nemausus (Nîmes), Arausio (Orange), and Vienna (Vienne), in the valley of the Rhodanus (Rhône); and Tolosa (Toulouse), inland to the west. The Roman ruins of Provence are famous: at Arles, a theater, an amphitheater, the forum, and town walls; at Nîmes, a fine temple, the so-called Maison Carrée, erected by Agrippa in 16 B.C., an amphitheater, and a gate, and nearby the splendid aqueduct known as the Pont du Gard; at Orange, a theater, a municipal arch, and fortifications; at Vienne, a well-preserved temple and a circus. Narbo became a Roman colony in 118 B.C.; colonies were later established at Arelate, Arausio, and Nemausus, and probably also at Vienna and Tolosa. (JJ)

Narcaeus (nār-sē'us). In Greek tradition, a son of Physcoa and Dionysus. He founded a temple of Athena Narcaea at Elis and introduced the worship of Dionysus in Elis.

Narcissus (nār-sis'us). In mythology, a son of the river-nymph Liriope and the river-god Cephissus. When he was born, the seer Tiresias told his mother that he would live to old age only if he never came to know himself. By the time he was a youth he was so beautiful that he was loved by many young men as well as maidens, but he scorned them all out of pride in his own beauty. The wood-nymph Echo fell in love with him and followed him. Narcissus heard her rustling in the forest and called to learn who was there. She could only repeat his last words, since she had been deprived of the power to speak any but the last few words another had spoken. When, therefore, Narcissus called out to his unseen admirer to come to him, she approached him with delight. But Narcissus scorned her love, as he had that of all others and Echo, yearning for love of him, wasted away until nothing was left of her but her voice, ever repeating the last words spoken by others. At length Aminius, whose love for Narcissus had also been scorned, prayed to the gods that one day Narcissus' love would be cruelly denied him, as he had denied others. Nemesis, or as some say, Artemis, heard the prayer and caused Narcissus, who was weary and hot from hunting, to go to a pool deep in the forest to refresh himself. As he bent to drink, he glimpsed his own image in the still surface of the pool and instantly fell in love with it. Each time he stretched his arms into the spring to clasp the image it disappeared. Nothing could tear him away from the spring and he cried to the gods in despair at the cruelty of the fate which denied him from embracing his love. As he lay day after day by the pool pining, he wasted away, adoring his own image. Dying, he prayed that the object of his love which was so beautiful, would outlive him, and when he breathed his last, his body disappeared. In its place was a lovely flower, with a golden center surrounded by white petals: the narcissus, whose bulb came to be useful as a narcotic. Another flower sometimes called narcissus, but more commonly called the iris, was created by Zeus to help Hades seize Persephone. It was a purple and silver blossom, and when Persephone saw it she wandered off from her attendant maidens in delight to pluck it. When she was alone the earth parted, Hades leaped out in his chariot and carried her off. Narcissus. Freedman of the Roman emperor Claudius; died 54 A.D. He acquired a complete ascendancy over the emperor. He assisted the empress Messalina in procuring the deaths of C. Appius Silanus and others. Afterward he was the chief instrument in bringing about the execution of Messalina herself. He was put to death on the accession of Nero.

Narcissus. Roman athlete; fl. latter part of the 2nd century. He strangled the emperor Commodus in 192 A.D.

Narni (nār'nē) or Narnia (nār'ni-ā). See Nequinum.

Naucratis (nô'krā-tis). In ancient geography, a city in Egypt, situated on the Canopic mouth of the Nile, not far from Saïs and about midway between modern Cairo and Alexandria. It is believed to have been founded by Milesian colonists not later than the 7th century B.C., and was described by Athenaeus and Herodotus as celebrated for its potters and florists. According to Herodotus, Amasis II (fl. c569-525 B.C.) encouraged the Greeks to settle in Naucratis, the only city where the Greeks were allowed to trade, and gave them land for their temples and altars. The site remained unknown till it was discovered by W. M. Flinders Petrie in 1884. The very extensive and important remains that have been excavated include ruins of the famous Hellenium, a temple built jointly by the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians, who owned the temple and appointed the governors of the port; temples of Zeus, Hera, Apollo, and Aphrodite, built by the Aeginetans, Samians, and Milesians; and pieces of pottery in great variety and profusion.

Naupactus (nô-pak'tus). [Also: Naupaktos, Navpaktos, Lepanto.] City in Locris, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Corinth, opposite Patrae. According to some accounts, the Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus was launched from here. The name of the city means "city of ship-building," and some say it was Cresphontes, others say it was Aristomachus, and still others say it was Temenus, who here built the vessels for the Dorian invasion. Just west of the city was a sanctuary of Asclepius, and a rock covered with inscriptions expressive of gratitude to the god of healing may still be seen there. In the 5th century B.C. the Athenians established a naval base here, having taken the city from the Ozolian Locrians, and thus won a strategic base for the control of the Gulf of Corinth. About 464 B.C. the Messenians had revolted against Sparta. Athens went to help the Spartans put down the revolt, but as the Spartans feared growing Athenian power more than the revolting Messenians, the Athenians were requested to withdraw. The Athenians got their revenge for this snub by giving Naupactus to the Messenians who were defeated and compelled to leave Ithome, where they had resisted Sparta. In the Peloponnesian Wars (431-404 B.C.), the Messenians offered Naupactus to Athens as a naval base against Sparta. It was a band of Messenian scouts who led the Athenians around to the Spartan rear when the latter were besieged on the island of Sphacteria, and brought about their surrender (425 B.C.). In gratitude for thus humiliating their age-long enemies the Messenians of Naupactus dedicated the famous statue of Victory, by Paeonius, at Olympia. After the defeat of the Athenians at Aegospotami (405 B.C.), the Spartans drove the Messenians out of Naupactus.

Nauplia (nô'pli-ā). [Also: Nafplion, Nauplion, Navplion.] Town in S Greece, situated at the head of the Gulf of Nauplia (also called Gulf of Argolis), about 25 miles SW of Corinth. It was the port of ancient Argos. According to tradition, the city was founded by Nauplius, the son of Poseidon and Amy-mone. It was the place where Agamemnon landed when he returned from Troy and, so some say, knelt to kiss the soil of his native land. South of the city a rocky cliff rises to a height of about 700 feet above the gulf. This was the ancient citadel of the city. Its name, Palamidi, recalls Palamedes, that son of Nauplius who was treacherously killed by his fellow Greeks in the Trojan War.

Nauplia, Gulf of. [Also: Gulf of Argolis (or Argos); Greek, Argolikos Kolpos; Latin, Argolicus Sinus.] Arm of the Aegean Sea, indenting the E coast of the Peloponnesus, Greece. Length, about 30 miles.

Nauplius (nô'pli-us). In Greek legend, a son of the Danaid Amy-mone and Poseidon. He was a celebrated navigator who discovered the art of steering by the constellation of the Great Bear. He was also the founder of Nauplia, the port of Argos.

naeus, and a descendant of Nauplius the navigator. He was a king of Nauplia, and he too was a famous navigator. He was one of the Argonauts who accompanied Jason on the expedition for the Golden Fleece. Aleus, king of Tegea, on discovering that his daughter Auge was about to bear a child whose father she claimed was Heracles, gave Auge to Nauplius with instructions to drown her, but he prudently took her to Nauplia and sold her to traders from Caria. Catreus, king in Crete, believing that he would meet his death at the hands of one of his own children, gave his daughter Clymene to Nauplius with instructions to sell her as a slave. Instead, Nauplius married her, and by her became the father of Oeax and Palamedes. The latter joined the Greeks in the Trojan War but was betrayed and killed by the Greeks at the instigation of Odysseus. Nauplius demanded satisfaction for his son's murder but was refused it. To avenge himself on the Greeks for the murder of his son, he visited the wives of the Greek heroes who were fighting at Troy. He told them that their husbands had taken concubines whom they intended to bring home as wives. Some unhappy women committed suicide as a result of his talk. Others were encouraged to commit adultery. Thus, Nauplius was partly responsible when Clytemnestra, wife of Agamemnon, became the mistress of Aegisthus, when Aegialea, wife of Diomedes, took Cometes as a lover, and when Meda, wife of Idomeneus, abandoned her husband for Leucus. In further revenge for the death of Palamedes, Nauplius decoyed the Greeks, returning home from the war in their ships, by lighting huge beacon fires on the coast of Euboea and causing them to dash their ships against the Capharean Rocks, thinking they were heading for safe harbors. Bold sailor as he was, Nauplius at length met his death by drowning after he himself followed a false beacon and was shipwrecked.

Nausicaä (nô-sik'â-ä). In the Odyssey, the daughter of Alcinoüs, king of the Phaeacians. Inspired by a dream, she went with her maidens to wash on the shore near where Odysseus, who had just escaped from the sea, was sleeping. She gave him food and clothes when he appeared before her, naked and bleeding, and directed him to the palace.

She discreetly advised him to go to the palace alone, rather than in her company, and told him to address himself to her mother first, rather than to her father, the king. Nausicaä has given her name as a model of discretion and tact.

Nausithous (nô-sith'ô-us). In Greek legend, a son of Poseidon and Periboea. He was the king of the Phaeacians and led them to their island home of Scheria, also known as Phaeacia and Corcyra. He aided Heracles' son Hyllus (the younger of the two sons of Heracles by this name) to emigrate. Nausithous was the father of Alcinoüs.

Nausithous. In Greek tradition, a native of Salamis who was employed by Theseus as his helmsman on the voyage to Crete. The Pilots' Festival, held at Phalerum, where Theseus set up monuments to Nausithous and Phaëax, the pilot, was celebrated in their honor.

Nautes (nô'têz). Named in the Aeneid as an aged Trojan who accompanied Aeneas on the flight from Troy. He was famed for his wisdom, having been taught by Pallas Athena herself. When the women of Aeneas' company, discouraged with continual voyaging, burned the ships in Sicily, Aeneas toyed with the idea of settling down in Sicily instead of going on to Italy. Nautes advised him instead to leave those who were discontented in Sicily, to repair the ships, and to proceed to his destined home with those who still had a thirst for glory.

Navarino (nä-vä-rē'nô). See Pylus.

Naxos (nak'sos). [Also: Naxia.] Island in the Aegean Sea, about 170 square miles in area. It is the largest and most fertile of the Cyclades, and is celebrated for its wine, olives, fruit, and vegetables. According to some accounts, it was anciently known as Strongyle, and was seized by Butes, a son of Thracian Boreas. He used it as a base from which to make piratical raids on passing ships. As there were no women on the island, he sailed to Drius in Thessaly with his followers. There he found the women celebrating the festival of Dionysus and attacked them. Butes was driven mad by Dionysus, who was invoked by one of the women Butes sought to ravish, and drowned himself in a well. His Thracian followers seized the women, among them Iphimedia, wife of Aloeus, and her daughter Pancratis, and returned with them to Strongyle. The sons of Iphimedia, Otus and Ephialtes, pursued the abductors, and captured the island, which they renamed Dia. Thracians dwelt on Naxos for 200 years, when they were driven out by a prolonged drought. It was afterward settled by Carians, whose king was Naxos, and for whom they in their turn renamed the island. The grandson of this king is said to have been the king who hospitably received Theseus and Ariadne when they stopped there on their way from Crete to Athens. While they rested at Naxos, Dionysus appeared to Theseus in a dream and commanded him to leave Ariadne on the island and depart for his homeland. Theseus did as he was bid, and Dionysus carried Ariadne away. The Naxians claimed that Dionysus was reared on their island by the nymphs Coronis, Philia, and Clide. For this reason Dionysus especially loved Naxos and caused its wine to be noted for its excellence, as the island became noted as a center of the worship of Dionysus. The Naxians were celebrated warriors and distinguished themselves at the battles of Salamis (480 B.C.) and Plataea (479 B.C.). Naxos was a member of the Confederacy of Delos, and revolted but was subdued by Athens c467 B.C. Near it Athens won a naval victory over Sparta in 376 B.C.

Naxos. [Also: Naxia.] Chief town of the island of Naxos, in the Cyclades, situated on its NW coast.

Naxos. [Also: Naxus.] In ancient geography, a seaport on the east coast of Sicily, just north of Mount Aetna. It was founded by Chalcidians who were accompanied by Ionians from the island of Naxos. The traditional date of its founding is 735 B.C. It was always especially highly regarded by the Greeks because it was their first settlement in Sicily. According to legend, the founders of Naxos were driven to Sicily by winds sent by Apollo. They erected an altar of Apollo Archegetes (Founder) on the spot where they landed, and it became the custom for envoys from Greece always to go first to this altar and offer sacrifice when they landed in Sicily. Colonists from Naxos founded the Sicilian cities of Catana and Leontini. Naxos sided with the Ionian cities of Sicily against Syracuse and the Dorian cities, and was one of the few allies of Athens in the Sicilian expedition of 415 B.C. In 403 B.C. traitors inside the city accepted gold to open the gates to Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse. Dionysius destroyed its walls and its dwellings, sold most of the inhabitants as slaves in Syracuse, and gave the land to the Sicels to win their support. The few Naxians who managed to escape at length found a home in the new town of Tauromenium.

Neaera (nē-ē'ra). In Greek mythology, the mother, by Strymon, of Evadne, who married Argus, the son of Niobe and Zeus.

Neaera. Said to have been a daughter of Pereus. She married her cousin Aleus, king of Tegea, and bore him a daughter, Auge, and three sons, Cepheus, Lycurgus, and Aphidamas.

Neaera. In the Odyssey, a nymph, the mother of Lampetia and Phaethusa, children of Helius. Her two daughters tended the wondrous herds of Helius on the island of Trinacria (Sicily).

Neapolis (nē-ap'ō-lis). [Also: Parthenope; modern Naples.] In ancient geography, a city of S Italy, situated on a magnificent bay, S of Rome. It was founded by colonists from the Greek settlement of Cumae, c600 B.C., and was first called Parthenope. When new colonists came from Chalcis and Athens and built themselves a settlement, Parthenope came to be known as Palaeopolis, the "old city," and the new settlement was called Neapolis, the "new city." In 327 B.C. Palaeopolis was besieged and taken by the Romans, and its name disappeared from history. Neapolis became a dependency of Rome, to whom she was a faithful ally. It was a strongly fortified town and resisted the efforts of Pyrrhus to take it, 280 B.C. In the civil wars it was betrayed to the partisans of Sulla (82 B.C.). They entered it and slaughtered the inhabitants. However, the city soon revived and became once more a prosperous port. Because of its climate and the beauty of its surroundings ("See Naples and die," Italian proverb) the city was a favorite resort of wealthy Romans and of the emperors. Vergil, who wrote most of the Georgics here, wished to be buried on a hill overlooking the city. The glorious beauty of the Bay of Naples, with Mount Vesuvius rising dramatically in the background, has for centuries been celebrated by poets and writers.

Nearchus (nē-är'kus). Attic painter and potter in the black-figure style, active c570 B.C. Over 40 cups with his signature are extant. He was one of the foremost makers and painters of the Little Master cups, so-called because of the exquisite miniature paintings that decorated them. A fragment of a cantharus (Athens) signed by him, shows Achilles and parts of three horses and represents the moment when Achilles was preparing to rejoin the battle against the Trojans to avenge Patroclus.

Nearchus. Macedonian officer, born in Crete, active in the second half of the 4th century B.C. He was an intimate friend and trusted officer of Alexander the Great, and was admiral of the fleet which Alexander sent out (325-324 B.C.), and voyaged from the mouth of the Indus to that of the Euphrates. An account of his voyage is given by Arrian in his Indica.

Nebris (neb'ris). A fawn skin worn as a special attribute by Dionysus and his attendant train (Pan, the satyrs, the maenads, etc.), and assumed on festival occasions by priests and priestesses of Dionysus, and by his worshippers generally.

Nectar (nek'tar). In classical mythology, the drink or wine of the Olympian gods, poured out for them by Hebe and Ganymede, the cup-bearers of Zeus. It was reputed to possess wondrous life-giving properties, to impart a divine bloom, beauty, and vigor to him so fortunate as to obtain it, and to preserve all that it touched from decay and corruption. In the Iliad, Thetis preserved the body of Patroclus by dripping nectar through his nostrils. Although nectar and ambrosia are usually considered the drink and food respectively of the gods, in ancient literature nectar is occasionally defined as the food and ambrosia as the drink of the gods.

Neda (nē'da). When Zeus was born to Rhea on a mountain top in Arcadia, she prayed to Gaea for water in which to bathe him. In answer to her prayer the river Neda gushed forth. According to the legend, Neda, a river-nymph, was one of the nymphs who cared for the infant Zeus.

Neith (nē'ith). [Also: Net.] In early Egyptian mythology, a personification of the female principle, called mother of the gods. She was the mother of the sun-god, Ra, but herself unbegotten. She was the chief divinity of the city of Saïs, single, supreme, self-existent and self-producing. In some interpretations of her function she was thought to personify parthenogenesis. Identified by the Greeks with Athena, she was represented as a woman wearing the crown of lower Egypt. Nekyia (nek'wi-a). The "Book of the Dead," a name given to the eleventh book of the Odyssey. (JJ)

Neleus (nē'lūs). In Greek mythology, a son of Tyro and Poseidon, and the twin of Pelias. His mother exposed the twins on a mountain but they were rescued by shepherds and Neleus was nursed by a bitch. When the twins grew up, they avenged the cruel treatment their mother had suffered at the hands of her stepmother, but later they quarreled. Pelias seized Iolus and Neleus went into exile in Messenia. There he captured the city of Pylus. It throve so under his management that it is sometimes said to have been founded by him. He married Chloris, the only daughter of Niobe who survived when her other daughters were slain by Artemis because of Niobe's arrogance. Chloris bore him 12 sons. Heracles asked Neleus to purify him for the murder of Iphitus, but Neleus refused, and all his sons, except Nestor, supported their father's refusal and refused to receive Heracles. In revenge, Heracles later attacked Pylus, captured it and burned it, and killed all the sons of Neleus except Nestor. Neleus himself escaped and lived to dwell again in the rebuilt city.

Nelides (nē-lī'dēz). An epithet of Nestor, meaning "Son of Neleus."

Nemausus (nē-mō'sus). [Modern name, Nîmes.] An important Roman town in the valley of the Rhodanus (Rhône) River, in the Roman province known as Provincia (modern Provence). Established as a colony in 16 B.C., Nemausus prospered greatly, as the impressive remains of Roman buildings indicate: The "Maison Carrée," a handsome and well-preserved hexastyle Corinthian temple built by Agrippa, an amphitheater, a gate, and a great aqueduct, one imposing section of which survives as the Pont du Gard.

Eventually Nemausus replaced Narbo as capital of the province of Gallia Narbonensis. (JJ)

Nemea (nē-mē-ā, nē-mē-ā). In ancient geography, a valley in Argolis, Greece, about 11 miles SW of Corinth. Some say Nemea was named for a daughter of the river-god Asopus. Nearby was Tretus, the cave with the double entrance which, according to legend, was the haunt of the Nemean Lion. As the first of his 12 labors for Eurystheus, Heracles blocked one of the entrances, entered the cave, and choked the lion to death. To Nemea came the Seven on their way to wage war against Thebes. They asked Hypsipyle, nurse of Opheltes, son of Lycurgus, king of Nemea, where they might find water. She put down her young charge in the grove of Nemean Zeus and led them to a spring, later called Adrastea. While she was gone, a snake bit Opheltes and caused his death. In his honor the Nemean Games were founded. Of the 4th century B.C. Doric temple of Zeus three columns still stand. Excavations by French and American archaeologists have revealed the plan of the temple, notable for its sunken adytum or crypt at the rear of the cella, and a great altar, a palestra, a gymnasium, and an athletes' bath. The stadium lies in a recess in the neighboring hills.

Nemean (nē-mē-ān). Epithet of Zeus, from his temple at Nemea in Argolis. A grove of cypress trees surrounded the temple, and it was in this grove that Opheltes was left by his nurse while she showed the Seven against Thebes where they could find water. Here Opheltes was bitten by a serpent, and died of its poison. His grave was on the spot, in an enclosure that also contained altars. Nearby was the grave of Lycurgus, his father. Near the temple was a spring, called Adrastea, perhaps because it was to this spring that the nurse of Opheltes led Adrastus and his Argive followers. Another sanctuary of Nemean Zeus was at Argos.

Nemean Games (nē-mē-ān or nē-mē-ān). One of the four great national festivals of the ancient Greeks (the others being the Olympian, Pythian, and Isthmian games). The Nemean Games were celebrated in the valley of Nemea near Cleonae, in the second and fourth years of each Olympiad, near the temple of the Nemean Zeus, some Doric columns of which are still standing. They are said to have been instituted originally in memory of Opheltes, the young son of Lycurgus, king of Nemea. The games consisted of athletic contests, equestrian exercises, and musical contests. The victor's garland at the Nemean Games was made of parsley (parsley being sacred to the dead in ancient Greece).

HERACLES STRANGLING THE NEMEAN LION
Black-figured Attic amphora, 6th century

Nemean Lion. In Greek mythology, a huge lion that could not be killed with any weapon of iron, bronze, or stone. Some say it was the offspring of Typhon and Echidna; others say the two-headed dog Orthrus fathered it. It dwelt in a cleft in Mount Tretus, between Mycenae and Nemea. The first labor of Heracles was to slay the Nemean Lion, which had been ravaging the countryside. He arrived at Cleonae, near Mount Tretus, and stopped at a peasant's hut. The peasant, one Molorchus whose son had been killed by the lion, was just on the point of offering a sacrifice to Hera. Heracles told him he intended to kill the lion, and instructed Molorchus to wait 30 days. If at the end of that time Heracles had not returned, then Molorchus must offer sacrifices to Heracles the hero, but if Heracles did return, then the sacrifice should be offered to Zeus. Heracles left Molorchus and proceeded to Mount Tretus. He encountered the lion but could make no impression on it with either his arrows, sword, or club. The lion withdrew to its lair unharmed. Heracles blocked up one end of the double-entranced lair and went into the cleft after his prey. He seized the lion with his hands and strangled it. He slung the lion across his shoulders and returned to the house of Molorchus, where they sacrificed to Zeus together. Heracles skinned the lion and ever afterward used its hide as a cloak, with the head of the lion serving as a terrifying helmet.

Nemesis (nem'e-sis). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Nyx and Erebus. According to some accounts, Zeus pursued Nemesis and at last, in the form of a swan, violated her. She took the egg which was produced from this union and gave it to Leda, wife of Tyndareus of Sparta. From this egg Helen, the cause of the Trojan War, was born. Nemesis is a goddess of law and justice, the personification of divine retribution, especially for human presumption. Sometimes she is represented as winged, holding an apple bough in one hand and a wheel of fortune in the other. She is also represented as being borne in a chariot drawn by griffins. By extension she is popularly regarded as a goddess of the inevitable. In the shrine of Nemesis at Rhamnus in Attica were two temples, the earlier, dating perhaps from the morrow of the first Persian invasion of 490 B.C., a modest distyle-in-antis structure, the other, a hexastyle peripteral temple by the nameless Periclean architect who built the temples of Hephaestus and Ares in Athens and of Poseidon at Sunium, begun about 436 B.C. and, probably in consequence of the Peloponnesian War (431-404 B.C.), never finished. It contained a cult statue of Parian marble by Agoracritus, fragments of which are said still to lie in the vicinity. Marble reliefs from its pedestal have survived, and are in the National Museum, Athens. In Augustus' time the temple was rededicated to the empress Livia. (JJ)

Nemetes (nē-mē'tēz). Ancient Germanic tribe, first mentioned by Caesar as being in the army of Ariovistus, king of the Suevi. The Nemetes were situated at the left side of the middle Rhene, east of the Vosegus (Vosges), in the region about present-day Speyer, where they still remained after the defeat (58 B.C.) of Ariovistus.

Nemorensis, Lacus (nem-ō-ren'sis, lā'kus). [Italian, Lago di Nemi; English, Lake Nemi.] A small lake about 17 miles SE of Rome, noted for its beauty. It occupies the crater of an extinct volcano in the Alban Mountains. Nearby is a lonely wood in which there was a temple to Diana where all the Latins joined in her worship. Among the many legends connected with this shrine was one that in the wood there was a tree which bore a golden bough. Whoever plucked the bough and slew the priest of the shrine succeeded him as the new priest and retained the honor until he in his turn was slain. It was in the hope of finding analogies which might provide an explanation of this cult that Sir J. G. Frazer embarked upon the extended research in primitive religion and magic which culminated in the publication of his monumental Golden Bough. The "golden bough" itself has, with some plausibility, been explained as mistletoe.

Neocastro (ne'ō-kas'trō). See Pylus.

Neocorus (nē-ok'ō-rus). In Greek antiquity, the guardian of a temple, in some cases, merely a janitor or temple-sweeper, in others, a priestly officer of much dignity, having charge of the treasures dedicated in the temple. Under the Roman imperial dominion the title was accorded by the Senate to certain cities regarded as custodians of the ceremonial worship of Rome and of the emperor.

Neoptolemus (nē-op-tol'e-mus). [Also: Pyrrhus.] In Greek legend, the son of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of Lycomedes, king of Scyros. After the death of Achilles in the Trojan War, Helenus, a Trojan seer who was captured by the Greeks, told them that Troy could not be taken without the aid of Neoptolemus. Odysseus and Diomedes were accordingly sent to Scyros to fetch him. He eagerly consented to accompany them in spite of the tears and entreaties of his mother to remain safe in Scyros. Some say he was only 12 years old at the time, and his name which was originally Pyrrhus means roughly, "he went to war young." On his arrival at Troy he went immediately into battle. Odysseus gave him Achilles' armor, Athena sent him glory, and he drove back Eurypylus, grandson of Heracles, who would surely have fired the Greek ships but for Neoptolemus. Night put an end to the battle. Next day it was resumed with increased ferocity. Neoptolemus led the Myrmidons against the Greeks and after a fierce struggle, he killed Eurypylus. Troy would have fallen before the Greek onslaught, but Zeus capriciously decided to save it by veiling it in a cloud, while Apollo saved Deiphobus from Neoptolemus by hiding him in a mist, and Thetis prevented her grandson Neoptolemus from coming face to face with Aeneas out of respect for Aphrodite, mother of Aeneas. Though Paris had been killed, the Greeks decided, with the assistance of the gods, not to try to take Troy by direct attack. Instead they proposed to build a great Wooden Horse and enter the city secretly and attack from within. Neoptolemus scorned the plan as cowardly. He preferred to win by valor. However, he was the first to volunteer to go in the Wooden Horse once the plan was adopted. Inside the city he fought ferociously. He found Priam and Hecuba before the altar of Zeus in the courtyard of Priam's palace, killed their son Polites and then slashed off Priam's head with one stroke of his sword when the aged king feebly attacked him. He then dragged the headless body to Achilles' tomb and left it there to rot. According to some accounts, it was Neoptolemus who hurled Astyanax, still a "wordless babe," the son of Hector and Andromache, from the towers of Troy. After the fall of the city, in which he took Andromache as his captive and concubine, the shade of Achilles appeared to him in a dream. Achilles announced that Priam's daughter Polyxena must be sacrificed on his tomb, or else Achilles' wrath would be even greater than when Briseis was taken from him, and he would send disastrous storms to prevent the Greeks from sailing. Neoptolemus related his dream and, over the protests of Agamemnon who thought there had been enough bloodshed, the sacrifice was carried out; Neoptolemus wielded the knife as priest. Odysseus recounted the glorious exploits of Neoptolemus to Achilles when he saw him in the Underworld on his way home from Troy.

Neoptolemus now set sail for Molossia, whither Helenus had advised him to go. According to some accounts, in a shipwreck on the way he lost the arms of Achilles, which had been awarded to Odysseus over the claims of Telamonian Ajax, and which Odysseus had given to Neoptolemus. Thetis washed the arms ashore at the tomb of Ajax on Cape Rhoeteum. Arrived in Molossia with his captive Andromache, whom, some say, he treated kindly and who bore him sons, he learned that his grandfather Peleus had been banished from his kingdom of Iolcus. He went to Iolcus, drove out the usurpers and regained the throne. Next he went to Epirus and built a city near the Oracle of Dodona. But his father's death still troubled him, and he went to the shrine of Apollo at Delphi and upbraided the god for, as he thought, causing Achilles' death. He plundered and burned the shrine and departed for Sparta, where he claimed Hermione, daughter of Menelaus. Although she had been promised to Orestes, son of Agamemnon, the Spartans gave her to Neoptolemus. But she bore him no children, and was intensely jealous of Andromache. Neoptolemus set off again to Delphi to inquire why Hermione was barren. He was told he must appease Apollo for his earlier action of destroying the shrine. Accounts of his death vary. Some say he was slain at Delphi by Apollo's priests. Others say he took the sacrifices he had offered to appease the god from the altar and was slain by Machaereus. Still others say Orestes was the instigator of his murder. In any case, his body was buried in the precincts of the temple and the Delphians made annual offerings to him as a hero. His shade was borne off to the Elysian Fields by the immortal horses, Balius and Xanthus, which had wept at the death of Patroclus and Achilles and now were united with their master in the Underworld.

Neoptolemus. King of Epirus; fl. 4th century B.C. He was the father of Olympias and the grandfather of Alexander the Great.

moving sorrow. In the Odyssey, it was an Egyptian drug which lulled sorrow for the day, and was given to Telemachus by Helen when he visited the court of Menelaus seeking information about Odysseus.

Nephele (nē'fē-lē). In Greek mythology, a cloud, shaped by Zeus into the form of Hera to protect Hera from the amorous advances of Ixion. By this cloud Ixion became the father of Centaurus, the sire of the centaurs. At Hera's command, Athamas later married this phantom and became the father by her of two sons, Phrixus and Leucon, and one daughter, Helle. But Athamas tired of his phantom wife and fell in love with Ino, the daughter of Cadmus. Nephele, learning of his attachment, and being abandoned by Athamas, complained to Hera. The goddess vowed vengeance on Athamas and carried out her vow by causing Athamas to lose Ino and all his children.

Nepos (nē'pos, nep'os), Cornelius. Roman historian, born probably in Cisalpine Gaul; active in the 1st century B.C. He was a friend of Cicero and Catullus, and wrote love poetry, a three-book Chronica, anecdotes, and lives of Cicero and Cato, all lost. His only extant work, De Excellentibus Ducibus Exterarum Gentium, is a section from the De Viris Illustribus, biographies of celebrated men, a larger work of his now lost. In this work he treated Roman and Greek lives of famous generals and historians in separate sections.

Neptune (nep'tūn). In Roman mythology, the god of the sea. He was originally a water god and rain giver, and thus associated with the growth of vegetation; but he came to be identified by the Romans with the Greek Poseidon. There was a temple to Neptune at Rome in the Circus Flaminius where he was worshiped as patron of horses and horsemen, and a temple on the Campus Martius erected by Agrippa to commemorate a naval victory. Neptune, in the Aeneid, calmed the storm aroused by Aeolus at Juno's request, lifted up the sunken ships, dispersed the clouds and restored the sun for Aeneas and his fleet. He promised Venus he would give Aeneas calm seas until he arrived at the harbor of Cumae, but in return for the lives he saved he demanded the life of one. The one he took was Palinurus, the steersman. In art Neptune is usually represented as a bearded man of stately presence, with the trident as his chief attribute, and the horse and the dolphin as symbols.

Nequinum (nē-kwī'num). [Also: Narnia; modern name, Narni.] In ancient geography, a town of Umbria in C Italy, on the Via Flaminia. It was situated on the Nar River about 43 miles N of Rome. The Umbrian town was captured by the Romans, 299 B.C., and colonized by them. The Roman name of the town was Narnia.

Nera (nā'rā). [Ancient name, Nar.] Small river in C Italy, a tributary of the Tiber. Terni is situated on it.

Nereid Friezes (ner'ē-id). Four friezes from the Nereid monument at Xanthus in Lycia, now in the British Museum. The widest frieze represents a battle between Greeks and Asiatics; the others represent episodes of war, the chase, banquet, and sacrifice.

Nereids. In Greek mythology, sea nymphs, the 50 daughters of Nereus (whence the name) and Doris. The most famous among them were Amphitrite, Thetis, and Galatea. The Nereids were beautiful maidens helpful to voyagers, and constituted the main body of the female, as the Tritons did of the male, followers of Poseidon. They were imagined as dancing, singing, playing musical instruments, wooed by the Tritons, and passing in long processions over the sea seated on hippocamps and other sea creatures. They were also held to assist mariners in distress and were therefore especially worshiped on the islands, along the coasts, and at the mouths of rivers. Works of ancient art represent them lightly draped or nude, in poses characterized by undulating lines harmonizing with those of the ocean, and often riding on sea monsters of fantastic forms.

Nereus (ner'ūs). In Greek mythology, a sea-god; the son of Pontus and Gaea. He was the husband of Doris, and the father of the 50 Nereids. On the whole he was a gentle and kindly god, but he had the power of changing his shape at will, and like Proteus, only by holding on to him firmly through all his transformations could one force him to answer the questions one asked of him. Heracles caught him and forced him to tell him how he could obtain the golden apples of the Hesperides.

Nerites (ner'i-tēz). In Greek mythology, a son of Nereus and Doris, and a brother of the Nereids. Aphrodite loved him as long as she lived in the sea. Because he would not follow her when she left the sea, she turned him into a mussel.

Neritos (ner'i-tos). In ancient geography, a small island near Ithaca, whose sheer cliffs rise abruptly from the sea. According to Greek legend, it belonged to Laertes in his young days.

Nero (nē'rō, nir'ō). [Full name, Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus; original name, Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus.] Roman emperor (54–68 A.D.); born at Antium, Italy, Dec. 15, 37 A.D.; committed suicide near Rome, June 9, 68. He was the son of the consul Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina (daughter of Germanicus Caesar). His father died when he was three years old and, since his mother had been banished the year before by the emperor Caligula, Nero was taken into the house of his aunt Domitia Lepida. The emperor Claudius recalled Agrippina, who at once began an unrelenting campaign to have Nero succeed Claudius in place of his son Britannicus. Agrippina married Claudius in 49 and persuaded him to adopt Nero as his son the following year. Seneca was recalled from exile and became his tutor. In 55 Nero married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius by Messalina. In 54 Claudius was poisoned by Agrippina, probably with the knowledge of Nero. She caused Nero to be proclaimed emperor to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius, who was Nero's ward. The partisans of Britannicus made no great resistance; Nero was well received by the public, and the opening of his reign was propitious. His former tutors, the philosopher Seneca and Burrus, commander of the pretorian guards, were placed at the head of the government. The early years of his reign were marked, on the whole, by clemency and justice. To be sure, he caused his rival, Britannicus, to be removed by poison (55) but such removals of threats to the imperial power had become so common as to be taken for granted, and did not particularly arouse resentment against him. The Senate recovered some of its power, taxes were lowered, many abuses were corrected, and the provinces were left in peace. In this time a great struggle for domination over the young emperor was being waged by Agrippina and Seneca. Agrippina's influence had been supreme, for she had made him emperor. But when Nero fell in love with Acte, a beautiful freed-woman, and was encouraged in the affair by Seneca, Agrippina rebuked, harried, and ultimately threatened her son. Nero deprived her of her Roman and German bodyguards, took away her power, and sent her away from his palace. Her continued threats and violent behavior so frightened him that he decided to put her out of his way. It is said he tried three times to poison her, but that each time she had taken an antidote in advance. He had a mechanical contrivance rigged up in her bedroom that would hurl the ceiling down and crush her as she slept, but someone revealed the presence of the device. Later, he pretended reconciliation and invited her to visit him at Baiae. He arranged to have the galley in which she arrived collide with another so that it was no longer seaworthy. After a seemingly affectionate reunion, he kissed her and put her aboard a vessel for her return home. This vessel was so constructed that it would collapse and fall apart on signal. On the way home the vessel collapsed as planned, but Agrippina saved herself by swimming to shore. In the end, Nero sent a group of soldiers to surround her house and murder her in her bedroom (59). Then at once he became fearful of the consequences of his crime, and claimed to be haunted by her ghost. He said the Furies hounded him with whips and flaming brands, and he asked magicians to intercede with her ghost and compel it to cease haunting him. The report was circulated that Agrippina had died as a result of her own plots against him, and congratulations came to him from all quarters that he had been spared. He was tumultuously welcomed when he returned to Rome. In 61 a savage revolt erupted in Britain. One Roman legion was destroyed before it was put down. Burrus died in 62, whereupon Seneca retired from public life. Freed from the restraint of his former advisers, Nero gave free rein to a naturally tyrannical and cruel disposition. He divorced Octavia in order to marry Poppaea, who had been his mistress for several years. He had several times tried to strangle Octavia, and when he divorced her, his act was so unpopular that he banished her to the island of Pandataria and shortly afterward had her put to death (62). Poppaea ultimately died (65) from the effects of a kick administered by her brutal husband. He also married Statilia Messalina, whose husband he murdered. In 63 the Romans lost the province of Armenia. Having been accused of kindling the fire which in 64 destroyed a large part of Rome, he sought to divert attention from himself by ordering a persecution of the Christians, whom he accused of having caused the conflagration. Traditionally, Peter and Paul both died in this persecution, but this is unlikely. Legend states that Nero, having set the fire, watched it spread while playing music on his lyre. The fire raged for six days, subsided, and then broke out anew. Nero made what provision was possible to shelter the many who were made homeless, brought in food from Ostia, and lowered the price of grain. In the rebuilding of the city an attempt was made to prevent future conflagrations by leaving open spaces about the new houses which were to be at least partly of stone, and by replacing the narrow winding alleys with broad streets. Nero took the opportunity offered by the fire to erect the "Golden House" between the Palatine and Esquiline Hills. It was built with no consideration for cost, decorated with gold and precious stones, and surrounded by magnificent grounds. The provinces were taxed heavily to pay for it. From the time of the fire Nero's popularity waned rapidly. The fire was thought to be a sign of the wrath of the gods, and was followed by a plague. In addition, his personal and public excesses, his wild extravagance, his cruelty and licentiousness, disgusted and terrified the people. A group of enemies conspired to murder him and put Caius Calpurnius Piso, a young noble who was one of his closest companions, in his place. The conspiracy was discovered (65) and the leaders were put to death. Nero was terrified by the plot and the extent of the enmity against him it revealed. He seized many citizens and had them put to death, among them Seneca. From this time on he killed Roman citizens more or less at will. From his youth Nero had been interested in the lyre and singing; he had studied and worked at this interest, and had arrived at a point where he considered himself a serious and accomplished musician. In 67 he went to Greece and entered as a contestant in the chariot races and musical competition. To accommodate him, all the great festivals were held in one year. He won the prizes in every contest, whether he actually competed or not, but he usually went through the motions of competing on the same terms as the other entrants. He was pleased with his reception in Greece and made lavish presents. While there he planned to cut a canal across the Isthmus at Corinth, and even went so far as to remove the first spadeful of earth himself. When he returned to Italy (68) he had great sections of the walls of the towns he visited torn down to permit his entry, as was fitting to a victor in the Greek games, and gave many musical entertainments, from which no one was permitted to depart while he was still performing. In his absence in Greece unrest at Rome had increased. More dangerous to him was the unrest and outright spirit of rebellion that had arisen in the provinces. Revolt broke out in Gaul. It was put down, and the troops who quelled it offered the throne to their commander. He refused it. This revolt was followed by one in Spain where Galba, the leader, proclaimed himself emperor. When Nero at last decided to take action to save his tottering power he found himself deserted even by his palace guards. He fled from Rome to the house of a freedman and there, with the aid of his secretary, stabbed himself and expired just as the troops who had been sent to take him alive arrived. Acte, the beautiful freedwoman he had earlier loved, had his body buried in the family tomb on the Pincian Hill. Many people refused to believe he was dead, and in ensuing years several appeared who pretended, with success in certain quarters, to be Nero. With the death of Nero the line of the Julian emperors came to an end. Suetonius tells that when Livia was returning to Rome after marrying Augustus, an eagle swooped down and deposited a white pullet in her lap. The pullet held a laurel twig in its beak. She kept the pullet and planted the twig. The pullet produced a great flock of poultry and the twig grew into a luxuriant tree. The Caesars henceforth were crowned with laurel from this tree in their triumphs. The deaths of the Julian emperors were foretold by the tree, whose leaves unfailingly wilted just before one of them died. In the last year of Nero's reign the original laurel tree, and those that had been raised from it as slips, died at the root, and the whole flock of chickens, descended from the original pullet, also died, thus faithfully prophesying the death of Nero and the end of the Julian line.

Nerva (nër'va), Marcus Cocceius. Roman emperor (96–98 A.D.); born c30 A.D.; died Jan. 27, 98. He was consul with Vespasian in 71 and with Domitian in 90, and was raised to the throne (96) after the latter was murdered. He was a mild and just ruler and accomplished reforms in laws, taxation, and expenditures. He was unable, however, to control the Praetorian Guard and therefore adopted (97) Trajan as his successor.

Nervii (nër'vi-i). Ancient warlike people of the Belgic Gauls, dwelling in the neighborhood of the Sabis (Sambre) River. They opposed the Romans but were defeated (57 B.C.) by Julius Caesar.

Nesiotes (nes-i-ō'tēz, nē-shē-). See Critius and Nesiotes.

Nessus (nes'us). In Greek legend, a centaur slain by Heracles. He carried Deianira, Heracles' wife, across the river Evenus; but when he attempted to ravish her, Heracles shot him with a poisoned arrow. Dying, Nessus secretly declared to Deianira that his blood would preserve her husband's love, and she put it in a vial and took it with her. Later she rubbed the dried blood on a sacrificial robe and sent it to Heracles, hoping thereby to regain his love which he had transferred to his captive, Iole, and to speed his return home. Heracles donned the robe to offer sacrifice; the garment clung to his flesh, which was torn off with it. The herald, Lichas, who brought the robe, was cast by the raging hero into the sea, and Deianira hanged herself when she learned what had happened. Heracles built and ascended a pyre, had it set on fire, and was carried off from it to Olympus, thus fulfilling a prophecy that no living man would kill him but that he would die as the result of action by a dead enemy.

Nestor (nes'tor). In Greek legend, one of the 12 children of Neleus, king of Pylus, and Chloris, only surviving daughter of Amphion and Niobe. In his youth he took part in the Calydonian Hunt. Nestor was the only one of Neleus' sons to receive Heracles when the latter came to Pylus to ask Neleus to purify him for the murder of Iphitus. Although Nestor urged his father to do it, Neleus refused. Because of his good intentions in this case, when Heracles later attacked Pylus and killed the rest of Neleus' sons, he spared Nestor and gave him the city of Messene. He was the first to swear an oath by Heracles and came to be much loved by him. But some say Nestor was away in Gerenia at the time of Heracles' attack. In Homer he is spoken of as the "Gerenian Horseman." At his father's order Nestor made war on the people of Elis, because they had stolen a chariot that Neleus had sent to compete in the games. He acquitted himself gloriously, taking rich booty, although this was his first experience of war. The Eleans retaliated, and Nestor, on foot because his father thought he was too young to control war-horses, furiously counter-attacked and cut a wide swath through their ranks. He slew an Elean and continued the battle from his dead enemy's chariot. He would have killed the Moliones but Poseidon spirited them away in a mist. The Eleans fled, and Nestor was given the honors for this victory. A truce was arranged and funeral games were held. Nestor won all the contests except the chariot race, and he lost that only because the Moliones committed a foul. He also fought against the Arcadians and took a valiant part in the battle between the Lapiths and the centaurs. Nestor recalled the glorious deeds of his youth when he rallied the Greeks during the dark days of the Trojan War. He succeeded to the throne of Messenia and lived in Pylus, where remains of his palace have recently been found. He had already governed two generations of men, and was ruling a third, when the Trojan War started. Nevertheless he immediately joined Agamemnon's forces, to which he contributed 90 ships. He accompanied Menelaus on his journey to recruit the Greek princes, former suitors of Helen, for the war against Troy. He also went on the mission to Scyros to fetch Achilles. He became Agamemnon's most trusted and skillful adviser in the war, his "utterance flowed from his smooth tongue sweeter than honey." His name has become a synonym for a wise old man, an elder statesman. He was a bold fighter in spite of his advanced age, and was a master of cavalry and infantry tactics. Agamemnon cherished him and said if he had but ten Nestors, the war would soon be over. Nestor and Odysseus always agreed on the course which should be followed in the conduct of the war. It was Nestor who advised the Greeks to take advantage of a truce in the fighting for burial of the dead, to dig a moat and to raise a wall as protection for the Greek ships drawn up on the beach before Troy. His sound judgment, firm and kindly character made him respected by all. In rallying or advising the Greeks he made many long speeches—the privilege of an old man—citing the magnificent exploits of his own career as a spur to the Greeks. He tried to prevent the quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles over the captive Briseis. He told them Priam and the Trojans would rejoice if they knew how the Greek chiefs were quarreling among themselves. In this he was unsuccessful. Later he advised Agamemnon to try to resolve the quarrel by restoring Briseis to Achilles and sending him rich gifts. But Achilles refused to accept this peace offer. Nestor, however, did persuade Patroclus, the great friend of Achilles who had withdrawn from the war with him, to don Achilles' armor and lead his Myrmidons against the Trojans. Nestor took full part in the fighting. At one point when his chariot horses were wounded and became unmanageable, Nestor was in danger of his life. Antilochus, his youngest son, came to his rescue. He saved Nestor but lost his own life when Memnon attacked and killed him. Nestor rushed to attack Memnon, but the Aethiopian told him to withdraw; he did not wish, he said, to wage war on an old man. Nestor grieved for his lost youth, and lamented that his brave heart had been "tamed by time." When, following the death of Achilles, Thetis offered his armor to the bravest of the Argives who had rescued his body, Telamonian Ajax and Odysseus both claimed Achilles' arms. Ajax suggested that Idomeneus, Nestor, and Agamemnon should decide between them. Nestor was filled with foreboding. The careless gods, he said, had laid a great woe on them, because whoever lost in the choice would be lost to the Greeks. He suggested that they should let the Trojan captives decide which one, Ajax or Odysseus, had done them the most harm. In that way the loser's wrath would be turned against the Trojans, and not against his fellow Greeks. This was done, but Nestor proved right in predicting that whoever lost would be lost to the Greeks, for Ajax committed suicide. Nestor was one of the few who had a prosperous voyage home after the war. He took the bones of the physician Machaon back to Pylus with him, and placed them in a sanctuary; many came to be healed there. Odysseus' son Telemachus, in search of news of his father, visited Pylus ten years after the Trojan War had ended. He found Nestor, now at a very advanced age, governing a prosperous kingdom, surrounded by bold, intelligent sons, and blessed by the gods; for he had always been just, courteous, valiant, and one who paid due honor to the gods. By his wife Anaxibia (or Eurydice, as Homer names her), he had two daughters and seven sons. He lived out his days peacefully and died at a very old age. Some say he lived 300 years, because Apollo added to his life span all the years that were denied his uncles, the sons of Niobe and Amphion slain by Apollo. The substantial bronze-age palace, discovered and excavated by a University of Cincinnati expedition directed by Carl W. Blegen, several miles inland from Pylus in Messenia, is plausibly believed to be Nestor's palace. The large numbers of clay tablets found there, inscribed in the syllabic script known as Linear B, essential to Ventris' decipherment of the language as an early form

Nestus (nes'tus). [Also: Mesta.] River in SE Europe, rising in SW Bulgaria and flowing generally SE through NE Greece to the Aegean Sea opposite the island of Thasus.

Nicaea (ni-sē'a). [Anglicized, Nice; Greek, Nikaia; modern Turkish name, Iznik.] In ancient geography, a town in Bithynia, Asia Minor, situated on Lake Ascania, about 58 miles SE of Constantinople. It was founded in the 4th century B.C., and was one of the chief cities of Bithynia. It was the seat of the two Councils of Nicaea, at the first of which (325 A.D.) the Nicene Creed was formulated and decreed.

Nicaea. [Modern name, Nice.] In ancient geography, a town on the coast of Liguria, founded by colonists from Massilia (present Marseilles) in the 1st century A.D.

Nicander (ni-kan'dēr, nī-). Greek poet, grammarian, and physician, born at Colophon in Asia Minor, probably about the middle of the 2nd century B.C. He was a priest of Apollo and a physician, and lived in Pergamum and Alexandria. He wrote widely on agriculture and on mythological transformations, only fragments of which survive. Two poems, on treatment of wounds inflicted by poisonous animals and on poisons and their antidotes, are extant.

Nicias (nish'i-as). Athenian general and politician; killed 413 B.C., in Sicily. He was the son of Niceratus and, although he was wealthy, he was the leader of a moderate party at Athens. He favored peace with Sparta and was continually opposed by Cleon and others who had lately won influence in the assembly and who pursued a policy of empire and war with Sparta. Nicias maintained his popularity with the people by his deserved reputation for incorruptibility, his undeserved reputation as a general, and his conspicuous piety. In the latter connection, he played a leading part in the "cleansing" of Delos. This was done (426 B.C.) to propitiate Apollo that he might never again send plague to Athens. The bodies of the dead were removed from their tombs on Delos and transferred to another island. It was ordered that henceforth those on the island who were near death, or women who were about to bear children, should be removed to neighboring Rhenia to keep Delos pure. Under his leadership the Athenians reestablished the ancient games of Apollo and held them every four years at Delos. A few years later all the inhabitants were moved from the island to complete the purification. Such manifestations of piety were intensely gratifying to the Athenians. Nicias ever held their respect and support. He was strategus (general) when the Spartans were besieged in Sphacteria (425 B.C.), and replied to the taunts of Cleon, who claimed he would capture the Spartan garrison himself if he were commander, by resigning his command to Cleon in order to permit the latter to carry out his boast. To the surprise of all, Cleon did so. To counteract the growing influence of Cleon that ensued from this success, Nicias went to the Peloponnesus and established a garrison at Methone (425 B.C.), and captured the island of Cythera (424 B.C.) from which the Athenians could raid Sparta. In 423 B.C. he negotiated a one-year truce with Sparta. The truce was violated in Thrace, whither Nicias now sailed at the head of a fleet of 50 ships and recovered Mende which had revolted. In 421 B.C. he was the chief Athenian negotiator of a peace, with Plistoanax the Spartan king, that was to last for 50 years. In 420 B.C. Alcibiades was elected strategus and Nicias was not. An expedition was made against Epidaurus; Sparta came to her assistance; Athens claimed Sparta had broken the peace. Nicias was returned as strategus (418 B.C.), continued to advocate peace, but found himself, through the vagaries of political fortunes, now in alliance with the warlike and far from pious Alcibiades.

In 416 B.C. Segesta, a city of Sicily, asked Athens for aid in a war with her neighbor Selinus. Alcibiades was all eagerness for a war in Sicily. He painted a glowing picture of the aggrandizement of Athens as the result of such a war. The younger generation of Athens responded to his clamor for war as if in a hypnotic trance. Nicias opposed sending aid to Segesta. In the first place, he doubted—correctly as it turned actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ġ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

out—that the Segestaeans had the money they promised for the war. He pointed out that the Athenians had enough enemies near at hand without going abroad for more. Even if an expedition to Sicily should succeed, it would be impossible to keep an enemy subdued at such a distance. It would be more to the purpose to concentrate on the enemies at hand. But the Athenians were so in love with the idea of conquering Sicily, about which they had only the vaguest ideas, that they paid no attention at all to his good advice, nor were they deterred in the least when he presented a formidable estimate of the cost of such an expedition. They voted all he asked for and made him, against his wish and judgment, one of the three commanders of the expedition with full power to help Segesta against Selinus, restore the Leontini to their city that had been taken by Syracuse, and promote Athenian interests in all matters. The other two commanders were Alcibiades and Lamachus. The most splendid and costly armament ever prepared by one city for the longest passage away from home ever attempted, sailed in a carnival atmosphere from the Piraeus (415 B.C.), libations having been poured and prayers uttered by a herald. At Corcyra the fleet, 134 galleys, was divided into three squadrons, each under one of the three commanders. Arrived at Rhegium, Nicias wanted to sail directly against Selinus to settle the affair of the Segestaeans. Alcibiades prevailed on him to prepare for an attack on Syracuse, but before it could be mounted, Alcibiades was recalled to Athens to answer a charge of impiety. Nicias and Lamachus divided the command between them. Lamachus now urged immediate attack on Syracuse, while the Syracusans were still unprepared and overawed by the size of the armament the Athenians had brought against them. Nicias rejected his advice. Instead the summer was spent sailing about, engaging in ineffectual skirmishes, while Nicias tried to make up his mind. In the meantime, the Syracusans recovered from their first shock and began energetic preparations to defend themselves. The Athenians frittered away their time, their money, and their striking power sailing up and down the coast, and then returned to Syracuse. In the first engagements there they were successful, but in one of them Lamachus was slain (414 B.C.), leaving the sole command to Nicias. He was not only incapable of making decisive moves but was ill. The Syracusans sent to Sparta and Corinth for aid and the Spartan general Gylippus arrived to aid them. A furious contest of building walls about Syracuse took place between the Athenians, to protect access to their ships and cut off the city, and the Syracusans, to protect their city and cut off the Athenians. As the strength of Syracuse under Gylippus grew, Nicias sent to Athens for help. Demosthenes and Eurymedon were sent out with a fleet. Demosthenes, driven back in an attempt to take one of the heights of Syracuse, advised Nicias to withdraw while he could still save his fleet, as he was convinced that Syracuse, made strong by her own preparations and by her allies, could not be taken by siege, and as he realized the danger in which the Athenian fleet was placed in the harbor. Nicias was fearful of his reception in Athens if he should retreat from Syracuse, and would not leave unless he was ordered to do so from Athens. To receive such an order would take a long time. He would not even withdraw to Catana, from which his army would have room to maneuver in open territory as Demosthenes advised, for at Syracuse the Athenians were cramped by the physical limitations of the location. When Gylippus returned to Syracuse with reinforcements, Nicias saw that his position was hopeless and decided to withdraw under cover of darkness. All was in readiness and the Syracusans were unaware of his intention. But that night there was an eclipse of the moon. One might have said the gods were aiding the Athenians with total darkness for their withdrawal. But many regarded the eclipse as an evil omen. Nicias consulted the soothsayers and decided to wait the 27 days they had prescribed. In that time the Syracusans learned that he meant to retreat. Emboldened by this obvious sign of weakness, they resolved to prevent the withdrawal they would earlier have welcomed. They defeated the Athenians in a sea fight and bottled their remaining ships in the harbor. The crews refused to board the ships for another attempt to get through the enemy fleet. Nicias was now compelled to retreat overland. Even in this extremity he let time help the Syracusans. They were celebrating their sea victory and would have been in no condition to march out and stop the Athenians, but Nicias delayed, duped by a stratagem of the Syracusan Hermocrates. When he led his forces overland in retreat, the Syracusans were ready and attacked them as they fled. The forces were divided between Demosthenes and Nicias, Eurymedon having been slain. Those under Demosthenes fell behind and were forced to surrender. Nicias, unaware of the surrender, pushed on to the Asinarus River. His men were harried by Syracusan attacks and many were lost; they were exhausted by lack of provisions and by thirst. When they came to the Asinarus River, they tumbled into it like madmen to allay their thirst. The Syracusans and their Peloponnesian allies, lined atop the steep opposite bank, butchered them with arrows and javelins as they drank. Nicias, who had now learned of the surrender of Demosthenes, offered to surrender. The Syracusans might do as they liked to him if they would stop the slaughter of his men. Gylippus accepted his surrender. According to Thucydides, Gylippus would have preferred to lead Nicias back as a captive, but the exultant Syracusans butchered him, and Demosthenes as well. The men were enslaved and imprisoned in a quarry. A few escaped and brought back the terrible news to Athens—news that the entire armament was destroyed and that those who were not killed were enslaved. This was the greatest disaster Athens had ever suffered and she did not recover. According to Thucydides' account of it in his History of the Peloponnesian Wars, if any one man was responsible for it that man was Nicias, whose incapacity and indecision along with his obstinacy were not only incredible but tragic for Athens. In his defense it must be said that he was personally brave, scrupulously honest, pious to the point of blind superstition, and commander of the expedition by popular demand and against his own will.

Nicias of Athens (ath'enz). Greek painter of the 4th century B.C., a younger contemporary of Praxiteles. When Praxiteles was asked which of his works in marble he valued most, he is said to have answered, "Those on which Nicias has set his mark." Pliny explains this expression by the comment, "So much importance did Praxiteles attach to the circumlitio (tinting of color) applied by Nicias." This passage was for a long time the principal foundation for the theory that the Greeks painted their statues, which is now confirmed by the works themselves. Nicias was noted for his skill in giving a third dimension to his pictures by the proper use of light and shade, and was celebrated for his painting of female figures and other subjects which gave scope for dramatic treatment. Among the latter was a Rescue of Andromeda and one of Odysseus Questioning the Dead in the Underworld. Ptolemy of Egypt offered a large sum for this latter picture, but Nicias preferred to make a present of it to Athens.

Nicias, Peace of. Peace arranged by the Athenian general Nicias with Sparta (421 B.C.), by the terms of which there was to be a 50-year truce between Athens and Sparta. The peace was broken almost immediately.

Nicippe (nī-sip'ē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pelops and Hippodamia. She was the wife of Sthenelus, the Argive king. When she was about to bear a child, Hera hastened her labor so that her child, Eurystheus, would be born before Alcmene's child and would, in accordance with an oath given by Zeus, become high king of the Perseid people. Thus it was that Nicippe's son Eurystheus was able to exact the 12 labors from Alcmene's son Heracles.

Nicolaus of Damascus (nik-ō-lā'us; da-mas'kus). Greek historian; born at Damascus; fl. in the 1st century B.C. The Jewish king Herod the Great was his patron, and he became friendly with Augustus when he accompanied Herod on a visit to Rome. He wrote a universal history from the time of the Assyrian empire to his own day in 144 books; a life of Augustus, and an autobiography. Fragments of his work survive.

Nicomachean Ethics (nī'kō-ma-kē'an). Ethical treatise by Aristotle, believed to be a series of his lectures edited by his son.

Nicomachus (nī-kom'a-kus). Greek painter, active about the middle of the 4th century B.C. He was noted for the speed and excellence with which he painted. One of his paint-

Nicopolis (ni-kop'ō-lis, nī-). Ancient city in Cappadocia, Asia Minor, founded by Pompey to commemorate his victory there over Mithridates VI in 66 B.C.

Nicopolis. In ancient geography, a city in Epirus, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Arta. It was founded by Octavian (later the emperor Augustus) in commemoration of his victory at Actium in 31 B.C. The site contains many Roman antiquities.

Nicopolis. Ancient city near Alexandria, Egypt, founded (24 B.C.) by Augustus to commemorate his defeat of Antony.

Nicosthenes (ni-kos'thi-nēz). Attic potter of the 6th century B.C. His work is known from about 100 extant vessels bearing his signature. The decorator of his vessels worked in the black-figure style and is called the Nicosthenes Painter.

Nicostrata (nī-kos'tra-tā). In Greek legend, a daughter of the river-god Ladon. She was the wife of Echenus but by Hermes was the mother of Evander. She persuaded Evander to murder Echenus, and when they were banished from Arcadia for this crime, she accompanied him to Italy, whither he emigrated. It was she who chose the site of the city he founded, Pallantium, near the Tiber River. It is the present site of the Palatine Hill. According to some accounts, it was she also who brought the alphabet to Italy and adapted it for use by the Latins. Others say the alphabet was a contribution which Heracles made to the Latins. In Italy Nicostrata's name was changed to Carmenta in recognition of her gift of prophecy.

Nicostratus (nī-kos'tra-tus). According to some accounts in Greek legend, a son of Menelaus and Helen. Some say that with his bastard brother Megapenthes he drove Helen out of Sparta after the death of Menelaus. Nicostratus was worshiped as a hero by the Lacedaemonians.

Nicostratus. Name of two Greek comic poets; the first, a writer of Middle Comedy, was said to be a son of Aristophanes. The second, a writer of New Comedy, was active at the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 3rd century B.C.

Night. In Greek mythology, the "Subduer of Gods and Men;" the child of Chaos. See Nyx.

Nike (nī'kē, nē'kā). [Latin, Victoria.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of victory, especially victory in war. According to Hesiod she was a daughter of Styx, whom she accompanied to aid Zeus in his war against the Titans. After the victory of Zeus in this struggle Nike remained on Olympus. She was identified often with Athena, and by the Romans with their Victoria. She was regularly represented as a winged maiden, usually as alighting from flight, her most frequent attributes being a palm branch in one hand and a garland in the other, or a fillet outstretched in both hands; sometimes she holds a herald's staff.

Nilus (nī'lus). The river-god of the Nile River.

Nineveh (nin'e-ve). [Latin, Ninus.] In ancient geography, an important city, for a long time the capital of the Assyrian Empire, situated on the E bank of the upper Tigris opposite what is now Mosul, and surrounded in ancient times by a shallow river (Khosr). The site, now marked by the two mounds of Kuyunjik and Nebi Unus, was first identified in 1820 by J. C. Rich, political resident of the East India Company at Baghdad. The first attempts at excavation were made in 1842 by Paul Emile Botta, who, however, met with slight success; these were followed on a more extended scale by Sir Austen Henry Layard (1845-47, 1849-51), by Hormuzd Rassam (1854), by George Smith (1873-76), the work being again taken up by Rassam on the death of Smith, and by King and Thompson (1903-05). As a result of these excavations, the general outline of a city about three miles long, the remains of four palaces and numerous sculptures, and thousands of tablets (principally from the so-called library of Assurbanipal) were discovered. The greater part of these are now in the British Museum. The city had a perimeter of from seven to eight miles, the ruins of the walls showing a height in some parts of 50 feet. It was in existence as early as the time of Hammurabi (c1950 B.C.). Shalmaneser I (1330 B.C.) built a palace at Nineveh and made it the city of his residence. Shamshi-Adad V (824-811) decorated and restored the temple of Ishtar, famous for a special phase of the cult of the goddess. Adadnirari III (811-782 B.C.) built a new palace on the site of the mound Nebi Yunus. For a time Nineveh was neglected, Sargon II (722-705 B.C.) the founder of the new dynasty, abandoning it as the capital for a new town Dur Sharrukin (Khorsabad) which he built and made his residence. His son, Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.), was, however, a special patron of Nineveh. He surrounded it with a wall, replaced (695 B.C.) the small palace at the NE wall by a large one, built another palace which he filled with cedar wood and adorned with colossal bulls and lions, and beautified the city with a park. The Old Testament (2 Kings, xix. 36, Isa. xxxvii, 37) mentions Nineveh as the residence of Sennacherib. Esarhad-don (680-668 B.C.) finished a temple, widened the streets, and beautified the city, forcing the kings whom he conquered to furnish materials for adorning the city and palaces.

Nineveh succumbed (c608 B.C.) to the combined attack of the Medes under Cyaxares and the Babylonians under Nabopolassar.

Nine Worthies. Nine heroes of ancient legend and medieval chivalric romance. In one of the latter, the Triumphes des neufs Preux, the author feigns that there appeared to him in a vision nine heroes, and in a second vision a tenth hero, i.e., Joshua, David, Judas Maccabaeus, Hector, Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, and then Arthur, Charlemagne, Godfrey of Bouillon, and finally Bertrand du Guesclin. They charge him to undertake the description of their lives and feats, in order that Lady Triumphe, who appears with them, may decide which of them has deserved her crown. The nine heroes of this romance are not infrequently mentioned in English literature. Shakespeare alludes (in Love's Labour's Lost) to the Nine Worthies. They also appear in the verses which precede the Low German history of Alexander the Great. They figure in tapestry and paintings. This selection of thrice three heroes may have originated in the Welsh Triads, where the three pagan, Jewish, and Christian trinities are enumerated as follows: Hector, Alexander, and Julius Caesar; Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabaeus; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey de Bouillon. Guy of Warwick is sometimes substituted for Godfrey.

Ninus (nī'nus). In Greek legend, the eponymous founder of Nineveh and of the Assyrian Empire; husband of Semiramis, the famous Assyrian queen. She is said to have coaxed Ninus into giving her full power for five days; he did so, and on the second she had him put to death.

Ninus, Tomb of. In Roman legend, the spot outside the city of Babylon where Pyramus was to meet Thisbe under a mulberry tree, and where he, thinking Thisbe had been slain by a lion, killed himself. Thisbe, returning to the spot and finding him dying, killed herself too, and ever after the berries of the mulberry tree were dyed red from their blood.

Niobe (nī'ō-bē). In Greek legend, the first mortal woman loved by Zeus. She bore him Argus and Pelasgus. Some say she was the mother of Phoroneus and the wife of Inachus. Others say she was the daughter of Phoroneus.

Niobe/Nisus

Niobe. In Greek mythology, the daughter of Tantalus, and thus a sister of Pelops. She was the wife of Amphion, king of Thebes, and the mother of seven sons and seven daughters, and extremely proud of this fact. (Other accounts give various numbers for her children, ranging from four to 20.) The Theban women, inspired by a seeress, were making offerings to Leto when Niobe appeared among them. In her arrogance she mentioned her ancestors, Tantalus, Atlas, even Zeus, who was her father-in-law as well as her ancestor. She spoke of the wealth and power of her husband, her own beauty, and above all, of her sons and daughters. She reminded the worshipers of Leto that Leto had only two children, and that both earth and sea had refused her a place to bear them until the tiny island of Delos sheltered her. For these reasons she considered that the Thebans should worship her instead of Leto, and finally prevailed on them to do so. Apollo and Artemis, Leto's children, took instant revenge for their mother. Apollo slew Niobe's sons, and Artemis killed her daughters. (Some say one son and one daughter were spared.) Zeus prevented the burial of the children by turning the Thebans into stone. After nine days, the gods themselves performed the burial rites. Niobe, distracted by grief, wandered to Mount Sipylus, where she was changed by Zeus into a marble statue whose face is continually wet with tears.

Niobids (nī'ō-bidz). The term means "Children of Niobe." The Slaughter of the Niobids, when Apollo and Artemis avenged Niobe's affront to their mother Leto by slaying Niobe's seven sons and seven daughters with their arrows, attracted at least two able sculptors. Copies of individual figures by them, separated by considerations of style into a 5th-century B.C. group and a 4th-century B.C. group, survive in European museums. Assigned to the 5th-century group is the superb Niobid in the National Museum (Museo delle Terme) in Rome, and a boy and a girl in Copenhagen. A collection of 18 statues in the Uffizi in Florence, the Chiaramonti Niobid in the Vatican, and others are assigned to the 4th-century group. The theme, offering a variety of postures, standing, running, crouching, kneeling, and prostrate, with perhaps 18 figures (Apollo, Artemis, Niobe, 14 children, and the paedagogus or tutor), would have lent itself admirably to the triangular composition of a temple pediment, and it is likely that one or both groups were originally so designed and erected, to be eventually shipped to Rome. It has been suggested that the 5th-century group represents the missing S pediment of the temple of Apollo at Bassae. The identification of the sculptors is in dispute. (JJ)

Nireus (nī'rös). Named in the Iliad as a son of Aglaia and Charopus. He was the fairest of the Greeks who went to Troy except Achilles, but his good looks were linked with a weakling's prowess. He was slain by Eurypylos, grandson of Heracles.

Nisa (nī'sā). Ancient name of Megara.

Nisaea (nī-sē'ā). In ancient geography, a region in Media (perhaps near the Caspian Gates), famous for its breed of horses.

Nisaea. The port of the ancient city of Nisa (later Megara), founded by Nisus, according to Greek tradition, and named for him.

Nisibis (nis'i-bis). [Modern names, Nisibin, Nusaybin.] In ancient geography, a town in Mesopotamia. At various times an Armenian, Parthian, and Persian stronghold, it was taken by Lucullus in 68 B.C., and afterward (from the Persians) by Trajan.

Nisus (nī'sus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Pandion. He and his three brothers conquered Attica and divided it between them by lot. Nisus drew Nisa, afterwards called Megara, and his claim to it was confirmed by Aeacus. He founded and gave his name to the port of Nisaea. Nisus had one purple (or golden) lock of hair, on which his life depended. The prophecy was that if it was cut off he would die. When Nisus was attacked by King Minos of Crete, his daughter Scylla fell in love with Minos, and cut the lock. Nisus died and Minos was successful, but Minos refused to take Scylla to Crete with him, as she had expected him to do, and sailed without her. She leaped into the sea and swam after his ship, pursued by her father who had been transformed into an osprey or sparrow-hawk. The body of Nisus was buried in Athens, in a tomb behind the Lyceum.

Nisus. In Greek and Roman legend, a son of Hyrtacus and the nymph Ida. He came from

Arisbe and fought at Troy. He was a companion of Aeneas on the flight from Troy and was famed for his devotion to his young friend Euryalus. At the funeral games for Anchises in Sicily Nisus was winning in the foot race when he slipped in a pool of blood and fell. To help his friend win, he rolled into the path of the next contestant and enabled Euryalus to win. In the war with the Rutulians, while Aeneas was away from the camp seeking help from Tarchon, the garrison was surrounded by the enemy. Nisus and Euryalus slipped away from the besieged camp to go for help but were discovered by the enemy when light glittered on the shining helmet Euryalus had placed on his own head after stripping it from one of the sleeping foes he had killed. In the fight which then broke out Nisus and Euryalus were separated and Euryalus was slain. Nisus, who might have escaped, turned on Volscens, the slayer of Euryalus, and killed him, but was then felled himself by enemy wounds. The Rutulians cut off his head and mounted it on a spear and exhibited it before the walls of the besieged garrison.

Nisyrus (ni-sī'rus). An island near Cos in the Dodecanese. According to tradition, it was formed during the war between the Giants and the gods when Poseidon broke off a piece of Cos with his trident and hurled it at the Giant Polybutes, burying Polybutes under it. Men of Nisyrus sailed against Troy in the Trojan War under the leadership of descendants of Heracles.

Noëmon (nō-ē'mon). In the Odyssey, an Ithacan who, inspired by Athena, gave Telemachus a ship in which to make his voyage to Pylus in search of news of Odysseus. Later, by asking Antinous when Telemachus would return, he gave away the secret that Telemachus had departed.

Nola (nō'lā). Town in Campania, S Italy, about 15 miles NE of Neapolis. Possibly founded by Etruscans, it became subject to Rome in 313 B.C. It was the scene of battles (216, 215 B.C.) between Marcellus and Hannibal in the First Punic War, and was also the site of the death of Augustus in 14 A.D.

Nomen (nō'men). "Name." In Classical

Athens, and in Greece generally, a person was known by his given name: Sophocles, Pericles, Aristophanes, Andromache, Aspasia. Such names were freely coined: Aristarchus "excellent ruler," Evangelus "of good tidings," Philippus "fond of horses," Zenodotus "gift of Zeus," Berenice "bearing victory," Dorothea "gift of heaven," Eurydice "wide-judging," etc. Many are patronyms, e.g. in -ides: Callicratides "descendant of Callicrates," Euripides "descendant of Euripus," Atreides "son of Atreus," etc. To distinguish between two men of the same given name the father's name, in the genitive ("son of"), was added: Thucydides Olorou (Thucydides son of Olorus, the historian), Thucydides Melesiou (Thucydides son of Melesias, the statesman and general). In formal records the name of the deme or parish in which the family was registered was also added: Sokrates Sophroniskou Alopekeus, Socrates son of Sophroniscus, of the deme Alopece. Sons rarely took the given name of their father, but frequently took that of a grandfather.

In early Rome an adult male had two names, a praenomen (Aulus, Caius, Lucius, Marcus, Quintus, Tiberius, etc., usually abbreviated to one or two letters, of which the number was fixed at about forty) and a clan or gentile name (nomen gentile or gentilicium, e.g. Aurelius, Julius, Lucretius, Ovidius, Terentius, Valerius, Vergilius, of which the number was fixed at about 1000): Servius Tullius, Appius Claudius, Caius Marius, Aulus Hirtius. Several emperors were commonly known by their praenomina: Tiberius, Caius ("Caligula"), Titus. To distinguish between individuals of the same name, a nickname (cognomen) was used, usually inspired by a distinguishing feature, desirable quality, or fancied resemblance, not invariably flattering: Ahenobarbus "red-beard," Albinus "white-haired," Balbus "stammering," Caecus "blind," Calvus "bald," Celsus "tall," Crassus "fat," Dentatus "toothy," Florus "shining," Glabrio "hairless," Laevinus "lefty," Lentulus "slow," Lepidus "elegant," Longus "tall," Macer "lean, skinny," Naso "big-nose," Niger "dark," Paulus or Paullus "shorty," Plautus "flat-foot," Pulcher "handsome," Rufus "red-haired," Strabo "squint-eyed" (Greek strabon), etc.; Carus "dear," dim. Carolus "little dear," Felix "happy, lucky," Frugi "honest, actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; ƒH, then; ǵ as d or j, ǵ as s or sh, ƒ as t or ch, ƒ as z or zh.

thrifty," Tacitus "silent," Valens "powerful," dim. Valentinus, etc.; Aquila "eagle," Catulus "puppy," Corvus "raven," Falco "hawk," Gallus "cock," Lupus "wolf," Mus "mouse." Toponyms (place names) also appear: Coriolanus, Norbanus, Sabinus, Soranus, Tusculanus. In the course of time these cognomina or nicknames came to be officially recognized, and thereafter most Romans had at least three names, praenomen, nomen, and cognomen, in that order: Publius Ovidius Naso, Quintus Horatius Flaccus, Publius Vergilius Maro. Most Romans appear in history under their gentile names: Ovid, Horace, Vergil; Cnaeus Pompeius Magnus is Pompey the Great, Tiberius Claudius Nero Germanicus is the emperor Claudius. But many Romans are better known by their cognomina: Caius Julius Caesar, Marcus Tullius Cicero, Cnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus, Marcus Terentius Varro, etc. An adopted child took the name of his adoptive father, adding a second cognomen (ending in -anus) to indicate the gens or clan to which he had been born: The emperor Augustus was first Caius Octavius; on his adoption by his great-uncle Caius Julius Caesar (by the latter's will) he became Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus, and between 44 B.C. and 27 B.C. he is properly known as Octavian. In 27 B.C. the Senate conferred on him the title Augustus, by which he is thereafter known. Military commanders often took a second cognomen recalling a victorious campaign: Africanus, Asiaticus, Macedonicus, Numantinus. A slave on emancipation received the praenomen and nomen of his master, keeping his own given name as a cognomen: Heliodorus, slave of P. Claudius, as a freedman became P. Claudius Heliodorus. In theory, members of families bearing the same gentile name were presumed to be descended from an ultimate common ancestor; but widespread adoption, and the assumption of their patrons' names by freedmen, accelerated the dilution of blood-lines which had presumably far advanced before the beginning of written history. Families sharing the same gentile name might identify themselves by coupling a distinctive cognomen permanently to the gentile name, e.g. the Cornelii Scipiones and the Cornelii Lentuli, individuals adding a second cognomen (if necessary, a third) for personal identification: L.

Cornelius Scipio, L. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus, Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Major and his son P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Minor, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus, etc. P. Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus Africanus Numantinus was the adopted son of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Minor, the cognomen Aemilianus showing that he was born to the gens Aemilia; he earned the further cognomina Africanus and Numantinus by his successes in Africa and Numantia (Spain). Brothers having the same cognomen could be distinguished by second cognomina or by distinct praenomina: Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Caius Sempronius Gracchus, the famous liberal tribunes; Marcus Tullius Cicero, Quintus Tullius Cicero. Father and son might have identical names, Marcus Tullius Cicero the orator being the third in line to bear the name and his son the fourth. In identifying the sponsors of legislation or public works the gentile name was regularly used: Lex Junia de Peregrinis, a law ordering non-citizens expelled from Rome, sponsored by the tribune M. Junius Pennus; Aqua Marcia, the aqueduct built by the praetor Q. Marcius Rex in 144 B.C.; Via Flaminia, the highway north from Rome to Ariminum, built by the censor C. Flaminius in 220 B.C. (but Via Appia, built by Appius Claudius; Appius is a praenomen). Among non-Romans the term "gentiles" referred to Roman citizens, those officially enrolled in a Roman gens and bearing one of the thousand recognized gentile names, as distinguished from non-citizens.

A Roman woman took as her name the feminine form of her father's gentile name; Junia, Valeria. Cicero's first wife was Terentia, daughter of one Terentius; their daughter was Tullia, the Tulliola "Little Tullia" of his letters. This is the origin of many given names of women in English-speaking lands: Celia (Latin Caelia), Cicely (Caecilia), Cornelia, Emily (Aemilia), Hortense (Hortensia), Julia, Lucy (Lucia), Marcia, Virginia, etc. Sisters were distinguished by ordinal cognomina: Secunda, Tertia, etc. (JJ) Nomentum (nō-men'tum). In ancient geography, a town of Latium, about 13 miles NE of Rome. It was a nameless site when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld. An-chises pointed out to him the shade of the man waiting to be born who would found the city. The village of Mentana later occupied this site.

Nomia (nō'mi-ā). In Greek mythology, a nymph to whom Daphnis had sworn to be faithful. When he was seduced while drunk, Nomia punished him for breaking his vow by blinding him.

Nonacris (nō-nak'ris). In ancient geography, a city in N Arcadia, Greece. It was named for the wife of Lycaon. Nearby was the famous river Styx, by which the Arcadians swore their most binding oaths. In the Aroanian Mountains above Nonacris was the cave where the daughters of Proetus fled in their madness. On the spot where Melampus cured them of their madness was a sanctuary of Artemis called Hemerasia (She who Soothes) by the people of Clitor.

Nonnus (non'us). An Egyptian Greek from Panopolis, who lived in the early part of the 5th century A.D. His epic, Dionysiaca, in 48 books, which he wrote as a pagan, is a collection of the legends of the Dionysiac cycle, and is an important source of those legends. Later, Nonnus became a Christian, and wrote a paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John in Greek hexameters. As a poet, he evolved a system of stress accents which he added to the hexameter.

Nora (nō'ra, nōr'ā). In ancient geography, a fortress in Cappadocia, Asia Minor, situated at the foot of Mount Taurus, near Lycaonia. Eumenes was besieged (320-319 B.C.) here by the forces of Antigonius.

Norba (nōr'ba). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, on a spur of the Lepini Mountains, overlooking the Pontine Marshes, about 35 miles SE of Rome. Norba is noted for its well-preserved fortification walls of massive polygonal ("Cyclopean") masonry in local limestone, with an imposing main gate and sally ports, which were formerly held to be of very early date, the 6th or 7th century B.C., but are now assigned to the late 4th or early 3rd century B.C. Within the outer circuit are many retaining walls and foundations in polygonal limestone, including the sub-structures of at least two temples. Norba was destroyed by Sulla during the civil wars; on the next eminence to the E lies its successor, the medieval town of Norma. (JJ)

Norcia (nōr'chā). See Nursia.

Noricum (nor'i-kum). In ancient geography, a country in Europe, bounded by Germany (separated by the Danube) on the N, Pannonia on the E, Pannonia and the land of the Carni on the S, and Vindelicia and Rhaetia (separated partly by the Inn) on the W. It corresponded mainly to the later Lower and Upper Austria S of the Danube, Salzburg, Styria, Carinthia, and parts of Tirol and Bavaria. It was conquered by the Romans c15 B.C., and made a Roman province.

Notium (nō'shi-um). In ancient geography, the port of Colophon, near Ephesus. Near it the Spartan fleet under Lysander defeated (407 B.C.) the Athenians.

Notus (nō'tus). In Greek mythology, the south or southwest wind. Notus was the son of Astraeus or Aeolus and Eos, and the brother of Zephyrus, Boreas, and Eurus. He was the wind of fog and mists, dangerous to shepherds on the mountain tops or to mariners at sea, but a friend of thieves.

Nuceria Alfaterna (nū-sir'i-ā al-fa-tēr'na). [Modern name, Nocera Inferiore.] In ancient geography, a town in S Italy, situated about 20 miles SE of Neapolis. An ancient Oscan town, it was occupied by the Romans in 307 B.C., destroyed by Hannibal in 216 B.C., sacked by the revolting slaves under Spartacus in 73 B.C., and recolonized by Augustus and Nero.

Numa Pompilius (nū'ma pom-pil'i-us). According to Roman legend, the second king of Rome (715-673 B.C.). He was a Sabine from Cures, born, so it is said, on April 21, the day Rome was founded. He married Tatia, daughter of Tattius, king of the Sabines. She died, and henceforth he was said to have turned to the nymph Egeria, who advised him on matters of state and religion. Numa was 40 years old when an embassy came from Rome to invite him to become king. His first reaction was to decline the honor with vigor. He enjoyed his quiet life and informed the embassy that a man must be mad to exchange a peaceful life of contemplation for the uncertainty and upheaval that being king of the warlike Romans would entail. He was at length persuaded that "the work of a true king is a service rendered to the gods," and accepted the throne. Many favorable omens accompanied him to Rome, and he was accepted as king with great joy. As king he tried to soften the warlike character of the Romans, and to turn their interest to matters of religion and ritual. For Romulus, recently deified, he appointed a priest called the flamen quirinales. He established the institution of the high priests, called the pontifices. The chief of these, the Pontifex Maximus, was charged with the duty of interpreting the will of heaven, was overseer of public ceremonies and private sacrifices, and overseer of the vestal virgins, consecrated by Numa. Numa is said also to have laid down rules concerning burial and mourning, established the priesthoods of the Salii and the Fetiales, reformed the calendar, and divided the people into tribes according to their work. In all he did Numa claimed he was guided by the Muses, among whom one in particular, Tacita (the Silent one), was honored, and by his nymph Egeria. Above all, Numa maintained peace, sometimes by playing on the superstitious fears of the people to compel them to follow his course. The doors of the temple of Janus, open in time of war, were closed for 43 years in the reign of Numa. When he died, his laws were buried in one stone coffin and his body in another. Some say the laws were found 400 years later, but were reburied as it was thought unlawful to publish them. Some say Numa had a daughter, Pompilia, who was the mother of Ancus Marcius, king of Rome (640-616 B.C.); and some say he had four sons, Pompon, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus, each of whom was the founder of a noble Roman family.

Numantia (nū-man'shā). In ancient geography, the capital of a Celtiberian people, the Arevaci, situated on the Durus (Douro) River near what is now Soria, Spain. It was famous on account of its siege by the Romans under Scipio Aemilianus, beginning in 134 B.C. It was taken and destroyed in 133 B.C.

Numantine War (nū-man-tin). War between the Romans and the Celtiberians of N central Spain, 143-133 B.C., ending in the destruction of Numantia in 133 B.C.

Numanus (nū-mā'nus). In Roman legend, the brother-in-law of Turnus, lord of the Rutulians. In the war between Turnus and Aeneas he taunted the Trojans and boasted of how he would annihilate them. He was slain by an arrow from the bow of Ascanius.

Numidia (nū-mid'i-a). In ancient geography, a country of N Africa, corresponding nearly to the modern Algeria. It was bounded by the Mediterranean on the N, the territory of Carthage on the E, the desert on the S, and Mauretania on the W. In Roman legend (Aeneid) it was occupied by tribes hostile to Dido and Carthage. The peoples in the E and W were united in a kingdom under Masinissa. This was dismembered after the defeat of Jugurtha in 106 B.C., and the E part became a Roman province shortly after the death of its king Juba in 46 B.C.

Numina (nū'mi-nā). In ancient Roman mythology, protective spirits—of the home, the fields, the crafts, individuals, and the like. The Numina of orchards and gardens were later identified with Pomona and Vertumnus, those of the home became the Lares and Penates. Gradually the Numina were differentiated and acquired names for their specific roles. Numen (singular form of numina) is a supernatural power or influence, corresponding in significance to the term mana, the extraphysical power prominent in Melanesian and Polynesian belief.

Numitor (nū'mi-tôr). In Roman legend, the father of Rhea Silvia, and the grandfather of Romulus and Remus. Numitor was a king of Alba Longa. He was deposed by a younger brother and was restored to his throne by the famous twins, who killed the uncle. Anchises pointed out the spirit of Numitor, waiting to be born, when Aeneas visited the Underworld.

Nursia (nēr'shā). [Modern name, Norcia.] An ancient Sabine city, about 42 miles SE of Perugia (Perugia). According to the Aeneid, its people were allies of Turnus in the war against Aeneas.

Nycteus (nik'tūs). In Greek legend, the brother of Lycus and the father of Antiope. When he learned that Antiope was about to produce Amphion and Zethus, her children by Zeus, his wrath caused her to flee, and he asked Lycus to capture and punish her. He died, either in the battle to capture Antiope from the king of Sicyon to whom she had fled, or by suicide.

Nyctimene (nik-tim'e-nē). In Greek legend, the daughter of Epopeus, king in Lesbos. After being ravished by her father, she hid in a forest. Athena transformed her into an owl.

Nyctimus (nik'ti-mus). The youngest, according to Greek legend, of the 50 sons of Lycaon of Arcadia. Some say that Lycaon was a pious king, who warned his sons that the gods were ever visiting the earth in disguise to observe mortals. His proud and arrogant sons decided to test whether a visitor who claimed to be Zeus was indeed that god. They cut up their young brother Nyctimus, boiled his flesh and served it to Zeus. Zeus, instantly aware of the nature of the meat set before him, in anger turned the sons of Lycaon into wolves; or as some say, struck them dead with his thunderbolt. He restored Nyctimus to life. Others say Lycaon was as impious as his sons and took part in this means of testing Zeus and was turned into a wolf. It was because of the lawlessness and impiety of Lycaon and his sons, according to some, that Zeus determined to punish mankind by sending a great flood.

Nymphaea (nim-fē'ā). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as goddess of love, meaning "Bridal." Theseus dedicated an image of Aphrodite Nymphaea when he made the youthful Helen, whom he had abducted with the help of Pirithous, his bride.

Nymphaea. Name sometimes given to the island of Calypso.

Nymphs. Inferior divinities, imagined as beautiful maidens, eternally young, who were considered as guardian spirits of certain localities and objects, or of certain races and families, and whose existence depended upon that of the things with which they were identified. They were generally in the train or company of some other divinity of higher rank, especially with Apollo, Artemis, Dionysus, Hermes, and Pan, and were believed to be possessed of the gift of prophecy and of poetical inspiration. Nymphs of rivers, brooks, and springs were called naiads; those of mountains, oreads; those of woods and trees, dryads and hamadryads; those of the sea, Nereids. The nymphs aided humans upon occasion, and guarded the places, tree, spring, mountain, etc., they themselves inhabited. The nymphs were wooed and won by gods and mortals alike and from them sprang many heroes. They also played a part in many of the activities of the gods and in general were a protective influence. Groves and grottoes sacred to the nymphs throughout Greece received offerings of lambs, milk, oil, and wine.

Nysa (nī'sā). The spot to which the infant Dionysus was sent by Zeus to protect him from the wrath of Hera. According to Greek mythology, the young god was nurtured in a cave in Nysa by nymphs who fed him on honey. The sacred place has never been definitely located and is probably mythical, but it was claimed by many areas where the vine is cultivated. It has been variously named as a mountain in Thrace, a city on a mountain in India, a city in Caria about 45 miles E of Ephesus, Mount Helicon in Greece, and a remote place in Aethiopia. Nysa was also the name of one of the nymphs who cared for Dionysus.

Nysaeen Nymphs or Nyseides (nī-sē'an, nī-sē'i-dēz). The nymphs who cared for the infant Dionysus on Mount Nysa, after Ino, his mother's sister who had first cared for him, died. To hide him from Hera, who was jealous because he was the child of Zeus by Semele, the nymphs covered him with ivy leaves. This plant was ever afterward associated with Dionysus. The Nysaeen nymphs, Bromie, Cisseis, Erato, Eriphia, Macris, Nysa, and Polyhymno, were rewarded by being placed among the stars by Zeus, after which they became known as the Hyades.

Nyx (niks). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Chaos. She was the goddess of night, a very ancient cosmological personification. By Erebus, her brother, she was the mother of Hypnos (Sleep), Thanatos (Death), Moros (Doom), Cer (Fate), Dreams, Momus (Blame or Mockery), Oizys (Misery), the Hesperides who guarded the Golden Apples, the three Fates (Lachesis, Atropos, and Clotho), Nemesis, Deceit, Friendship, Old Age, and Strife. Nyx, riding in a chariot and accompanied by stars, led forth the brothers Sleep and Death at the close of day, and was a force for both good and evil for man, as she brought sleep and rest or darkness and death. Nyx was even revered and feared by Zeus, whom she instructed. When Sleep, bribed by Hera, lulled Zeus so that Hera could rouse a great storm and shipwreck Heracles on the isle of Cos, Zeus on awaking threatened to hurl Sleep down to Erebus. But Nyx intervened, and Zeus bowed to her will and spared Sleep. Nyx had little or no cult worship, but was revered for her oracular powers, which were made known from a cave.

— O —

Oak. Tree sacred to Zeus. The rustling of the leaves in the grove at Dodona was interpreted by priests to reveal the will of Zeus.

Oaxes (ō-ak'ses). A river of Crete. According to some accounts, the nymph Anchiale bore the Dactyls in a cave near this river.

Oceanids (ō-sē'ā-nidz). In Greek mythology, 3000 ocean-nymphs, daughters of the sea-god Oceanus, and his consort Tethys.

Oceanus (ō-sē'ā-nus). In the belief of ancient geographers, a swift and unbounded stream that encircled all the world, from which all earthly rivers were believed to rise. Oceanus was later taken to be the outer sea, which we know as the Atlantic Ocean.

Oceanus. In Greek mythology, a Titan, the son of Gaea and Uranus. He lived with his wife Tethys in the farthest west, and never attended the meetings of the gods on Olympus, or took part in their quarrels. He and Tethys were the parents of 3000 sons, who were the river-gods of all the rivers of the world, and of 3000 daughters, the sea- and river-nymphs. Oceanus was the oldest of the Titans, and on the fall of Cronus submitted to the sovereignty of Zeus. Oceanus and Tethys brought up Hera, and to them she fled during the war between the Titans and the gods, in which Oceanus took no part. In art Oceanus was represented as an aged, bearded man, sometimes with bull's horns on his head or with a garland of crab's claws, and surrounded by creatures of the deep.

Ocellus Lucanus (ō-sel'us lū-kā'nus). Greek philosopher; born in Lucania; fl. 5th century B.C. He was a follower and possibly a pupil of Pythagoras. Writings attributed to him are of doubtful authenticity.

Ochimus (ok'i-mus). In Greek mythology, one of the seven sons of Helius. In a quarrel among the brothers one of the brothers was slain. All the brothers except Ochimus and Cercaphus fled from Rhodes, and Ochimus became king. He married a nymph, Hegetoria, who bore him Cydippe.

Ochus (ō'kus). Original name of Darius II (of Persia).

Ocnus (ok'nus). In Greek mythology, the droll of the Underworld and personification of delay or futile effort. He is described as forever plaiting a straw rope, which his ass devours as fast as he makes it: or sometimes he is shown loading the ass with sticks which keep falling off.

Ocnus. In Roman legend, an Etruscan, the son of the Tuscan River and the seeress Manto. He founded Mantua and gave it his mother's name. He commanded a group who went to the aid of Aeneas in his war against Turnus and Mezentius.

Ocrisia (ok-rī'shi-ā). In Roman legend, a slave in the house of Tarquin and Tanaquil. A phantom appeared to her as she was making an offering of food on the hearth. On Tanaquil's advice she clothed herself as a bride and waited alone in the room for the phantom. In this guise a god, either Vulcan or Lar, visited her and she became by him the mother of Servius Tullius.

Octavia (ok-tā'vi-ā). Sister of Caius Octavius (Octavian; after 27 B.C. known as Augustus). She died 11 B.C. She was the wife first of Caius Marcellus, and afterward of Mark Antony. Her son by Caius Marcellus was the first husband of her brother Octavian's (Augustus) daughter Julia. Octavia was married to Mark Antony to cement the alliance between Augustus and Mark Antony. When Antony went to the East and carried on his affair with Cleopatra with flagrant disregard for Roman morality and the feelings of his wife, Augustus used this as one of his reasons for making war on Antony and eliminating him as a rival for power in Rome. Octavia was divorced from Antony in 32 B.C.

Octavia. Daughter of Claudius I and Messalina; born c40 A.D.; killed 62 A.D. She was the wife of Nero. He divorced her in order to marry Poppaea and soon afterward contrived to have her killed, after banishing her to the island of Pandataria.

Octavian (ok-tā'vi-an). Name by which Caius Octavius, who afterward became Augustus, was known after he became the heir of Julius Caesar and, under the terms of his will, took the name Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus. After 27 B.C. he is properly known as Augustus.

Octavian Library. Library at Rome, founded by the emperor Augustus in honor of his sister Octavia. It was destroyed in the fire which raged at Rome in the reign of Titus (79-81 A.D.).

Octavius (ok-tā'vi-us), Caius. Original name of Augustus.

Octavius, Cnaeus. Roman consul in 87 B.C. and killed at Rome in that year. He was an adherent of Sulla, while his colleague, Lucius Cornelius Cinna, was an adherent of Marius. He was killed by the followers of Cinna while Sulla was absent fighting against Mithridates VI in the East.

Ocypete (ō-sip'ē-tē). In Greek mythology, one of the Harpies, a daughter of Thaumus and the Oceanid Electra. See Harpies.

Ocyrrhoë (ō-sir'ō-ē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Chiron and the nymph Chariclo. She was named for the river on whose banks she was born. She had learned the healing and hunting arts of her father, and was also endowed with the gift of prophecy. When Asclepius, the infant son of Apollo, was brought to be reared by Chiron, Ocyrrhoë prophesied that he would bring healing and health to all the world; that he would even be able to restore the dead to life; that by so doing he would rouse the envy of the gods, who would cause Zeus to strike him dead with his thunderbolt; and that after being a lifeless corpse he would be immortalized and thus twice fulfill his destiny. She also foretold the sufferings that would befall Chiron as a result of an accidental wound from one of Heracles' arrows.

Ocyrrhoë bewailed her ability to know the future, for by her own gift she knew that she incurred the wrath of heaven and would be punished by the gods. Her foreknowledge was correct. The gods, angered because she correctly predicted the future, transformed her into a mare and gave her the name Hippo.

Odeum (ō-dē'um). "Singing-place." The odeum was a form of roofed theater, generally smaller than the great open-air theaters of Greece and Rome. It was developed primarily for musical performances, because the volume of sound produced by early stringed and reed instruments was insufficiently audible in open-air theaters. The earliest recorded example is the Odeum of Pericles at Athens, built in the 5th century B.C., burned in the 1st century B.C., and reconstructed by Ariobarzanes II, king of Cappadocia. Agrippa built an odeum in the Athenian Agora, and in the 2nd century A.D. Herodes Atticus built odeas at Athens and Corinth. In the absence of special buildings for the purpose, an odeum could conveniently serve as a meeting-place for a bouleuterium (town council) or ecclesiasterium (public assembly), and with this versatility odeas were widely built throughout the Roman provinces. (JJ)

Odeum of Herodes Atticus (hē-rō'dēz at'i-kus). A roofed theater at Athens, at the SW foot of the Acropolis. It was built in the middle of the 2nd century A.D. at the expense of the wealthy statesman, litterateur, and art patron Herodes Atticus, in memory of his wife Regilla, for whom it is sometimes called the Odeum of Regilla. It is of Roman plan, semicircular, about 260 feet in diameter, with about 33 rows of seats and well-preserved stage and scene. As elsewhere, the revetment of the seats and scene-building, pavement, etc., were removed before the liberation of Greece from the Turks, but are currently being restored, and the odeum is again used for dramatic presentations, concerts, etc. Herodes Atticus also built an odeum at Corinth. (JJ)

Odysseus (ō-dis'ūs, ō-dis'ē-us). [Latin: Ulixes, Ulysses.] One of the leading Greek heroes in the Trojan War. He not only survived the war but eventually, after ten years of wandering, returned safely to his home in

Ithaca. He has many epithets; "wily," "crafty," "Odysseus of many devices," are a few of them. In Homer he is represented as a brave man of great wisdom and ingenuity, always ready with a stratagem to save the day and never wanting in sage counsel or valor. But Pindar thinks that Odysseus owes his reputation to Homer, and that he was, in fact, merely "a supple liar." In later literature Odysseus often appears as unscrupulous, shrewd, and deceitful. Ordinarily in Homer the heroes are described as "glorious," "man-slayer," "flawless," or in other abstract terms, but Odysseus receives some physical description. He had red hair and, though he had broad shoulders so that when he was seated he looked as mighty as any man, he had short legs and showed when he stood up that he was somewhat under the expected height. Odysseus passed as the son of Laertes and Anticlea, but some say that Sisyphus was his father. His name, which means "the angry one," was given to him by his grandfather Autolycus, father of Anticlea. Autolycus so named his grandson because he himself had made many enemies in his lifetime and expected Odysseus to be a target for some of them. In his boyhood Odysseus visited Autolycus on Mount Parnassus and received rich gifts from him. During a boar hunt on this visit he was wounded in the leg and bore the scar the rest of his life. Odysseus went, as did many of the heroes and princes of Greece, to the court of Tyndareus at Sparta. Unlike the others, he was not a candidate for the hand of Tyndareus' daughter Helen. He wanted to marry Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. Tyndareus feared to choose from among the many suitors for Helen's hand, lest in selecting one he offend the others and make powerful enemies. Odysseus proposed a way for him to choose one suitor without antagonizing the others. It was to make them all swear, on the joints of a dismembered horse, that they would come to the aid of the man who became Helen's husband in the event that any ill should come to him as a result of his marriage to her. Tyndareus adopted his suggestion, the suitors took the oath, and Helen was given to Menelaus. In return for this good advice Tyndareus agreed to help Odysseus win Penelope. Some say he won her as the result of a foot race that Tyndareus arranged for him to win. In any event, he married Penelope and took her with him to his home in Ithaca. There he ruled wisely and won the devotion of his subjects. Penelope bore him a son, Telemachus. While his son was still an infant Paris abducted Helen, her former suitors were called upon to honor their oath, and all was set in motion for a great expedition to Troy to recover her. Agamemnon, brother of Menelaus and the commander of the expedition, learned that it could not succeed without Odysseus. He and Menelaus, accompanied by Palamedes, went to Ithaca to secure his services. Odysseus had been warned by an oracle that if he went to Troy, he would be gone 20 years and would return alone and destitute. When the envoys arrived, they found Odysseus plowing with an ox and an ass yoked together, and flinging salt over his shoulders into the furrows. On his head was a Phrygian peasant cap. He pretended not to recognize his visitors and gave every sign that he had taken leave of his senses. But Palamedes suspected him of trickery. He seized the infant Telemachus and flung him in front of Odysseus' advancing plow. Odysseus immediately turned out to avoid injuring his son, and confessed that he had feigned madness to escape going to Troy. He was now compelled to join the Greeks in their expedition, but he never forgave Palamedes for unmasking him, and when the Greeks were later gathered before Troy, he succeeded in having Palamedes accused of treachery and brought about his death.

Calchas the seer foretold that Troy could not be taken without Achilles. Odysseus was one of the ambassadors who went to Scyros to fetch him. Some say Achilles had been hidden away among the women of Lycomedes' court by his mother Thetis to prevent him from going to the war. Odysseus appeared at the court and asked for him. Lycomedes let him search the palace but Achilles was not to be found. Odysseus now asked if he might make presents to the women of the court. He displayed girdles, jewels, and such ornaments as would appeal to women. As the women crowded around to look at his gifts Odysseus caused a trumpet

blast and a clatter of arms to be heard from the courtyard. Instantly one of the young women seized the sword and shield which Odysseus had cunningly included in the gifts he was displaying, and made ready to fight. Thus was Achilles unmasked and brought to join the Greeks. But others say Odysseus and Nestor found Achilles not at Lycomedes' court, but at his father's court, that Peleus readily consented to let his son join the Greek expedition and sent Achilles off with good advice and the company of his tutor Phoenix and his dear friend Patroclus. When the Greek fleet was wind-bound at Aulis and Agamemnon learned that only the sacrifice of his daughter Iphigenia could appease Artemis and cause favorable winds, it was Odysseus, according to some, who devised the scheme of sending for Iphigenia on the pretext that she was to be married to Achilles, and so persuaded Clytemnestra to let her come to the Greek camp, where she was sacrificed. The Greeks then had favorable winds and put to sea. They stopped at the island of Lesbos where Odysseus wrestled the king, Philomelides, and overcame him. Then they went to Tenedos. At some point before the actual siege of Troy Odysseus accompanied Menelaus to Troy as an envoy to seek the voluntary return of Helen. This mission failed. In the conduct of the war before the walls of Troy Odysseus and Nestor were Agamemnon's most trusted advisers. No matter how hopeless the Greek situation appeared, Odysseus would not hear of giving up and returning home. On his advice a rampart was built to protect the Greek ships on the beach. He was a member of the embassy which tried to patch up the disastrous quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles, as a result of which Achilles had withdrawn from the fighting. This embassy was unsuccessful, and the Greeks suffered catastrophic losses without the aid of Achilles. With Diomedes, Odysseus made a scouting raid on the Trojan camp. He killed the Thracian Rhesus, who had just come up to the aid of the Trojans, and seized his marvelous horses, because there was a prophecy that if the horses of Rhesus grazed on Trojan pastures and drank the waters of the Scamander River, Troy could not be taken. In furious fighting the next day

Odysseus was wounded and cut off by the Trojans, but was rescued by Menelaus. In this engagement many of the leading Greek heroes were wounded and the Trojans breached the wall protecting the ships. Agamemnon proposed that the Greeks give up the struggle, put to sea in their galleys, and return to Greece. Odysseus scorned this proposal and successfully urged the continuance of the war. After the death of Achilles, Thetis decreed that her son's armor, made by Hephaestus, be awarded to the bravest of the Greeks. Only Odysseus and Telamonian Ajax dared claim them. Ajax was always the enemy of Odysseus. He said Odysseus fought with words, but when swords were flying Odysseus disappeared. He reminded Odysseus that he had sought to avoid coming to Troy in the first place. For his part, Ajax wished that he had not come, for it was on the advice of Odysseus that wounded Philoctetes, possessor of the bows and arrows of Heracles, had been abandoned alone on the island of Lemnos, and it was due to the machinations of Odysseus that Palamedes had been destroyed. He accused Odysseus of cowardice for keeping his ships in the center of the line, where there was less danger, while Ajax had his ships on the exposed flank. But Ajax despaired of winning by speech, for in that field Odysseus clearly dominated; therefore, he challenged Odysseus to duel with him for the armor of Achilles. Odysseus replied that wisdom increases strength. He listed his contributions to the war and declined to duel with Ajax on the ground that he was still suffering from his wound. Agamemnon did not know how to choose between these two valiant and valuable warriors. Nestor mourned that the careless gods had sent them a great evil by making them choose between two such great men, as whoever lost in the choice would be lost to the Greeks. According to some accounts, Nestor suggested that the Greeks allow the captured Trojans to decide which of the two had done them the most injury, for perhaps thus the wrath of the loser would be turned against the Trojans rather than against his fellow Greeks. The decision of the captive Trojans caused the arms of Achilles to be awarded to Odysseus. Others say the arms were awarded as a result of a secret vote of the Greek leaders. Ajax was infuriated with the decision, and sought to kill Odysseus, but Athena inspired him with madness and he captured a ram under the impression that it was Odysseus, and flogged it unmercifully. Restored to his senses, Ajax was so appalled and humiliated by what he had done that he committed suicide. According to some accounts, Agamemnon refused burial to the body of Ajax, and ordered it exposed as prey for the birds, but he was persuaded by Odysseus to allow the burial on the ground that Ajax had made valiant contributions to the Greeks, and with the warning on the part of Odysseus that yesterday's enemy might become tomorrow's friend. He offered to help in the burial rites for Ajax, and said he would never have claimed the armor of Achilles if he had realized how much it meant to Ajax. Later Odysseus gave the armor to Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles.

When it was learned that Troy could not be taken without the bows and arrows of Heracles, Odysseus went with Diomedes to Lemnos to fetch Philoctetes, the possessor of the bow and arrows. Philoctetes had been abandoned on Lemnos at the suggestion of Odysseus when the Greeks were on their way to Troy, because he had suffered a noisome wound. Now when Odysseus appeared to ask him to go to Troy, Philoctetes' first impulse was to shoot him. But such were the persuasive powers of Odysseus, and the influence of the gods, that Philoctetes agreed to accompany him to Troy. Again with Diomedes, Odysseus went to Scyros to fetch Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, to Troy, because an oracle said Troy could not be taken without him. On learning that only Helenus knew the oracles that protected Troy, Odysseus captured him and brought him to the Greek camp. Some say Odysseus secretly entered Troy with Diomedes to steal the Palladium, a sacred image which Helenus said protected the city as long as it remained in the citadel. Some say Diomedes climbed on Odysseus' shoulders to scale the wall of the city and got the Palladium himself, and that as the two were returning to the Greek camp Odysseus thought to kill Diomedes and gain the credit for securing the Palladium for himself. He stepped behind Diomedes, but Diomedes saw the glint of his naked sword in the moonlight as he lifted it to strike him, whirled around and disarmed Odysseus, and drove him with the flat of his sword back to the Greek camp. And some say Odysseus, disguised in rags and matted with blood, entered Troy secretly and alone on another occasion, was recognized by Helen and Hecuba, questioned by them, and allowed to return unharmed to the Greek camp. Again, some say that the idea for the stratagem of the Wooden Horse by which Troy was finally taken came from Odysseus, but others say he merely took the credit for it, as usual. All agree that he was one of those who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse. In the sack of Troy he accompanied Menelaus to the house of Deiphobus, where Helen was, and had a part in the slaying of Deiphobus. According to some accounts, it was Odysseus who persuaded Agamemnon, against his will, to sacrifice Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles, and to dash Astyanax, the young son of Hector, to his death from the walls of Troy. Odysseus took Hecuba as his share in the spoils of the city, some say to prevent her from revealing his craven attitude when he secretly entered Troy and was discovered by her and Helen.

After the sack of Troy Odysseus departed with his ships for his home in Ithaca. At the outset of his voyage he was driven by a storm to the coast of Thrace, north of the island of Lemnos. He plundered the town of Ismarus, belonging to the Cicones, where he lost a number of his followers. Next he was driven to the country of the Lotophagi (the Lotus-Eaters) on the coast of Libya; then to the goat island, which lay a day's voyage to the north of the Lotophagi. Leaving behind all his ships except one, he sailed to the neighboring island of the Cyclopes (which some locate on the W coast of Sicily), where with 12 companions he entered the cave of the one-eyed Cyclops, Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon. Polyphemus devoured six of the intruders, and kept Odysseus and the others prisoners. Odysseus made Polyphemus drunk with wine, put out his one eye with a burning pole, and escaped with the remnant of his companions by concealing himself and them under the bellies of the sheep which the blinded Cyclops let out of his cave (he ran his hands over their backs, but forgot that his enemies might be clinging to their bellies). Thenceforth, however, Odysseus was pursued by the anger of Poseidon, who sought to avenge the injury inflicted on his son. After further adventures, in which he lost all his ships except one, he arrived at the island of Aeaëa, inhabited by the sorceress Circe.

He remained with her a year and she bore him, according to some accounts, three sons—Agius, Latinus, and Telegonus. At her insistence he made a journey to Hades, where he consulted the shade of the seer Tiresias. He then sailed by the island of the Sirens (which some locate near the W coast of Italy), passed between Scylla and Charybdis, and arrived at Trinacria, the island of Apollo, or of the Sun. Here his companions killed some of the sacred oxen belonging to the god with the result that they were all drowned in a shipwreck after leaving the island. Odysseus escaped with his life to the island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso, with whom he lived eight years. She bore him twin sons, Nausithous and Nausinous. Leaving Ogygia on a raft built with the assistance of the nymph, he was again shipwrecked, but reached the island of the Phaeacians, where he was discovered naked by Nausicaä, the daughter of their king Alcinous. Clothed, and presented at court, he told his story. He was carried to Ithaca by the hospitable Phaeacians, and after slaying the suitors of his wife Penelope who had been wasting his property during his long absence, was welcomed by his wife and subjects. (For a fuller description of the return of Odysseus, see Odyssey.) He now sacrificed to Hades, Persephone, and Tiresias, and on the advice which Tiresias had given him when he visited him in Hades, he set out to appease Poseidon. He went on foot, carrying an oar, until he came to a people who had never seen the sea. They asked him why he was carrying a winnowing fan. Here he set up the oar and sacrificed to Poseidon. Some say he married Callidice, the queen of this land, which was Thesprotia, and became its king and had a son by his new wife. When she died he gave the kingdom to this son, Polypoetes, and returned to Ithaca, which Penelope had been ruling in his second absence in the name of their young son, Poliporthis. An oracle had foretold that Odysseus would meet his death at the hands of his son. For this reason he banished Telemachus. Tiresias had added to this prophecy that Odysseus' death would come from the sea. Now Telegonus, his son by Circe, came searching for his father. He landed on Ithaca, unaware that it was his father's island home. Odysseus, equally unaware that the apparent raider was his son, rushed to the shore to repel him. Telegonus killed him with his spear, which was tipped with the spine of a sting ray, and thus the prophecies were fulfilled.

Odyssey (od'i-si). Epic poem, in 24 books, attributed to Homer, and generally thought of as a companion to the Iliad. Some critics, both ancient and modern, who have acknowledged the Homeric origin of the Iliad, attribute the Odyssey to a different author. These critics believe that the Odyssey is a later poem. It celebrates the ten years of wandering and trials endured by Odysseus as he struggled to reach his home in Ithaca after the close of the Trojan War.

Book I: In a council, while Poseidon is absent, Athena secures the consent of the gods to the return of Odysseus to his homeland. He has been prevented from returning after the Trojan War by the anger of Poseidon and is languishing on the isle of Ogygia with the nymph Calypso. Athena, disguised, advises Telemachus, son of Odysseus to rebuke the suitors of Penelope, his mother, who are wasting the substance of the absent Odysseus, and then to go to Pylus, home of Nestor, and Sparta, where Menelaus lives, to see what he can learn of Odysseus. Book II: Telemachus rebukes the assembled suitors for eating up his inheritance. Antinous, most insolent of them, reminds him that Penelope has tricked them. Pretending she would make her choice when she finished a shroud she was weaving, each night she raveled out what she had woven during the day. Until she chooses a husband from among them, Antinous says the suitors will continue to make merry in the halls of Odysseus. That night Telemachus boards a ship, provided and manned by Athena's aid, telling only his old nurse, Euryclea, what he intends to do and swearing her to secrecy.

Book III: In Pylus, Nestor can tell him only that the gods had scattered the Achaeans on their way home from Troy. He gives him a chariot to go to Menelaus, and sends his son with him.

Book IV: In Sparta, Menelaus tells him that he has learned from Proteus, a sea-god, that Odysseus is held on the island of Ogygia by Calypso. Meanwhile in Ithaca, Antinous and the other suitors plan to waylay and kill Telemachus on his return.

Book V: Spurred on by Athena, Zeus sends Hermes to command Calypso to send Odysseus home. The nymph agrees and informs Odysseus of his imminent departure. After a brief and understandable doubt concerning Calypso's motives, Odysseus welcomes the approaching end of his eight-year stay on her island. He builds a raft, Calypso gives him provisions, and he sails. But Poseidon is enraged when he sees Odysseus skimming over the sea, and determines that if he can not defy Zeus and prevent Odysseus from reaching Ithaca, at least he will make it difficult. He raises a mighty storm that shatters the raft. A sea-nymph, Leucothea, comes to Odysseus' aid; she gives him a veil which bears him up until he reaches a rocky island, the home of the Phaeacians. There he drags himself into a wood, covers himself with leaves and falls into a deep sleep.

Book VI: Athena now inspires Nausicaä, daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, to go to the beach with her maidens to wash her garments. Their happy cries awaken Odysseus. Naked and bruised as he is, he approaches them and asks their aid. Nausicaä directs him to her father's palace and advises him to approach her mother, Arete.

Book VII: Hidden in a mist by Athena he arrives at the palace. As he nears Arete, the mist lifts and, falling on his knees, he appeals for help. Alcinous offers the stranger hospitality.

Book VIII: The next day there is a great feast and athletic contests in which Odysseus shows his skill, and dancing. Twice when the blind minstrel, Demodocus, sings of the Trojan Wars, Alcinous notes that the stranger weeps. He tells the minstrel to cease his song and, addressing Odysseus, asks him to tell who he is and why he weeps.

Book IX: He says he is Odysseus, son of Laertes, from Ithaca, and begins his story. After leaving Troy he sacked Ismarus, city of the Cicones, and took great treasure, but his men refused to leave and were set upon by neighbors of the Cicones. Many were killed. A violent storm then drove his fleet to the land of the Lotophagi, the Lotus-Eaters, but they did not linger there for fear of the lotus, fruit of forgetfulness. Stopping next at an island near the land of the Cyclopes, he took a skin of wine and 12 comrades and went to that land. On finding a vast cave, well stocked with wine and cheese, his men urged him to steal the stores and leave, but he decided to await the return of the cave-dweller. Polyphemus, a huge, one-eyed giant, returned at dusk, drove in his flocks and barred the entrance to the cave with a great boulder. On discovering his guests he seized and ate two of them. Odysseus dared not kill him for if he was successful he and his companions would be trapped in the cave. In the morning Polyphemus devoured two more men before driving his flocks out and again barring the entrance to the cave. For his evening meal he took two more of Odysseus' unfortunate companions, and asked Odysseus his name. Odysseus replied that he was "Noman." He offered Polyphemus the wine he had so wisely brought with him, and when the Cyclops fell into a drunken sleep, Odysseus and his men poked out his one eye with a stake they had sharpened in the fire for this purpose. In a frenzy of pain the giant sought his tormentors. His howls were heard by neighboring Cyclopes but when they questioned him from outside the cave, he answered that "Noman" had wounded him and they went away, saying he was mad. Next morning when Polyphemus rolled the stone away to let his flocks out, Odysseus and his comrades clung to the thick fleece of the ram's bellies and rode out safely. Polyphemus passed his hands over the back of his flock as they went out but it did not occur to him to feel underneath. Running to his ship, Odysseus flung back a taunting shout at Polyphemus. The giant hurled a great crag after them, and sorrowfully recalled that an oracle had foretold his blinding by Odysseus, but he hadn't expected Odysseus to be so puny as "Noman." He prayed to his father, Poseidon, to avenge him. This was the reason for Poseidon's unrelenting anger at Odysseus.

Book X: From the land of the Cyclopes Odysseus went to the cliff-edged isle of Aeolus, the king of the winds. He entertained them and gave Odysseus a bag in which all the winds were tied up. As they came within sight of Ithaca his men, thinking the bag contained gifts which Odysseus was keeping for himself, opened the bag; the winds flew out and drove them back to Aeolus. That king refused to help again such men who were hateful to the gods, and they departed, compelled to use their oars until they came to the land of the Laestrygoni (Man-eaters). Odysseus alone anchored his ship outside their harbor and thus escaped when the Laestrygoni attacked his other 11 ships and devoured their crews. He fled in the last ship of his fleet to Aeaea, home of the enchantress Circe. There he sent half his forces, led by Eurylochus, to explore. Eurylochus, who had not entered Circe's palace with the others, returned and told Odysseus that his men had been turned into swine by the sorceress and begged Odysseus to fly. However the latter was determined to rescue them, and with the aid of a magic herb given him by Hermes, proved himself invulnerable to Circe's charms and compelled her to change his men back to men from the swine into which she had transformed them. After this Circe was very agreeable, entertained them nobly, and they remained with her a year. She then told Odysseus he must go to Hades and visit the shade of Tiresias, the seer, before he could get home.

Book XI: Circe sent a favorable wind and the ship arrived at the fog-shrouded land of the Cimmerians at the edge of the world, and followed the stream of Oceanus. Odysseus performed the sacrifices as Circe had directed and the souls of the dead appeared. Tiresias came, and Odysseus allowed him to drink the blood of animals he had sacrificed. The seer told him of the journey he must make and of Penelope's suitors, and said Odysseus would vanquish them. The shade of Odysseus' mother appeared and told him she had died grieving for him.

Book XII: From Hades Odysseus returned to Aeaea to bury Elpenor, one of his companions who had died there. Circe warned him of the Sirens, of Scylla, a monster with 12 legs and six hideous heads bearing three rows of teeth each, who inhabited a rocky cave and seized passing mariners, and of Charybdis, a violent whirlpool he must pass. She told him how to pass these threats with the minimum loss and also warned him, as Tiresias had done, not to harm the cattle of the Sun if they touched the island where they were pastured. When they drew near the Sirens' isle, Odysseus filled the ears of his crew with wax, but he had himself lashed to a mast and listened to the Siren's song. He begged his men to release him when he heard it but they ignored his pleas and the danger was safely passed. With great skill the whirlpool of Charybdis was navigated, but six men were seized by Scylla and devoured. Weary and discouraged, they arrived at Trinacria, the island of Helius. Odysseus, mindful of the warnings of Tiresias and Circe, wanted to sail on. His exhausted men insisted on landing, and promised not to harm the cattle of Helius. Storms kept them on the island and when their food gave out they decided, on a day when Odysseus was off praying to the gods, that they might as well die from eating Helius' cattle as from starvation. Odysseus was in despair when he learned of the feast they had eaten, and rightly so, for shortly after they again set sail Zeus sent a fierce storm and shattered the ship with a thunderbolt to punish them. Only Odysseus survived the wreck. He was swept back to Charybdis but saved himself by grasping a timber of the broken ship and paddling with his hands. Nine days later he landed at Ogygia, the isle of Calypso. She treated him kindly through his eight years' stay there, but he longed for his homeland and Penelope his wife. With this episode Odysseus brings the tale of his wanderings to a close.

Book XIII: The Phaeacians promise him a ship for the voyage to Ithaca, and at nightfall they take him aboard and sail. As he sleeps, they put him ashore on Ithaca and leave him, surrounded by many gifts. When he wakes alone, he does not recognize his surroundings and thinks that the Phaeacians have deceived him. However, Athena appears and reassures him. She helps him hide his treasure in a cave and then transforms him into an old beggar, advising him to seek Eumaeus, a swineherd who has been faithful to him during his absence, for help, and cautioning him not to betray his real identity to Eumaeus.

Book XIV: Eumaeus does not recognize him but treats him kindly and gives him meat and wine, meanwhile bemoaning the continued absence of his master Odysseus. Odysseus assures him that his master will return but Eumaeus is not convinced. In answer to questions about himself Odysseus invents a tale, including an episode in which he says that he has seen Odysseus. The words and deeds of Eumaeus confirm his loyalty to Odysseus but the time has not yet come for Odysseus to reveal himself.

Book XV: Athena visits Telemachus in Sparta and inspires him with a burning desire to go home. He leaves Menelaus, who gives him rich gifts, and returns to Pylus with Nestor's son. There he goes directly to his ship and sails. He lands on Ithaca near the hut of Eumaeus, as advised by Athena, and tells his crew to take the ship into port, thus frustrating the plans of Antinous and the suitors to waylay his ship and kill him.

Book XVI: Eumaeus is delighted to see Telemachus safely returned and goes at once to the palace to give Penelope the good news. As soon as he leaves, Athena transforms Odysseus into his own shape again and he reveals himself to his son, telling him that it is with Athena's help that he has come home, the suitors. He says he will go to the and that with her help he will overcome palace as a beggar to learn what is going on and to decide what he must do, before anyone realizes he is home.

Book XVII: When Eumaeus returns, Telemachus leaves to go home. Shortly thereafter Odysseus, again in the guise of a beggar, with Eumaeus sets out for the palace. Odysseus finds his home filled with Penelope's suitors, who are eating and drinking at his expense. They mock him as they give him the food he begs, and Antinous throws a footstool at him, but he holds his peace. Penelope sends for him to ask whether he knows anything of Odysseus and he sends word that he will talk to her after the suitors have gone, as this course of action will be more discreet.

Book XVIII: Irus, a common beggar, fearing Odysseus as a rival, is encouraged by the suitors to engage in a fist fight with Odysseus. The suitors think it is great sport and are delighted when Odysseus nearly kills him. Odysseus tries to warn Amphinomus, the best of the suitors, of the imminent arrival of Odysseus and the ruin of the suitors, but Amphinomus, though troubled, ignores him. Now Penelope appears and reminds her uninvited guests that it is customary for wooers to present gifts. Odysseus is delighted with her guile and the rich gifts it draws. When she withdraws from the hall, the merrymaking continues. The suitors entertain themselves by mocking Odysseus and he enrages them with his bold answers. A brawl over the audacity of the beggar is avoided only because Telemachus accuses the suitors of being too far gone in wine and suggests that they go home.

Book XIX: As advised by Odysseus, Telemachus then takes the suitors' weapons from the hall and hides them. Penelope comes to question the beggar. He begs her not to ask his name, and invents a story of his wanderings. He says he has seen Odysseus and predicts his early return. In spite of her tears he does not reveal his true identity. She thanks him and orders Euryclea, an old nurse, to wash the stranger's feet. In the act of doing so Euryclea recognizes him by an old scar on his leg, and would cry out but Odysseus grasps her throat and warns her to keep silence. Then Penelope describes a dream of 20 geese in the dooryard who were destroyed by an eagle and he tells her it means that Odysseus will return and slay the suitors. She says it must be soon, for she has decided to make a trial of her suitors and choose the one who can string Odysseus' great bow and shoot an arrow through the eyes of 12 ax heads set up in a row, as Odysseus himself used to do. He advises her to do this at once, and assures her that Odysseus will be among the contestants.

Book XX: The following day the banquet hall is prepared for a great feast. Odysseus meets Philoetius, one of his cattle drovers, and learns that he has been as loyal as Eumaeus. He tells Philoetius that Odysseus will soon be home.

Book XXI: Penelope joins the feast, bringing Odysseus' great bow with her, and announces the contest and her intention of marrying the winner. Odysseus withdraws to the courtyard with Eumaeus and Philoetius, proves that he is their master by showing his scarred leg, and enlists their aid to kill the suitors. When Penelope leaves the banquet hall one of the suitors tries to string the bow but is unsuccessful. Eumaeus, over the violent protest of the suitors, then hands it to Odysseus, as he has been instructed to do. Meantime, Euryclea has sent the servants away and Philoetius has taken his post guarding the entrance to the hall. Odysseus takes up the bow, strings it easily, and shoots an arrow through the ax heads which Telemachus has set up.

Book XXII: He then strips off his rags, takes an arrow and shoots Antinous in the throat. The suitors spring up, thinking it is an accident. Now Odysseus tells them who he is and vows to kill them all. As their shields and spears have been hidden by Telemachus, they seize their swords and rush on Odysseus, but to no avail. With his mighty bow and with the aid of Telemachus, Eumaeus, Philoetius, and above all, of Athena, all the suitors are slain. Next he rounds up the servants who have been faithless, orders them to clean up the bloody hall, and then Telemachus hangs them.

Book XXIII: Penelope cannot believe that it is really Odysseus. She lays a trap for him by telling the servants to move his bed. He proves his identity when he says they cannot move his bed, as he had made it himself from a living olive tree that was enclosed by the walls of the palace. At this Penelope falls into his arms. He tells her briefly of his adventures, and of the journey Tiresias has commanded him to make to a people who have never heard of the sea in order to appease the anger of Poseidon.

Book XXIV: Next day Odysseus visits his father, Laertes. In the meantime the Ithacans have discovered the slaying of the suitors. They bury their dead and resolve to avenge them. As Odysseus and his party are returning from Laertes' home, they are met by the Ithacans, fathers of the suitors. A fight breaks out and Odysseus and his group are about to conquer when Athena intervenes and advises Odysseus to make peace with them forevermore.

Oeagrus (ē'ā-grus). In Greek legend, a king of Thrace. By the muse Calliope he was the father of Orpheus and, some say, of Linus the musician.

Oeax (ē'aks). In Greek legend, a son of Nauplius and Clymene, and the brother of Palamedes, the inventor. The brothers joined the Greek army which attacked Troy. When Palamedes was killed, through the machinations of Odysseus, Oeax informed his father of the murder by writing the message on oars, which he dropped into the sea. He and his father became the implacable enemies of Agamemnon, because he had refused satisfaction for the death of Palamedes. In his scheme for revenge, Oeax told Clytemnestra that Agamemnon was bringing home Cassandra, and provoked her to murder Agamemnon. His enmity extended to Agamemnon's children, Orestes and Electra.

Oebalus (ē'bā-lus). In Greek legend, a king of Sparta. He was the second husband of Gorgophone, daughter of Perseus. His sons by Gorgophone were Tyndareus and Icarius. His son Hippocoön was said to have been born to him by the nymph Batia.

Oedipus (ed'i-pus, ē'di-). In Greek legend, the son of Laius, king of Thebes, and Jocasta, and a descendant of Cadmus. Because of an unfavorable oracle, Laius caused his son's feet to be pierced with a spike and bound when he was born (this accounts for his name, which means "swollen-footed"), and ordered him to be exposed on Mount Cithaeron. However, the shepherd into whose hands he gave the infant was too tender-hearted to leave him to die on the mountain side. Instead, he gave him to a shepherd from another district. The second shepherd gave him to Polybus, king of Corinth. Polybus and his wife Merope (or Periboea), being childless, brought Oedipus up as their own son. When he was grown to manhood, Oedipus was taunted about his origin. Hints were thrown out that he was not the true son of his father. Oedipus questioned Polybus. The king protested and sought to punish those who had made the accusations but, still uneasy in his mind, Oedipus secretly set out to consult the oracle at Delphi. To his horror the priestess told him that he would slay his father and sire children on his mother. Determined to prevent the fulfillment of this awful prophecy Oedipus did not return to Corinth but made his way to a new land. On his way from Delphi where three roads crossed, Oedipus met an older man in a chariot, who ordered him out of the road. Oedipus refused to move and a quarrel arose. Oedipus was struck and de-then proceeded on his way. On the outskirts of the city of Thebes he was stopped by a Sphinx. This monster had been terrorizing Thebes by stopping passers-by and compelling them to answer a riddle: What goes on four legs in the morning, two legs at noon, and three legs in the evening? Whoever failed to give the correct answer, and all had failed, was slain by the Sphinx. Oedipus, when the riddle was put to him, answered that it was man: In infancy he crawls on all fours, in youth he walks upright on his two legs, and in the evening of his life he needs the aid of a staff. On hearing the correct answer the Sphinx killed herself and Thebes was freed of her ravages. When Oedipus arrived in the city, he learned that the king had recently been murdered, and that his successor, his brother-in-law Creon, had proclaimed that whoever vanquished the Sphinx should become king of Thebes and marry the former king's widow, Jocasta. Oedipus was accordingly made king and married Jocasta. By her he became the father of two sons, Eteocles and Polynices, and of two daughters, Antigone and Ismene. Oedipus and Jocasta dwelt in perfect harmony and Thebes prospered. Then a plague struck the city. Cattle and men died, no young were born, the sound of weeping filled the streets. Oedipus sent Creon to the oracle at Delphi to learn the cause of the plague. On his return Creon reported that the plague would be lifted when the murderer of Laius was found and punished. Oedipus now issued a proclamation decreeing that whoever had knowledge of the murderer and sheltered him would be shunned by all Thebans and subject to banishment. He called down all sorts of terrible punishments on the murderer and on those who knew of him and concealed their knowledge. After some time the seer Tiresias was brought to the city on the advice of Creon. Tiresias at first refused to do more than hint at the identity of the murderer but, goaded by the anger of Oedipus, at last revealed that it was Oedipus himself who had murdered Laius. The tragic story gradually unfolded. The shepherd who supposedly had exposed Oedipus as an infant was found and confessed that he had given the child to a shepherd of Corinth. News came from Corinth of the death of fended himself. The stranger, angry in his turn, lashed out at Oedipus with his goad. Enraged, Oedipus set on him and killed him and all his train, save one who escaped. He Polybus, and at the same time, the fact that he was not the real father of Oedipus was revealed. All of the pieces of the story fell into place and it became horrifyingly clear that the prophecy the priestess at Delphi had made to Oedipus had come true: He had slain his father and become the father of his own sisters and brothers by his mother. Jocasta hanged herself when she learned the truth. Oedipus despairingly blinded himself and as a consequence of his own order, was shunned by all the people of Thebes. With his daughter Antigone to guide him, he left Thebes and wandered about Greece, endlessly pursued by the Furies. He came at last to Colonus in Attica. There he was befriended by Theseus and at last found peace in death. He was buried and mourned by Theseus and the faithful Antigone. Some say that Oedipus continued to rule Thebes after he learned of the crimes he had unwittingly committed, that he married again, that it was this second wife who bore his four children, and that he finally fell in battle and was honored with funeral games. Others say that once, after his misfortunes, his sons gave him the slave's portion of a sacrificial victim—the haunch, rather than the shoulder. To punish them for their scorn, he laid on them a curse that they should divide their inheritance by the sword. Oedipus was worshiped as a hero after his death. According to some accounts, his bones were treasured as the guardians of the country's safety. Some say the resting-place of his bones was a secret. Others say his grave was in the sanctuary of Demeter at Eteonus, and still others say his bones were taken to Athens.

Oedipus at Colonus (kō-lō'nus). Drama by Sophocles, produced c401 B.C., concerning the fate of Oedipus. The first scene is near a grove of trees in the countryside. Oedipus, self-blinded, banished from Thebes, clothed in rags, and with only his daughter, Antigone, for guide and protector, has wandered here in search of refuge. Antigone leads him to a rock and helps him to be seated. She describes the scene to him, telling him it must be a sacred place. As they wonder where they are, a stranger enters. He urges them to leave the spot where they are resting because, he says, it is sacred to the Eumen-ides and no human being has ever set foot in it before. In reply to questions put to him by Oedipus, who refuses to move, the stranger says they are near Athens, whose king is Theseus. However, the grove is in land belonging to Colonus and he departs to consult with its people as to whether Oedipus may remain or not. Oedipus prays to the Eumenides to grant him refuge, for Apollo has promised it. Some Elders of Colonus arrive. Their first horror at the idea of a stranger's violating their sacred grove turns to pity when they see the wretched old man, and they are impressed with his noble bearing despite his rags. When they learn he is Oedipus, whose story they know, they urge him to leave lest he pollute their city. Antigone pleads with them. Her plea moves them, but fear of the gods is stronger than pity. They ask Oedipus to respect the laws of their land and leave the sacred grove. Oedipus reminds them of the reputation of Athens for sheltering the weak. He chides them for fearing his name and for betraying their reputation by forcing him, an afflicted old man, away. The crimes he committed he tells them, were committed in innocence. He commands them not to darken the bright name of Athens, and assures them that they will offend the gods if they drive him out, for now he is under the protection of the gods. His presence will bring a blessing to Athens. His arguments sway the elders. They will lay the matter before King Theseus for decision. While they await the arrival of Theseus, Ismene, a second daughter of Oedipus, approaches. She has been searching for them. She greets her father and her sister with joy, then grieves that she brings a message of evil concerning her brothers, Polynices and Eteocles. When Oedipus first left Thebes, she says, the brothers allowed their uncle, Creon, to rule. Now they are grown and are contending for the throne. Polynices, driven out of Thebes by Eteocles, has raised an army in Argos and intends to march against Thebes. An oracle of Apollo has predicted that the army that has possession of Oedipus will win. Creon, wishing to keep mastery, is on his way to seize Oedipus, dead or alive. He will never take him into the city, for he killed his father and cannot be buried there, but he will take him to the borders of the city. Eteocles and Polynices also know of the oracle. Oedipus is incensed. After neglect, abuse, and banishment at their hands, his sons will now seek him for their own advantage. He vows that none of them shall ever benefit from him.

The elders of Colonus advise Oedipus to make amends to the Eumenides, whose sacred grove he has violated. Ismene offers to perform the rites for him and departs. The elders have heard the story of Oedipus. They ask to hear from his own lips whether what they have heard is true, namely that he married his mother and had children by her, that he killed his own father. Oedipus replies that it is all true, but that he did it in innocence, for the Thebans gave him a bride but he did not know she was his mother. He killed a man in self-defense, but he did not know it was his father. Now, he says, the oracle has promised that he will bring a blessing to the land that offers him refuge.

Theseus enters and expresses compassion for the miserable state of Oedipus and his daughters. He promises Oedipus asylum and departs. Antigone warns that Creon is approaching. He comes and with smooth words invites Oedipus to return to Thebes, so that the shame of his exile and the unhappy condition of his daughters may be erased. Oedipus is wrathful to hear Creon's hypocrisy. He knows, he says, that Creon will not take him back into Thebes at all, and that Creon is seeking his own advantage because of the oracle. Rather than return with him Oedipus curses him and his own sons. Creon threatens him. If he cannot take Oedipus, he will seize his daughters. Ismene has already been taken. He orders his guards to seize Antigone. They carry her off. Creon prepares to seize Oedipus but Theseus returns and forbids him, and also sends his men to rescue the daughters of Oedipus. As for Creon, Theseus says he will be dealt with according to the laws of Athens. In the meantime, he accuses Creon of disgracing and dishonoring the name of Thebes. Creon tries to justify himself. He flatters Theseus and Athens for the rule of law and respect for the gods. Then he recites the crimes of Oedipus, mentions the pollution his presence brings, and says he would spare Athens from it. Oedipus cries out that he knows the story better than anyone. He lashes out against Creon for telling his disastrous history again, and shames him. Again he declares his innocence. The oracle that he would slay his father was given before he was even born. And as for marrying his mother, Creon should be ashamed to drag out the story of his own sister again. The Athenians, Oedipus says, know not only how to rule themselves but how to protect the weak. Theseus orders his men to recover Ismene and Antigone. He assures Oedipus he can stay in Athens in peace and, taking Creon with him, he leaves. He returns shortly with Antigone and Ismene. Overjoyed, Oedipus thanks and blesses Theseus. Theseus tells him a man has rushed up to Poseidon's altar as a suppliant, and that he wishes to see Oedipus and asks for assurance that he will be allowed to depart in safety after he has done so. Theseus adds that this suppliant has come from Argos. When Oedipus hears this he realizes it is his son Polynices, and at first refuses to see him, but yields to Antigone's pleas that he hear his son, whom, he says, he hates. Polynices enters. He berates himself for his neglect of his father. His errand is to ask his father's friendship in the war against Eteocles for the throne. Oedipus answers him with wrath. He reminds him that he was no kinder to his father than Eteocles has been. He knows why they all seek him now, after abandoning him for so long. It is because they need him. As he refused Creon, he now refuses Polynices, and predicts that the brothers will both die if Polynices marches against Thebes. The inheritance he leaves for his sons is a place to die in. In sending Polynices away, he prays that the brothers will kill each other. Polynices prepares to leave. He begs his sisters to give him honorable burial if he falls at Thebes. Antigone reminds him that the oracle and the curse will both fail if he does not attack Thebes and pleads with him to spare his own city. Polynices answers that he will not inform his allies of the oracle, and that having raised an army he must fight or he will be branded a coward. He goes. A clap of thunder is heard. Oedipus calls on his children to send for Theseus, for the thunder is a sign from Zeus that his death is near. Thunder peals again, and yet a third time. Theseus appears and Oedipus welcomes him. He wants to keep his promise that his body will bless Athens before he dies. Theseus alone is to know the spot where he dies. Theseus must reveal it to none save his successor, for the body of Oedipus in Athenian soil will protect Athens from Thebes. Now Oedipus, the blind one, helped by the gods, leads his daughters and Theseus away. As the elders wait, a messenger comes. Oedipus first purified himself, then said farewell to his daughters and commended them to the care of Theseus. He sent them away, keeping only Theseus with him. When the messenger looked back, Oedipus had disappeared, and Theseus was holding his hand before his eyes as if blinded by a great light. The death of Oedipus was quiet; only Theseus knows how it came. Antigone returns, grieving, followed by Theseus. He cannot yield to her plea to know where her father's grave is for he gave his oath in return for the promise of Oedipus to protect his country from harm.

Oedipus Rex (Tyrannus), or Oedipus the King. Tragedy by Sophocles on the story of Oedipus of the cursed house of Labdacus. The date of its first production is not known. With dramatic power and logical motivation, it perfectly illustrates the conception of the tragic hero, defined by Aristotle as "a man who is highly renowned and prosperous, but one who is not preëminently virtuous and just, whose misfortune, however, is brought upon him not by vice and depravity but by some error of judgment or frailty."

The scene is before the palace of Oedipus at Thebes. Seated on the steps of the altars are a number of suppliants, their hair bound with white fillets of wool. Oedipus comes from the palace to learn their prayer. An aged priest of Zeus says that the city is beset by a plague—vines and cattle are dying, women are producing stillborn infants. As Oedipus once before saved them by killing the dread Sphinx, before he was king, they turn to him again, now that they have made him their king. Oedipus knows of the plague; he suffers for the city, for its people, and for himself. He has sent Creon, son of Menoeceus, to the oracle at Delphi to learn how the plague can be lifted. As he wonders why his emissary has not returned, Creon enters with a message from the oracle. The word is that the plague will be lifted when the man who killed Laius has been found and driven from the city. Laius, the last king before Oedipus, was murdered by a band of robbers as he was returning from Delphi. Because Thebes was so troubled by the Sphinx at that time, the search for his murderers was not pursued. Oedipus resolves that he will find the murderers and purge Thebes. The suppliants are comforted by his promise and leave. A chorus of Theban Elders enters and sings an ode, mourning the plague and praying to the gods to save the city from the pestilence that is smiting down her children. Oedipus speaks to them. If the man who killed Laius is in Thebes, let him declare himself, and his only punishment will be exile from the city. If any one knows who the murderer is, he must declare it. But if any one knows and does not declare it, that man shall be banished from the life and shelter of Thebes and hounded by the gods. If it were a member of his own household, Oedipus would carry out this punishment, and he charges all of them to do the same. Apollo has spoken to them from Delphi; they must obey the god. Since he, Oedipus, now rules in the place of the slain man, is married to his former wife, and since his children will be heirs to the kingdom, Oedipus has more obligation than any of them to find the murderer of Laius. He will, he says, champion the cause of Laius as if he were his own father. If any disobeys his command to reveal the murderer, he prays that the gods will smite that man.

Tiresias, the blind seer whom Oedipus has called to the palace for help, is led in by a boy. He refuses to answer the questions of Oedipus, saying that it will be better for all if he keeps his peace, yet he knows the man they are seeking. This infuriates Oedipus. Tiresias assures him that the future will come of itself; Oedipus may rage all he likes, but he will remain silent. However, he cannot carry out his intention. Under the lash of Oedipus' tongue he is goaded into saying that Oedipus himself was the slayer of Laius. When Oedipus realizes that Tiresias means what he says, he hotly concludes that this is a plot, planned with Creon, the queen's brother, to ruin him. Tiresias tells him Creon

is not a plague to him and that he is his own plague, but Oedipus concentrates on the thought of a plot. The chorus tries to calm them. Tiresias speaks again and tells Oedipus that though he has eyes, he cannot see the misery he is in, nor understand where he is living, nor with whom. He predicts that the curse of Oedipus' mother and father will drive him from Thebes. Oedipus, in a rage, tells him to be gone, but calls him back when Tiresias mentions his parents, and asks who they were. Tiresias predicts that this day will reveal all to him.

The chorus, alone, sings an ode of foreboding, but refuses to believe Oedipus guilty. Creon enters. He has heard the charges of a plot laid against him and has come to face the king. Oedipus berates him. Creon tries to assure him, and asks not to be convicted without some proof. The chorus approves his defense, but Oedipus is not appeased and vows to kill him.

Jocasta, who has heard their angry voices, joins them and begs them to cease their quarrel when the city is already so afflicted. She urges Oedipus to believe Creon's oath that he is his friend. No one wants to tell her the cause of their quarrel, but Oedipus says he will, for he honors her above all others. He tells her he has been accused of murdering Laius. Jocasta seeks to relieve his mind. An oracle said Laius would die by the hand of his own son. But Laius was killed at a place where three roads cross by a band of robbers. His own son, and hers, had been abandoned on a mountain side with his ankles pinned together, when he was only three days old. Therefore the oracle was not fulfilled; the gods can change the future as they will.

Oedipus is not calmed by this story. He questions Jocasta. Where was the place where the three roads cross? She answers that it was on the way from Delphi, and the slaying happened just before Oedipus came to Thebes. As Oedipus questions her and hears her answers, he becomes more agitated. He tells that when he was a youth, son of King Polybus and Queen Merope of Corinth, he overheard some drunken youths say he was not the true son of his father. Vexed and troubled, he went to Delphi to question the oracle. There he was told he would kill his father, and then marry his mother and have children by her. After that, to prevent the fulfillment of the oracle, he refused to return to Corinth. Instead he came to Thebes. On the way he met a chariot at a place where three roads crossed, disputed the passage, and in anger slew the old man riding in it. Thus, he must be the man to suffer his own proclaimed punishment for the murder of Laius, unless the one man who escaped from the retinue of Laius and for whom he has sent, swears by his story that Laius was set upon by a band of robbers. If he does, Oedipus is innocent, for he was alone when he killed the old man in the chariot. No matter what the man says, Jocasta insists that he cannot change the story now for the whole city has heard it, but besides, the oracle had said Laius would die by the hand of his son, and his son had perished when he was an infant.

They go into the palace, but Jocasta soon comes out and makes offerings on the altar of Apollo. She prays for an end to Oedipus' terrors and to the uncleanness that befouls them all. A messenger comes seeking Oedipus to tell him that his father Polybus is dead and that the people of Corinth want him for their king. Jocasta is delighted, for now it is impossible for the oracle that Oedipus will kill his own father to come true. Oedipus is relieved too, but still fears the second part of the oracle, namely that he will marry his mother. The messenger, overhearing, tells him to be easy about that, for Merope after all, is not his mother, and Polybus was not his father. The messenger is perfectly sure of this because he himself gave Oedipus into the hands of Merope. He had received Oedipus as an infant, with his ankles pinned together, from a shepherd on Mount Cithaeron, and had given him to Polybus and Merope. This tale gives a new direction to Oedipus' thoughts. He wants to find the shepherd and unravel the mystery of his birth. Jocasta begs him not to continue his researches. She implores him to take her advice and give it up. But he is so determined to discover whether he is of noble or base birth that the details the messenger has given him mean nothing to him. They do to Jocasta who hopes he will never know who he is. When he persists in questioning the shepherd, who has now been brought in, she rushes into the palace. The shepherd, with the greatest reluctance, is forced to reveal what Jocasta has realized is true: Oedipus is the son of Laius and Jocasta. The shepherd had been given the infant to expose on the mountain, so that the oracle concerning the death of Laius would not be fulfilled. But his heart was touched by the child, and instead he gave him to the messenger now standing before them. Now Oedipus realizes that the oracle he had received at Delphi and which he tried so desperately to circumvent, has been fulfilled. He rushes into the palace in a frenzy. A second messenger comes out and announces that Jocasta, in horror at what she has learned, has hanged herself. As he finishes speaking Oedipus staggers forth, his face streaming with blood from his empty eye sockets. Feeling he was no longer worthy to look on the sun he had plucked out his own eyes. He calls down ruin on the man who preserved him as an infant so that he could grow up and commit these horrors. As he swore to do to the murderer of Laius, he commands, Creon, who now becomes king, to banish him from the city. He leaves Thebes to free it from the pestilence of his presence.

Oeneus (ē'nūs). In Greek legend, a son of Porthus. He was king of Calydon in Aetolia. He married Althaea and was the father of Toxeus, Meleager, Tydeus, Deianira, and Gorge, although some accounts say Ares was the father of Meleager and Dionysus the father of Deianira. Dionysus gave him a vine plant and he is said to have been the first to cultivate grapes. Bellerophon visited Oeneus at his court and they exchanged guest gifts of lasting friendship, a fact that assumed great significance for their respective grandsons, Glaucus and Diomedes, in the Trojan War. Agamemnon and Menelaus were sheltered by Oeneus for a time after their father's death. Because he neglected to offer first fruits to Artemis when he made offerings to the other gods and goddesses, the goddess sent a savage boar to lay waste his land. The boar was slain by Meleager in a hunt in which many great heroes took part. Afterward Artemis inspired a war over possession of the boar's hide to harass the Calydonians.

In his later days Oeneus was driven from his throne by rebels and restored to it by his grandson Diomedes.

Oeno (ē'nō). In Greek mythology, one of the three daughters of Anius, king of Delos. She was given the power by Dionysus to turn whatever she wished into wine. See Elaïs.

Oenochoë (ē-nok'ō-ē). In Greek antiquity, a small vase of graceful shape, with a three-lobed rim, the central lobe forming a mouth adapted for pouring, and a single handle reaching above the rim: used for dipping wine from the crater and filling drinking cups.

Oenoë (ē-nō'ē). An island of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea. Here Thoas, king of Lemnos, is said to have landed when he was cast adrift in a chest by his daughter Hypsipyle to save him from the Lemnian women. The name of the island was later changed to Sicinus, after the child that Oenoë, the water-nymph, bore to him.

Oenoë. In ancient geography, a place in C Argolis. Oeneus, king of Calydon, was driven out of his kingdom and took refuge with Diomedes at Argos. Diomedes treated him as a father. When Oeneus died, Diomedes buried him in Argolis and the Argives named the place Oenoë after him.

Oenomancy (ē'nō-man-si). A mode of divination among the ancient Greeks, from the color, sound, and other peculiarities of wine when poured out in libations.

Oenomaus (ē-nō-mā'us). In Greek legend, a son of Ares and a nymph, or of Ares and the Pleiad, Sterope. He was a king of Pisa and Elis. His wife Sterope, a daughter of Acrisius, bore him three sons, Leucippus, Hippodamus, and Dysponteus, and one daughter, Hippodamia. Either because he was in love with her himself or because he feared one of her offspring would cause his death, he determined not to let her marry. However, he did not say this was the case. He said he would wed Hippodamia to the suitor who could beat him in a chariot race from Olympia to the Isthmus of Corinth. If Oenomaus, who gave each suitor a head start while he sacrificed at Olympia, overtook the suitor in the race, he flung his spear into the suitor's back. But if a suitor won, Oenomaus would have to die and Hippodamia would be given to the victor. However, since Oenomaus' horses were given to him by Ares and were the swiftest in Greece, Oenomaus always won. He had already defeated 12 or 13 suitors and nailed their heads to the door of his palace when Pelops, son of Tantalus, came to race for Hippodamia's hand. Pelops' horses and winged chariot had been given him by Poseidon, but to make absolutely sure of winning, he bribed Oenomaus' charioteer Myrtilus, a son of Hermes. Myrtilus substituted wax pins in the axles of Oenomaus' chariot. As the racers neared the goal on the Isthmus, Pelops, with Hippodamia in the chariot beside him, was in the lead. Oenomaus in a furious attempt to overtake him was suddenly cast out of his chariot. The wheels had flown off. He was dragged along, tangled in the reins, to his death. But some say Pelops won and Oenomaus killed himself, or that Pelops, on winning, killed him. But before Oenomaus died, he put a curse on Myrtilus for betraying him and prayed that Myrtilus would die at the hands of Pelops.

Oenone (ē-nō'nē). In Greek legend, a nymph of Mount Ida. A daughter of the river-god Oeneus, she was versed in the arts of healing, which had been taught her by Apollo, and in the arts of divination, which she learned from Rhea. She was loved by Paris when he lived as a simple shepherd on Mount Ida, and bore him a son, Corythus. When Paris returned to his father's palace and later decided to sail to Sparta, Oenone begged him not to leave her, but her pleas were unavailing. As she said goodbye to him, she told him to return to her if he was ever wounded, as she alone could heal him. Toward the end of the Trojan War he did return, grievously wounded. Oenone, jealous of Helen and maddened by Paris' desertion, scornfully told him to get Helen to heal him. She knew Helen could not do this, and in the night Oenone ran through the forest to find Paris. Some say her love for him compelled her to seek him out to cure him. But she arrived too late. Paris was already dead and lying on his funeral pyre. Muffling her face in grief, Oenone flung herself on the lighted pyre, clasped Paris in her arms, and died in the flames with him. Their ashes were mixed in one urn and buried beneath a huge mound. Two pillars were erected on it, facing in opposite directions, for the ancient jealousy persisted in the marble.

Oenophyta (ē-nof'i-tā). In ancient geography, a place in Boeotia, Greece, about 23 miles N of Athens. Here the Athenians under Myronides defeated (456 B.C.) the Boeotians.

Oenopion (ē-nō'pi-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Dionysus and Ariadne, and a king of Chios, which he had inherited from Rhadamantys of Crete. He was the father, by the nymph Helice, of Merope. He promised his daughter to Orion in return for killing the wild beasts of Chios, but kept delaying the marriage. Orion assaulted Merope, while under the spell of too much wine, and Oenopion punished him by blinding him as he slept. When Orion returned from the East with his sight restored Oenopion hid from him in a palace under the earth built for him by Hephaestus. Oenopion had been taught how to make wine by his father Dionysus, and it was he who first realized that it was wise to mix the wine with water for drinking purposes.

Oenotria (ē-nō'tri-ā). In ancient geography, a name given by the Greeks to the S part of Italy, which was colonized by Oenotrians. The name was ultimately changed to Italy. It was to this region that Aeneas and his Trojan followers went to fulfill their destiny.

Oeonus (ē-ō'nus). In Greek legend, a young relative of Heracles who accompanied him to Sparta. As he was walking about the streets one day, a dog rushed out and attacked him. Oeonus threw a stone at the dog in self-defense and killed it. The sons of Hippocoön surged forth and beat Oeonus with cudgels. Heracles rushed up to protect him, but he was too late; Oeonus had been beaten to death. On this occasion Heracles was injured in the thigh and was compelled to withdraw. Later he resolved to wage war on Hippocoön and this time he killed him and his sons. In gratitude for having avenged the death of Oeonus Heracles raised a sanctuary of Athena Axiopoenus (Just Requital) in Laconia and dedicated a shrine of Asclepius Cotyleus (Of the Hip-joint) on the road to Therapne for the healing of his wound.

Oeta (ē-tā), Mount. A mountain in S Thessaly. Here Heracles built his own funeral pyre when he was suffering from the agonies caused by the poisoned garment sent to him by his wife. Since he was too strong to die, he cast himself on a pyre of his own building and prevailed on Philoctetes to set it alight. A cloud descended on the pyre and when it had lifted, all trace of Heracles had vanished. Nearby is the pass of Thermopylae, into the stream of which Heracles had flung himself to get relief from his burning pain. Its waters brought no relief to Heracles. On the contrary, he caused the waters to bubble and steam, hence the name, which means "burning" or "hot passage."

Oetylus (ē'ti-lus). An ancient town in Laconia, on the Taenarum promontory. It was named for a hero of Argive descent, and sent many heroes to the Trojan War under the command of Menelaus.

Ogmios (og'mē-ōs). Ancient Gallic god of eloquence, equated with the Old Irish Ogma. The Romans, when they invaded Gaul, identified Ogmios with their own Mercury.

Ogygia (ō-jij'i-a). In classical geography, the island of Calypso, referred to in the Odyssey. Plutarch says it lies due west, beneath the setting sun.

Ogygus (oj'i-gus). A legendary Boeotian king, said to have sprung from the soil or, as some say, the son of Poseidon. During his reign Lake Copais overflowed its banks and inundated the region with a great flood that came to be known as the Ogygian Flood.

Oicles (ō-ik'lēz). In Greek legend, an Argive, the son of Antiphates. He was the father of Amphiarus the seer. He accompanied Heracles on his expedition against Troy to punish Laomedon. Oicles was left to guard the ships while Heracles attacked Troy. The Trojans, hurriedly armed, set upon the ships to burn them but Oicles, fighting heroically, held them off until his companions could launch the ships and escape. Some say Oicles was killed in this action. Others say he survived it and was still alive when his grandson Alcmaeon was driven mad by the Furies, and that he gave asylum to Alcmaeon.

Oileus (ō-i'lūs). A legendary king in Locris. He had gone as an Argonaut with Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece, and was wounded near the island of Ares, when an iron feather dropped from one of the birds of Ares on him. He was known as a "sacker of cities." By his wife Eriopis he was the father of Ajax the Less, and by Rhene, his concubine, he was the father of Medon.

Olbia (ol'bi-a). In ancient geography, a city in Scythia, a Greek colony from Miletus, near the confluence of the Borysthenes (the modern Dnieper) River and the Hypanis (modern Bug).

Olbia. An ancient settlement on the northeast coast of the island of Sardinia. It had the best harbor on the coast and its traditional founding is attributed to an expedition from Thespieae and Attica led by Iolaus. (AH)

Old Man of the Sea. In Greek mythology, a name for Nereus, the god from who came to be thought of as the god of the Mediterranean, as distinct from Oceanus, the personification of the outer sea. This title or name is also given to Phorcys.

Olen (ō'len). A mythical poet of Lycia. He was reputed to be the first to sing hymns to the gods in connection with the worship of Apollo at Delphi. To him was attributed the legend of Apollo's visit to the Hyperboreans.

Olenus (ō'lē-nus). In ancient geography, a town on the coast of Achaea. It was one of the 12 towns occupied by the Achaeans after the Ionians had left the region. In the time when Dexamenus was king of Olenus, Heracles is said to have visited his kingdom, having just finished the labor of cleansing the Augean Stables; there he saved the daughter of Dexamenus from marriage with the centaur Eurytion. Olenus did not grow in size and was finally abandoned by its inhabitants because it was so small as to be defenseless.

Oliarus (ō-li-ār'us) or Olearius (ō-lē-ār'us). [Modern name, Antiparos.] Island in the Cyclades, SW of Paros, celebrated for a stalactite grotto. Length, about eight miles.

Olive. Tree sacred to Athena. In a legendary contest between Poseidon and Athena for possession of the city of Athens, Poseidon struck the rock of the Acropolis with his trident and a well of salt water gushed forth. Athena planted the olive tree beside the well, and as this was considered the more useful and valuable gift, Athena was awarded the city. The well and the olive tree were in the temple of Erechtheus. When the Persians under Xerxes captured and sacked Athens (480 B.C.), they killed the Athenians who had rushed to the Acropolis for safety and burned the temple with the olive tree in it. But when the Athenians returned to the citadel to offer sacrifices, they found a fresh shoot growing out of the old trunk. The olive tree could still be seen on the Acropolis as late as the 2nd century A.D. Some say Heracles, having reestablished the Olympic Games, went back to the land of the Hyperboreans and asked Apollo's priests to give him some of the wild olive trees growing there. He wanted the trees to provide shade for the precinct of Zeus at Olympia. The priests gave him a tree which he planted in the precinct of Zeus. From that time on, he decreed that the victors in the contests should be crowned with olive leaves. This was to be their sole reward, because he had not received payment for his labors for Eurystheus. His decree was honored. Branches for the victors' crowns were cut from the tree in the sacred grove of Zeus with a golden sickle, by a boy of noble birth, both of whose parents were still living.

Cultivation of the olive was an important feature of agricultural life in the ancient world. In Greece the expansion in olive culture came after the Persian Wars when expanded maritime activity made it possible both to import grain and to export olive oil. Cultivation in Italy increased after the Punic Wars. Methods of cultivation described by ancient authors are still followed.

Olonos (ō-lō'nos). See Erymanthus.

RED-FIGURED EYE-CUP, OLTOS, c530-520 B.C.
Munich

Oltos (ol'tos) or Oltus (-tus). Attic vase-painter, active c530-510 B.C. Two kylixes (cups) signed by him as the painter are extant, and over 100 other cups have been attributed to him. Among his works is a large kylix (Tarquinia) on which the gods on Olympus are shown. An eye cup (Munich) decorated on the inside in black-figure style shows

Dionysus with a drinking cup; on the outside the decoration is in red-figure and consists of two large eyes separated by a flute case on one side and two large eyes separated by a nose on the other. Another cup (Munich) in red-figure has Priam with a train of gift bearers before Achilles to ransom the body of Hector. Oltos also worked, to a less degree but with great success, on the larger vessels, as the amphora and stamnos.

Olympia (ō-lim'pi-ā). In ancient geography, the site of a celebrated sanctuary of Zeus and of the Olympic Games, the most important of the great public games of classical antiquity. Situated in Elis in the valley of the Alpheus River at its confluence with the Cladeus River, its location and importance caused it to be spared the incessant warfare that harassed most of the rest of Greece. The area was originally a part of Pisatis, whose capital was Pisa, but came, after many engagements between Eleans, Pisans, Spartans, and Argives, under the control of Elis early in the 6th century B.C. Through centuries of warfare and change in Greece, Olympia remained a relatively peaceful spot, remote from political upheavals and protected by its geographical location. It was primarily a religious center, where the athletic contests in honor of the gods gradually took on more importance than the religious ceremonies that brought them into being. The site is a peaceful valley, cooled by numerous pine trees, once washed by two rivers, and protected at the north by the low wooded Hill of Cronus. The origins of the sanctuary and of the games are anterior to history; according to tradition the games were reorganized, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, in the 9th century B.C. The list of Olympic victors goes back to 776 B.C., which is the first of the four years of the first Olympiad, but the Olympiad system of chronology did not come into accepted use until much later. South of the Hill of Cronus at Olympia was the Altis, a sacred enclosure that was the religious center. It was surrounded by a low wall, the location of which was changed from time to time through the centuries to enlarge the enclosure. Inside the Altis was the 6th century B.C. Doric temple of Zeus, built from the spoils that were taken from the Pisans by the Eleans. Libo, the architect who designed the temple shortly after the Elean victory, did not live to see its completion, which was not accomplished until the middle of the 5th century B.C. The greatest treasure of the temple, which was richly decorated within and without, was the statue of Olympian Zeus by Phidias. In front of the temple, facing the east, were many statues given as votive offerings at various times. Among them was the Nike of Paeonius, given by the Messenians to celebrate a victory over the Spartans. Inside the north wall of the Altis was the ancient temple of Hera, in the cella of which stood the famous Hermes and the Infant Dionysus, by Praxiteles. Between the temples of Zeus and Hera, on a slight rise, was a sanctuary of Pelops, enclosed by a pentagonal stone wall. Black rams were here sacrificed to Pelops, who was honored at Olympia only slightly less than Zeus, and in memory of whom, some say, the first games were instituted. East of the temple of Hera stood the Metroum, a temple dedicated to the Mother of the Gods, and south of the Metroum, roughly in the middle of the Altis, was a very ancient altar of Zeus made of ashes of victims mixed with the waters of the Alpheus River. In addition, there was a profusion of statues of gods, heroes, and victors scattered within the Altis, as well as numerous other buildings that were erected in later times. Outside the Altis, to the west, was the Bouleterium, dating from the 6th and 5th centuries B.C. Here sat the Upper Council, or Boule, that managed affairs at Olympia. Also to the west were a gymnasium and palestra where the athletes trained for the contests. At the northwest corner of the Altis stood the Prytaneum, the chief administrative building at Olympia, where the priests and other officials took their meals and where visitors of importance and victors were entertained. In half the building was the sacred hearth of Hestia, on which a fire was kept burning at all times. To the east of the Altis was the stadium, capable of seating 20,000 spectators, where the foot races were held. German archaeologists have uncovered the marble starting line, marked off in equal spaces for the contestants, and the finish line, 192.27 meters away. South of the stadium was the hippodrome, where the chariot races were run. In addition, the site at Olympia was occupied by a number of thermae, chiefly of Roman date, the treasures of various Greek cities and states, numberless statues and works of art, and steles with commemorative inscriptions. The Olympic Games were formally abolished (394 A.D.) by the emperor Theodosius as a relic of paganism. The monuments were much shattered by earthquakes in the 6th century, and as time went on were progressively buried by landslides from Cronus and inundations of the Cladeus (now dry), and the Alpheus, in one of which the hippodrome was entirely washed away. Sand and earth were deposited to a depth of from ten to 20 feet over the ruins. Nor was man free from responsibility in the destruction of the monuments. The heads of many statues were lopped off to destroy the pagan idols, and much material from the temples and other buildings was carried away for use in humbler structures. The French Expédition de Morée made (1829) some superficial excavations, and recovered some sculptures (now in the Louvre) from the temple of Zeus. In six seasons of work after 1874, the German government laid bare down to the ancient level the greater part of what survives of the sanctuary. The sculptural finds include the Hermes of Praxiteles and the Nike of Paeonius, which are now in the Museum at Olympia, along with large fragments from the pediments of the temple of Zeus as well as fragments of metopes from the same temple. In the departments of architecture and epigraphy the German excavations, resumed after World War II, rank as the most important that have been made. The antiquities discovered are preserved on the site. Olympia as a religious and athletic center did not seek to exercise influence on political affairs, and it was perhaps for this reason that it was respected as a peaceful island in the midst of the constantly warring Greek city-states, that armed soldiers were not permitted to pass through its territory, and that guarantees of safe conduct through hostile areas could be given to contestants and spectators going to the games. For centuries, the festival at Olympia gave one point of unity to the Greeks perpetually at odds with each other. In its Golden Age, Olympia developed a high standard of personal excellence in the games, and served as a widely-attended showplace for the presentation of Greek ideas and for the exhibition of some of the finest achievements in Greek art, poetry, literature, and philosophy.

Olympians (ō-lim'pi-anz). The 12 high gods of Greek mythology, so named because they dwelt on Mount Olympus. They are usually counted as follows: Zeus, the supreme god who ruled over all; Hera, his consort and sister; Hestia, another sister; Poseidon, his brother; the four daughters of Zeus, Athena, Hebe, Artemis, and Aphrodite; his four sons, Hermes, Ares, Apollo, and Hephaestus. Demeter and Dionysus are sometimes added to the original 12, and sometimes also Heracles.

Olympian Zeus. Great statue of Zeus in the sanctuary at Olympia. It was one of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World, and in ancient times it was considered a misfortune to have died without beholding it. The statue, of ivory and gold, with painted draperies, was made by Phidias, whose workshop near the sanctuary at Olympia existed into the Christian era and later became a Byzantine church. Phidias was assisted in executing the statue, which was considered, with the statue of Athena in the Parthenon, his masterwork. According to tradition, when Phidias was commissioned to make the statue he was asked what model he would use, and was said to have replied that he would use Homer's description:

"Thus spoke the son of Cronus, and with darkling eyebrows he nodded.

Then the ambrosial locks of the King flowed waving about him, Down from his head immortal; . . ."

When the statue was finished, Phidias prayed for a sign from Zeus that the god found it acceptable. Immediately a bolt of lightning struck the floor of the temple in front of the image, signifying the pleasure of Zeus in the work. Many eminent travelers of the ancient world testified to the extraordinary beauty and majesty of the statue, but only Pausanias attempted to describe it in detail. He tells of the god on his throne, his head wreathed with the wild olive. In his right hand was an image of Victory; in his left hand was an ornamented scepter on which perched an eagle. On his feet were golden sandals, and his robe was decorated with figures of animals and flowers. The throne was of gold, jewels, ebony, and ivory, and was decorated with many figures from mythology. According to some accounts, the Emperor Caligula wished to transport the image to Rome, and replace the head of Zeus with an image of his own, but the ship he sent for the purpose was struck by lightning and lost. Whenever, later, any of his men attempted to lay hands on the statue, they were driven back by a loud peal of laughter from the image. The image has been completely lost. Some say it was lost in a fire about 408 A.D., or that it was destroyed in Constantinople, whither it had been taken, about 475 A.D. Only representations of it on coins remain. The descendants of Phidias held the office of Burnishers of the Image for generations; they anointed the ivory with oil to keep it from cracking.

Olympias (ō-lim'pi-as). Wife of Philip II of Macedon, and mother of Alexander the Great; put to death 316 B.C. The daughter of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus, she met Philip at Samothrace, where he had gone to be initiated into the mysteries, and married him in 357 B.C. According to tradition, before Alexander was born, she dreamed a thunderbolt fell on her body and that from it flames spread out in all directions and then were extinguished. This was taken as an omen that her son would have brilliant successes. Of a strongly mystical temperament, it is said that at the religious orgies she twined tame serpents about her body, a sight men could not bear to see. Once also, it is said, Philip found a serpent lying beside her as she slept. From that time on he found her distasteful and turned his attention to other women. Her proud and tumultuous spirit was roused to fury and desire for revenge by his flagrant infidelities. She found some satisfaction in turning her son against his father. In 337 B.C. Philip inflicted the supreme insult by casting her aside altogether and marrying Cleopatra, the niece of his general, Attalus. At the wedding feast Attalus asked the assembled company to pray for a legitimate heir, thus bringing into the open rumors that Olympias was, though more discreet, no less unfaithful than Philip, and that Alexander was not his son. Alexander hurled a cup into Attalus' face for his insult to his mother. Philip rose to run his son through with his sword but tripped over a couch as he lunged. After this Alexander took his mother to her old home in Epirus. She continued to intrigue against Philip for revenge and for power. At the marriage of Philip's daughter to her brother, the king of Epirus, Philip was murdered as he walked in the wedding procession. Olympias did not wield the dagger that killed him, but it has been said on the basis of evidence of doubtful validity that she was the architect of the plot. Still thirsting for revenge, she caused the infant son of Philip and Cleopatra to be slain in his mother's arms and compelled Cleopatra to hang herself. This not only avenged her honor but also cleared a possible rival from Alexander's path. After Alexander's accession (336 B.C.) she maintained her influence at court, especially during Alexander's absences in his campaigns. She constantly wrote to him, advising him not to enrich his companions, lest they seek his throne, and pouring out accusations against Antipater, left behind as regent of Macedonia. Alexander sent her many gifts from the spoils he took in Asia but did not allow her advice to influence his conduct of affairs. Antipater in his turn sent letters of accusation against Olympias. Alexander read them and remarked that Antipater did not realize how easily all his words could be washed out by the tears of a mother. Having made an enemy of Antipater, when Alexander died (323 B.C.), she prudently retired to Epirus once more. From there she opposed the growth of the power of Cassander, Antipater's son, but he besieged her at Pydna, and, after her capitulation, had her slain.

Olympias. Spring, near Trapezus in Arcadia. Every other year, according to the Arcadians, the spring ceased to flow; instead, fire rose up. The Arcadians said that here the battle between the gods and the giants took place, and here the Arcadians offered sacrifices to the lightning, thunder, and hurricanes.

Olympic Games (ō-lim'pik). [Also: Olympian Games.] The greatest of the four Panhellenic festivals of the ancient Greeks. The others were the Nemean, the Pythian, and the Isthmian games. They were celebrated at intervals of four years in honor of Zeus at Olympia on the Alpheus River in Elis. The contests were held outside a sacred enclosure called the Altis, at the foot of the Hill of Cronus. The Altis contained many temples and other religious structures, was dotted with a profusion of statues of gods, heroes, and victors, and was the site of a very ancient altar of Zeus. Outside the Altis were civic buildings, treasuries, gymnasia, baths, and the stadium and hippodrome where the contests were held. Various accounts are given of the origin of the games. Some say that Heracles, the eldest of the five Curetes of Mount Ida in Crete, who guarded the infant Zeus, came to Olympia and matched his brothers in a running race, and crowned the winner with a wreath of wild olive. He established the custom of holding the games every fifth year because there were five brothers, they say. But some say Zeus wrestled at Olympia with Cronus for control of the universe, and that he established games to celebrate his victory over Cronus, and that Apollo was an early Olympic victor, having beaten Hermes in the foot race and Ares in the boxing contest. Others say the games were established by Pisus, founder of the city of Pisa in Elis that was destroyed in the time of Nestor by the Eleans. And still others say that the games commemorated the chariot race between Pelops and Oenomaus for the hand of Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus, won by Pelops. At all events, there was a sanctuary of Pelops at Olympia of great antiquity, and he was honored there only slightly less than Zeus. Some say Olympia was the site of an ancient oracle of Gaea and of Zeus, and that the first games date from the second millennium B.C. In the earliest times the games were purely local, and membership in them was limited. Later, it is said, they were refounded and reorganized by Heracles, who paced off the stadium himself. The local games, originally celebrated in honor of local gods and heroes, gradually resolved into a festival honoring the greatest of the gods, Zeus, and became a Panhellenic festival in which membership was open to all free Greeks. At intervals in the early centuries the celebration of the games lapsed. They were revived, allegedly in the 9th century B.C., by Iphitus, descendant of that Aetolian Oxylyus who assumed the throne of Elis on the return of the Heraclidae to the Peloponnesus. He is said to have appealed to the oracle at Delphi for a means of stopping the constant wars, and was told by the priestess to reestablish the games. It was Iphitus too, some say, who in obedience to a command of the oracle first crowned the victors in the contests with wreaths of wild olive. From about this period dates the Sacred Truce, under which contestants going to the games were guaranteed safe conduct. The Sacred Truce was later extended to cover the full month in which the games were held, so that spectators as well as contestants could proceed to Olympia in safety. Records of the victors at the games were kept from 776 B.C., and the period of four years intervening between one celebration and the next, called an Olympiad, is notable as the measure by which the Greeks computed time. The name given to each Olympiad was that of the victor in the foot race. At the beginning of the 6th century B.C. the Eleans wrested control of Olympia from the Pisans, and henceforward Olympia was relatively inviolate, and was gradually enriched with the magnificent temples and many works of art that made it a center of pilgrimage throughout the Greek world. Until 472 B.C. the games all took place on the same day, on the day of the first full moon after the summer solstice. After this, the festival lasted for a week, and in this period of the summer solstice the contests were held in the cool of the morning. In the evening, by the light of the full moon and pine torches, banquets and feasts were held at which hymns of victory and paeans to the gods were sung. The festival was in two parts: the first consisted of offerings to Zeus, and to the other gods and to heroes; the second, in which men, and later boys also, took part, consisted of the athletic contests. After the 5th century B.C. all the contestants, except those in the chariot race, competed in the nude. The earliest contest was the foot race, run in the stadium that Heracles was said to have paced off. In 708 B.C. the pentathlon was added. This consisted in a combination of five separate contests—wrestling, spear-throwing, discus-hurling, leaping, and a foot race—in each of which some contestants were eliminated, and in which the victor in the last contest was the winner of the pentathlon. The pancratium, consisting of boxing and wrestling matches, was a later addition. Gradually, more contests were added, including chariot racing, competitions between trumpeters and heralds, oratorical contests, literary, poetic, and painting competitions and the like, until there were 24 separate contests, held over the course of several festivals, in which any free Greek could participate. Later, the Romans also were allowed to take part. The emperor Nero added a musical contest, in which he was, of course, the victor. No Greek who had any personal stain on his honor could enter; slaves were not admitted to competition, although they could observe; and women were forbidden even to observe except on certain days. A law was passed that any married woman caught observing on the prohibited days must be tossed to her death from nearby Mount Typaeum. Only one woman was ever caught, and she escaped the penalty because of the glorious record of her family in the games. The story was that one Pherenice or Callipatira, a widow, disguised herself as a trainer and took her son to compete in the games. He won his match and she, in jumping over the enclosure in which the trainers were kept during the competition, exposed her person and unmasked herself. Although she escaped the penalty, a law was passed that in future trainers must strip before entering the arena. In the Council Chamber at Olympia was an image of Zeus, holding a thunderbolt in each hand, called the "Oath-god." Here the contestants, their families, and their trainers took an oath on slices of boar's flesh that in nothing would they sin against the Olympic Games. The athletes swore that they had spent at least ten months in preparation for the games and that they would observe only fair means in attempting to win their contests. The games were supervised by priests and the rules were rigidly enforced, any infractions being punished by fines or forfeiture of the prize. The fines were used to erect images of Zeus called Zanes. These images were set up along the way leading to the stadium, to remind the athletes on their way to their contests of the penalties of breaking their oath. The victors in the contests were crowned with wreaths of wild olive that had been cut with a golden knife by a boy whose mother and father were still living. The victors were also permitted to set up suitably inscribed statues of themselves in the Altis. The festival ended with sacrifices at the six double altars of the gods. These altars were reputedly set up by Heracles, one altar for each pair of the twelve Olympians. When a victor returned home, he was received with extraordinary distinction and enjoyed numerous honors and privileges. He rode in a chariot drawn by four white horses to the temple of the most important god of his home area and deposited his victor's wreath on the altar as an offering to the god. After this there was a banquet for the victor at which a hymn was sung in his honor. Such hymns were sometimes composed by the most celebrated poets, as those of Pindar. Often valuable perquisites were given to the victor, for in winning he was thought to be in divine favor and honored his home city as well as himself. After the Peloponnesian Wars the games deteriorated somewhat. The principle, carefully maintained up to this time, that the contestants at the festival must be amateurs of good character and superb fitness was abandoned, and Olympia became an arena for professional athletes. The emperor Hadrian sought to restore the former splendor of the games and for a time they regained some of their former glory and attracted many spectators and gifts. The games were held regularly, regardless of war or disaster, from 776 B.C. to 393 A.D. In 393 A.D. the emperor Theodosius abolished them as a symbol of pagan idolatry.

Olympus (ō-lim'pus). In Greek legend, a Phrygian flute-player who was taught the art of flute-playing by Marsyas and improved upon it. His Phrygian descendants were said to have inherited the art and the 7th century B.C. Olympus who introduced the art among the Asiatic Greeks was regarded as his descendant. In the contest between Apollo and Marsyas Olympus was associated with Apollo. Olympus was taught how to play the syrinx by Pan.

Olympus. In ancient geography, the name of various mountains, but especially of one (elevation, about 9794 feet) on the borders of Macedonia and Thessaly, regarded as the especial home of the chief gods of Greek mythology. Hence the word is often used to mean heaven. The Mysian Olympus was on the borders of Mysia, Bithynia, and Phrygia in Asia Minor. Others were in Lydia, Lycia, Cyprus, Laconia, and Elis. There are believed to have been 14 in all.

Olynthiac Orations (ō-lin'thi-ak). Series of three orations delivered (349-348 B.C.) at Athens by Demosthenes for the purpose of inducing the Athenians to assist Olynthus against Philip II of Macedon.

Olynthus (ō-lin'thus). In ancient geography, a city in Chalcidice, Macedonia, situated near the head of the Toronaic Gulf near the neck of the Pallene peninsula. It was a city of the Bottiaeans, a Thracian tribe, until 479 B.C. At that time Artabazus, the Persian general who had escorted the defeated Persian king to the Hellespont, returned to Chalcidice and, suspicious that Olynthus was about to revolt against Xerxes, captured the city and sacked it. The inhabitants were led to a nearby marsh and slaughtered. Artabazus then handed the city over to the Chalcidians, who had been loyal to Persia, and from this time Olynthus became a Greek city. The city revived under the Macedonian king, Perdiccas. He instigated a revolt of the cities of Chalcidice against Athens and persuaded the inhabitants of the neighboring cities to unite within the walls of Olynthus against Athens actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; q̄ as d or j, s̄ as s or sh, t̄ as t or ch, z̄ as z or zh.

(c433 B.C.). Perdiccas later appealed to Sparta for aid against Athens, and Olynthus became the base for the operations of the Spartan general Brasidas in the area. With his successes Perdiccas turned against Sparta and renewed his alliance with Athens. Olynthus became independent and the center of a powerful Chalcidian League. The league, at first an association of equals, soon came to be dominated by Olynthus, which sought to compel neighboring cities to join. They appealed to Sparta and a force was sent against the city, 382 B.C., and Olynthus was compelled to surrender, 379 B.C., but only after having inflicted heavy losses on the Spartans. The city soon recovered its power and its place as the head of a confederacy even more powerful than the earlier one. It was allied with Philip II of Macedon, who had sought its favor by giving it the city of Potidaea. However, as Philip's power grew, Olynthus became alarmed and abandoned her alliance with him. When he demanded the surrender of his half-brother, who had found refuge in the city, the Olynthians refused his demand and he marched against the city. Olynthus appealed to Athens for aid. In the Olynthiac Orations Demosthenes urged the Athenians to send aid to Olynthus. His main argument was that Philip must be crushed before he became so powerful as to threaten Athens, and that the place to crush him was Olynthus, far from the borders of Attica. Athens sent soldiers to the north, but had delayed their departure too long. The city was captured by Philip (348 B.C.) before the Athenians arrived. He so completely destroyed the city that a few years later it would have been hard to realize a city had ever existed on the spot. The inhabitants that were not slain were sold as slaves or scattered in neighboring cities.

Omphale (om'fā-lē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Iardanus. She was the wife of Tmolus, king in Lydia, and some say she was the mother of Tantalus by Tmolus. On the death of her husband, Omphale became ruler of Lydia. It was she who bought Heracles as a slave when he was ordered to sell himself to expiate the murder of Iphitus. He performed many services for her, in the course of which he captured the Cercopes, and killed Syleus, Lityerses, and a serpent that was ravaging the countryside. In gratitude, Omphale, who had now learned his real identity, freed him and became his mistress. She bore him several sons, among them Lamus. When Heracles had completed his service, some say at the end of a year, others say at the end of three years, Omphale gave him rich gifts and he returned to Tiryns. Some say that Omphale forced Heracles to dress in women's clothes and to perform women's work. This was a story spread by Pan. Heracles and Omphale did sometimes exchange their clothes, as it amused the queen to behold the brawny Heracles in her delicate garments. On one occasion when they were dressed in each other's clothes, Pan sought to ravish Omphale as she slept in a cave with Heracles. Feeling the silken garments in the dark, he mistakenly attacked Heracles and was kicked across the cave for his pains.

APOLLO SEATED ON THE OMPHALOS
Red-figured Greek vase

Omphalos (om'fā-los). A sacred stone in the temple of Apollo at Delphi, believed by the Greeks to mark the "navel" or exact center-point of the earth. This point was located by Zeus. He released two eagles in opposite directions. They flew until they met, at Delphi, and thus determined the center of the earth. The stone set up to mark the spot was the one Rhea gave to Cronus to swallow in the place of her new-born son, Zeus; for it was the custom of Cronus to swallow his children as soon as they were born. When Zeus grew up, he forced Cronus to disgorge his sisters and brothers and the stone. It was then set up at Delphi and daily anointed with oil. Extant representations show it as a stone of a conical shape, often covered with a kind of network called agrenon, similar in character to the sacred garment so called, or wreathed with votive fillets. The Delphic or Pythian Apollo is often represented as seated on the omphalos, in his chief sanctuary, and statues have been found, the feet of which rest on a truncated omphalos.

Onatas (ō-nā'tas). Aeginetan sculptor and painter, a contemporary of Ageladas, the teacher of Phidias. He was active c500–460 B.C. He was especially famous for his statues of athletes. Pausanias has described many of his works, as the Apollo of Pergamum, the Ten Greek Heroes casting lots to see which would take up the challenge of Hector to single combat, and a group representing Hiero of Syracuse in the chariot in which he won the victory at the Olympic Games.

Onchestus (on-kes'tus). In ancient geography, a city of Boeotia, Greece, near Thebes. It was named for a son of Poseidon, was sacred to that god, and contained a temple and image of Onchestian Poseidon.

Oncium (on-si'um). Place in Arcadia, ruled by Apollo's son Oncus. Here, according to legend, Demeter, wearied from her search for Persephone, and being pursued by Poseidon, transformed herself into a mare and grazed in the fields. But Poseidon was not fooled. He transformed himself into a stallion and attacked her. From this union the nymph Despoena and the fabulous horse Arion were born.

Oneiros or Oniros (ō-nī'ros). The personification of dreams. He was a winged god who dwelt in the land of the sunset.

Onesimus (ō-nē'si-mus). See Euphronius, painter and potter.

Onomacritus (on-ō-mak'ri-tus). Greek prophet and mystic poet at the court of the Pisistratidae at Athens, about 530–485 B.C. He is said to have edited the poems of Musaeus for the Orphics. He was for a time a great friend of the Pisistratidae but was banished from Athens by Hipparchus when it was discovered that he was inserting one of his own oracles among the supposed oracles of Musaeus, namely, that the island of Lemnos would one day disappear into the sea. Later he was reconciled to the sons of Pisistratus, who had been banished themselves from Athens, when they went to Susa to persuade Xerxes to make war on the Athenians. To help the Pisistratidae to sway Xerxes, who was at first cool to the idea of the war, Onomacritus recited oracles which seemed to promise success in a war against Athens. At the same time, he carefully omitted to mention a great number of oracles that prophesied disaster for the Persians. According to Herodotus, the favorable oracles he mentioned to Xerxes had great weight in swaying that monarch to the idea of war.

Opheltes (ō-fel'tēz). In Greek mythology, a son of Lycurgus, king of Nemea. He was left alone by his nurse Hypsipyle, former queen of Lemnos, while she went to get water for the Seven against Thebes, who had stopped in Nemea on their way to Thebes. While she was gone, Opheltes was bitten by a serpent and died. The Nemean Games were celebrated in his honor.

Ophion (ō-fi'ōn). In Greek mythology, a great serpent who was created, some say, by Eurynome, and with her was the first lord of creation. They created the Titans, according to some accounts, and ruled them from Olympus until they were forced to yield to Cronus and Rhea; after this they disappeared into the sea.

Ophiuchus (of-i-ū'kus). An ancient northern constellation, representing a man holding a serpent, whence its name, Serpent-bearer. The serpent is now treated as a separate constellation. Also called Serpentarius.

Ophthalmitis (of-thal-mī'tis). An epithet of Athena, meaning "Of the Eye." Lycurgus, the Spartan lawgiver, incurred the enmity of some of the Spartans with his laws. One of his enemies struck out one of his eyes. Lycurgus fled to a spot near the Bronze House in Sparta, and was saved by the Spartans from losing his remaining eye. In gratitude he set up an image of Athena Ophthalmitis, because it was near her temple, the Bronze House, that he was rescued.

Opimius (ō-pim'i-us), Lucius. Roman consul in 121 B.C. He was put forward by the Senate to oppose the reforms of Caius Gracactor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; ҃҃, then; ҃ as d or j, ҃ as s or sh, ҃ as t or ch, ҃ as z or zh.

chus and, as the leader of the optimates, killed Gracchus and 3000 of his followers in 121 B.C. He was afterward exiled for accepting bribes from Jugurtha, king of Numidia.

Opis (ō'pis). In Greek mythology, a Hyperborean maiden who was a companion of Artemis. Some say Orion pursued her, and that it was because of this that Artemis killed him. Opis and Arge, a Hyperborean companion, were said to have come to Delos at the same time as Artemis. The Delian maidens dedicated locks of their hair to them, and they were invoked by the Delians, as well as by the other islanders and the Ionians, in a hymn that Olen made for them. The Delians scattered the ashes from the sacrifices burnt on the altar of Artemis over the tomb of Opis and Arge, which was behind the temple of Artemis, facing the east.

Opisthodomus (op-is-thod'ō-mus). In Greek architecture, an open vestibule within the portico at the end behind the cella in most ancient temples, corresponding to the pronaos at the principal end, into which opens the main entrance. It was sometimes used as a place for preserving the temple treasure.

Oppian (op'i-an). Greek poet of Cilicia, who was active in the latter part of the 2nd century A.D. He was the author of a poem on hunting, Cynegetica, for which he was rewarded by the emperor Caracalla. To Oppian, although possibly to another Oppian, of Syria, of the first half of the 3rd century A.D., is attributed a poem in five books on the subject of fishing, Halieutica. (AH)

Oppius (op'i-us), Caius. Friend and contemporary of Julius Caesar, reputed in antiquity to be author of the history of the African war. This work, however, is usually ascribed to Aulus Hirtius.

Ops (ops). In Roman mythology, a very old harvest and fertility goddess, hence also construed as a goddess of plenty. She was the wife of Saturn, with whom she shared a temple on the Capitoline, and the mother of Jupiter. Ops dwelt in the earth, and for this reason she was invoked by worshipers who were seated and in contact with the ground. At her festival honoring her as the goddess of sowing and reaping, only the vestal virgins and one of the priests could be present. Later the Romans identified Ops with the Greek goddess Rhea.

Optimus Maximus (op'ti-mus mak'si-mus). A Roman epithet of Jupiter, "Best and Greatest."

Opus (ō'pus). In ancient geography, a town on the Gulf of Euboea. It was the capital of Opuntian Locris, and was said to have been named for Opus, the foster son of Locrus, an early king of the Locrians. Opus was the home of Patroclus, Ajax the Less, and, some say, of Theano, the wife of the Trojan Antenor.

Oracle. In classical antiquity: 1) an utterance given by a priest or priestess of a god, in the name of the god and, as was believed, by his inspiration, in answer to a human inquiry, usually respecting some future event, as the success of an enterprise or battle, or some proposed line of conduct. Such oracles exerted for centuries a strong influence upon the course of human affairs, the belief of both the medium and the questioner in their divine inspiration being in most cases genuine. The oracles themselves, however, were often ambiguous or at least obscure. The prestige of the chief oracular seats of Greece was powerful in the promotion of good government and justice. 2) the deity who was supposed to give such answers to inquiries. 3) the place where oracular answers were given; the sanctuary, temple, or adytum whence the supposed supernatural responses proceeded. The Greeks surpassed every other nation in both the number and the celebrity of their oracles. Those of Zeus at Dodona in Epirus, of Apollo at Delphi, and of Trophonius near Lebadaia in Boeotia enjoyed the highest reputation.

Orbilus Pupillus (ōr-bil'i-us pū-pil'us). Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, the teacher of Horace. The epithet "plagosus" was given to him by Horace on account of the floggings which his pupils received from him, and the name Orbilius has often since been used in literature for a teacher of this type.

Orchomenus (ōr-kom'e-nus). In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, Greece, about 33 miles W of Corinth. According to tradition, it was founded by Orchomenus, son of Lycaon, who gave it his own name, and it became one of the leading Arcadian cities. Nearby the city was a wooden image of Artemis set in a cedar tree, from which the people called the goddess "Lady of the Cedar." Arcadians from Orchomenus took part in the Battle of Plataea (479 B.C.) and had their names inscribed, with others, on the pedestal of an image of Zeus that was dedicated at Olympia.

Orchomenus. In ancient geography, a city in Boeotia, Greece, situated on the Cephissus River, about 55 miles NW of Athens. According to tradition, it was first named Andres, for Andreus, son of the river-god Peneus. Athamas, having lost his wife and his children, joined Andreus here, and was given land about Mount Laphystium. In later times, Eteocles became king in the land. He was, the Orchomenians claimed, the first to sacrifice to the Graces, of whom he numbered three. Eteocles died childless and Phlegyas ascended the throne. He named the people Phlegyans. He was a warlike king, and in their folly the Phlegyans attacked Delphi. They drove back the picked force that was sent against them but were themselves driven back by the god. Chryses, son of Poseidon, succeeded Phlegyas, and was in turn succeeded by his son Minyas, from whom the people took the name Minyans. In the time of Minyas Orchomenus was very rich; Minyas was the first to build a treasury for his wealth. The son of Minyas was Orchomenus, and from him the land came to be called thereafter Orchomenus. When Erginus, son of Clymenus, became king of Orchomenus, he exacted tribute from Thebes because a Theban had accidentally slain his father. Heracles waged war on Erginus and defeated him, and thereafter Thebes ceased to pay tribute. The sons of Erginus, Agamedes and Trophonius, were famous builders, and from their time Orchomenus reached a high degree of civilization. It is thought that in this period the earliest attempts were made to drain Lake Copais on the borders of Orchomenus. After the death of Agamedes and Trophonius, Ascalaphus and Ialmenus, sons of Ares, led the Minyans who accompanied the Greeks to Troy. The city was noted for its wealth and its many sanctuaries. The people worshiped the Graces, in whose honor they held a festival. They sacrificed annually to Actaeon as a hero, and they had sanctuaries of Dionysus and the Graces, and a cult of Asclepius. The tomb of Minyas was in the city. In obedience to an oracle given them by the priestess of Delphi during a pestilence, the Orchomenians recovered the bones of Hesiod from Naupactus and buried them in their city. In the time of its greatness Orchomenus sent colonists to Asia Minor.

Orchomenus became a member of the Boeotian Confederacy at the beginning of the 7th century B.C. In the Persian War it was on the side of the Persians. Up to the time of the Peloponnesian Wars, Orchomenus was the equal of Thebes, but following that long struggle Thebes became a democracy, and the aristocracy that ruled Orchomenus took the side of Sparta and became an enemy of Thebes, fighting against that city at Coronea and Haliartus. When the Thebans defeated Sparta at Leuctra (371 B.C.) they would have destroyed Orchomenus, but Epaminondas persuaded them to spare it. However, in 364 B.C. they destroyed it without mercy. It was rebuilt in 353 B.C. by the Phocians, but was destroyed again by the Thebans in 349 B.C. Philip of Macedon rebuilt it anew, but the city never recovered its former power and wealth. In 87 B.C., Sulla defeated Archelaus, the general of Mithridates VI, king of Pontus, before the walls of Orchomenus. The site contains important remains of antiquity, going back to the Neolithic Age. Modern excavations have uncovered one city built atop another, as at Troy, the oldest of which dates from before 3500 B.C. Fragments of vases and frescoes, on which are depicted buildings and scenes of bull-leaping, and designs similar in style to those of Cnossus and Tiryns, have been recovered at the site. The so-called treasury of Minyas is a very ancient tomb of the Mycenaean beehive type. The plan is circular, 45 feet in diameter, covered by a pseudo-dome formed by corbeling in the stones of the wall.

Orcus (ôr'kus). In Roman mythology, a god of the Underworld, identified with the Greek Horcus, god of oaths, who punished perjurers. Orcus was later identified with the Greek Underworld god, Hades, and still later with Pluto. The word eventually became synonymous with Hades as a place.

Oreads (ô'rê-ădz). Nymphs of the mountains. They were especially associated with Artemis because they dwelt on the mountains where she hunted, and were her companions in hunting, dancing and frolicking. Because of their association with Artemis they were particularly honored by hunters. They were also connected with the worship of Pan and as such were honored by shepherds.

Orestea (ō-res-tē'ā). A dramatic trilogy by Aeschylus, for which he won first prize in 458 B.C. It is founded on the history of the family of Agamemnon, and treats the theme of the curse on the house of Atreus, which caused much suffering, and the reconciliation of the tragedies Agamemnon, which takes place in Argos following the fall of Troy and ends with the murder of Agamemnon by his wife Clytemnestra; The Choëphoroe, in which Orestes, son of Agamemnon, who has grown up in exile, returns at Apollo's command and avenges his father by murdering Clytemnestra and her paramour Aegisthus; and The Eumenides, in which Orestes, relentlessly pursued by the Furies, is at last tried before the Areopagus and acquitted by the vote of Athena, whose vote cast in Orestes' favor breaks a tie. and the end of the curse by the application of moral laws. The two laws chiefly operative are that the doer must suffer and that man learns by suffering. Though it may take several generations, as it is shown to do here, man eventually learns the folly of wrongdoing, and learns not only how to avoid suffering but how to do right. The Orestea consists Orestes (ō-res'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and the brother of Electra and Iphigenia. Before Agamemnon returned victorious from Troy and was slain by Clytemnestra and her lover Aegisthus, Orestes had been spirited away to Strophius, king of Phocis. In the eighth year following the murder of Agamemnon he returned in secret to Mycenae, accompanied by his friend Pylades, to avenge his father's death. He went to his father's grave, left offerings on it of locks of his hair, and prayed to his father's spirit for his sanction in the deed he was about to commit. Electra, who had been kept in a state of misery by Clytemnestra and Aegisthus, and who constantly accused her mother of adultery and murder, publicly longed for the return of Orestes to avenge their father's death. Orestes revealed himself to his sister and told her he had come at the command of Apollo to kill Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. He was greatly troubled by the deed he was planning, as to slay one's own kin was the most heinous crime in the sight of gods and men. He found that Electra had no such doubts about it, as the gods also laid an obligation on sons to avenge their fathers. Caught in the dilemma of angering the gods if he failed to avenge his father's death, and of incurring the wrath of the Furies if he killed his mother, Orestes wavered. Electra and Pylades stiffened his will to carry out the command of Apollo and to shed blood for the blood that had been shed. By a ruse he secured entrance to the palace and came face to face with his mother. She did not recognize him at first but when he made himself known to her, she understood what was about to happen. Despite her pleas to spare the mother who had given him life and despite his own doubts, he killed her, calling the gods to witness that he was obeying a command of Apollo and reminding them of the horrible crimes she had committed. He also killed her paramour, as Hermes had told Aegisthus he would do many years before, if Aegisthus persisted in his plan to seduce Clytemnestra and destroy Agamemnon. The murder of Aegisthus could readily be justified as a proper fate for an adulterer. But there was no escape from the avenging Furies who immediately began hounding Orestes for the murder of his mother. After great pain and suffering, and spells of madness, in one of which he bit off his own finger to appease the Furies, he felt that he had been purified of his guilt by his sufferings. He had been purified many times in this period but to no avail, for the Furies still pursued him. He now made his way to Athens to stand trial before the Areopagus. Apollo was his advocate. The chief of the Furies was his prosecutor. Athena was present as an impartial judge to see that justice was done. The jury was evenly divided as to the verdict, whereupon Athena cast a vote to break the tie. She decided on the side of Orestes, on the ground that he had suffered for his guilt and been purified. She persuaded the avenging Furies to accept her verdict on the side of mercy, and from then on they took up their residence in a grotto on the side of the Acropolis and became known as the Eumenides, the "kindly ones," who protected suppliants. The acquittal of Orestes lifted the curse which had tormented three generations of the House of Atreus. Some say that this verdict did not render Orestes immune to suffering because not all of the Furies accepted it; those that did not continued to harass him. He went to the shrine of Delphi and asked Apollo's aid. The priestess told him he must go to Tauris and secure a wooden image of Artemis from a temple there and restore it to Attica. Orestes and the faithful Pylades set out for Tauris, although it was well known that the Taurians sacrificed strangers who landed on their shores. The two friends landed, were captured, and brought before the priestess to be prepared for sacrifice. At first the priestess gloated over the two Greeks who had fallen into her hands. She was Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon, and she was glad to sacrifice Greeks, as the Greeks so many years before would have sacrificed her when they were windbound at Aulis. Only the intervention of Artemis had saved her. As she talked to the two men, one of whom seemed mad, she felt drawn to them and decided to help them escape. In the course of her conversation with them she told her own history. Orestes then declared that he was her brother. After joyous reunion they made plans to escape and, aided by Athena, succeeded in leaving Tauris and returning to Greece with the image. Some say that they went to Sminthe where they were overtaken by the king of the Taurians, but escaped again. Others say they were driven to Rhodes by a storm and set up the image there. Still others say the image was taken back to Attica, as commanded by the priestess of Delphi, and set up in a temple at Brauron, where Iphigenia became a priestess. But many places claimed the image: it was said to have been taken to Italy, Susa, Cappadocia, and Sparta, and all claimed they had the original sacred image. Finally cured of his madness and freed from the persecutions of the Furies, Orestes went to Delphi and there was reunited with his sister Electra. He then returned to Mycenae and slew Aletes, descendant of Thyestes who had seized the throne, and became ruler of Mycenae. His next project was to bring about the murder of Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, at the shrine of Delphi, and to marry Hermione, daughter of Menelaus. He had been betrothed to Hermione but Menelaus had given her to Neoptolemus, some say in return for the latter's help at Troy, but others claim that Orestes' madness had caused Menelaus to give her to Neoptolemus. When Menelaus died, Orestes was invited by the Spartans to become their king. By conquest he added a large part of Arcadia to his kingdom, and he would have taken Achaea also, but the oracle at Delphi warned him against it. In the end he left Mycenae and went to Arcadia, where he founded the city of Orestia. There, in his old age, he was bitten by a serpent and died. He was buried at Tegea. Later the Spartans, informed by an oracle that they would continue to lose their battles with the Tegeans as long as the bones of Orestes remained in Tegea, sent Lichas to Tegea to locate the whereabouts of Orestes' grave. He learned that Orestes' bones had been discovered under the forge of a Tegean smith; he stole them and returned with them to Sparta, where they were reinterred. After that the Spartans were victorious over the Tegeans. Orestes' son Tisamenus succeeded him as king. The tragedy of Orestes, caught between the necessity to avenge his father and the crime of killing his mother if he did so, is treated in The Choëphorae of Aeschylus, the Electra of Sophocles, and the Electra and Orestes of Euripides. The expiation of his crime and his release from suffering are treated in The Eumenides of Aeschylus, and Iphigenia in Tauris by Euripides. See these entries.

Orestes. Drama by Euripides, produced 408 B.C. It concerns the wild events that followed the murder by Orestes of his mother Clytemnestra to avenge her murder of his father Agamemnon. The scene is at the palace in Argos. Orestes sleeps while his sister Electra watches over him. She recounts the evils that have befallen the race of Tantalus. He suffers in Hades because he offended the gods. His descendants—Pelops, the brothers Atreus and Thyestes, and Agamemnon, son of Atreus—have all been under a curse. Now Electra sits with her brother who has been driven mad by the Furies because, at Apollo's command, he slew his mother to avenge his father's murder. For six days he has taken no food. During most of his waking hours he has been raving with madness. On this day the Argives will decide whether to stone him, and her too for the part she played, for their mother's murder, or whether they will force them to kill themselves. Their only hope lies in Menelaus who has just landed at Nauplia. In fear of the Argives, who lost their sons at Troy for her sake, Menelaus has sent Helen to the palace in secret. There she now mourns for her sister Clytemnestra. Helen comes from the palace and asks Electra to make offerings at the tomb of Clytemnestra in her name, as she is ashamed to be seen by the Argives. Electra mocks her belated virtue, and suggests that Helen send her daughter Hermione to make the offerings. Helen adopts the suggestion. She gives Hermione locks of her hair to lay on Clytemnestra's tomb, and instructs her to make drink-offerings of milk and honey, and to pray to Clytemnestra for a kindlier mood towards Helen. When they leave, Electra notes that Helen cut off only the tips of her hair, so as not to mar her beauty. She is still the Helen of old, and Electra hates her for the ruin she has brought—to the Greeks, to the house of Agamemnon, and particularly, to Orestes and Electra.

A chorus of Argive women, friendly to Electra, enters softly so as not to disturb sleeping Orestes. Electra asks them to go away quietly, but they remain. She says he will die, so faint has he become, and she is fated to die too. They are both victims of Apollo's command to kill their mother. Orestes wakes. His madness has left him temporarily. Electra informs him of the arrival in Argos of Menelaus and Helen, and adds that the daughters of Tyndareus (Helen and Clytemnestra) are beacons of reproach and infamy. At the mention of his mother Orestes becomes terribly agitated. He cries out that the Furies are leaping upon him. He raves, but calms somewhat when he sees how this makes Electra suffer. He blames Apollo, who commanded him to commit a heinous crime and then deserted him. He begs Electra to go and rest, for she is his only support and must take care of herself for his sake. Assuring him that she will never forsake him, that she will live or die with him, she agrees to go into the palace.

The chorus of Argive women prays to the Eumenides to spare Orestes. Menelaus enters and greets them. His homecoming after so many years of wandering is darkened by the fearful news of his brother's death, Clytemnestra's crime, and her murder by Orestes. Orestes clasps the knees of Menelaus as a suppliant. He has come at the hour of greatest need. Menelaus is appalled at the sight of wild-appearing Orestes, and asks what sickness is killing him. Orestes replies that it is conscience, grief, and madness; yet he killed his mother in obedience to Apollo. Now the god has abandoned him. The Argives hate him. None will purify him. This is the day they will decide on his death. He cannot escape, for the Argives have surrounded him. His only hope is in Menelaus, who has appeared in his prosperity to Orestes in his misery. Tyndareus is seen approaching. This deepens the suffering of Orestes, for Tyndareus was good to him as a child and he has made a foul return for his kindness. Tyndareus welcomes Menelaus, reviles Orestes, and chides Menelaus for speaking to the criminal. Menelaus answers pacifically that Orestes is the son of one he loved, and that the Greek way is to honor those of kindred blood. Tyndareus argues that Orestes should have had his mother brought to trial for her crimes, which he does not condone, instead of taking the law into his own hands. He has made himself as vile as his mother by killing her. If this principle of blood for blood is carried on, he asks, where will the killing end? Tyndareus holds no brief for either of his daughters, but he upholds the rule of law rather than that of blood vengeance. He warns Menelaus not to try to help Orestes, who is loathed by the gods for his crime, and ends by saying that but for his daughters, he would have had a happy life. Orestes seeks to defend himself. He recites his mother's crimes—she took a lover while Agamemnon was away at war, and slew Agamemnon with her lover's help when he returned victorious. If Orestes had remained silent, he would have been guilty of condoning her crimes and would have been hounded by the shade of his unavenged father. Over and above all this, Apollo commanded him to commit the murder, and so it is Apollo's sin, not his. Tyndareus scorns his defense. Before he leaves to encourage the Argives to sentence Orestes to death by stoning, he warns Menelaus that if he aids Orestes he will never set foot in Sparta again. Menelaus is shaken by this parting threat. Orestes, seeing that he hesitates, addresses him again, saying that Menelaus owes it to him to help him, even if he has to commit a wrong to do so, for Agamemnon went to Troy to "heal the sin and the wrong-doing of thy wife," and was murdered on his return. He pleads with Menelaus to save him, so that the line of Agamemnon will not die.

Menelaus wavers. He alone cannot fight the Argives. Instead, he will try to persuade them by words to spare Orestes and Electra. When he leaves, Orestes cries out against the ingrate who has forgotten the deeds of Agamemnon in his behalf. He has been betrayed by Menelaus, the one man from whom he might have expected help. Pylades, his true friend, comes to him in his despair. Pylades is not surprised that Menelaus has betrayed Orestes, "by the traitor wife the traitor husband made!" He encourages Orestes to try to escape and promises his help. They leave to visit Agamemnon's tomb. The Argive women chant about the curse on the house of Tantalus that has brought about the terrible murder of a mother by her son. Electra enters, followed by a messenger who informs her that the Argives have voted death to her and Orestes, and that they have scorned Orestes' defense of his act. Electra despairs. The curse on the house of Tantalus, felt by all his descendants, is now about to destroy the last of his line in Orestes and herself. Orestes and Pylades return. Electra cannot submit quietly to her fate; she longs to live. Pylades says if they all have to die, he would first like to bring some suffering to Menelaus. He proposes that they go to Helen, pretending to bemoan their fate, and that they seize and kill her. It will be only right to kill one who has caused such grief to Hellas, and they will also be avenged on Menelaus, who in his cowardice and greed for the throne has abandoned his kinsmen. If they do not succeed in killing Helen, they will set fire to the palace and perish with it. Electra suggests that they seize Hermione as a hostage and force Menelaus to let them go, on the threat of killing his daughter. Thus they will escape death and at the same time punish Menelaus by killing Helen. All agree on the plan, and pray to Agamemnon for help. Orestes and Pylades enter the palace. Electra gives the signal, and Helen is heard to cry out from within. Electra savagely exhorts her brother to slay her. The Argive women tell her that Hermione is nearing. Electra greets her in subdued fashion and tells her she and Orestes are to die. The cry Hermione heard, she says, was from Orestes pleading with Helen. She begs Hermione to join her prayers to those of Orestes. Hermione hurries into the palace. Soon her cry that she has been seized is heard. A Phrygian slave rushes out and describes the attack on Helen. When she was about to be slain she vanished, perhaps carried off by the gods. Menelaus now rushes in. As he stands outside the palace Orestes and Pylades, with Hermione, look down on him from above. Orestes threatens to murder Hermione and set fire to the palace if Menelaus does not persuade the Argives to spare him and make him their king. Menelaus is trapped. He calls on the Argives to rescue Hermione, as flames leap up from the palace. Now Apollo appears in the clouds above with Helen. The god calls for peace between Menelaus and Orestes. He says he has rescued Helen at the command of Zeus, and that henceforth she will dwell on Olympus. Orestes must go into exile for a year, then stand trial at Athens for his mother's murder. Ultimately he will marry Hermione. He commands Orestes to give Electra in marriage to Pylades. Menelaus must return to Sparta. Orestes will finally be restored to sanity and to the throne of Argos.

Oreus (ō'rē-us). In ancient geography, a city on the NW coast of Euboea, Greece, situated opposite Thessaly. See Histiaeia.

Orgetorix (ôr-jet'ô-riks). Helvetian conspirator shortly before the time of Caesar's war with the Helvetians in 58 B.C. According to Caesar's account, he planned to conquer Gaul with the Helvetians, but was detected by them plotting with other chiefs to seize control of the tribe. He escaped immediate trial, but committed suicide afterward.

Orion (ō-rī'ōn). In Greek mythology, a giant hunter, the son of Poseidon and Euryale. He visited Chios and fell in love with Merope, daughter of King Oenopion. For her sake he cleared the island of wild beasts. But Oenopion, who had promised her in marriage to Orion, kept postponing the wedding day. Frenzied by wine, Orion attacked Merope and was punished by Oenopion with the aid of Dionysus, by having his eyes put out while he lay in a drunken sleep. Orion learned from an oracle that if he went to the East and turned his eyes to Helios as he rises from the ocean stream, his sight would be restored. He kidnaped a young worker from Hephaestus' workshop on Lemnos and with him for a guide set off for the East, and had his sight restored. Eos fell in love with him and accompanied him on his return journey. He was dissuaded from pursuing Oenopion for revenge by Artemis, whom he met on his way to Crete and whose passion for hunting he shared. Together they pursued the pleasures of the hunt and caused Apollo to become uneasy, for he feared that his virgin sister might become enamored of Orion as Eos had been. Apollo sent a giant scorpion to attack Orion, and when he found he could not overcome the scorpion, Orion leaped into the sea to escape. When his head was but a distant speck on the sea, Apollo tricked Artemis, who was unaware that it was Orion, into transfixing it with an arrow. She was stricken with grief when she learned that she had killed her hunting companion, and sought Asclepius to restore him to life, but Asclepius had been killed by a thunderbolt of Zeus. Artemis then placed the image of Orion in the heavens as the constellation Orion, the mighty hunter, eternally pursued by the scorpion. His spirit went to the Asphodel Fields and Odysseus saw him hunting there when he visited the Underworld. According to another account, Artemis slew Orion because he pursued her chaste companions, the Pleiades, but as the Pleiades were far from chaste, this version seems unreasonable. Still others say Orion was killed by the scorpion, whose image was also translated to the stars.

Orion. A constellation situated in the southern hemisphere with respect to the ecliptic, but the equinoctial crosses it nearly in the middle. This constellation is represented by the figure of a giant with a sword by his side. It contains seven stars which are very conspicuous to the naked eye; four of these form a quadrangle, and the other three are situated in the middle of it in a straight line, forming what is called the Belt or Girdle of Orion. They are also popularly called Jacob's staff, Our Lady's wand, the Yard-wand, etc.

Orithyia (ôr-i-thî'yā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and his wife Praxithea. Boreas fell in love with her and wished to marry her but her father, fearing the wild wind of Thrace, delayed the marriage. Boreas became impatient and one day as Orithyia was playing on the bank of the Ilissus River, he swooped down and carried her off in a gust of wind to his home in Thrace. The children of Orithyia were Cleopatra, Chione, and the winged twins, Calais and Zetes.

Orneae (ôr'nē-ē). In ancient geography, a city in Argolis, traditionally named for Orneus, son of Erechtheus. Men of Orneae went to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon, and Menestheus, grandson of the founder of their city, led a body of Athenians to help Agamemnon destroy Troy. At some later time, the inhabitants of Orneae were removed to Argos by the Argives and their city was abandoned.

Orneus (ôr'nūs). In Greek legend, a son of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. With his brother Metion he caused Cecrops, another brother who had been chosen to succeed Erechtheus, to flee from Athens.

Ornytus (ôr'ni-tus). In Greek legend, a leader of the Arcadians. He quarreled with Agamemnon as the Greeks were assembled at Aulis and waiting for favorable winds to sail to Troy. As a result of this quarrel he refused to accompany the Greeks. Athena appeared to him in disguise and tried to persuade him not to take his followers and go home, but to go with the Greeks to Troy. Ornytus angrily wounded the goddess, whom he did not recognize, with his spear. As punishment for this Athena appeared to him in a dream when he returned home. She caused him to fall sick and sent a pestilence on his fields. On appealing to an oracle he learned that he could appease the goddess by erecting a statue to her.

Oroetes (ô-rē'tēz). A Persian noble who was appointed a governor of Sardis by Cyrus the Great. He retained this post under Cambyses. He resolved to destroy Polycrates, ruler of Samos (c540-522 B.C.). Some say his hatred of Polycrates was inspired by one of his fellow Persians who reproached Oroetes because he had not conquered Samos and brought it under the dominion of Persia. Others say Polycrates had deeply offended Oroetes by his contemptuous treatment of a herald of Oroetes. Oroetes sent the herald to Polycrates on some mission and Polycrates received him as he was lying on his couch with his back to the herald. At no time during the interview did he deign to turn over and face the messenger from Oroetes, nor did he address one word to him. Whatever the reason, Oroetes, having learned that Polycrates had the mighty ambition to make himself master of the sea, sent a messenger to him. The message he bore was that Oroetes had been warned that Cambyses meant to destroy him. At the same time Oroetes said he was aware of Polycrates' great ambition, and also that Polycrates lacked the means of attaining it. If Polycrates would, therefore, come to the aid of Oroetes and save him from Cambyses, for his part Oroetes would supply Polycrates with the wealth to make himself master of the sea. However, lest Polycrates should doubt that Oroetes possessed enough wealth to make it worthwhile, he invited Polycrates to send a trusted messenger to whom he would show his treasure as a proof. Polycrates was delighted, as he was in great need of gold to build up his fleet. He sent a messenger as Oroetes had invited him to do. Oroetes filled eight great chests with stones. Over the stones he spread a layer of gold. These chests he showed to the messenger from Polycrates, who in due course reported on the vast wealth of Oroetes to his master. Polycrates decided to go to Sardis and rescue Oroetes from Cambyses and gain the promised treasure. Against the advice and warnings of his friends, soothsayers, and his own daughter, he went to Sardis with some of his followers. As soon as Polycrates came into his hands, Oroetes seized him and put him to death and hung him on a cross. Oroetes let the Samians in the train of Polycrates return to their homes but the foreigners who had come with him, including Democedes, he kept among his own slaves. Not long after this Oroetes killed the Persian who had reproached him about Samos, and during the time of the False Smerdis he did nothing to help the Persians regain the throne. When Darius became king, Oroetes showed great insolence toward him, even going so far as to kill one of his messengers. Darius longed to take vengeance on him, but since he had only recently ascended the throne and since Oroetes was very powerful in Sardis and was surrounded by a guard of 1000 men, Darius had to attack him by indirect means. He sent a volunteer to Sardis who contrived that Oroetes was murdered by his own bodyguard, whose loyalty to the king of Persia proved to be greater than that to Oroetes. After his death the treasures and slaves of Oroetes were taken to Susa.

Oropus (ō-rō'pus). In ancient geography, a seaport in Attica, Greece, bordering on Boeotia, situated on the Euripus, about 23 miles N of Athens. It belonged originally to Boeotia, but in the struggles for it between Attica and Boeotia, the former won control of it. Near Oropus was a sanctuary of Amphiarus, whose divinity was first established by the Oropians, who gave the cult to the rest of Greece. In the sanctuary was a temple and a white marble image of Amphiarus, and the oracle of Amphiarus, the Amphareum, was very famous. Sometimes the oracle gave responses in verse, but generally responses were given in dreams. The questioner at the oracle purified himself, sacrificed to Amphiarus and to all those whose names were on the altar. He next sacrificed a ram, flayed it, and spread its skin on the ground. At night the questioner stretched out to sleep on the ram's skin and the answer to his question came to him in his dreams. Near the sanctuary was a spring into which those who had been cured of diseases as the result of responses from the oracle threw gold and silver coins.

Orpheus (ôr'fūs, ôr'fē-us). In Greek legend, a son of Oeagrus, king of Thrace, and the muse Calliope and, some say, the brother of that Linus who was slain by Heracles. But according to some accounts, Orpheus was the son of Apollo. Whoever his father was, Orpheus was the most famous poet and musician in Greek legend. Apollo gave him the lyre and the Muses taught him to play it so beautifully that trees and stones danced to his music and wild beasts were tamed by it. He was taught the Mysteries of Rhea by the female Dactyls in Samothrace and on a visit to Egypt he saw the Mysteries of Osiris. In imitation of these latter he invented the Mysteries of Dionysus and instituted them in Thrace. He taught the Mysteries of Dionysus to Midas, the Phrygian king, among others. Orpheus accompanied Jason and the Argonauts on the expedition to Colchis for the Golden Fleece. With his music he soothed quarrels that sprang up among the Argonauts, made the arduous labor of rowing seem lighter, and drowned out the songs of the Sirens, thus enabling the Argonauts to pass their island in safety on the return voyage. Only Butes succumbed to the charms of the Sirens and leaped overboard. According to some accounts, the Sirens were so chagrined at being out-charmed by Orpheus that they committed suicide, but in Homeric legend they were still on their island when Odysseus passed by a generation later. On the island of the Phaeacians Orpheus sang the marriage song at the wedding of Jason and Medea. When he returned from the voyage of the Argo Orpheus married Eurydice and went to dwell among the Cicones of Thrace. One day as Eurydice was walking in the meadows, Aristaeus saw her and tried to ravish her. As she fled from him she stepped on a viper which bit her ankle, and she died of the poisoned sting. Orpheus was inconsolable and resolved to bring her back from the Underworld. He descended to Tartarus, some say through an entrance in Thesprotia, and so charmed Charon that the ferryman freely carried him over the Styx. Cerberus, the watch-dog of Tartarus was also charmed by his music, and the judges of the Underworld interrupted their task to listen, and the tortures of the wicked were temporarily suspended. Even Hades' heart was softened, and he agreed to let Eurydice return to earth on condition that Orpheus was not to look back as she followed him until she reached the light of the sun. Orpheus gladly accepted this condition and led the way, playing upon his lyre. Eurydice followed, guided by the music. When he reached the light of the sun, he could wait no longer; he looked back eagerly to see Eurydice. But she had not yet stepped into the sunlight and so he lost her forever. After had neglected the worship of the god and now honored the sun above all. Orpheus protested against human sacrifice and objected to the orgies of the maenads. Others say the women set upon him in revenge for his scorn. While their husbands were worshipping in the temple the women rushed at Orpheus. One hurled a stone at him, but the stone, charmed by his music, dropped harmlessly at his feet. Then the clamor of the women was so great the music was drowned out. The women fell upon him and tore him limb from limb. They flung his head and lyre into the Hebrus River. From there they floated, still singing, across the sea to the island of Lesbos. As the head lay on the shore of Lesbos a serpent approached to bite it, but Apollo appeared and turned the this second loss he retired to Thrace and kept apart from all women. Many maidens sought to win his love but he scorned them and gave his attention to lads in the first bloom and beauty of youth. When he played his lyre, the trees and rocks gathered to listen. One day as he was thus playing, he was set upon by the Ciconian women. Some say Dionysus inspired them with madness because Orpheus serpent to stone. The head was placed in a cave at Antissa, where it prophesied continually until Apollo, fearful lest it become more famous than his oracle at Delphi, commanded it to cease prophesying. The lyre was first placed in the temple of Apollo at Lesbos and its image was placed in the heavens as a constellation. The Muses, grieving over the loss of the poet, gathered his limbs and buried them at the foot of Mount Olympus, and ever since, the night-ingles of this region sing more sweetly than anywhere else in the world. The Ciconian women sought to wash the blood of Orpheus from their hands in the Helicon River, but the river-god, not willing to be an accessory in any way in the murder of Orpheus, dived underground and did not reappear for several miles. The women were transformed where they stood into oak trees as a punishment for the murder of Orpheus, and there they stood throughout time. In Zone in Thrace was another ring of oak trees left standing in the midst of a dance they had been performing as Orpheus played for them. A religious sect arose, perhaps in the 5th century B.C., called the Orphics. They claimed Orpheus as their founder and adopted some Oriental and Egyptian ideas of purification and expiation. According to the Orphics, Orpheus was a more ancient poet than Homer and they attributed many poems, hymns, and prayers to him, some of which survive.

Orpheus, Eurydice, and Hermes (ū-rid'i-sē; hēr'mēz). Replica of an Attic high relief of the school of Phidias, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The group is shown just at the moment when Orpheus, having looked back, must lose his wife forever.

Orseïs (ôr-sē'is). In Greek mythology, a nymph who married Hellen and bore him Aeolus, Zuthus, and Dorus. Xuthus was the father of Ion and Achæus. Thus Orseïs was the ancestress of the four great Hellenic nations: Dorians, Aeolians, Ionians, and Achæans.

Orsippus (ôr-sip'us). An athlete of Megara, Greece. He is said to have won the foot race at Olympia (720 B.C.) by running naked while his competitors wore loin cloths as was the custom, and thus was the first to compete in the nude. Afterward, this became the custom. He was buried at Megara.

Orthaea (ôr-thē'a). A daughter of Hyacinthus the Spartan. See Hyacinthides.

Orthia (ôr-thi-a). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Upright," because the image of Taurian Artemis, brought back to Greece by Orestes and Iphigenia, was found among willows at Limnaeum, in Laconia, according to some accounts, and willow tendrils growing about it held it upright. It is likely that Orthia represents a goddess of the Dorians with whom Artemis was identified. See also, Lygodesma.

Orthrus (ôrth'rus). In Greek mythology, the son of Echidna and Typhon, and the brother of Cerberus. He was a two-headed monster who guarded the cattle of Geryon. By Echidna, his mother, he was the father of the Sphinx, the bane of the Thebans until it was slain by Oedipus. Some say that he was the father by the Chimaera of the Nemean Lion that ravaged the vale of Nemea until it was slain by Heracles. When Heracles came to fetch the cattle of Geryon, Orthrus rushed against him barking furiously. Heracles attacked him with his club and killed him.

Ortygia (ôr-tij'i-a). In ancient geography, a small island at the entrance to the great harbor of Syracuse, Sicily. It was famous in the sieges of that city. It is the site of the fountain of Arethusa, a sacred spring. Arethusa was transformed by Artemis into a spring as she fled from the river-god Alpheus. The spring flowed under the sea from Greece and arose in Ortygia. Alpheus pursued her under the sea and the waters of the Alpheus of Elis at last mingled with those of Arethusa in Ortygia. It was said that a flower thrown into the Alpheus River in Greece would float under the sea and rise in Arethusa's spring in Ortygia.

Ortygia. An ancient name of Delos. It means "Quail," and was so named because Asteria, daughter of Coeus the Titan, leaped into the sea to escape the embraces of Zeus and was transformed into a quail. The island where she came safely ashore was named for her.

Orvieto (ôr-vye'tō). See Urbibentum.

Orythaon (ôr-i-thā'on). In Greek legend, a Trojan comrade of Hector. He was one of the last Trojans slain by Achilles. Achilles, dying from the wound inflicted by Paris or by Apollo had not lost his fury for fighting; he hurled his spear with his last breath and killed Orythaon.

Oschophoria (os-kō-fō'ri-a). A festival of Dionysus celebrated at Athens in the Fall, when the grapes ripen. It was believed to have been established by Theseus, when he returned safely from Crete, in gratitude to Athena and Dionysus, who had come to him while he was at Naxos on his way home, or in honor of Dionysus and Ariadne. For the festival two youths whose parents were living were chosen from each of the ten Athenian tribes. Carrying clusters of grapes on shoots of vine, the 20 youths raced from the sanctuary of Dionysus at Limnae in Athens to the sanctuary of Athena Sciras at Phalerum. The name of the festival comes from the vines they bore, and means "Fruit-bearing." The winner of the race received a goblet with a drink of wine, cheese, meal, and honey, and was given an honored place in the procession that followed the race. This procession was led by two youths disguised as maidens. They represented two of the youths who went to Crete with Theseus as part of the Athenian tribute to Minos, and who, some say, disguised themselves as girls and killed the guards while Theseus was in the Labyrinth. Fourteen women took part in the sacrifice that followed the procession. They commemorated the mothers of the seven youths and seven maidens who made up the tribute to Minos and who were saved by Theseus.

Osiris (ō-sī'ris). In Egyptian mythology, the god and judge of the dead, and lord of the Underworld. He was also believed by the ancient Egyptians to have given them their religious rites, their knowledge of agriculture, and the other arts of civilization. Probably the most widely known myth about Osiris is that he was the son of Geb (earth) and Nut (sky), consort of his sister Isis, that he was killed by his envious brother, Set, cut up into 14 pieces and scattered over Egypt, and avenged by his posthumous son, Horus, who killed Set. Isis recovered the scattered fragments of his body and buried them here and there in Egypt; and each of these places became a center of the Osiris cult. The gods then gave Osiris immortality and made him judge and guardian of the dead. Osiris was originally an ancient fertility god who became associated with the fertility-giving Nile, and because of his death, resurrection, and immortality story, became associated with the setting and forever-rising sun, and thus with Ra, the sun-god. His chief center of worship was at Abydos. In art he was portrayed as a bearded human figure in mummy swathing, wearing the crown of Upper Egypt, and bearing in his hands, which protruded from the swathing, the shepherd's crook and flail (both agricultural symbols). The Greeks identified Osiris with Dionysus, Isis with Demeter, and Set with Typhon.

Osroene or Osrhoene (oz-rō-ē'nē). [Also: Orrhoene.] In ancient geography, a region in the NW part of Mesopotamia. Its chief city was Edessa (modern Urfa).

Ossa (os'a). Mountain in the E part of Thessaly, Greece, situated NW of Pelion and separated from Olympus on the N by the Vale of Tempe. According to myth, Pelion was piled atop Ossa by the giants when they stormed Olympus. Elevation, about 6400 feet.

Ostia (os'ti-a). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, situated on alluvial soil on the left bank of the river Tiber near its ancient mouth, about 15 miles SW of Rome. According to Roman tradition it was the oldest colony of Rome, founded by Ancus Marcius, fourth king of Rome (640-616 B.C.), but extensive excavations have revealed nothing earlier than the 4th century B.C. To the period of about 340 B.C. is assigned the plan of the earliest Roman settlement, in the form of a Roman camp (castrum), consisting of a rectangular fortification bisected by a north-south street, the cardo, and by a west-east street, the decumanus. The walls, and the four gates where these streets enter the castrum, are of the ashlar tufa masonry which is so typical of Republican construction in and near Rome that it is of little use as a criterion of dating, the most that can be said of it being that it would not be out of place any time between 500 and 50 B.C. Parallel to the walls, both inside and outside the castrum, are strips of land about 40 feet wide, reserved for military purposes and forbidden to private construction, clearly defined by streets, the external and internal pomerial streets, so called because they mark the defense zone known as the pomerium. Of the four areas corresponding to city blocks within the walls, part was taken up by temples and a forum or market, the rest being available for residential purposes; but the population quickly outgrew the fortified space and expanded outside the walls. During the Punic Wars, especially the Second Punic War, Ostia became a naval base of crucial importance to Rome. In the disturbances of the time of Sulla, during which Ostia was sacked by Marius, a new and greatly enlarged fortification wall was built in ashlar tufa masonry strikingly similar to that of the 4th century castrum, enclosing an area now calculated at c170 acres, in spite of which Ostia was sacked again in 68 B.C., this time by pirates, an act of unprecedented boldness which led to Pompey's imperium in 67 B.C.

Rome's increasing need for grain, other foodstuffs, and building materials imported from Spain, North Africa, Sicily, and Egypt, caused the rapid growth of Ostia as the commercial port of Rome. Ostia built a theater and behind it a vast colonnade where the corporations which organized the import and export trade and the barge services on the Tiber had their offices. Vulcan remained the chief god of Ostia, but the cosmopolitan and polyglot population introduced the oriental cults of Magna Mater, Isis, Mithras; and, soon after, if not before 200 A.D., Christ. To overcome continual silting by the Tiber, Claudius and later Trajan constructed artificial harbors, connected to the sea and to the Tiber by canals. In the 2nd century A.D. Ostia reached its peak as one of the greatest cities of the Empire; the population then exceeding 200,000 and perhaps approached 300,000. The growing population caused crowding that was only partly relieved by the development of great five-story insulae (apartment houses), with central courts, interior staircases, windows, and balconies, directly anticipating those of modern cities. Before 300 A.D., however, there is evidence of depression; taxes and liturgies became increasingly onerous, and the population began to decline.

On an island in the Tiber, the Isola Sacra, was the cemetery of the prosperous freedmen who made up the bulk of the commercial class. It has been meticulously excavated, like much of Ostia itself, by the distinguished Italian archaeologist Guido Calza. There is a small museum of sculpture, and important collections of Latin and Greek inscriptions. Outside the walls stands the small modern village of Ostia, but the area within the walls is unoccupied and the shore has advanced two miles from its ancient line. The Tiber has eroded a small sector along the northern boundary of Ostia, and for centuries Ostia was quarried by Roman princes for building materials and objets d'art, but it remains one of the most impressive archaeological sites of ancient Italy. (JJ)

Ostracism (os'tra-sizm). A political measure employed under restrictions of law among the Athenians, by which citizens whose presence seemed embarrassing to the state were banished by public vote for a term of ten years, with leave to return to the enjoyment of their estates at the end of the period. It has its name from the tablet of earthenware (ostrakon) on which every voter wrote the name of the person he desired to ostracize. Ostracism was practised in some other democratic states of Greece, as Argos and Megara, but the method of its administration, except in Athens, remains obscure. Aristides, Themistocles, and Cimon were among those who were banished by ostracism. Hyperbolus was ostracized in 417 B.C. He was a demagogue, called "a rascal and a disgrace to the city" by Thucydides. Hitherto, ostracism had been employed against statesmen whose very qualities of leadership might pose a threat to the democracy. When it was employed against Hyperbolus the practice was considered to have been degraded, and thereafter fell into disuse.

Otanes (ō-tā'nēz). A Persian nobleman of the 6th century B.C. According to Herodotus, when the False Smerdis ascended the throne of Persia, following the death of Cambyses, Otanes began to suspect that this Smerdis was not the true son of Cyrus because he never left the palace and never received any of the Persian noblemen. Otanes suspected that he was really a Median magus who had usurped the throne with the help of his brother, a magus who had been left in charge of Cambyses' household when the latter departed on his expedition to Egypt. Otanes sought to prove his suspicions. His daughter, Phaedima, had been one of the wives of Cambyses and was taken as a wife by Smerdis after the death of Cambyses. Otanes sent a message to her, asking if the man who shared her couch was truly Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, or some other man. Phaedima answered that she did not know because she had never seen Smerdis the son of Cyrus.

Otanes then instructed her to ask Atossa if the man they both knew as their husband was truly Smerdis, for surely Atossa, the sister and wife of Cambyses and the sister of Smerdis, would know whether the man she called her husband was her own brother. Phaedima replied that she was never permitted to see the other wives of Smerdis. Otanes was now more than ever convinced that the man was not truly Smerdis. He instructed his daughter to perform the following test: When the king came to her, she was to feel his ears as he slept. If he had ears he was truly Smerdis, but if he had no ears he was the magus, for his ears had been cut off as punishment for a crime. Phaedima did as her father commanded, and reported that the man who came to her as king had no ears. Now Otanes was certain that this was an impostor. He confided his information to two other Persian nobles, who, as it happened, had already entertained the same suspicions, and the three decided to take three more loyal Persians into their confidence. At this time Darius, the son of Hystaspes, came to Susa and he was made a seventh member to plan how they should remove the false king. The names of the seven conspirators were Otanes, Aspathines, Gobryas, Intaphernes, Megabyzus, Hydarnes, and Darius. Darius urged instant action, for if so many already knew what he thought he alone knew, more would find out soon and warn Smerdis. In fact, he threatened that unless they acted at once, he himself would betray them to Smerdis rather than take the risk of being betrayed himself. Otanes would have preferred more men to aid them, and he counseled delay but was overruled. The seven set out at once for the palace, succeeded in entering it, and themselves cut down the False Smerdis and his brother. Following his death and exposure, the capital was in a ferment. The conspirators now met to decide on a government to succeed Smerdis. Otanes favored a government by the people. He pointed out the excesses of Cambyses and the insolence of Smerdis as evils attendant on a monarchy, in which the monarch can do as he likes and is answerable to no one. Otanes thought it was inevitable that the power which is customarily vested in a monarch leads to excessive pride and arrogance and promotes great envy in those who aspire to such power; thus the kingdom is continually in turmoil. He thought the excesses and unlimited power of monarchs could be avoided by a democracy, but Otanes was overruled. The conspirators decided to choose one of themselves as king. Hereupon Otanes said that as he neither wanted to rule or to be ruled, he would withdraw his name from consideration for the role on one condition: that none of them or their descendants should ever claim the right to rule over him or his descendants. The others agreed, and thenceforward the family of Otanes was the only free family in Persia. Its members submitted to the rule of the king or not, as they chose, although they were compelled to obey the laws of the land like all other Persians. Later Otanes successfully commanded an expedition for the conquest of Samos.

Otho (ō'thō), Marcus Salvius. Emperor of Rome (January–April, 69); born 32 A.D.; committed suicide, in April, 69. He was governor of Lusitania under Nero, whose mistress was Poppaea Sabina, Otho's wife. He overthrew Galba by a conspiracy after helping him gain the purple, and was in turn overthrown by Vitellius.

Othrys (oth'ris). Mountain range in the S part of Thessaly, Greece, due S of Ossa and SW of Pelion. Peak elevation, about 5665 feet. According to Greek mythology, it was a part of the domain of Aristaeus, and was the headquarters of the Titans when they waged war against the gods.

Otionia (ō-shi-ō'ni-ā). In ancient mythology, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and his wife Praxithea. She gladly submitted to being sacrificed when an oracle told her father that Athens would secure victory in a war between the Athenians and the Eleusinians, if he would sacrifice his youngest daughter. On her death two of her sisters, Pandora and Protogonia, killed themselves, as they had taken an oath that if one of them must die by violence, they would also die.

Ovid (ov'id). [Full Latin name, Publius Ovidius Naso.] Roman poet of the Augustan Age, who was born at Sulmo, in the mountains of the Abruzzi in Italy, March, 43 B.C.; died at Tomi, near the Euxine Sea, 17 or 18 A.D. He was the son of a wealthy and prominent landowner who wanted him to enter the legal profession, and for this purpose sent him to Rome to be educated. There he had a splendid training under two of the most noted rhetoricians of his day, Porcius Latro and Arellius Fuscus. He completed his education by traveling for more than a year to Athens, Troy, Asia Minor, and Sicily, with Aemilius Macer, the poet and contemporary of Vergil. He held a number of minor posts in the government, but his drive for poetic expression exerted itself to the disappointment of his father, and he gave up all pretensions to a career in the government service to devote himself to his poetry which, he said, flowed from his lips of its own accord, and to living a life of unfettered pleasure. He had some connection with the younger members of the palace circle, had powerful allies in government posts, and was the friend of the poets Tibullus, Propertius, and Horace. He was married three times, first to a wife who was given to him by his father when he was yet very young. This marriage ended in divorce, as did his second marriage. For his third wife, who was of the prominent and powerful Fabian family, he seems to have had warm affection and respect, and after his marriage to her he produced his more serious work, or perhaps "less frivolous" would be a better description, as Ovid was not noted for the seriousness of his work but for the elegance of his writing, his gracefully evocative descriptions of the beauties of nature, the vividness of his imagination, and his skill as a story-teller. For reasons now unknown, he was banished by Augustus in 9 A.D. to Tomi on the Euxine (Black) Sea. Some think he may have had knowledge of one of the affairs of the notorious Julia, granddaughter of the emperor, which he failed to report, and that this was the reason for his exile. From his own writing we learn that he admitted to an error, but not to a crime. Another reason for his banishment may have been his publication of Ars Amatoria (Art of Love) which was in conflict with the moral reforms of the emperor. In any event, Augustus never recalled him from his banishment, and Tiberius, successor of Augustus, paid no attention to his constant and anguished appeals to be allowed to return. In spite of the mild form of his banishment, which permitted him to retain his civic rights and his property, to be exiled among semi-barbarians was most dire punishment for the sophisticated and cultivated Ovid, who by his own account would rather have lived in his own age and in Rome than any age of which history has a record or any other place. It was to no avail, he died an exile, in 17 or 18 A.D.

Among his works was a tragedy, Medea, which has been lost, but which enjoyed a high reputation among his contemporaries. Apparently he never again tried his hand in this form. Of his Amores (Love Poems), a collection published in 2 B.C. (following an earlier publication) is extant, and contains 49 elegies on the poet's life and his love for his mistress, Corinna. But some think that this lady was not much more than a fictional love. The Heroides is a collection in the form of letters written by the heroines of various myths or legends to their lovers. Published in 2 B.C. was his immoral Ars Amatoria (Art of Love), in three books, a handbook on the arts of love which described in sensual and light-minded detail the means and methods of engaging in and carrying on love affairs. The first two of these books was for the instruction of men, the third was directed to women. In the course of the work he illustrated various points by retelling the stories of famous lovers of mythology, as Cephalus and Procris, and Theseus and Ariadne. This work shocked the official court of Augustus, while it titillated those permitted to have private opinions, for the emperor was trying at that time, with little success, to improve and elevate the lowered moral tone of the higher echelons of Roman society. Ten years after its publication, when Ovid was banished, an edict against the Ars Amatoria was also published. Ars Amatoria was followed by Remedia Amoris (Cures of Love), thought by some to have been written as a kind of apology for the earlier work, but with no diminution of its sensual quality. From his exile in Tomi, Ovid wrote a number of poems, Tristia, of lamentation concerning his exile, and letters, Epistulae ex Pontus, in which he expressed his sorrow in his exile and his ardent desire, never fulfilled, to be recalled to the life and the city he loved. The Fasti is a poem in six books (out of 12 contemplated, one for each month), on the Roman calendar, and describes the ceremonies and rites of Roman religion in his age. He had begun this work before he finished the Metamorphoses, and stopped work on it at the time of his exile. In addition, he wrote a treatise on the use of cosmetics, Medicamina Faciei Femineae, fragments of which remain, and a poem in imitation of Callimachus' poem of the same name, Ibis, which was an attack on an enemy held in some part responsible for his exile.

Perhaps the most influential and most widely read of Ovid's works has been the Metamorphoses, a collection of myths drawn from Greek, Latin, and Eastern sources, all of which had one element in common: that they dealt, no matter how tenuous the connection, with a miraculous transformation. In the 15 books of the Metamorphoses Ovid treated a sure knowledge of mythology with untrammelled imagination and graceful language. He dextrously maneuvered through intricate plots and relationships so that one story led almost imperceptibly to another. To his quick sense of what a story is, he added compassion for his human protagonists and a lightly irreverent treatment of the immortal gods. The work is a treasure of myth and legend which has provided a source of information and inspiration to succeeding western literature and art, and which is still read in modern times, if perhaps without the same sense of charm and delight that it held for the readers of his own time. Written entirely in the hexameter, rather than the elegiac couplet which he used in other works, the work covers the field of mythology from the transformation of Chaos to the ordered universe of earth, sea, and sky, down through the myths of Greek and Latin cultures to the transformation of Julius Caesar into a star. This last was included as a tribute to the divinity of Augustus, the adopted son of Caesar, but it did not benefit Ovid, for just as he had finished the long poem and begun revising it, Augustus banished him. In his despair it is said that Ovid gave his work to the flames. Obviously, and fortunately, there were copies of it in existence at the time, and though he never finished the revision he had intended, his work was preserved in spite of his dramatic gesture, and was published by friends after he had gone into exile. And although he felt it stood in need of revision and lamented from exile that he had not done it, Ovid was in no doubt as to its worth as it stood, for the closing lines of the Metamorphoses read, "My work is complete: a work which neither Jove's anger, nor fire nor sword shall destroy, nor yet the gnawing tooth of time. That day which has power over nothing but my body may, when it pleases, put an end to my uncertain span of years. Yet with my better part I shall soar, undying, far above the stars, and my name will be imperishable. Wherever Roman power extends over the lands Rome has subdued, people will read my verse. If there be any truth in poets' prophecies, I shall live to all eternity, immortalized by fame."

Oxyderces (ok-si-dér'sêz). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Bright-eyed." Diomedes, whom the goddess so inspired with valor in the Trojan War that he attacked even the gods themselves, was wounded by an arrow of Pandarus during the struggle. Mist darkened his eyes and he faltered, but Athena came to him, healed his wound, and cleared the mist from his eyes. After the Trojan War Diomedes dedicated a sanctuary of Athena Oxyderces at Corinth.

Oxylus (ok'si-lus). In Greek tradition, an Aetolian who was exiled for a year to Elis for an accidental homicide. As he was returning to Aetolia he was met by the Heraclidae—Cresphontes, Temenus, and their nephews Procles and Eurysthenes. The Heraclidae, preparing for their invasion of the Peloponnesus, had been told by an oracle to choose the man "with three eyes" for a leader. Oxylus was driving a one-eyed mule and the Heraclidae took him as the leader indicated by the oracle. Oxylus asked that they give him Elis as his reward for leading them into the Peloponnesus, and they promised to do so. But he feared that when they saw what a pleasant land it was they would break their promise, and so he led them through Arcadia. When he came to Elis, he hoped to get the kingdom without a battle, but the Eleans would not give up so easily. However, they agreed to a duel in which the winner would get the kingdom. The champion who fought for Oxylyus was an Aetolian slinger. He won and Oxylyus became king. He allowed the Eleans to keep their land and did not disturb their worship of their heroes. He brought in Aetolian colonists and enlarged the city, and the land prospered. In obedience to an oracle, he sought Agorius from Helice in Achaia, as he had been commanded to take a descendant of Pelops as co-founder.

Paches (pa'kēz). Athenian commander; fl. at the end of the 5th century B.C. He was sent to capture Lesbos, which had revolted from Athens in 428 B.C. After a winter siege the city of Mytilene, the chief Lesbian city, surrendered to him, 427 B.C., on condition that the Mytileneans would be allowed to send a delegation to Athens to plead their cause, and that Paches would not imprison, enslave, or put to death any of the inhabitants of the surrendered city. He accepted the terms and invested the city. On learning that a Peloponnesian fleet had been seen coming to the relief of Mytilene, Paches set out after it and the Peloponnesians fled. Paches went on to Ionia, seized Notium, and gave it to a faction in Colophon. Afterward, Paches was called to account for his activities by his enemies. As he was giving his account of his generalship in court he drew his sword and killed himself.

Pactolus (pak-tō'lus). In ancient geography, a small river of Lydia, Asia Minor, a tributary of the Hermus. It was long celebrated for its gold, but its sands had ceased to produce by the time of Augustus. In Greek legend, it was the river in which Dionysus told Midas to bathe in order to free himself of the gift, which had become a curse, of having everything he touched turn to gold. This was the reason why the sands of the river afterwards bore grains of gold.

Pacuvius (pa-kū'vi-us), Marcus. Roman tragic poet, born c220 B.C., at Brundisium, Italy, and died at Tarentum, c130 B.C. He went to Rome, where he was a pupil of his uncle, the poet Quintus Ennius, and spent most of his life there, returning to Brundisium only at an advanced age. Fragments or titles totaling about 400 lines of 13 of his tragedies, in imitation of the Greek, survive. Cicero accused him of faulty use of Latin, which suggests that his native tongue may have been Greek, or at least that he was brought up in a Greek-speaking community.

Padua (pa'dū-ā). English form of Italian Padova, Latin Patavium (q.v.).

Padus (pā'dus). A Latin name of the Po; equated with the mythical Eridanus River by Greek and Roman writers.

Paeon, Paeon (pē'an, -on). An epithet of the gods of healing applied to Apollo and then to his son Asclepius. Originally a hymn to a help-giving god, especially Apollo, asking for aid in war or other trouble, or giving thanks for aid received; hence, a war-song sung before battle in honor of Ares, or after battle as a thanksgiving to Apollo; in later times, a hymn in praise of other gods, or even of mortals.

Paeon, Paeon, or Paeon. According to Homer, the physician of the gods. He healed Hades when the latter was wounded by Heracles, and cured Ares when he was wounded by Diomedes during the Trojan War.

Paedotrophus (pē-dō-trō'fus). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Nurse of Children." At Sparta a festival was held in her honor and little boys were brought to her temple by their nurses. The Ionian Greeks presented her with clippings of boys' hair at their annual festival of the Apaturia. She was worshiped by girls as the guardian of their maiden years, and when the time came for them to marry they offered her a lock of their hair and their girdles.

Paeligni (pē-lig'nī). [Also: Peligni.] Ancient Italic people who were neighbors of the Marsi and Sabines, and whose chief towns were Corfinium and Sulmo. In the 3rd century B.C. they unsuccessfully resisted Roman ascendancy in the region. Their language, called Paelignian, was one of the ancient Oscan dialects.

Paëon (pē'on). According to tradition, a son of Endymion. His father organized a running race at Olympia, the winner of which was to succeed him on the throne of the region later known as Elis. Paëon raced against his brothers Epeus and Aetolus and lost. Angry at his defeat, Paëon went into exile in the region beyond the Axius River and founded the race that bore his name, the Paëonians.

Paëonia (pē-ō'ni-ā). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Healer." Altars and images of Athena Paëonia were raised at Athens and Oropus, among other places.

Paëonia. In ancient geography, the land between the Strymon and Axius (modern Vardar) rivers, lying on the north border of Macedonia and the western border of Thrace. The Paëonians claimed descent from colonists from Troy, and fought as allies of the Trojans in the Trojan War. According to Herodotus, they practised polygamy, and, among other deities, they worshiped Dionysus and Artemis. Also according to Herodotus, several tribal chieftains struggled for control of Paëonia. Two brothers sought the aid of the Persian king, Darius, to win power. In a typically devious manner, they dressed their sister, a tall and beautiful woman, in rich clothing and sent her to draw water for them by a way which passed the spot near Sardis where Darius was sitting in state. On her head she bore a pitcher, with one arm she led a horse, and all the while as she walked she spun flax. Darius was struck by her beauty and her industry. He sent men to follow her and observe what she did. When she came to the river she watered the horse, filled the pitcher and set it on her head, and returned by the way she had come, spinning all the while. Darius commanded that she be brought to him. She arrived with her brothers. Darius asked of what nation the woman was. Her brothers said she was their sister and that they were all Paëonians. Darius had never heard of Paëonia. He asked where it was and what had brought them to Sardis. They told him Paëonia was a land not far beyond the Hellespont, and that they had come to put themselves under his protection. They added, in answer to his questions, that all the women of Paëonia were as beautiful and industrious as their sister. Thereupon Darius resolved to have the hard-working Paëonians moved from Europe into Asia, and sent word to his general Megabazus in Thrace to bring the Paëonians to him. Megabazus did, in fact, make war on Paëonia, and conquered the lower part of it. He could not conquer the Paëonian tribes on Mount Pangaeus or the Paëonian lake-dwellers. Herodotus says the lake-dwellers had their houses built on platforms resting on piles in the middle of the lake. The platforms were connected to the land by a single narrow bridge. The independent Paëonians in later times raided Macedonia and united with the Illyrians to harass Macedonia until they were finally subdued (358 B.C.) by Philip II of Macedon. Paëonia became a district of Macedonia after the Roman conquest.

Paëonius (pē-ō'ni-us). Greek sculptor of Mende in Thrace, active in the latter part of the 5th century B.C. Some say he was one of the sculptors who worked on the decorations of the temple of Zeus at Olympia, and among the figures by him there was a group representing the chariot race between Pelops and Oenomaus. Paëonius made the statue of Victory which the Messenians dedicated at Olympia in honor of the defeat of their ancient enemies the Spartans at Sphacteria and Cythera (425 B.C.), and in celebration of their part in the defeat. The statue, a contemporary marble copy of a bronze original, was discovered in 1875 with its inscription, and gives a perfect idea of this master's style.

Paestum (pes'tum). City in Lucania, in southern Italy, situated near the sea. Founded as Posidonia, a colony of Sybaris, c600 B.C., it quickly achieved prosperity, as its great Doric temples indicate. These temples include: a temple of Hera, c530 B.C., known in later times as the Basilica; a temple of actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

Pagae/Painted Portico or Colonnade

Athena, c510 B.C., known later as a temple of Ceres; a temple dedicated to Hera, c450 B.C., but later called the temple of Poseidon. Each of these temples preserves its peristyles, or outer colonnades, intact, and the temple of Poseidon (Hera) further preserves its interior supports, small Doric columns in two stories. Excavations of two more temples of Hera at the mouth of the river Silarus (Sele), five miles to the north, have produced delightful sculptured metopes in the archaic style that are now displayed in the Paestum museum. Together, these temples form an outstanding gallery of Doric architecture, surpassed in impressiveness and wealth of information only by the Periclean buildings of Athens. Yet no ancient writer ever happened to mention them. Beginning about 400 B.C. native Italian tribes, the Lucani, attacked Posidonia and soon gained control of the city, whose inhabitants they are said to have oppressed. The greater part of the city fortifications, two and a half miles in circuit and still preserved throughout their entire length, appears to be of Greek construction, with extensive repairs attributed to the Lucanians. Four main gates survive, as well as a number of posterns and sally ports, some blocked up, and many towers. Of these towers, those later adapted for use as farm buildings have survived almost intact. From this period date also a number of painted Lucanian tombs. After the collapse (275 B.C.) of Pyrrhus' invasion of Italy, Posidonia fell under the domination of the Romans, who established there (273 B.C.) a Latin colony under the name of Paestum, the name by which it is now usually known (Italian, Pesto). To the period of Roman domination belong new temples, an amphitheater, houses, and paved streets. Under the Empire, however, malaria increased and the population declined. To this circumstance we must credit the partial survival of the three great temples and the superb fortifications, which a more vigorous population would surely have dismantled to obtain their stones for building material. The temple of Athena (known as the temple of Ceres) became a church, and still contains traces of Christian tombs, but after a destructive Saracen raid in the 9th century the site was deserted. Paestum's temples remained unknown to western scholarship until 1745, when the Italian traveler Antonini described them. Recent excavations by Claudio Pellegrino Sestieri have revealed streets, Roman houses, fresh data on the history of the fortifications, painted tombs, and an extraordinary underground ritual chamber containing a bed and jars of offerings. Pagae (pa'jē). In ancient geography, a seaport on the Gulf of Corinth, surrounded by the hills of the Megaris. There was an ancient oracle of Hera here, and here too, Aegialeus, son of Adrastus, reputedly had his tomb, having fallen in the siege of the Epigoni at Thebes. In the Persian War a force from the army of Mardonius was lost in the hills nearby at night. In fear of hostile forces, they fired off a volley of arrows. The arrows struck a rock at Pagae which, according to tradition, Artemis caused to groan. The Persians, thinking they were hitting their enemies, shot off all their arrows, and when day broke they were easily overcome, having exhausted their ammunition, and were slain by the Greeks. The rock at Pagae, bristling with the Persian arrows, was shown for centuries as one of the sights of the region. In gratitude for her help, the inhabitants of Pagae raised a bronze image of Artemis Savior at Pagae.

Pagasae (pag'a-sē). A principal seaport in Thessaly, in NE Greece. Here the Argo was said to have been built and from here it sailed. To this port the Argo returned after the journey to Colchis. Many ancient ruins of the city remain. Near it is the modern city of Volos.

Pagagus (pag'a-sus). Named by some as a Hyperborean priest who established the worship of Apollo at Delphi.

Painted Portico or Colonnade. [Also: Stoa Poikile.] A portico in the market-place, at Athens, founded by Pisianax. The walls of the portico were covered with paintings. One of the pictures showed the Athenians arrayed against the Spartans at Oenoe in Argolis, the date of which incident is unknown. Another, by Micon of Athens, was of Theseus fighting the Amazons. A third, by Polygnotus, showed the Greeks victorious at Troy gathered in an assembly to consider the outraging of Cassandra by Ajax the Lesser; and a fourth, by Micon and Panaenus,

portrayed the fighting at the Battle of Marathon, in which were portraits of Callimachus the polemarch and Miltiades. Pausanias the traveler saw the paintings in the 2nd century A.D., but by the end of the 4th century they had disappeared. The Athenians dedicated the shields they had taken from the Spartans on the island of Sphacteria in 425 B.C. in the Painted Portico, and covered them with pitch so that they would not rust. Zeno, the philosopher, walked with his disciples in the Painted Portico, and discussed philosophy with them, whence came their name Stoics, from the stoa (colonnade, or portico), in which they developed their principles.

Palaces of the Caesars (sē-zarz). Vast congeries of constructions in Rome, begun by Augustus and added to by successive emperors, occupying the Palatine Hill. Though the buildings are in ruinous condition, the plans have been in large part recovered by excavation, with fragments sufficient for a far-reaching restoration; and many imposing walls and vaults, with interesting wall paintings and graffiti, remain in position.

Palaemon (pā-lē'mon). In classical mythology, a sea-divinity into which Melicertes was metamorphosed when Ino, his mother, fleeing from her frenzied husband Athamas, leaped into the sea bearing him in her arms. See Melicertes.

Palaemonius (pā-lē-mō'ni-us), or Palaemon. In Greek legend, an Argonaut from Aetolia. He was said to be the son of Lernus of Olenus, but to have been actually the son of Hephaestus. Like his father, he had crippled feet. His lameness did not interfere with his heroic actions, for he was of great might and valor.

Palaephatus (pā-lē'fa-tus). Greek historical writer of the late 4th century B.C. In his writings he attempted to rationalize the myths and religion by asserting that the gods were originally mortals who, because of their great deeds, came to be looked upon after their deaths as gods through the awe and superstition of lesser mortals. A later extract of his work, called Of Incredible Things, survives.

Palamedes (pal-ā-mē'dēz). In Greek legend, a son of Nauplius and Clymene, and the brother of Oeax. He was one of Agamemnon's chief lieutenants and went with Agamemnon and Menelaus to Ithaca to secure the services of Odysseus in the war against Troy for the recapture of Helen. Now Odysseus had been warned by an oracle that if he went to Troy he would be gone 20 years and would return alone and destitute. When, therefore, Palamedes, Agamemnon, and Menelaus arrived in Ithaca he pretended to be mad. Palamedes realized that this madness was feigned. According to some accounts, he snatched up Telemachus, the infant son of Odysseus, and made as if to put him to the sword. Other accounts say the envoys found Odysseus plowing with an ox and an ass and sowing salt, and that Palamedes flung Telemachus in front of the plow. In either case, Odysseus showed by his instant reaction to protect his son that he was not mad at all. Thus Palamedes won the valuable services of Odysseus for the Greeks. But Odysseus never forgave him for unmasking his feigned madness and plotted to destroy him. When the Greeks were encamped before Troy he contrived to make Palamedes appear as a traitor. He compelled a Trojan prisoner to write a letter, supposedly sent by Priam to Palamedes, in which a sum of gold sent as a reward for Palamedes' treachery was mentioned. Odysseus then killed the prisoner and buried gold near Palamedes' tent. He caused the letter to be found and read by Agamemnon and gave sufficiently broad hints so that the gold was also found. This was evidence for the Greeks, and they stoned Palamedes to death as a traitor. Some say Agamemnon was privy to this plot and encouraged it because he feared Palamedes. Others say Odysseus and Diomedes induced Palamedes to descend into a well, with the claim of a great treasure there, and then buried him under a shower of stones. For the murder of Palamedes, Nauplius became a burning enemy of Agamemnon and other Greek heroes, and avenged himself on them in his own way. Palamedes, noted as an inventor, was said to have added letters to the alphabet, to have invented weights and measures, dice, the discus, and the lighthouse. He was worshiped as a hero on the island of Lemnos.

Palatine (pal'ā-tin) Hill. See Palatium.

Palatium (pā-lā'shi-um). [Also: Mons Palatinus.] One of the seven hills of Rome, SE of the Capitoline and dominating the Forum from the S; traditionally, the hill at whose foot Romulus and Remus were washed ashore, where Romulus took the auspices, where he plowed the magic furrow that marked the pomerium, and the site of the first settlement at Rome. Archaeological confirmation for this is lacking, and the suggestion that the Palatium had still earlier been a pasture is commended by no more than a dubious etymology—pascere, “drive to pasture.” Much built over in later times, the Palatium preserves of primitive structures a few courses of fortification walls in tufa and little else. Since householders on the hill could reach the Forum in a few moments, it became the fashionable residence of the wealthy and the politically ambitious, and we hear of many prominent citizens of the late Republic who had houses there: M. Fulvius Flaccus, Q. Lutatius Catulus, M. Livius Drusus whose house was bought by Crassus and then by Cicero, Cicero’s brother Quintus Cicero, Q. Hortensius, M. Aemilius Scaurus, Mark Antony, and many others. When Octavian established the principate he acquired the house of Hortensius and added to it to form a suitable imperial residence; later emperors extended these quarters until they occupied almost the whole of the Palatium. Romans who had business at the offices of the emperor spoke of going ad Palatium (to the Palatium); from this came the secondary meaning of palatium as the residence of any head of state or church, English “palace.” The Palatium also had temples of Jupiter, Victoria, Magna Mater (Cybele), Apollo, and other divinities, and relics of Romulus, whose locations are still in controversy. Palermo (pā-ler’mō). See Panormus.

Pales (pā’lēz). In old Italian and Roman mythology, a deity, protector of shepherds and flocks, sometimes regarded as a god and equated by the Romans with Pan or Faunus; also sometimes regarded as a goddess and identified with Vesta. The festival of Pales was the Palilia or Parilia, celebrated April 21 (the reputed anniversary of the founding of Rome) for the increase of flocks.

Palestra, Palaestra (pā-les’tṛā). In Greek antiquity, a public place appropriated to exercises under official direction, in wrestling and athletics, and intended especially for the benefit of athletes training to contend in the public games. Also, wrestling and athletics themselves.

Palestrina (pal-ēs-trē’nā; Italian, pā-lās-trē’nā). See Praeneste.

Palici (pa-lī’si). In mythology, twin sons of either Zeus and Thalia or Hephaestus and Aetna. They were born in Sicily. Their mother feared the jealousy of Hera and asked to be concealed in the earth. Twin boys arose from her hiding place near Mount Aetna in Sicily, and this became the seat of their worship. They were regarded as the personifications of two warm sulphur springs nearby and oaths were taken by these springs, death being the penalty for a false oath. Their shrine came to be famed as a seat of justice, as an oracle, and as a sanctuary or place of refuge, especially for runaway slaves.

Palilicium (pal-i-lish’i-um). Name given by the Romans to the Hyades, and especially to Aldebaran, the brightest of them, because this group of stars set on the day of the Palilia (April 21), originally a festival for the increase of herds, dedicated to Pales, later celebrated as the anniversary of the founding of Rome.

Palinurus (pal-i-nur’us). In Roman legend, a son of Iasus. He was Aeneas’ steersman on the voyage from Troy to Italy after the Trojan War. When the Trojans left Carthage, Palinurus advised them to put into Eryx to avoid a storm. But Neptune, who at Venus’ request had calmed the storms, required one life in return for the many he had spared. Thus it was that after the Trojans left Eryx, Somnus (Sleep), taking the form of Phorbas, lulled Palinurus, causing him to fall asleep, and pushed him overboard. Palinurus woke, swam for four days, and finally reached shore. There, having reached Italy as Apollo had promised, he was murdered by barbarous natives. Aeneas met his shade when he visited the Underworld. The shade of Palinurus, wandering in the marshes surrounding the Styx, unable to cross the river because he had not been properly buried, asked Aeneas to bury him and let the shade rest. On his return to the upper world, the Sibyl promised Aeneas that the natives who had killed Palinurus would bury him and atone for his death, and that the place where he had come ashore in Italy would keep his name forever. For this reason Cape Palinurus on the west coast of Italy received his name.

Palinurus or Palinurum (-um). [Modern names, Cape Palinuro, Cape Spartimento.] Promontory on the W coast of Italy, situated in Lucania. It was the scene of shipwrecks of Roman fleets in 253 and in 36 B.C., and of the legendary drowning of Palinurus.

Palladium (pā-lā'di-um). A wooden image of a maiden supposed to have been sent from heaven as a gift to the Trojans as a pledge of the safety of Troy so long as it should be preserved within the city. According to one account, when Ilus had marked out the limits of Troy, he prayed to Zeus for a sign that he had chosen an auspicious site for his city and that his efforts would be successful. The next morning he found a legless image of a maiden half buried in the ground in front of his tent. She was three cubits high (about five feet), and in her right hand she held a spear, in her left a distaff and spindle (or a shield), and she was wearing the aegis. Athena had made the image in memory of her dead playmate, Pallas, and set it up on Olympus, but when Electra, the Pleiad who had been violated by Zeus, accidentally touched it, Athena hurled it out of Olympus. On discovering the image Ilus was told by Apollo to guard it, as the city in which it was kept could not be taken. Another account says that the image came from heaven while Ilus was building a temple, and that it fell through an opening in the still uncompleted roof and landed on the spot where it afterward remained. However it came to Troy, it brought marvelous protective powers with it. It was for this reason that Diomedes and Odysseus entered Troy secretly toward the end of the Trojan War and carried it off, after which Troy fell to the Greeks. In Roman legend, Aeneas rescued the sacred image from the burning city of Troy, took it to Italy, and it became established at Rome. It is said to have saved Rome from the sack of the Gauls in 390 B.C. Many cities in both Greece and Italy claimed and disputed the possession of the original.

Pallanteum (pā-lan-tē'um). A town in Italy, founded by Arcadians from Greece, descendants of Pallas. According to legend, Evander, to whom Aeneas came when he reached Latium after his flight from Troy, was king in the town. The site of the town was later known as the Palatine Hill in Rome.

Pallantium (pā-lan'shi-um). In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, founded by Pallas, a son of Lycaon. According to legend, from here Evander, son of Hermes and a nymph, daughter of the river-god Ladon, was sent out to found a colony. He went to Italy, and there on the banks of the Tiber River founded a town, Pallanteum, which he named for his native town in Arcadia. This name was later shortened, and the Palatine in Rome is supposed to be the site of Evander's town.

Pallas (pal'as). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war against the gods. In the battle Athena crushed him with a stone and Heracles killed him. Athena then stripped him of his skin and afterward wore it as a garment.

Pallas. In Greek mythology, a Titan, the son of Crius and Eurybia, and the brother of Astraeus and Perses. By Styx he was the father of Zelus, Nike, Cratus, and Bia. According to some accounts, he was also the father of Chryse, wife of Dardanus, who gave her husband the sacred images of the gods as a wedding gift.

Pallas. In Greek legend, one of the four sons of Pandion and Pylia, born at Megara. He and his brothers, Aegeus, Lycus, and Nisus, divided Attica between them, and Pallas received the southern part as his portion. He was the father of 50 giant sons. He and his sons attacked Aegeus, king of Athens, claiming that he was not a true descendant of Erechtheus, but a bastard. They were, however, betrayed by the herald Leos and defeated by Theseus, son of Aegeus. When Theseus later became king of Athens, he killed Pallas and those of his sons who had survived previous battles.

Pallas. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Triton, in Libya. She was a youthful playmate of Athena who was accidentally killed by the goddess. In grief, Athena put the name of Pallas before her own name. The goddess also made a wooden image of Pallas which later was flung out of heaven and landed before the tent of Ilus, founder of Troy. This image was placed in the temple, and as the Palladium, became the guardian of the safety of Troy as long as it remained within the city. Scholars agree that the name Pallas was originally a title of the goddess Athena who is often called Pallas Athena.

Pallas. In Roman legend, a son of Evander, king of Pallanteum on the Tiber River in Italy. Evander sent Pallas to fight at the side of Aeneas in his war against Turnus. Pallas was slain by Turnus, who stripped him of his armor. Aeneas returned the body of Pallas to his father on his shield, with great pomp. Later, in a final struggle with Turnus, Aeneas recognized the belt which Turnus was wearing as belonging to Pallas. This so enraged Aeneas that instead of sparing Turnus' life, as he had intended to do, he killed him.

Pallas. A favorite freedman and financial secretary of the emperor Claudius. He persuaded Claudius to marry Agrippina and to adopt her son, Nero. When Nero succeeded Claudius, he deprived Pallas of his offices (56 A.D.) and finally put him to death (62), ostensibly because of his wealth. Many stories circulated concerning his intimacies with Nero's mother and his immense wealth. (PM)

Pamisos (pā-mī'sus). Chief river of Messenia, Greece. Its waters made the Messenian fields fertile, and in honor of it the kings of ancient Messenia made annual sacrifices to it. It flows into the Gulf of Messenia.

Pamphilus (pam'fi-lus). Greek painter of the first half of the 4th century B.C. He came from Macedonia and worked chiefly at Sicyon, as a teacher in the school founded there by Eupompus. Among his pupils was Apelles. He was the first to base the teaching of art on scientific principles, maintaining that painters had to have a knowledge of arithmetic and geometry in order to perfect their art. He is also said to have been responsible for introducing drawing as a school subject in Sicyon.

Pamphylia (pam-fil'i-ā). In ancient geography, a mountainous region in Asia Minor, bounded by Pisidia on the N, Cilicia on the E, the Mediterranean Sea on the S, and Lycia on the W. It was successively under the rule of Lydia, Persia, Macedon, Syria, Pergamum, and Rome.

Pamphylian Gulf (pam-fil'i-ān). [Also: Pam-phylian Sea.] Ancient name of Antalya, Gulf of.

Pamphylicus Sinus (pam-fil'i-kus sī'nus). Latin name of Antalya, Gulf of.

APHRODITE AND PAN PLAYING FIVE-STONES
Engraved Greek bronze mirror, 4th century
B.C. British Museum

Pan (pan). A woodland god and god of pastures and of flocks. According to most accounts, he was a son of Hermes. It has even been claimed that he was a son of Penelope, wife of Odysseus, by her suitors, or of Amalthea, the goat who nursed Zeus, but others say he was a very ancient god, and was the son of Cronus and Rhea, or of Zeus. He was born with horns, a beard, tail, and goat legs. Pan never lived in Olympus, but dwelt in Arcadia where he guarded his flocks and herds, played with the mountain-nymphs, and aided hunters. Although he did not dwell with the gods he was associated with Cybele, Dionysus, and Aphrodite. Early in the 5th century B.C. his worship, which was native to Arcadia, spread over the rest of Greece and was strongest in country areas. He passed his days in comparative idleness, playing on his pipes and resting. It was his custom to frighten any who disturbed his noonday rest with a sudden shout, and this was the reason shepherds did not play on their pipes at midday. Sudden terror (panic) without reasonable or visible cause was attributed to his influence. It was Pan's sudden shout, in the long war between the gods and fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nôr,

Titans, which finally caused the precipitous retreat of the Titans. Another shout so frightened the monster Delphyne, who was guarding Zeus, disabled by Typhon, that Hermes was able to free Zeus. Some say Pan stopped Phidippides, the messenger whom the Athenians sent to ask Sparta for aid on the eve of the Battle of Marathon, as he ran to Sparta. The god asked him why the Athenians neglected him, when he was so friendly to them and would aid them in the future as he had in the past. The Athenians believed that Pan caused the panic which helped them to rout the Persians later at Marathon (490 B.C.). Afterward, the Athenians erected a cave-shrine to Pan on the Acropolis and established annual sacrifices and torch-races in his honor. Pan taught Apollo the art of prophecy and taught Daphnis to play the pipes. He considered himself a fine musician and, on boasting of his skill, was challenged to a contest by Apollo. Midas and Tmolus, the god of the mountain, were the judges. Tmolus decided in favor of Apollo; Midas obstinately favored Pan, but as everyone else agreed with Tmolus Apollo was the victor. By the nymph Echo, Pan was the father of Iynx; by Eupheme, the father of Crotus; and he boasted that he was the lover of all of Dionysus' maenads at the time of their wild orgies on the mountain tops. Pitys escaped his amorous advances by becoming transformed into a fir tree, and ever afterward Pan wore a wreath of pine about his head. Syrinx escaped him by turning into reeds along the Ladon River. Pan cut the reeds and, as they made a gentle singing sound, bound them together and invented the Pan-pipes. Of all the gods, Pan was the only one whose death was announced. A sailor, Thamus, on a ship voyaging to Italy, heard a voice shout across the waves telling him to proclaim that "the great god Pan is dead." When he reached Italy Thamus did as he was bid and the land mourned. The story of Pan's death was described by Plutarch in the 1st century A.D. but shrines, altars, mountains, old oaks, pine trees, and caves sacred to Pan were still honored and much frequented over a century later. The tortoise was sacred to Pan. The Romans identified Pan with their god Inuus, and sometimes also with Faunus.

Panacea (pan-ā-sē'ā). ["All Healer."] A goddess of healing. She was a daughter of Asclepius, and was the sister of Hygea, Iaso, and Aegle.

Panachaea (pan-ā-kē'ā). Epithet of Demeter, from her sanctuary at Aegium, in Achaea.

Panaenus (pā-nē'nus). Greek painter, active about the middle of the 5th century B.C. He was a brother or a nephew of Phidias, and worked with him on the great statue of Zeus at Olympia, of which, some say, Panaenus painted the drapery. He also worked with Micon on the painting of the Battle of Marathon in the Painted Portico at Athens.

Panaetius (pā-nē'shi-us), Painter. See Euphronius, painter and potter.

Panaetius. Greek Stoic philosopher of Rhodes, born c185 B.C.; died c109 B.C. He was the friend (at Rome) of Laelius and Scipio the Younger. In 129 B.C. he became head of the Stoa at Athens. Of his work, on which Cicero based some of his writing, only fragments have survived.

Panathenaea (pan-ath-e-nē'ā). In ancient Greek religion, the great festival celebrated annually in July/August (and every fourth year with greater pomp) at Athens in honor of Athena. Traditionally, it was founded by Erechtheus, as a festival of Athena. Theseus changed it to the Panathenaea, a festival of all the Athenians. The manner of its celebration was elaborated and fixed in the time of Pisistratus. There were athletic and musical contests, races, and various games. A chief feature of the celebration was a procession of women to the Acropolis bearing a mast to which was fastened a magnificent peplus which they had embroidered for the goddess. In the procession were also youths and maidens bearing various symbolic implements and leading sacrificial animals, and also chariots and cavalry. It is this procession which was commemorated in the splendid Ionic frieze which encircles the cella of the Parthenon. The prize given to winners of the various contests was olive oil in amphorae bearing a depiction of the goddess, the olive having been the specific gift of Athena to the people.

Pancratis (pan'krā-tis). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Aloeus and Iphimedia, and a sister of the Alodidae. She and her mother were carried off to Naxos by Thracians, but were rescued by the Alodidae.

Pancratium (pan-krā'shi-um). In Greek antiquity, a gymnastic contest or game combining wrestling and boxing. The combatants fought naked, with bare fists or with the soft cestus, and the contests were, at Olympia as almost everywhere, regulated by strict rules to guard against unfairness. The contest was, however, very severe, as the fight was continued until one of the adversaries either was killed—which often happened—or acknowledged his defeat.

Pandareus (pan-dār'ē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Merops. He was a native of Miletus in Crete, and was the father, by Harmothoë, of Aëdon, Cleothera, and Merope. He stole the golden dog which Hephaestus had made to guard the infant Zeus from the temple of Zeus at Dictæ, and gave it to Tantalus to keep for him. When he later asked Tantalus to return it to him Tantalus denied that it had ever been in his possession. Hermes discovered the whereabouts of the dog, on Mount Sipylus, and restored it to the temple. Tantalus was buried under Mount Sipylus for his lies and Pandareus fled to Sicily. There he was slain by Zeus. His daughters were brought up by Aphrodite, with the assistance of Artemis, Athena, and Hera. According to other accounts, it was Tantalus who stole the dog, and Pandareus who received it for safe-keeping, and for his part in the theft Pandareus was slain by Zeus or turned into stone.

Pandarus (pan'da-rus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Lycaon. A renowned archer, being the possessor of a bow given to him by Apollo, he came from Zeleia, at the foot of Mount Ida, to aid the Trojans in the war against the Greeks. The Greeks and Trojans, both tired of the war, exchanged oaths of friendship and agreed that the winner of a duel between Paris and Menelaus should have Helen and all her possessions. This duel was inconclusive because when it appeared that Paris might lose Aphrodite snatched him away in a cloud. Following this, Athena, in the guise of Laodocus, appeared to Pandarus and urged him to shoot at Menelaus and win fame for himself. Beguiled by the goddess, Pandarus treacherously aimed an arrow at Menelaus. Athena deflected it so that Menelaus was only wounded, but the truce had been broken by the Trojans, and the war was resumed. Pandarus, "peer of immortals," wounded Diomedes and, encouraged by Aeneas, sought to kill him, although by that time he was convinced that the gods were protecting Diomedes, as indeed they were. In their second encounter, Pandarus wounded Diomedes with his spear and then was slain by Diomedes.

Pandarus. In the Aeneid, a son of Alcanor of Mount Ida in Troy, reared by the wood-nymph Iæra. He was one of the companions of Aeneas on the flight from Troy. In Italy Aeneas left him to guard the gate of the Trojan garrison when he himself went to seek help from Tarchon for his beleaguered forces. Pandarus and his brother Bitias opened the gate and slew the followers of Rutulian Turnus as they poured into the garrison. In the mêlée Bitias was killed. When Pandarus saw that his brother was dead he shut the gate, leaving many of his comrades outside and locking in some of the Rutulians, notably Turnus. He hurled his spear at Turnus but Juno deflected it. Turnus took advantage of the divine intervention and split the head of Pandarus in two with his sword.

Pandataria (pan-da-tār'i-a). [Modern name, Ventotene.] In ancient geography, an island in the Tyrrhenian Sea, W of Naples. It was the place of banishment of Julia, the licentious daughter of Augustus; Agrippina, Julia's daughter and wife of Germanicus; and Octavia, daughter of Claudius and Messalina.

Pandemos (pan-dē'mos). Epithet of Aphrodite, originally alluding to her function as a civic or social goddess, but later referring to her as goddess of earthly or physical love.

Pandion (pan'di-on). In Greek legend, a king of Athens, father of the twins Butes and Erechtheus, and of Procne and Philomela. He died of grief following the transformation of his daughters into a nightingale and a sparrow, respectively. See Procne.

Pandion. In Greek legend, one of the two sons of Phineus and Cleopatra. His brother was Plexippus. The brothers were blinded by Phineus, who had abandoned their mother and married Idæa, as a result of false accusations made against them by their stepmother. According to some accounts, their sight was later restored and they were given Phineus' kingdom by their uncles, Calais and Zetes.

Pandion. Named by Homer as a companion and squire of Teucer, and bow-carrier for Teucer.

Pandion the Younger. In Greek legend, a son of Cecrops. He was a king of Athens, and by Pylia was the father of Aegeus, Lycus, Nisus, and Pallas. When he and his sons were driven out of Athens by his nephews the Metionidae, he fled to Megara, his wife's home, and succeeded her father Pylas to the throne. Pandion never returned to Athens. He was given a hero's honors in Megara.

Pandora (pan-dō'ra). According to Greek mythology, Prometheus defied Zeus, stole fire from heaven and gave it to men. Zeus punished Prometheus for loving mankind too well, and took his revenge on men by sending an evil which counterbalanced the benefits of the gift of fire. He commanded Hephaestus, the master smith, to create a maiden. She was a most beautiful creation. Athena taught her woman's work, Aphrodite endowed her with beauty, Hermes gave her a deceitful nature, the Charites and the Horae adorned her with delicate raiment, flowers, and a crown of gold. She was called Pandora because all the gods of Olympus gave her gifts. Zeus ordered Hermes to take her to Epimetheus as a gift. Prometheus, still loving mankind, shut up in a casket all the evils which might plague the world. This was given to Pandora as a dowry. Prometheus warned Epimetheus not to accept any gift from Zeus but Epimetheus forgot the warning, and only remembered it when it was too late. He married Pandora, and forbade her to open her box, as Prometheus had instructed him to do. But as Pandora had been created as a scourge to mankind, she one day yielded to her curiosity and opened the box. All the evils which Prometheus had imprisoned therein flew out and from that time on brought misfortune to men. Only hope remained. Some say this was at the order of Zeus. Others say it was Prometheus who gave wild hope to men. At all events, until the arrival of woman, in the shape of Pandora, men lived without evil and hardship, but with her coming, the world became a dangerous and unhappy place.

Pandora. In Greek legend, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and his wife Praxithea. When her sister, Otionia, was sacrificed to bring victory to Athens, in the war with the Eleusinians, Pandora fulfilled a vow and killed herself.

Pandorus (pan-dō'rus). In Greek legend, a son of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. After the death of Erechtheus his sons quarreled over the succession. Cecrops was appointed king by Xuthus, who had been asked to settle the dispute. But Metion and Orneus were not satisfied. They threatened to kill Cecrops. He fled, and Pandorus joined him and founded a colony in Euboea.

Pandosia (pan-dō'shā). In ancient geography, a town in Bruttii, Italy, situated on the Acheron River, near what is now Cosenza. Here Alexander I, king of Epirus, was defeated and slain (326 B.C.) by the Bruttians.

Pandrosos (pan'drō-sos). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, and Agraulos. She was a priestess of Athena, in whose temple on the Acropolis grew the sacred olive tree, given to Athens by Athena. She leaped to her death from the Acropolis. See Herse.

Pancas (pan'ē-as). [Roman name, Caesarea Philippi; modern name, Baniyas.] Village in SW Syria, at the foot of Mount Hermon, about 40 miles SW of Damascus: said to have been named by the Greeks for the god Pan.

Pangaeus, Mount/Panopeus

Pangaeus (pan-jē'us) or Pangaeum (-um), Mount. A mountain in Thrace, near the mouth of the Strymon River on the shore of the Aegean Sea. Here, according to legend, Lycurgus was pulled apart by wild horses in punishment for his crime (induced by madness which Dionysus had inspired) of killing his son, Dryas. It was also the place where Orpheus rose to greet the dawn and proclaim Apollo, in defiance of the ritual of Dionysus. The mountain was rich in gold and silver. Philip II of Macedon in 358-357 B.C. seized it and from its mines secured the funds to build his military organization.

Panhaema (pan-hē'ma). A field on the island of Samos where, according to tradition, Dionysus killed the Amazon women who opposed him on his return from India. He killed so many of them that the place was named Panhaema (All-bloody) to commemorate them.

Panhellenius (pan-he-lē'ni-us). Epithet of Zeus as "God of all the Greeks." It was to Zeus Panhellenius that Aeacus sacrificed on the mountain top in Aegina, to beseech him to end the drought that afflicted all Greece. Zeus answered his prayers and sent rain. Afterward, Aeacus established a sanctuary of Zeus Panhellenius on the mountain top in Aegina. The Roman emperor, Hadrian, dedicated a temple of Zeus Panhellenius in Athens in the 2nd century A.D.

Panhellenius. A mountain on the island of Aegina. Aeacus made sacrifices on it, at the request of the Athenians, to end a drought in Greece. His rites were followed by a thunderclap and a deluge of rain. He built a sanctuary to Zeus there, and ever afterward it was a sure sign of rain when a cloud veiled the mountain top.

Panionia (pan-i-ō'ni-a). In ancient Greece, a festival convening all Ionians for the worship of Poseidon. By the end of the 5th century B.C. it had been superseded in importance by the festival of Ephesus. See Panionium.

Panionium (pan-i-ō'ni-um). A temple of Poseidon at Mycale in Asia Minor, where the Ionians of the 12 Ionic cities of Caria (Miletus, Myus, and Priene), of Lydia (Ephesus, Colophon, Lebedus, Teos, Clazomenae, and Phocaea), of the islands of Samos and Chios, and of Erythrae on the mainland opposite Chios, gathered to celebrate the Panionia, in honor of Poseidon. These Ionians decreed that this temple should be closed to the other states of Ionia. The Ionians met at the Panionium to discuss matters of public business and policy. At one time Thales of Miletus suggested in a meeting at the Panionium that the Ionian cities unite and establish a central government, and suggested Teos, as the center of Ionia, as the logical place for the central government. His advice was disregarded. The Ionian cities maintained their separate laws and policies and were easily picked off by Croesus, Cyrus, and Darius.

Pannonia (pa-nō'ni-a). In ancient geography, a Roman province, bounded by the Ister (Danube) on the N and E, Moesia and Illyricum on the S, and Noricum on the W. It was made a Roman province by Tiberius (c9 A.D.), and divided by Trajan into Upper Pannonia in the W and Lower Pannonia in the E (c106 A.D.).

Panomphaeus (pan-om-fē'us). An epithet of Zeus as the sender of ominous and prophetic voices.

Panopeus (pan-ō-pūs). In Greek legend, a son of Phocus (son of Ornytion) and Asteria. He was the twin of Crisus, with whom he struggled in his mother's womb. The hatred thus begun persisted throughout their lives. Panopeus took the part of Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, while Crisus and his family sided with Orestes. He took part in the Calydonian Boar Hunt and also allied himself with Amphitryon, foster father of Hercules, in the war against the Taphians and Teleboans. Before going into battle he swore in the name of Athena, as did the other allies, that he would not hide any of the spoils which might be taken in the war. He was the only one to break his oath and was punished for so doing by becoming the father of a cowardly son, Epeus, who, nevertheless, accompanied the Greeks to Troy and built the Wooden Horse. Panopeus was also the father of Aegle, for whom, some say, Theseus abandoned Ariadne on the island of Naxos.

Panopeus. In ancient geography, a city of Phocis. It was named for Panopeus, father of that Epeus who built the Trojan Horse, and was peopled by Phlegyans. Homer mentions it as one of the cities that sent men against Troy in the Trojan War. Among the wonders of Panopeus described by Pausanias, fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hér ardent; pin, pine; not, nōte, möve, nōr, who visited it when the city was in ruins, were two very large, clay-colored stones that gave off an odor like the smell from the skin of a man. The people of Panopeus claimed these stones were all that remained of the clay from which Prometheus fashioned the human race. Near Panopeus was the reputed tomb of Tityus. Panopeus was destroyed by the Persians (480 B.C.), rebuilt, destroyed by Philip of Macedon following the Sacred War (346 B.C.), and never recovered from the destruction of Sulla (86 B.C.).

Panoptes (pan-op'tēz). In Greek legend, an epithet, meaning "All Eyes," of the 100-eyed giant, Argus. He was slain by Hermes.

Panormus (pa-nōr'mus). See Gonippus.

Panormus. In ancient geography, a city on the N coast of Sicily, lying at the foot of a mountain. Harbors on both sides of the ancient city accounted for its name, which means "All-haven." The city was founded in very ancient times by the Phoenicians, came under the power of Carthage, and was one of the most important Punic centers in Sicily. It remained a Punic city until 254 B.C., when it was taken by the Romans. The modern city on the site is Palermo, noted for its mild climate and the beauty of its location.

Pansa (pan'sa), Caius Vibius. Roman consul in 43 B.C. He was the colleague of Hirtius with whom he defeated Antony at Mutina, 43 B.C. He died the same year.

Pantelleria (pān'tel-le-rē'ā). [Also: Pantalaria, Pantellaria.] Island in the Mediterranean Sea, off the W tip of Sicily. It was highly favored as a place to which members of the imperial family and other prominent persons were banished in the time of the Roman empire. See Cossura.

Pantheon (pan'thē-on). In 27 B.C., M. Vip-sanius Agrippa, son-in-law of the emperor Augustus, ordered the construction of the Pantheon, a temple dedicated to the "All-Holy Ones" (not to "All the Gods," as is sometimes asserted), in the Campus Martius, Rome. The Pantheon of Agrippa was burned in 80 A.D., restored by Domitian, and destroyed about 110 A.D. The structure which now stands on the site was built between 120 and 124 A.D. at the orders of the emperor Hadrian, who repeated Agrippa's dedicatory inscription on the entablature of the façade.

As it stands, it is a rotunda of concrete faced with brick, c142 feet high and c142 feet in internal diameter, and c182 feet in external diameter, the walls being more than 20 feet thick. It is roofed with a coffered dome in which is a circular open skylight about 29 feet in diameter, and entered through a handsome vestibule with 16 Corinthian columns of granite with marble capitals. The great bronze doors are variously reported to be ancient, or to have been removed for reuse and replaced in the 16th century. The interior walls are decorated with rectangular and semicircular niches, once elegantly revetted in marble, which was later removed for reuse elsewhere. The dome was originally covered with gilded bronze tiles which at the orders of the emperor Constans II were removed in 662 A.D. and carried off to Constantinople. In 609 A.D. the Pantheon became a church, dedicated to Sancta Maria ad Martyres, later Santa Maria Rotonda. As a church, it contains tombs of members of the Italian royal family, including two kings, Victor Emmanuel II and Humbert I, and of Raphael and other artists. In spite of many changes, it is the best preserved Roman temple, and illustrates as very few Roman buildings do the Roman sense of scale and proportion, and the integrity of their construction. (JJ)

Panthous (pan'thō-us). In Greek legend, a priest of Apollo at Delphi. Priam sent an envoy to consult the oracle at Delphi concerning the site of Troy, when he was about to rebuild it after its destruction by Heracles, but the envoy fell in love with Panthous and brought him back to Troy, without consulting the oracle. Priam made him a priest of Apollo in Troy and he became one of his trusted advisers. By the time of the Trojan War he was too old to fight but acted as one of Priam's counselors. He was the father of Euphorbus, Hyperenor, and Polydamas.

Panyasis (pa-nī'ā-sis, pan-i-ā'sis). Greek poet of Halicarnassus, an uncle or cousin of Herodotus. He was active in the first half of the 5th century B.C., and was put to death by the tyrant Lygdamis, c454 B.C., as leader of the party which opposed the tyrant. He was the author of the epic Heraclea, in 14 books, that dealt with the deeds of Heracles. Only fragments of the work survive. By some, he is ranked next after Homer among the epic poets. Others place him fourth, after Homer, Hesiod, and Antimachus. Besides his epic, he wrote elegies.

Paphian Goddess (pā'fi-ān). In ancient Greek religion, Aphrodite, as goddess of sexual love. The term arose from the worship paid her at her cult center at the city of Paphos, in Cyprus.

Paphlagonia (paf-lā-gō'ni-ā). In ancient geography, a country in Asia Minor, bounded by the Euxine Sea on the N, Pontus (separated by the Halys) on the E, Galatia on the S, and Bithynia on the W. According to Homer, the inhabitants were specially noted as breeders of mules. In the Trojan War the Paphlagonians were allies of Troy and were led by Palaemenes. The country was semi-independent under Persian and Macedonian rule. It passed later to Pontus, and to Rome in 65 B.C.

Paphos or Paphus (pā'fos, -fus). In Greek legend, a son of Pygmalion and Galatea. He succeeded his father as king of Cyprus. The city on Cyprus, which bears his name and was one of Aphrodite's favorite cities, was founded by his son and successor Cinyras, according to Greek tradition.

Paphos. In ancient geography, the name of two cities in Cyprus. Old Paphos was situated near the SW coast. According to legend, it was founded by Cinyras, the grandson of Pygmalion, and it was he who built the celebrated temple of Astarte, or Aphrodite, of unburned brick and wood on a stone foundation measuring 164 by 220 feet. The famous image of the goddess was a baetylus (a conical meteoric stone). The temple stood in a large enclosure whose walls were likewise of sun-dried brick on a massive stone foundation. Cinyras named the city for his father Paphos, who was the son of Pygmalion and Galatea. The city was sacred to Aphrodite and was one of her favorite haunts. New Paphos was situated on the W coast eight or ten miles NW of Old Paphos. It was a commercial center. Aphrodite is said to have risen from the sea near Paphos.

Papirius Cursor (pā-pir'i-us kēr'sôr, -sôr), Lucius. Roman consul five times and dictator twice, hero of the Second Samnite War. As dictator he won a victory over the Sam-nites in 309 B.C. His name became a byword for great strictness and severity.

Papirius Cursor, Lucius. Roman consul and general in the Third Samnite War (298-290 B.C.); son of the hero of the Second Samnite War. According to Pliny, he erected the first sun-dial at Rome.

Paraebius (pā-rē'bi-us). In Greek legend, a friend of Phineus, in Salmydessus in Thrace. His father had cut down a hamadryad's tree, despite the pleas of the nymph to be spared. As a result he and his children were cursed. Phineus told Paraebius how he could lift the curse on himself by proper sacrifices to a nymph. Ever after, Paraebius loyally tended to the needs of the blinded and Harpy-harried Phineus. When the Argonauts visited Phineus on their way to Colchis, it was Paraebius who prepared the altar and sacrifices which they required.

Parallel Lives. Formal title of the chief work of Plutarch, consisting of biographies of 23 Romans and 23 Greeks, arranged in pairs (one Greek and one Roman), and four separate biographies. The arrangement as we have it is probably not as in the original; some biographies have been lost. The comparisons at the end of each pair (some of these are missing) are perhaps not by Plutarch. Various writers, including Shakespeare, have drawn upon Plutarch's work. See Plutarch.

Parcae (pār'sē). Three Fates of Roman mythology. Originally there was one (named Parca), a birth goddess who decided the destiny of the newborn. She was early equated with the Greek Moerae, and thus the concept became triplicate.

Parchment. A favorite writing material in antiquity. The Latin term was membrana Pergamena (Pergamene skins), the Hellenistic kingdom of Pergamum in Asia Minor having been a center of preparation of sheepskins for international commerce. The phrase, shortened to Pergamena, became parchemin in French and parchment in English. With its great durability, and its excellent writing surface and light color, against which black and colored inks contrast agreeably, it was the finest writing material known to the ancients, and many of the oldest surviving manuscripts are on parchment. Its substantially higher production cost, compared with the

abundant papyrus of Egypt, tended to limit its use to compositions of permanent importance, except during those periods when artificially high prices set on papyrus by the Ptolemies made parchment and vellum commercially competitive. (JJ)

Paria (pār'i-ā). In Greek mythology, a nymph. She was loved by Minos, king of Crete, and bore him four sons: Eurymedon, Nephalion, Chryses, and Philolaus. Her sons colonized the island of Paros in the Cyclades and named it for their mother. Heracles, on his way to fetch the Apples of the Hesperides, stopped at Paros for water. Two of his men were killed. In retaliation he killed the sons of Minos and Paria.

Parian (pār'i-an) Chronicle. [Also Marmor Parium.] A marble tablet, found at Paros (1627), on which were engraved a number of dates relating to Greek history, especially literary and religious history, from the time of Cecrops, king of Athens, to the time of the Athenian archon Diognetus, 264 B.C. The times of the founding of various festivals, victories of poets in contests, and dates of their births and deaths, are among the data inscribed in the 93 lines which remain of the Chronicle. Among others, the time of the arrival of Demeter in Eleusis is given, as well as the first sowing of corn by Triptolemus in the plain of Eleusis; and the first celebration of the Mysteries of Demeter by Eumolpus is placed in the reign of Erechtheus. According to the Chronicle, iron was discovered on Mount Ida in Crete in the time of Pandion I of Athens. The dates given are according to the kings and archons of Attica, progressing backward in time from the period of Diognetus. The Parian Chronicle was part of a group of ancient sculptures and antiquities collected by Thomas Howard, 14th Earl of Arundel, and presented to the University of Oxford in 1667. A smaller fragment of the Parian Chronicle was found at Paros in 1897 and is preserved in the local museum.

Paris (par'is). [Also: Alexander.] In Greek legend, a son of Priam and Hecuba. Before he was born his mother dreamed that she had given birth to fiery serpents and awoke screaming that Troy was in flames. Her dream was interpreted to mean that the child she would bear would bring disaster to Troy. On the day Paris was born another prophecy was made: that the child born to a royal Trojan that day would cause the ruin of Troy and that therefore he and his mother should be destroyed. Priam, despite the pleas of priests and seers to kill Paris, who was born late that day, could not destroy his wife and child, and gave the child to a herdsman with instructions to kill him. The herdsman exposed Paris on Mount Ida, but when he returned after a few days he found the infant alive and well, having been suckled by a she-bear. He carried him home and brought him up with his own son. Paris became a shepherd on Mount Ida and lived happily with Oenone, a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Oeneus. He was disporting with Oenone and innocently tending his flocks on Mount Ida when Hermes approached and told him he had been selected to judge a contest between goddesses: Eris had thrown a golden apple, marked "To the Fairest," among the wedding guests at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis. Athena, Aphrodite, and Hera each claimed the prize. Zeus had refused to settle the dispute and had advised the goddesses to consult Paris. They agreed to accept his decision. Hera promised to make him ruler of all Asia if he awarded the apple to her; Athena promised him victory in all his battles, as well as wisdom and beauty; Aphrodite promised him the fairest woman in the world as his wife. Paris awarded the apple to Aphrodite, and thus won the eternal hatred of Athena and Hera for himself and for all Trojans. The fairest woman in the world was Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta. Before she married Menelaus, her foster father made all her suitors swear an oath that they would take up arms for the man she married if any evil ever came to him because of his wife. By chance, Paris shortly after the contest returned to Troy and was discovered to be the supposedly lost son of Priam and Hecuba. (Some say Hecuba had bribed the herdsman not to destroy her infant.) The priests immediately urged that he be put to death before he could cause the destruction of Troy, as the oracles had foretold, but Priam would not consent and welcomed his handsome son warmly. Without divulging his true purpose, which was to go after Helen, Paris asked Phereclus to build him a fleet in which he could sail to Sparta, and when it was ready he sailed off, in spite of the burning admonitions and prophecies of Cassandra, his proto attend his grandfather's funeral. That same night Helen, swept on by the fate which Aphrodite had spun for her, eloped with Paris, taking one of her sons and a great treasure with her. On the way to Troy they were phetic sister, that his voyage would bring ruin to Troy. Helenus, a seer and a brother, added his warnings, but Priam ignored them and permitted Paris to sail. Oenone, his nymph, also tried to dissuade him from his journey, but her tears were unavailing. As she bade him farewell she told him to return to her if he was ever wounded, because only she could heal him. Arrived in Sparta, Menelaus welcomed him courteously, entertained him for some days, and then, oblivious of the apparent fact that Paris was headlong in love with Helen, Menelaus left for Crete driven to Cyprus by storms, and later spent some months in Egypt, fearing pursuit by Menelaus. When they finally arrived at Troy they were married, and all Troy fell in love with Helen's glorious beauty. No one blamed Paris. According to some accounts, Helen bore Paris several children, all of whom died as a result of an accident in their childhood. In spite of envoys and threats Paris refused, with the full consent and approval of the Trojans, to give up Helen. The Trojan War, in which all the Greek suitors of Helen who had taken the oath took part, followed. After nearly ten years of war Menelaus and Paris arranged, with the approval of both the Greek and Trojan armies, to fight in single combat, the winner to have Helen and end the war. In the duel, Paris was about to be overcome by Menelaus when Aphrodite spirited him away and restored him to Helen. Hector, brother of Paris, frequently accused him of being a coward and a wife-stealer, but in truth Paris fought bravely. He wounded Diomedes, Machaon, and Eurypylus, and led a group at the attack on the Greek fortifications. But each time that it was proposed that he restore Helen to Menelaus, as after the death of Hector and later the deaths of Penthesilea and Memnon who had come to aid the Trojans, he refused and accused those who made the proposals of cowardice, or what was worse, treachery. According to most accounts Paris, with the help of Apollo, mortally wounded Achilles by shooting an arrow into his vulnerable heel. He attacked Telamonian Ajax, who was defending the body of Achilles, and was flattened by a huge stone flung by Ajax. Again, he fearlessly attacked Philoctetes, who had been brought from Lemnos with the arrows he had inherited from Heracles. This attack was Paris' downfall. His arrow missed Philoctetes, but he was wounded by one of the poisoned arrows Philoctetes aimed at him. He withdrew from the battle in great pain, as the poison invaded his body. No one could cure his wound. In his desperate need he sought out Oenone, his deserted nymph, who alone could heal him. He implored her to free him of his pain, declared that it was fate which had made him desert her, and asked her forgiveness. But Oenone had also been wounded, by desertion and jealousy. She scornfully advised Paris to go to Helen to be cured. Deserted in his turn by Oenone, Paris died of his wound. The Trojans did not mourn him, for he was the cause of all their woes. His death frightened Helen, for she did not know what the Trojans would do with her now that Paris was dead. But Oenone's deep love for Paris reasserted itself. Her heart was pierced with grief. She left her home in the night and ran through the woods to the pyre on which Paris was lying. Muffling her face, she leaped into the flames and died in the fire, with Paris clasped in her arms. Their ashes were mingled in one urn and a common burial mound heaped over it. Two pillars were erected at the burial mound, facing in opposite directions because the jealousy which Oenone harbored for Helen still lived in the marble pillars.

Parisii (pa-ris'i-i). Ancient Gallic tribe occupying a small town called Lutetia on an island in the Sequana (Seine), at the time of Caesar's conquest of Gaul. They gave their name to the city of Paris.

Parma (pär'ma). [Latin: Parma, Colonia Julia Augusta.] City in N Italy, situated between Bononia (Bologna) and Placentia (Piacenza). It became a Roman military colony in 183 B.C. and was of great strategic importance because of its location on the Via Aemilia. It was destroyed by Mark Antony in the civil wars, and was rebuilt by Augustus under the name of Colonia Julia Augusta.

Parmenides (pär-men'i-dēz). Greek philosopher, born at Elea (Velia), in Italy, and active about the middle of the 5th century B.C., in the Eleatic school of philosophy. In his native town he was noted for his wise laws and blameless life; in respect to the latter, his fame was such that the expression "a Parmenidean life" became proverbial among the Greeks. He is believed to have arrived (c450 B.C.) at Athens at the age of 65, which suggests a birthdate of c514 B.C. According to some accounts, in Athens he became acquainted with his younger contemporary Socrates. He was a follower of Xenophanes, and the teacher of Zeno, and he embodied his ideas in a didactic poem in hexameters, On Nature, in two books. In a proem to the poem, he tells how he rode to the daughters of the Sun, who took him through the stone gates of Night and Day, to the goddess Wisdom. She told him he must seek the truth and how to go about it. In the first book, On the Way of Truth, he outlines his belief in one unchangeable state of being. It is not something in the process of being created or of having been created. It is there—perfect, whole, unchangeable; "that that is, is; that that is not, is not." In the second book, The Way of Falsehood or Illusion, he puts forth the view that the idea of non-existence, of phenomena in nature, of changing states, of becoming, is false and illusory; the idea of substantive change, of existence being created from non-existence, is opinion, and not truth. Fragments of his work survive.

Parmenio (pär-mě'ni-ō) or Parmenion (pär-mě'ni-on). Macedonian general, born c400 B.C.; executed without trial, on the orders of Alexander the Great, 330 B.C. He was the leading councilor and ablest general of Philip II of Macedon, who sometimes called him his only general. He defeated the Illyrians (356 B.C.); acted as envoy of Philip at the signing of a peace treaty with Athens, 346 B.C.; and when Philip was preparing war to liberate the Greek cities of Asia Minor from Persian control, he crossed the Hellespont with an advance force. Philip was murdered before he could carry out his plan to drive back the Persians. Parmenio won control of the Hellespont and kept it. When Philip's successor, Alexander the Great, arrived (334 B.C.), he had a base from which to launch his invasion of an expedition into Asia. Parmenio served Alexander as loyally and well as he had served Philip. He commanded the left wing at the battles of Granicus, Issus, and Arbela. Perhaps because of his experience and because he was old enough to be Alexander's father, he sometimes gave him advice, which was seldom taken. When the Macedonians came to the Granicus River, where the Persians were arrayed to meet them, Parmenio advised Alexander to wait until morning to cross the river and make his attack, before the Persians had time to draw up their line. Alexander's characteristic reply was that he would disgrace the Hellespont, which he had already crossed, if he allowed himself to be detained by a miserable stream such as the Granicus, even for a night. The Macedonians crossed and defeated the Persians (334 B.C.). Again, some time after the battle of Issus (333 B.C.) the defeated Darius sent to Alexander asking to ransom his family and proposing to cede to Alexander all of his kingdom west of the Euphrates River. Parmenio said he would accept the offer if he were Alexander. Alexander remarked, "So would I, if I were Parmenio," and proceeded to draft an imperious letter to Darius in which he refused his terms and demanded his surrender in person. On the eve of the battle of Gaugamela (331 B.C.), Parmenio advised a night attack against the vastly superior forces assembled under Darius. In this case, Alexander said, "I will not steal a victory," and ordered the attack for the morning. The Persians facing Alexander were completely routed and he would have pursued Darius who fled on horseback, but Parmenio was in difficulties in his sector and sent to Alexander for aid. Before Alexander came up the enemy was routed, thanks to the Thessalian cavalry. Some say that from this time Alexander had less confidence in Parmenio. However, he was left in charge (330 B.C.) of the enormous treasure the Macedonians had assembled at Ecbatana, the capital of Media, when Alexander at last found an opportunity to pursue Darius. Philotas, son of Parmenio, was also a general in Alexander's army. With the rich spoils taken and distributed to the Macedonians, Philotas began to lead a wildly extravagant life, and to rival Alexander himself in the rich gifts he gave his friends. Parmenio wrote to his son to be "less great," for he knew Alexander had received accusations against Philotas. Alexander became convinced that Philotas was conspiring against him, had him accused, tried, and put to death. He then sent messengers to Media with orders to kill Parmenio, against whom there was no charge; but the fact that he was the father of Philotas made him an object of danger to Alexander. The murder of Parmenio (330 B.C.), a loyal general who had rendered great service to two generations, marked a departure from Alexander's ordinarily generous and mild conduct toward his friends.

Parmensis (pär-men'sis), Caius Cassius. See Cassius Parmensis, Caius.

Parnassus (pär-nas'us). [Also: Liakoura.] Mountain ridge in Greece, about 83 miles NW of Athens, and situated mainly in ancient Phocis. Some say the mountain was named for Parnassus, a son of Poseidon and the nymph Cleodora. Others say this Parnassus was a mortal. In any case, he is said to have founded the oldest city at Delphi and to have discovered how to tell the future by observing the flight of birds. The ancient city founded by Parnassus was destroyed in the great flood Zeus sent to punish wicked mankind. Some of the inhabitants of Parnassus' city were warned by wolves of the coming of the flood and escaped up the mountain. There they founded a new city called Lycoria (Mountain-wolf-city). Deucalion and Pyrrha, who some say were the only ones to survive the flood, landed on Mount Parnassus as the waters ebbed, and there in obedience to a command of the gods recreated the human race. Mount Parnassus suffered again when Phaëthon lost control of the horses that draw the chariot of the sun. The flaming chariot came too near the earth and set the mountain afire. It was on Parnassus that Odysseus, visiting the home of his grandfather Autolycus, received a gash from a wild boar's tusk and carried the scar the rest of his life. The mountain was sacred to Apollo, the Muses, Dionysus, and the nymphs, and hence was regarded as the seat of music and poetry. On its slopes was located the most famous of all Greek oracles, that of Apollo at Delphi. The mountain was a favorite place for the orgies that were celebrated in honor of Dionysus. On its slopes was the Corycian cave, sacred to Pan. In the Persian Wars, the Delphians took refuge in the mountain peak when Xerxes sent an army against Delphi, but the mountain itself, according to Herodotus, protected the sacred oracle: two enormous crags broke off from it, rolled down, and crushed the Persian forces (480 B.C.). Guerrilla bands hid out in the mountain and used it as a base from which to make damaging raids on the armies of Mardonius before the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.). Highest summit, Lycoria (8068 feet).

Parnethius (pär-nē'thi-us). Epithet of Zeus, from his bronze image on Mount Parnes, near Athens.

Parnopius (pär-nō'pi-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Locust-god," because he dispelled a plague of locusts from Attica.

Paros (pār'os). Second largest island of the Cyclades; in the Aegean Sea W of Naxos. It is composed of a single mountain, famous in ancient times for its white marble. According to tradition, the island was first colonized by Arcadians. These were later joined by Ionians from Athens. Colonists from Paros, including the poet Archilochus, went to the island of Thasos early in the 7th century B.C. Because Paros had been an ally of the Persians at Marathon (490 B.C.), the victorious Athenian general Miltiades attacked it after the defeat of the Persians, but was unable to take the island. In 480 B.C. Paros again sided with the Persians. After the expulsion of the Persians from Greece (479 B.C.) Paros was forced by the Athenians to pay a heavy fine, to join the Confederacy of Delos, and to pay the highest tribute to the Confederacy treasury of any of the islands. Remains of many ancient structures have been found on the island, among them sanctuaries of Asclepius, Aphrodite, and of Delian Apollo, and a grotto of Ilithyia. Parian marble was exported from the 6th century B.C., and was used by the most famous of the Greek sculptors. Some of the tunnels in the mountain by which the marble was quarried can still be seen. One of the most interesting finds made on the island was that of the Parian Chronicle. Area of the island, about 81 square miles; length, about 15 miles.

Parrhasius (pā-rā'shi-us). Greek painter, considered one of the greatest of antiquity. He was born at Ephesus and was active in Athens, c400 B.C., as one of the chief representatives of the Ionic school. He was said to have had a painting contest with Zeuxis, another leading painter of the Ionic school. Zeuxis painted a bunch of grapes, which so deceived the birds that they swooped down and pecked at them. But Parrhasius painted a curtain which deceived Zeuxis himself, and won the contest. The anecdotes of Pliny about all the painters of this time indicate extraordinary realism carried to the point of actual illusion, as in the above case. There were many pen-and-ink sketches by Parrhasius still in existence in the time of Pliny. Among his principal works were The Personification of the Demos of Athens, probably suggested by Aristophanes, in which he portrayed great variety of psychological expressions in depicting the many types that made up the Athenian people; a Prometheus; the Heracles at Lindus; the Theseus at Athens, afterward on the Capital at Rome; a Contest of Ajax and Odysseus for the Arms of Achilles; and a Madness of Odysseus. He was one of the first to observe and utilize the proportions in human anatomy, and was skilled in the use of delicate coloring, as well as interested in catching rather violent activity in facial expressions.

Parthenia/Parthenon

Parthenia (par-then'i-a). Another name for the island of Samos.

Parthenia (pär-thē'ni-a). An epithet of Athena as the chief of the three virgin goddesses: Athena, Artemis, and Hestia.

Parthenius (pär-then'i-us). In Greek legend, a son of Phineus and Cleopatra. He and his brother, Pandion, were blinded by Phineus when their stepmother, Idaea, made false accusations against them. Parthenius is also known as Plexippus. See Pandion.

Parthenius. Greek poet of Nicaea, brought to Rome as a slave and then freed; active in the 1st century B.C. Only a few fragments of his elegiac poetry remain. A collection of his prose stories of unhappy lovers survives, culled from ancient writers and dedicated to Cornelius Gallus. The stories are illustrative of romantic Alexandrian literature. (PM)

Parthenius. A river of Paphlagonia; a gentle river, where Artemis bathed to refresh herself after hunting.

Parthenius, Mount. In ancient geography, a mountain in Arcadia. Some say Telephus, son of Heracles and Auge, was born on the mountain, and abandoned there. A sacred enclosure marked the spot where the infant was found and suckled by a deer. Near the sanctuary of Pan on Mount Parthenius, Phidippides, the Athenian runner, met the god when he was on his way to Sparta to seek aid for Athens just before the battle of Marathon (490 B.C.), and Pan assured him of his interest in the Athenians. The mountain was noted for its many tortoises, the shells of which would make good lyres, but the people of the mountain would not permit the tortoises to be taken because they were considered sacred to Pan.

Parthenon (pär'thē-non). The popular name for the splendid marble Doric temple of Athena Polias (Athena of the City), built on the Acropolis of Athens, between 447 and 438 B.C. It represents the peak achievement of Greek architecture. It was the third of three temples of Athena on this site. The first was a modest Doric temple of the limestone known as poros, restored with tristyle-in-antis porches at front and rear, the so-called Hecatompædon or "100-foot" temple. The foundations of this temple, buried beneath the later Parthenons, cannot be seen, but its dimensions and plan can be deduced from elements of the entablature and pediments which have survived, and which indicate a date somewhat earlier than 550 B.C., in the time of the Pisistratids.

In the wave of enthusiasm which followed the repulse of the Persians at Marathon in 490 B.C., the Hecatompædon was deliberately demolished to make place for the second temple, a more pretentious structure. This was the "Older Parthenon," designed as a hexastyle Doric temple, of marble from the quarries then recently opened on Mount Pentelcus, and was the first large construction in Pentelic marble. When the Persians, return-of from two to four drums each, the columns of the peristyle. In the fire these were badly damaged. Before the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), the Greek allies had sworn not to rebuild the sanctuaries which had been burned and thrown down by the Persians, but to leave them in perpetuity as memorials of barbarian impiety. In accordance with this, the older Parthenon stood in ruin for 30 years; but in 449 B.C. Pericles annulled the oath, and ordered plans drawn up for the most magnificent temple yet seen. The architects were Ictinus and Callicrates, the sculptor in charge was Phidias. They designed an octa-style Doric temple, of Pentelic marble, with 17 columns on the flanks, measuring 101 by 228 feet on the top of the stylobate. Within the peristyle, two steps up from the stylobate, was the cella, itself divided into two chambers, the cella proper, called the Hecatompedon, in which was the cult statue, and a rear room called the Parthenon, the chamber of the Virgin (parthenos, "virgin"), each approached through a hexastyle portico. The cella had interior supports in the form of small Doric columns in two stories, the Parthenon in the form of four tall, slender, Ionic columns. The sculptured decorations, designed by Phidias and executed under his supervision, the finest architectural sculpture created in the Greek world, consisted of the east and west pediments, a Doric frieze of 92 metopes, and an Ionic frieze in low relief which ran completely around the naos within the peristyle, at the top of the cella wall and above the columns of the vestibules. The east pediment represented the birth of Athena, when Hephaestus split Zeus' aching head open with an ax. The west pediment represented the contest between Athena and Poseidon for chief place in the worship of the Athenians. The 92 metopes of the Doric frieze carried scenes in high relief of the battles of gods and giants on the east front, centaurs and Lapiths on the south, Amazons and Athenians on the west, and the fall of Troy on the north. The superb Ionic frieze, 523 feet in length, represented the Panathenaic procession of officials, youths and maidens, and sacrificial animals, that was the high point of the great festival of Athena held every four years. Phidias himself executed the gold and ivory (chryselephantine) cult statue of Athena, tinted ivory for the face and throat, arms, and feet, and gold for the clothing, armor, and attributes, 42 feet in height. The staggering expenditure on the Parthenon and its brilliant decorations was severely criticized by those who opposed governmental extravagance in any form, by those who were a little sensitive about the source of the funds, which Athens had blandly diverted to its own purposes from the reserves of the Delian Confederacy, and by those who hoped to profit by discrediting or embarrassing Pericles. Even after the dedication some residue of bitterness found expression in the litigation traditionally so dear to Athenian hearts. Phidias, for instance, was accused of having converted to his personal advantage some of the gold for the cult statue with which he had been entrusted, but refuted the charge by revealing that he had cast the gold in artfully fitted plates which could be dismantled, verified by weighing, and reassembled. Again, he was accused of impiety in that among the figures in the scene of the battle of Marathon, on Athena's shield, he had included recognizable portraits of himself and Pericles. Whatever the validity of the charge, it is known that Phidias left Athens and lived in exile for some years.

When its service to the pagan goddess was completed, the Parthenon was converted into a church of the Theotokos, the Mother of God. In 1204 (or 1208 A.D.) the Frankish Dukes of Athens turned it over to Rome. About 1460, after the Turkish conquest, it became a mosque. In 1687, during a siege of Athens by the Venetians under Morosini, a Venetian cannon ball exploded gunpowder stored in the mosque by the Turks, destroying the cella, the pronaos, 14 columns of the peristyle, and the mosque; afterward the Turks built a smaller mosque amid the wreckage. In 1801-3 Lord Elgin removed a great number of "architectural marbles," and as the Elgin Marbles they are among the chief treasures of the British Museum. These include 18 figures from the pediments, almost half of the frieze, and 15 metopes. Those sculptures which remain in place on the Parthenon have suffered grievously from weathering. Parthenopaeus (pär'thē-nō-pē'us). In Greek legend, a son of Atalanta. According to some accounts, he was the son of Melanion (or, as some say, Hippomenes), who had won the race with Atalanta by means of the golden apples provided by Aphrodite. Some say he was a son of Ares. Still others say he was the son of Meleager, who had fallen in love with Atalanta when she joined the Calydonian Boar Hunt, and that she exposed the child when he was born, on Mount Parthenius. A she-bear found him and suckled him until he was found by shepherds and taken to Corythus, their master. At the same time, Telephus, son of Heracles, who had been abandoned by his mother Auge, was found and the two children were brought up together. According to some accounts, Parthenopaeus accompanied Telephus to Mysia when the latter went in search of his mother, and acted as his spokesman, and also helped and his hair sent back to his mother. His body was one of those reclaimed by Theseus and the Athenians, after the Thebans had refused burial to those who were slain, and was returned to Athens for burial.

Parthenope (pär-then'ō-pē). In Greek mythology, a siren who threw herself into the sea because her singing could not beguile the hero Odysseus. She drowned, and her body was cast up on the shore of Naples, for which reason her name is sometimes given for Naples.

Parthenos (pär'thē-nos). Epithet meaning "Virgin," given to several Greek goddesses, as for instance Artemis and Athena. It was also given to Hera in her aspect as a maiden.

Parthia (pär'thi-ā). In ancient geography, a country in W Asia, situated E of Media and S of Hyrcania. It was the nucleus of the Parthian Empire.

monarchy, comprising a great part of the territories of the first Persian Empire. It extended at its height to the Euphrates River, Caspian Sea, Indus River, and Indian Ocean. It was established by Arsaces, the first king, who overthrew the rule of the Seleucidae and reckoned 248/7 B.C. as the Year 1 of the Arsacid or Parthian Era, and rose to great power under Mithridates I and II. The Parthians were often at war with Rome. Their empire was overthrown by the new Persian dynasty of the Sassanidae c224 A.D.

Parthians (pär'thi-anz). People of ancient Parthia in Asia. They were skilled horsemen and excelled in fighting on horseback with bows and arrows. The expression "a Parthian shot" means a parting shot or, in modern usage, the last word in an argument. This is in allusion to the custom of the ancient Parthians of shooting at an enemy from horseback with the horse turned away as if in flight.

Parysatis (pā-ris'a-tis). Daughter of Artaxerxes I (Artaxerxes Longimanus), wife of Darius II, and mother of Artaxerxes II (Artaxerxes Mnemon) and Cyrus the Younger. She was active c400 B.C. She was notorious for her crimes, especially those committed in revenge for the failure and death of her son Cyrus, whom she had attempted to aid in usurping the throne.

Pasargadae (pā-sār'gā-dē). One of the tribes that made up the Persian nation. Herodotus says they were the noblest of the tribes and the one from which the royal line of Achæmenidae sprang. According to some accounts, in the last violent battle Cyrus fought against his Median grandfather Astyages, the Pasargadae fought with outstanding valor. Cyrus named the new city he built, the capital of ancient Persia, Pasargadae in their honor. It has been identified in the ancient site conspicuous in the little valley now called Meshhed-Murghab, NE of the ancient Persepolis. Cyrus built here two palaces and founded temples; here he was buried; and his city became a place of pilgrimage and religious instruction for the Persians. Darius afterward moved the capital to Persepolis, but a great treasury remained in Pasargadae which fell into the hands of Alexander the Great when he conquered the Persians in 336 B.C. When Alexander returned from India he found that the tomb of Cyrus in Pasargadae had been looted. He ordered the perpetrators of this crime found and punished, and ordered the tomb to be restored. The architectural remains of the city, though in ruins, are important.

Pasiphaë (pa-sif'a-ē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Helios and Persa, and the sister of Aeëtes and Circe; like her sister she was a mistress of the black arts. She married Minos, king of Crete, and was the mother of Acacallis, Ariadne, Androgeus, Glaucus, Catreus, and Phaëdra, among others. Poseidon had sent a magnificent white bull to Minos, which the latter had promised to sacrifice to the god. But Minos hated to slay the handsome creature and sacrificed another bull in its place. Poseidon punished Minos for this breach of his oath by causing Pasiphaë to fall in love with the bull. Pasiphaë confessed her bizarre passion to Daedalus, the marvelous smith and builder who was living in Crete at that time. He built her a wooden image in the shape of a cow and made it possible for her to enter the structure and consort with the white bull. As a result of this union she produced the monstrous Minotaur, half-man and half-bull. To hide the disgraceful story of his wife's passion Minos asked Daedalus to construct a labyrinth, and in it the Minotaur and, some say, Pasiphaë as well, were hidden. When Minos later learned that Daedalus had helped Pasiphaë to gratify her unnatural lust he locked Daedalus up in the labyrinth also, but Pasiphaë freed him and, some say, helped him to escape from Crete. There was an oracle of Pasiphaë at Thalamæ in Laconia, where answers were given in dreams.

Pasiphaë. An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of the heavens, meaning "Shining on all."

Pasiteles (pā-sit'ē-lēz). Greek sculptor, a native of Magna Graecia, of the 1st century B.C. He acquired Roman citizenship (c87 B.C.) when the southern cities were admitted to that privilege. He followed the modern method of elaborating his work in clay, and wrote five books on artistic matters much quoted by Pliny. Pasiteles and his school affected a kind of pre-Phidian style. Many pseudo-archaic works are ascribed to them.

Patara (pat'ā-rā). In ancient geography, a city in Lycia, Asia Minor, situated on the coast. There are remains of a theater dating from the time of Hadrian.

Patavium (pā-tā'vi-um). [Modern name, Padova; English, Padua.] City in NE Italy, situated on the Meduacus Minor River, about 20 miles W of Venetia (Venice). According to legend, it was founded by Antenor, who came to this place when he was spared by the Greeks in the sack of Troy. It became a capital of the Veneti, and by 174 B.C. it was subject to Rome. It was the birthplace of the Roman historian Titus Livius (Livy), 59 B.C.–17 A.D., whose literary style the rival historian Asinius Pollio ridiculed as Patavinitas (Patavinity), and of Asconius Pedianus. (JJ)

Paterculus (pā-tēr'kū-lus), Caius Velleius. Roman soldier and historian, born c19 B.C.; died after 30 A.D. He is the author of an extant epitome of Roman history distinguished by lavish praise for Tiberius.

Paternò (pā-ter-nô'). Town on the island of Sicily, situated on the S slope of Mount Aetna. Nearby is the site of the ancient Hybla or Hybla Major.

Patizeithes (pa-ti-zī'thēz). Median magus who was left in charge of Cambyses' household when the latter went on his campaign against Egypt. Patizeithes plotted a revolt against Cambyses and carried it out by setting his brother Gaumata on the throne under the name of Smerdis. See Smerdis, False.

Patmos (pat'mos; Greek pāt'môs). [Also: Patino; Italian, Patmo.] Island of the Dodecanese, situated in the Aegean Sea, about 20 miles SW of Samos. It was colonized first by Dorians, who were later joined by Ionian colonists. In the Roman period the barren volcanic island was frequently used as a place of banishment for political exiles. There is a monastery bearing the name of Saint John the Divine, and a cave pointed out where, according to legend, the apostle saw the visions of the Apocalypse. Area of the island, about 22 square miles.

Patrae (pā'trē). [Modern name, Patras.] A city on the N coast of Achaea in the Peloponnesus, at the western end of the Gulf of Corinth. According to tradition, Eumelus first settled in the land and became king over a few subjects in a town called Aroë. Triptolemus visited him and taught him how to cultivate corn. Together, Eumelus and Triptolemus founded a second city, and named it Antheia after the son of Eumelus, who had been killed when he rashly tried to yoke the dragons of Triptolemus' chariot. A third city, Mesatis, was built between the two. Later Patreus, a descendant of Amyclas and Lacedaemon, came with Lacedaemonian followers. He drove out the inhabitants of the cities, built a wall which enclosed Aroë, and named his new city Patrae after himself. Many years before, after the Trojan War, Eurypylus, son of Euaemon, received a chest as his part of the spoils of victory. He was driven mad by the image of Dionysus inside the chest and went to Delphi to inquire concerning his malady. The priestess told him to find a people making a strange sacrifice and to settle there. Ultimately he came to Aroë, where he found the people sacrificing a youth and a maiden to Artemis, to propitiate her for the crime of Comaetho and Melanippus, who had polluted her shrine. Eurypylus understood that this was the strange sacrifice indicated by the priestess and settled in Aroë. The people recognized him as the leader foretold by an oracle and made him their king. Thereafter Eurypylus recovered his sanity and the Patraeans ceased to make human sacrifices to Artemis. The tomb of Eurypylus was in Patrae, and ever after the people of the city sacrificed to him as a hero at the festival of Dionysus. In Patrae there was an oracle of Demeter, where the priestesses gave answers to cure the sick by reading from a mirror lowered into Demeter's well. In the Peloponnesian War Patrae supported Athens. After occupation by Rome Augustus established a Roman colony at Patrae, which had been abandoned for some time. The city was, and still is, an important port for travelers from Italy.

Patrai (pā'tre) or Patras (pā-tras', pat'ras). See Patrae.

Patroclus (pā-trō'klus). In Greek legend, a native of Opus in Locris. His father was Menoetius. His mother is variously named as Sthenele, daughter of Acastus; Polymele, daughter of Peleus; Periapis, daughter of Pheres; or Philomele, daughter of Actor. As a youth he had accidentally slain a friend in a childish argument over jackstones, and had fled to the court of his uncle Peleus. There he became the intimate friend and inseparable companion of Achilles. He was a suitor of Helen and had sworn to defend and assist whomever she chose as her husband in the event that any ill came to him as a result of his marriage. Thus, he accompanied Achilles and his Myrmidons to Troy when the Greeks sailed to recapture Helen from Paris. On the way to Troy their ships landed in Mysia and the Myrmidons ravaged the country, under the impression that it was a part of the Troad. The king, Telephus, drove them back to their ships but was in his turn repelled and wounded by Achilles, with the staunch assistance of Patroclus. In the years of the war before Agamemnon. Patroclus withdrew from the fighting with him. However, they both kept close watch of the battle, and after a furious struggle in which Hector drove the Greeks back to their ships, they saw a chariot racing toward the ships bearing a wounded man. Patroclus was sent to find out who it was. "This for Patroclus was the beginning of evil." He learned that it was Machaon, the surgeon, and that the Greeks had just barely prevented Hector from setting fire to their ships. Nestor pleaded with Patroclus to urge Achilles to come to the aid of his beleaguered friends or, if he refused that, at least to send his Myrmidons under Patroclus' command to their aid. Patroclus started back to Achilles with the message. On the way he met Eurypylus, who had been wounded by Paris, and learned that Ajax, Diomedes, and Odysseus had also been wounded, and that Eurypylus thought nothing could now stop Hector the actual siege of Troy Patroclus took part with Achilles in raids and captures of many cities that were allied to Troy. In the tenth year of the war Achilles withdrew his ships and men from the Greek camp and threatened to sail home, because of his anger at from destroying the Greek host. Patroclus attended to his wound and sped back to Achilles with the news. In spite of his pleas to give up his anger Achilles refused to join the battle, but he did yield to Patroclus' request to borrow his armor and his Myrmidons so that Patroclus could lead them into battle. Achilles helped him into the armor and cautioned him to drive the Greeks away from the ships but not to go onto the plain, lest a victory by Patroclus tarnish the glory of Achilles. Patroclus entered the fray with a furious onslaught. Aided by Zeus, he drove the Trojans back to the plain and, in defiance of Achilles' command, pursued them to the walls of the city. There Apollo came to the Trojans' rescue. Patroclus slew Cebriones, Hector's brother and charioteer, and struggled with Hector over his body. Three times he attacked the walls, each time killing nine Trojans. The fourth time he attacked, Apollo smote him and stunned him, his helmet fell off and his armor was loosened. Euphorbus wounded him with his spear and Hector dealt him the death blow. With his dying breath Patroclus defied Hector, saying it was the gods who had slain him, not Hector. Hector stripped off Achilles' armor and donned it himself. A furious struggle then broke out for possession of Patroclus' body, but Achilles, who had learned of his dear friend's death from Antilochus, appeared on the Greek fortifications and so terrified the Trojans that Menelaus and Meriones, protected by the two Ajaxes, were able to carry his corpse to the Greek camp. Achilles was wild with grief over the death of his comrade, and Briseis, Achilles' captive princess, expressed his epitaph as she mourned him by remembering that he was ever gentle. Thetis preserved Patroclus' body from corruption, and made it whole of its wounds by dripping nectar through his nostrils, as Achilles, mourning, refused to bury the body. The ghost of Patroclus at last appeared to Achilles in a dream and asked him to bury the body so that the soul of Patroclus could rest. Prophesying the death of Achilles before Troy, the ghost of Patroclus asked that his ashes be placed in the same urn with those of Achilles. And so, when Achilles died, it was done.

Patroclus. Uninhabited island off the Cape of Sunium. It was named for Patroclus, an admiral in command of an Egyptian fleet that came to help the Athenians c267-263 B.C. There was an ancient fortification on the island.

Patrous (pā-trō'us). An epithet of Zeus, meaning "Paternal." This name was also applied to Apollo. In the Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus, the sons of Aristomachus (Temenus, Cresphontes, and the twin heirs of their brother Aristodemus), successfully won the region and divided it between them by lot. They set up three altars to Zeus Patrous and cast lots for the division of it between them. After they had cast lots they found signs lying on the altars where they had sacrificed. Temenus drew Argos, and the sign on his altar was a toad. The seer interpreted this to indicate that the followers of Temenus should remain in the city, for the toad loses its strength when it walks. The sons of Aristodemus drew Lacedaemon. On their altar was found a serpent, and the seer told them their people would be terrible in attack. On the altar of Cresphontes, who had won Messenia by a trick, a fox was found, and the seer said his people would be wily.

Paulus (pô'lus), Lucius Aemilius. Roman consul in 219 and 216 B.C. He was the colleague of Varro in the Roman defeat at Cannae, 216 B.C., where he was killed.

Paulus, Lucius Aemilius. [Surnamed Macedonicus, meaning "the Macedonian."] Roman general, born c229 B.C.; died 160 B.C. He was the son of Lucius Paulus, who took part in the defeat at Cannae (died 216 B.C.), and claimed descent from the philosopher Pythagoras. His sister Aemilia was the wife of Scipio Africanus. His wife Papiria was a daughter of the consul Maso. She bore him two sons, one of whom was adopted by Scipio Africanus and took the name Scipio (Publius Scipio Aemilianus). The other was Fabius Maximus. Aemilius divorced Papiria. There seemed to be no good reason for the divorce, and in explanation a story of another Roman who divorced his wife was told: This man's friends were surprised when they heard of the divorce; was his wife not discreet, was she not beautiful, did she not give him sons? In reply he held out his shoe and asked, "Is this not handsome? Is it not new? But no one of you can tell me where it pinches my foot." Afterward, Aemilius married again and had two more sons.

Aemilius was noted in Rome for his integrity and his courage. In 193 B.C. he was elected aedile over 12 competitors. He was made augur in 192 B.C. and devoted himself to the study of the ancient rituals, which he performed with the most precise regard for the forms. In military matters he was equally exact in observing the established customs and practices. He was sent to Spain (191 B.C.) as praetor and defeated the revolting barbarians, slaying about 30,000 of them and subduing 250 cities. He restored order and left the province (189 B.C.) having refused to enrich himself by as much as a penny through plunder of the province. In 182 B.C. he was elected consul and undertook an expedition against the Ligurians, whom he defeated, though their forces outnumbered his by five to one. Because the Ligurians formed a buffer between the Gauls and the Romans he did not treat them harshly. He seized their ships in which they had been making piratical raids, but restored the captives he had taken. When he returned to Rome he was not made consul again, as he expected to be, and gave himself up to his duties as augur and to the education of his sons, the elder of whom he introduced to the men of affairs in Rome.

The Romans had been successful in their wars on all fronts save that with Perseus, king of Macedonia. He defeated them in several engagements, though he was not considered an especially skillful general. The Romans felt disgraced by the defeats and sought a new commander for the war. Aemilius was urged to run as consul, but declined at first on the grounds of his age, and perhaps out of pique at not being chosen consul again when he returned from his successful Ligurian campaign. But he was at length persuaded to stand for the office and was chosen consul in 168 B.C. for the second time. Now in his sixties, he became commander of the Roman forces in the war against Perseus. It is said that when he went home after being made consul he found his little daughter in tears, and learned she wept for the death of her "little Perseus," a pet dog. Aemilius knew this for a favorable omen. Before he set out to join the army he made a speech to the Romans, in which he announced that the first time he became consul he had sought the office. This time he had become consul because the Roman people needed a general. Therefore he cherished no feelings of gratitude for the office. On the contrary, if the people had confidence in him they must not attempt to tell him what to do. All he required of them was that they vote the necessary supplies and money to carry on the war, for if they sought to command their commander his campaigns would be as ridiculous and as unsuccessful as those of his predecessors. Such frank speaking greatly impressed the Romans. They voted what he asked for. He joined the Roman army near Mount Olympus in Greece, about which Perseus had set up his camp, and by an encircling movement prepared to attack Perseus at Pydna (168 B.C.). That night the moon changed color many times and finally disappeared. Some say the Romans, according to their custom, tried to call her light back by clashing bronze utensils and by holding up many torches toward the heavens. Others say Aemilius, a well-educated man, knew an eclipse of the moon would take place, and had forewarned his men so that they would not take it as an evil omen. But the Macedonians were terrified, and rumor spread rapidly through their ranks that it portended the eclipse of a king. Aemilius sacrificed 11 heifers to the moon. At day-break he sacrificed 20 oxen to Hercules without getting favorable omens for the coming battle. When the twenty-first victim was sacrificed the omens were favorable, on condition that the Romans did not initiate the attack. Aemilius vowed hecatombs and games to Hercules if he should be successful. During the day he occupied himself about his camp, waiting until afternoon, when the sun would be in the eyes of the enemy and not blinding his own men. Careful not to defy the omens produced by the sacrificial victims, he did not take the offensive, but tricked the Macedonians into beginning the attack. His strategy was spectacularly successful: 25,000 Macedonians were slain, while he lost only between 80 and 100 of his own men. Perseus was routed, thus ending the Third Macedonian War. Perseus fled to Pella, later sailing to Samothrace where he took refuge in the temple of the Dioscuri with his wife and children. But his enraged Macedonians seized him and themselves gave him into the hands of Aemilius. After the victory at Pydna, Aemilius rested his army, while he traveled about Greece. One of his journeys was to Delphi, where he set up a statue of himself on the pillar Perseus had raised for a statue of himself. He visited Olympia and held games, offered sacrifices, gave feasts, and won the admiration of the Greeks. Of the plunder taken from Perseus, he kept none himself, but sent it all to Rome except for some books he allowed his sons to take from the library of Perseus. After freeing the Macedonian cities and exacting tribute from them for Rome (less than they had paid to their own king), Aemilius marched into Epirus and, on orders from the Roman Senate, allowed his soldiers to plunder it. The sack of Epirus did not satisfy them, for it yielded but little. They thought with envy of the rich treasure that had gone to Rome, and were ready to join in a vote to deny Aemilius a triumph when he returned. However, a veteran, covered with wounds, made a speech in honor of Aemilius, the soldiers changed their minds, and he was voted a triumph. It was celebrated in November, 167 B.C. Three days were required for the procession carrying the captured armor and spoils from the victory of Pydna to pass. Perseus, who had begged to be spared the humiliation of marching in the procession, was scorned by Aemilius for his cowardice. Aemilius pointed out one way in which he could avoid being exhibited as a captive, but Perseus could not bring himself to take his own life at that time. He marched in the procession with his two sons and his daughter, following his own chariot and captured armor and accompanied by many captive Macedonian nobles. At the end of the procession came Aemilius, clad in a purple robe, carrying a spray of laurel, and riding in his war chariot. His triumph was held in the midst of personal disaster. Five days before it was celebrated the elder of the two sons by his second wife died. Three days after the triumph the second son died. Aemilius took this as an evil sent by the gods to balance the good fortune he had met with in war. The Romans continued to reward him. In 164 B.C. he was made censor, a post of great honor because of its power over the senators and life of the Romans. Four years later, after a brief illness, he died, having enjoyed many honors from the Republic, and leaving to it two sons, one of whom, Scipio the Younger, destroyed Carthage (146 B.C.) and became the most influential Roman of his day.

Pausanias (pô-sā'ni-as). Son of the Spartan king Cleombrotus and nephew of Leonidas. He was a Spartan general. When Leonidas I, the Spartan king, died at Thermopylae, Cleombrotus, his brother, became regent for Pleistarchus, the son of Leonidas; Cleombrotus died in 480 B.C. and Pausanias became regent. At the earnest request of the Athenians, when Mardonius occupied Attica for a second time (479 B.C.), the Spartans sent out Pausanias, in command of a force of Spartans, to the aid of the Athenians. At Plataea he commanded the Spartans and Tegeans, the other Greek forces having withdrawn according to plan, in a battle against vastly superior numbers of Persians under the command of Mardonius. Pausanias and his Spartans and Tegeans won a glorious victory (479 B.C.) Mardonius was killed in the battle and it was suggested to Pausanias that he behead and crucify the body of Mardonius to avenge Leonidas, whose body had been mutilated in this manner by the Persians after the Battle of Thermopylae. Pausanias replied to this suggestion that such acts were more suited to barbarians than to Greeks, and even in barbarians were detestable. Moreover, he considered Leonidas to have been amply avenged by the Persian lives that were taken, not only at Plataea, but in his own battle at Thermopylae. Pausanias ordered the booty of the Persian camp to be gathered. A tenth part of it was dedicated to Apollo at Delphi. Other portions were offered to the gods at Olympia and on the Isthmus. The rest was divided among the soldiers according to their merits. Pausanias himself received ten of every kind of thing found in the Persian camp—women, horses, camels, money, vessels, etc. Herodotus says that when Pausanias came upon the rich war-tent of Mardonius, he commanded the Persian captive cooks and bakers to prepare a banquet in the Persian manner. When he saw the rich couches, covered with gold and silver, tables inlaid with the same precious metals, and the feast that was spread on them, he ordered his own men to prepare a Spartan meal. Then he called the Greek generals to see both meals. He told them he wanted them to see the folly of the barbarians who, when they had such fare as this, had come to rob the Greeks of their poverty. After Plataea Pausanias led his forces against Thebes, because the Thebans had made common cause with the Persians, and demanded the surrender of the Theban chiefs whom he held responsible for the alliance of Thebes with the Persians. The Thebans refused to give these men up and the city was attacked. Thereupon two Theban chiefs, Timagenidas and Attaginus, volunteered to surrender to Pausanias to spare the city further siege. But when agreement was made with Pausanias, Attaginus fled and escaped, and sent his children to Pausanias in his place. Pausanias, however, refused to hold them guilty, for he did not consider the children responsible for their father's offense. But the other men surrendered by the Thebans he took to Corinth and slew. In 478 B.C. he continued the war against Persia, took Cyprus and, when he was besieging Byzantium (which he subsequently took, 477 B.C.), he set up a great bowl as an offering at the entrance to the Euxine Sea. Later, Pausanias seems to have nourished an ambition to become tyrant of Greece, and to this end he seems to have conducted a treasonable correspondence with Xerxes. He was recalled to Sparta for trial but was acquitted of the charges. He then returned to Byzantium and seized the Straits, but was driven out (c475 B.C.) by the Athenians under Cimon. Returning to Sparta, he plotted a revolt of the helots. This was exposed at the last moment and he was forced to flee. He took refuge in the sanctuary of Athena on the Acropolis of Sparta, and was starved to death there by order of the ephors as a punishment for his treason (c466 B.C.).

Pausanias. Spartan king, colleague of Agis I; reigned 445–426 and 408–394 B.C. He brought an end to the civil war in Attica that followed the defeat of Athens in the Peloponnesian War, and helped the Athenians to restore their democracy (403 B.C.). He was known to be an opponent of the Spartan general Lysander. In a Spartan attack on Thebes (395 B.C.) Pausanias marching from the south, was to meet Lysander marching from the north, at Haliartus. Lysander arrived first and was forced into battle by the Haliartians and was killed. By the time Pausanias arrived an Athenian force had come to the aid of the Thebans, and Pausanias felt his position was hopeless. He recovered the body of Lysander and then asked for a burial truce, thereby admitting defeat. Afterward, the Spartans accused him of betraying Lysander and of refusing to fight, and condemned him to death. However, since he did not return to Sparta, the sentence could not be carried out, and he died an exile in Tegea.

Pausanias. Greek geographer and traveler, active in the middle of the 2nd century A.D. He was a native of Lydia, and traveled widely in Greece, Macedonia, Asia, Palestine and Egypt. Ultimately he settled in Rome and wrote his Periegesis, or Description of Greece, in ten books. The ground covered includes Attica, Megara, Corinth, Philius, Argolis, Aegina and the neighboring islands, Laconia, Messenia, Elis, Olympia, Achaea, Arcadia, Boeotia, Phocis, and Locris. Some of what he describes he actually saw himself, some he read about in books that may have been as much as 300 years old at the time he wrote, and some of his information he gleaned from talking to the natives of the regions he visited. Some critics have rather scorned the work of Pausanias because it is unsystematic, diffuse and even—in a few cases—inaccurate. However, the material he preserved in his work from the ancient writings and his own observations, and the information he picked up, make his work a rich source of information about religious cults and mythology; it provides the most complete clue existing to the monuments of art and architecture of ancient Greece; it contains historical data that might otherwise have been lost; and its topographical notices are a primary source for scholars and archaeologists. Heinrich Schliemann, the great German archaeologist and discoverer of the rich Circle Graves of Mycenae, was led to the site from reading Pausanias.

century B.C. He was a pupil of Pamphilus and a contemporary of Apelles. He made a special study of foreshortening, and was the first to paint ceiling-panels. A famous picture was the Stephanoplocus or Stephanopolis, painted from Glycera, a flower girl of Sicyon. He painted Love, without his bow and arrows and carrying a lyre, in the Tholos (Round House) at Epidaurus, and also a picture of Drunkenness staring at himself from the bottom of his cup. He was especially attracted by the possibilities of encaustic (the technique of using heated wax to apply colors on stone or wood), and developed it to a high degree of perfection.

Pax (paks). In Roman mythology, the goddess of peace. She was the personification of both civil peace and peace among nations. She was a fairly late addition to the pantheon, almost unknown before Augustus; but her cult is credited with fostering the popularity of the empire.

Paxos (pak'sos, päk-sôs'). [Also: Paxoi.] Small island of the Ionian Islands, about eight miles SE of Corfu. It is noted for the production of olive oil. According to a famous story found in Plutarch and mentioned by Rabelais and Milton among others, it was from Paxos that mariners heard the great voice announcing "Pan is dead."

Peace, The. Comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 421 B.C. and awarded the second prize. Its aim was to commend the anticipated peace of Nicias.

Peacock. This bird was sacred to Hera. She set the 100 eyes of Argus, the "All-seeing," in the peacock's tail as a reminder of the murder of Argus by Hermes.

Pedaeus (pe-dē'us). Named by Homer (Iliad) as an illegitimate son of Antenor, who was raised by Antenor's wife Theano as tenderly as her own sons. He was slain in the Trojan War by Meges.

Pedasiens (pē-dā'shānz). A people of Caria, dwelling above Halicarnassus. According to Herodotus, when any evil was about to befall them, the priestess of Athena grew a long beard. The Pedasiens alone, of all Caria, resisted subjugation by Persia but were overcome in the end.

Pedasmus (pēd'ā-sus). A Trojan, named in the Iliad as the twin of Aesepus. See Aesepus.

Pedasmus. A town in Messenia, which Homer described as "vine-clad." It was one of the cities Agamemnon promised to Achilles if he would give up his quarrel and join the Greeks in the battle to defend their ships.

Pedasmus. A town in the Troad, near the Sanniois River, that was sacked by Achilles.

Pedasmus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a horse captured by Achilles in the sack of Thebes in Cilicia, and yoked to his immortal horses. Patroclus borrowed him, along with Achilles' armor, when he led the Myrmidons against Hector. Pedasmus, being mortal, was slain by Sarpedon.

Pegae (pē'jē). A spring in Mysia. The nymph of the spring fell in love with Hylas, when he stooped to draw water, and drew him into the spring to dwell with her.

Pegasus (peg'ā-sus). In Greek mythology, the winged horse that sprang from the blood of Medusa when she was slain by Perseus. His father was Poseidon. Athena gave him to the Muses and with a stroke of his hoof he caused the poetically inspiring fountain Hippocrene to well forth, on Mount Helicon in Boeotia. Bellerophon, on the advice of a seer, sought Pegasus when he undertook to slay the Chimaera for Iobates, king of Lycia. Some say the seer told Bellerophon to go and sleep in the temple of Athena, if he would find the winged horse. Bellerophon followed his advice, and dreamed that the goddess appeared and spoke to him. When he woke he found a golden bridle at his feet. Carrying this, he found Pegasus drinking at the Pirene spring in Corinth. He threw the bridle over the horse's neck. Thus Pegasus was tamed and willingly carried Bellerophon to hunt the Chimaera. Because he could fly above it on the back of Pegasus, Bellerophon was able to kill the Chimaera. Later Bellerophon sought to fly to the heavens. Zeus sent a gadfly that stung Pegasus. He reared in pain and Bellerophon was hurled to earth. Pegasus went to Olympus and was stabled with the steeds of Zeus. Ultimately his image was placed among the stars as a constellation.

Pegasus. An ancient northern constellation. The figure represents the forward half of a winged horse. The center of the constellation is about 20 degrees north of the equator, and four bright stars in it form a large square.

Peitho (pī'thō). In Greek mythology, a cult title of Aphrodite, and also a separate, lesser deity, attendant on Aphrodite, interpreted as a personification of persuasion, especially to love.

Pelagon (pel'ā-gon). Named in the Iliad as one of Sarpedon's Lycian comrades in the Trojan War. He helped Sarpedon away from the battle when he was wounded by Tlepolemus, son of Heracles, and it was he who drew out the spear that had been driven into Sarpedon's thigh.

Pelasgi (pe-laz'ji). [Also: Pelasgians.] Ancient people believed by the Greeks to have been widely spread over Greece and the coasts and islands of the Aegean Sea and the Mediterranean generally. All accounts of the Pelasgi now available are legendary, and their ethnological position is uncertain. According to mythology, they were sprung from Pelasgus and were the original inhabitants of Argos. The Athenians claimed that Pelasgians were ancient dwellers in Attica, and that they built the earliest fortification wall of the Acropolis, which was called the "Pelasgian wall." Pelasgians were also supposed to have lived in the Troad, south of Mount Ida, and are mentioned in the Iliad as allies of Troy in the Trojan War. Archaeological research has indicated that three or four, or more, groups of pre-Hellenic migrants in the Aegean area preceded the first Greeks in Greece, but it is not now possible to identify the Pelasgians with any one of these groups rather than another, nor is there any way of inferring their linguistic affinities. Perhaps the historical Greeks lumped together under this term a number of non-Greek-speaking, "aboriginal" populations in the lands bordering the Aegean. (JJ)

Pelasia (pe-laz'ji-ā). Ancient name of Arcadia, said to have been called this after Pelasgus, the first king of the area.

Pelasgiotis (pe-laz'ji-ō'tis). In ancient geography, a division of C Thessaly, Greece.

Pelagis (pe-laz'jis). Epithet of Demeter, from her sanctuary at Argos, named for Pelasgus, who is said to have founded the sanctuary. Pelasgus (pe-laz'gus). In Greek mythology, according to some accounts, the first man, a son of Earth who sprang from the soil of Arcadia and taught those who followed him to build huts and sew tunics of pigskin. He was the father of that Lycaon whose impieties caused Zeus to send the flood. Others say Pelasgus was the son of Zeus and Niobe, and the founder of the Pelasgian race. Still others, that he was the son of Phoroneus, and thus the grandson of the river-god Inachus, and that he was the founder of the Pelasgian division of the Greeks.

Pelegon (pē'le-gon). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a son of Periboea and the river-god of the Axios River in Paeonia. He was famed for his powerful spear, and as the father of Asteropaeus.

Peleus (pē'lūs, pē'lē-us). In Greek legend, a king of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was a son of Aeacus and Endeis, and the brother of Telamon and the half-brother of Phocus. He was born on the island of Aegina. Peleus and Telamon were jealous of Phocus because he was their father's favorite and excelled at athletic games. Acting on the advice and encouragement of their mother, they challenged Phocus to an athletic contest in the course of which Phocus was killed. Some say he was struck by a discus and then beheaded with an ax. The brothers were accused of the murder and fled. Peleus went to Phthia, where he was purified by Eurytion, the adopted son of King Actor. He married Polymela, Actor's daughter, and received one-third of the kingdom. But he was again forced to flee for having accidentally killed Eurytion in the Calydonian Hunt, of which they were both participants. He went to Iolcus and was again purified; this time it was Acastus, a son of Pelias, who performed the rite. In Iolcus, Cretheis, wife of Acastus, falsely accused Peleus of making improper advances to her, and when Polymela learned of the charges she hanged herself. Acastus, who believed his wife's accusations against Peleus, challenged him to a hunting contest. Peleus had a magic sword made by Daedalus, and with it he soon killed many beasts. Acastus claimed that they were his victims but Peleus proved that he had slain the animals by producing their tongues, which he had had the forethought to cut out and keep to one side. During the night Acastus stole and hid Peleus' sword, and left with his followers, but the sword was restored to Peleus by Chiron, the centaur, who also protected him from other centaurs who were minded to murder Peleus. Peleus then departed to Chiron's cave. Here a messenger from Hera came to him to tell him that he was to marry Thetis, the sea-goddess who had scorned the amorous advances of Zeus. Zeus had given up his pursuit of Thetis when he learned that she would bear a son who would be greater than his father, but to punish her for rejecting him he vowed that she would not marry a god but would be yoked to a mortal. Chiron warned Peleus that Thetis would be a reluctant bride, and advised Peleus to seize her as she took her midday nap in a cave on the shores of a small island off Thessaly. Peleus hid behind a myrtle bush near the cave, and watched as the naked goddess rode on the back of a dolphin to the island. When she had entered the cave and fallen asleep he followed Chiron's advice, seized the sleeping goddess and held on to her manfully as she changed herself into fire, water, a lion, and a serpent in her attempt to escape. At last she yielded. Peleus and Thetis were married near Chiron's cave on Mount Pelion as the gods, seated on their twelve thrones, looked on approvingly, the Muses sang, and the 50 Nereids who accompanied Thetis danced. The gods gave wedding gifts: an ashen spear, golden armor, and a pair of immortal horses, Balaus and Xanthus. The only one of the immortals who was not invited to the wedding was Eris, goddess of discord, and this deliberate slight led to the interminable struggle and disaster of the Trojan War, for Eris hurled the Apple of Discord among the wedding guests which led to the Judgment of Paris and the Trojan War. Peleus and Thetis passed through Trachis, where Peleus' herds were attacked by a wolf sent by the mother of Phocus to avenge her son's murder, but Thetis turned the wolf to stone with a glance. They next proceeded to Iolcus, which Peleus captured, and where he killed Acastus and his lying wife, Cretheis, and hacked her body to pieces. He then led an army of his Myrmidons into the city. Some say the Myrmidons had fled with him from Aegina, others say they sprang from an army of ants supplied by Zeus. Thetis bore seven sons to Peleus. Each of the first six she held in the flames to burn away their mortal parts and sent the immortal remainder to Olympus. Peleus happened to see her as she was performing this rite on their seventh son, Achilles. He screamed in fright. Thetis dropped the child, left Peleus and returned to her home in the sea. (The best known tale is that Thetis plunged the infant Achilles into the Styx and made every part of him invulnerable except his heel.) Peleus never saw her again, although she permitted him to hear her voice from time to time. Peleus accompanied Heracles on his voyage to fetch the girdle of the Amazon queen, and again when Heracles attacked and sacked Troy to punish Laomedon. He also accompanied Jason on the voyage of the Argo to Colchis. He was too old to fight at Troy, but he gave his ashen spear, golden armor, and immortal horses to his son Achilles when the latter set off for the war. Peleus outlived his famous son, who was mightier than his father as had been prophesied, and he outlived his grandson, Neoptolemus. According to some accounts, although old and weak he protected and preserved the life of Neoptolemus' bastard son by Andromache, after the Trojan War, when Menelaus and his daughter Hermione would have killed Andromache and her child out of jealousy. In his old age, and after he had been expelled from Iolcus by the sons of Acastus, Thetis spoke to Peleus, advised him to return to the cave where he had first mastered her, and await her there. She promised that she would come and confer immortality on him, and carry him away to live with her under the sea. But, according to some accounts, Peleus, although he went to the island as instructed, became impatient. In quest of news of Neoptolemus, he set out across the sea, was caught and shipwrecked in a great storm, died and was buried on an island near Euboea before Thetis had a chance to make him immortal.

Pelias (pē'li-as). In Greek legend, a son of Tyro and Poseidon, twin-born with Neleus. The twins were exposed on a mountain to die but were rescued. A horse belonging to the rescuer kicked Pelias and bruised his face, whence his name, which means "livid" or "black and blue." When the twins grew up they learned that Tyro was their real mother, and proceeded to avenge her for the mistreatment she had received at the hands of Sidero, her stepmother. They found her before the altar of Hera, where she had gone for sanctuary, and Pelias slew her. For this act in the temple of Hera, Pelias incurred the anger of Hera and later suffered from the goddess' displeasure. It is also said that Pelias withheld sacrifices to Hera, which made her the more resolved to punish him. Tyro married Cretheus, founder and king of Iolcus, and he adopted Pelias and Neleus. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus quarreled. Pelias forced Neleus into exile. But when he was warned by an oracle that a descendant of Aeolus would cause his death, Pelias killed all the descendants of Aeolus he could find except his half-brother Aeson, a son of Cretheus and Tyro and the rightful heir to the throne. He kept Aeson as a prisoner. Pelias married Anaxibia, a daughter of Bias, or Phylomache, a daughter of Amphion, and became the father of Acastus and several daughters. Among the latter was Alcestis, who had many suitors. According to some accounts, Pelias gave her to Admetus of Pherae, because he alone of the suitors met the conditions set up by Pelias: to yoke a lion and a wild boar to his chariot and drive them around a race-course. But others say Jason arranged the marriage of Alcestis and Admetus. A second oracle warned Pelias to beware of a man wearing one sandal. When, therefore, a youth clad in a leopard's skin and wearing but one sandal appeared before him Pelias resolved to destroy him. On learning that the youth was Jason, his nephew, he agreed to resign the throne to him, but said he was troubled by the ghost of Phrixus, which demanded proper burial and the return of the Golden Fleece, now in Colchis, to Hellas. He assured Jason he would give up the throne once these things were accomplished. He did this in the expectation that Jason would never return from the dangerous errand. Jason accepted his proposal and departed with a band of heroes and demigods to fetch the Fleece. After some time had passed Pelias was sure that Jason had perished. He was about to kill Aeson, father of Jason, but allowed him to commit suicide by drinking bull's blood. Aeson's wife thereupon uttered a curse on Pelias and hanged herself. (According to other accounts, aged Aeson was still living when Jason and Medea returned, and was restored to youthful vigor by Medea's magic.) Pelias murdered the young son of Aeson. Jason, however, returned to Iolcus with Medea and the Fleece. Medea tricked the daughters of Pelias into murdering their father. She appeared to Pelias and told him Hecate had empowered her to rejuvenate him. She transformed an old ram into a skipping lamb to demonstrate her powers. Pelias was convinced and allowed himself to be drugged into a deep sleep. His daughters, instructed by Medea, cut his throat, dismembered his body, and cast the pieces into a cauldron. But Medea added no magic herbs to the brew as she had done with the ram, and the daughters of Pelias unwittingly brought about his miserable end.

Pelides (pē-lī'dēz). An epithet meaning "Son of Peleus," applied especially to Achilles, and sometimes to his son Neoptolemus.

Pelike/Pelopia

Pelike (pel'i-kē). In ancient Greece, a large vase resembling the hydria, but with the curve between the neck and the body less marked, and having only two handles, attached to the neck at or near the rim and extending to the body.

Pelion (pē'li-on). Mountain in Thessaly, N Greece, near the coast, SE of Ossa. It was the legendary home of the centaurs, and known especially as the dwelling place of Chiron, the wise centaur who was tutor to Achilles. It was near his cave on Mount Pelion, that Peleus and the sea-nymph Thetis were married. The two mythical giants known as the Aloidae piled Mount Ossa on Olympus and then Pelion on Ossa in their attempt to reach heaven.

Pella (pel'a). In ancient geography, the capital of Macedonia (c400-167 B.C.). It was the birthplace of Alexander the Great.

Pellegrino (pel-lā-grē'nō), Monte. See Ercta.

Pellene (pe-lē'nē). In ancient geography, a town in E Achaea, on the borders of Sicyon. The people of the town said it was named for the Titan Pallas, but the Argives claimed it was named for Pellen, a son of Argive Phorbus. The town was one of the 12 towns occupied by the Achaeans after the Ionians left the region. Pellene was on the lower slopes of a hill, and boasted an ivory-and-gold image of Athena in the temple, that was said to have been made by Phidias before he made the famous statue of Athena in the Parthenon. The Pellenians claimed that a deep shrine beneath the pedestal of this statue was filled with damp air, and this dampness preserved the ivory of the image. Behind the temple was a grove of Artemis Savior, and nearby was a sanctuary of Dionysus Lampteros (Torch-bearer). The Pellenians held a festival in his honor, during which they took blazing brands to the sanctuary at night, and set bowls of wine throughout the city. The Pellenians also held games in honor of Apollo Theoxenus (God of Strangers), whose shrine was in their city. In addition, there were sanctuaries of Artemis and Ilithyia. Pellene fell under the dominion of Alexander the Great, who appointed one of their own sons despot over them. Thereafter the Pellenians would not even mention his name, though he had won two prizes at the Isthmian games and four at the Olympian, because he had permitted the conqueror to set him up as a tyrant over his own countrymen.

Pelopia (pe-lō-pī'a) or Pelopea (-pē'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Thyestes, and the niece of Atreus. She was separated from her father in the quarrels between Thyestes and Atreus, and went to Sicyon where she became a priestess. Thyestes had been advised by the oracle at Delphi to father a son by his own daughter, in order to get revenge on Atreus (who had killed three of Thyestes' sons and served them to Thyestes at a banquet). He found Pelopia sacrificing to Athena, at night, attacked and ravished her. She did not know who her attacker was in the darkness, but she managed to steal his sword, and hid it in the temple of Athena. Thyestes fled. Shortly afterward, Atreus came to Sicyon in search of Thyestes, because the oracle had ordered him to bring Thyestes back from exile. Atreus saw Pelopia, fell in love with her, and asked the king, thinking she was the king's daughter, for her hand in marriage. The king, Thesprotus, was anxious to have Atreus for an ally, and did not tell him that Pelopia was not his own daughter, but gladly gave his consent to the marriage. Pelopia later bore a son, the child of Thyestes, and exposed him on the mountain to die, but he was found by shepherds and brought to Atreus. Atreus thought Pelopia had temporarily taken leave of her senses after giving birth to her son, and brought up the child, Aegisthus, under the impression that it was his own son. A few years later, Aegisthus was ordered by Atreus to kill Thyestes, who had fallen into his hands again. Thyestes escaped the young boy's attack (some say Aegisthus was only seven years old at this time), but recognized the sword in his hand as the one which had been taken from him the night he attacked Pelopia. When he learned from Aegisthus that the sword had been given him by his mother he asked Aegisthus to bring Pelopia to him. She came, and recognized her father joyfully, but on learning that the sword she had stolen from her ravisher was her own father's, and that he was the father of her son, she plunged the infamous sword into her breast and died.

Pelopidae (pe-lop'i-dē). A name for the descendants of Pelops, applied especially to Atreus, Thyestes, Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Orestes.

Pelopidas (pe-lop'i-das). Theban general, killed at Cynoscephalae, Thessaly, 364 B.C. He was the great and good friend of the Theban patriot Epaminondas, and like him hated the Spartan overlords of the city, but unlike Epaminondas, Pelopidas went to Athens as an exile. Aware that Thebes could not be freed by force, he resolved to free it by guile. With six friends, all disguised as hunters, he crossed Mount Cithaeron and mingled with the Theban peasants who returned within the city walls at nightfall. In this manner the conspirators entered the city safely. Another conspirator hid them in his house. Still another conspirator invited the Spartan polemarchs to his house for a great banquet, at which, as a special lure, he promised the presence of some beautiful women in whom the Spartans were interested. In the course of the banquet, it is said, a letter was delivered to one of the Spartan polemarchs, but he, enjoying himself, said he would tend to business the next day, and put it away unread. The letter advised him that a conspiracy was afoot. The Spartans called for the women who had been promised them. When all the attendants had left the room the women, heavily veiled, were brought in and seated themselves beside the Spartans. They were invited to lift their veils by the amorous Spartans. As they did so the "women" buried daggers in the bodies of their hated Spartan masters, for the women were Pelopidas and his six companions. Following the deaths of the polemarchs, Pelopidas and his friends went to the houses of other Spartan leaders and killed them, and freed the political prisoners. Those Theban patriots who hated the Spartans but had felt the time was not ripe for action, now joined Pelopidas and the revolution was successfully proclaimed. Athenian volunteers who had helped in securing the overthrow of Sparta were afterwards repudiated by Athens. But in this manner Thebes was liberated (379 B.C.). Later, Pelopidas was one of the Theban generals in the army of Epaminondas.

The night before the battle of Leuctra, some say, a vision came to Pelopidas as he slept. Nearby his tent were the tombs of the Leuctrides, daughters of a local hero, Scedasus. Pelopidas dreamed that he saw the Leuctrides crying at their tombs and cursing the Spartans. Scedasus appeared to him and commanded him to sacrifice a maiden with auburn hair to the Leuctrides if he wished to defeat the Spartans in battle. The vision disturbed Pelopidas. Next day he related it to the generals and seers of the army. Some said such a maiden should be sacrificed at once, and cited the sacrifice of Macaria, daughter of Heracles, to bring victory against Eurystheus, and that of Menoeceus, son of Creon, for the defense of Thebes. Others held that such sacrifices would never be demanded by gods. While they were discussing the matter, a filly with a shining red coat broke away from the herd and ran through the camp. One of the soothsayers who was discussing the vision of Pelopidas cried out to him that here was the sacred victim, a maiden sent by the gods to be sacrificed. All agreed to accept the gift of the gods. They wreathed the head of the colt with flowers, led her to the tombs of the Leuctrides, prayed, and sacrificed her. On that same day, the Thebans overcame the Spartans at Leuctra (371 B.C.). Pelopidas brought Thessaly under Theban protection and arranged an alliance with Macedonia, and took hostages, including young Philip, who was to become the ruler of Macedonia. In 368 B.C., when he was on his way home, he stopped at the camp of Alexander of Pherae who, without his knowledge, had become an ally of Athens. Alexander detained him, but he was released through the intervention of Epaminondas in command of a Theban army. In 364 B.C. he started for Thessaly again at the head of an expedition. Before he left there was an eclipse of the sun, an evil omen. At Cynoscephalae (364 B.C.) he defeated the forces of Alexander of Pherae. However, in the moment of victory he happened to spy Alexander himself, and rashly rushed against him. Alexander escaped to his guards and Pelopidas, pursuing recklessly, was killed.

side and the Peloponnesian confederacy under the lead of Sparta and its allies (Boeotia, Phocis, Megara, and others) on the other. Argos, bound by treaty with Sparta, remained neutral. The war was carried on from 431 to 404 B.C. The Peloponnesian War actually consisted of two wars, the Archidamean War (431-421 B.C.) and the Deceleian War (414-404 B.C.) and the uneasy Peace of Nicias between them; the first war is named for Archidamus, then king of Sparta, the second for Decelea, a town in Attica whose seizure by the Spartans signaled the beginning of open warfare once more. Thucydides, in tracing the causes and history of the Peloponnesian War, relates that the Corcyraean colony of Epidamnus, weakened by civil war, appealed to Corcyra for help. Corcyra refused aid. The Epidamnians went to the oracle at Delphi and were instructed to deliver their city to Corinth. The Corinthians agreed to accept and protect Epidamnus, partly because of the oracle, but mostly because they hated the insolent (as they considered them) Corcyraeans. This led to a war between Corinth and Corcyra, in which Corinth suffered defeat. Later Corcyra arranged an alliance with Athens, and when Corinth attacked Corcyra, Athens sent a fleet to the assistance of the Corcyraeans. At about the same time (432 B.C.) revolt broke out in Potidaea, a Corinthian colony, but an Athenian city by forced alliance. The Potidaeans were aided by the Corinthians, while Sparta refused to arbitrate the disputes with Athens as Pericles offered to do. These two outbreaks emphasized the friction between Sparta, of whom Corinth was the chief naval ally, and Athens, and added to the fear of Sparta, a land power, of the growing power of Athens, a sea power. Embassies went back and forth between the two powers. The Spartans demanded that the Athenians drive out the curse of the goddess. This was a reference to the curse laid on the Alcmaeonidae, whose ancestors had impiously slain the followers of Cylon (c632 B.C.) who had been promised safe conduct if they withdrew from the altar in the Acropolis of Athens. The curse was that the Alcmaeonidae were to be exiled from Athens. For a time they were exiles, but they had gradually returned. The Spartans pretended that they were upholding the honor of the gods in their demand but in actuality it was a device to get rid of Pericles, the most powerful man in Athens and a member of the Alcmaeonidae. By submitting this demand on religious grounds they hoped to win allies. The Athenians answered their demand by ordering the Spartans to drive out the curse of Taenarus. This referred to the Spartan slaying of the Spartan regent Pausanias (c466 B.C.). He had taken refuge in the Bronze House (sanctuary of Athena) on the Acropolis at Sparta when he realized that the Spartans were about to seize him for his intrigues against Sparta with the Persian king. The Spartans barricaded him in the temple and starved him to death. It was called the curse of Taenarus because it was there that Pausanias was betrayed by his messenger. In this instance it was the Spartans who had dishonored the gods. All these incidents and demands were pretexts. Basically the Peloponnesian War resulted from the reaching of the saturation point in the alliances of both of the chief Greek powers, Athens and Sparta. Athens had built up, following the Persian Wars at the beginning of the 5th century B.C., a great league of city-states around the Aegean Sea, while Sparta had developed a confederacy of land powers covering the Peloponnesus and part of northern Greece. With her fleet, Athens could shut off the food supply of the Spartans. It was thus the clash of a sea power with a land power; Athenian strategy, determined initially by Pericles, was to avoid land battles and to wait for Sparta's military efforts and Athenian raids to exhaust her; Sparta would try to starve Athens out, besieging her, laying the countryside to waste, and alienating her allies. To say that the struggle was between oligarchic Sparta and her allies on one side and democratic Athens and her allies on the other has more ideological than actual significance; in truth, both ruled absolutely and solely for their own benefit, and both were subject to dissension caused by enemies within who were opposed to their ruling system.

The war began over economic measures taken by Athens against Megara. The Megarians appealed to Sparta, and in the winter of 432-431 B.C. Sparta declared war.

Attica was invaded in the spring of 431, but the inhabitants of the countryside were removed to within the walls of the Athens-Piraeus area (the "long walls" from Athens to the sea), and all that Sparta accomplished was to destroy some crops and farms. In 430-429 plague struck crowded Athens and many died, Pericles among them. Lesbos revolted, 428, but by 427 the revolt had been suppressed by the Athenians. An Athenian fleet on its way to Sicily was driven by a storm into Pylus harbor (Navarino, as it is known in later history); the general Demosthenes seized the city as a base for operations against Sparta. Sparta in turn sent troops to Sphacteria, an island in Pylus bay, and they besieged the Athenians. Cleon, who had replaced Pericles as the popular leader in Athens, was sent to assist Demosthenes, and with the help of Messenian allies, bitter enemies of Sparta, the Spartan force on Sphacteria was captured. This was an almost unbelievable event, since the Spartans had won the reputation throughout Greece of never surrendering, but of fighting on to victory or death. In 422, after indecisive military operations by both sides throughout Greece, both Cleon and Brasidas, the Spartan military leader, were killed. The Peace of Nicias was negotiated in 421, but it was soon broken by both sides. In 418 the Spartans defeated the Athenians and their allies at the battle of Mantinea and restored their control over the Peloponnesus. Except for local fighting, however, the war had practically died out. A war had, meanwhile, been going on in Sicily among the city-states of that island and when Segesta appealed (416) for aid to Athens, a huge expedition was sent out by which the Athenians hoped to establish their hegemony over the island and provide a great outlet for their trade. But, just before the fleet sailed the sacred statues of Hermes throughout Athens were discovered to be mutilated; suspicion fell on Alcibiades, the principal promoter and one of the leaders of the expedition, and he was recalled. He fled to Sparta and the expedition continued under Nicias, whose temporizing led in 413 to the complete defeat of the Athenians, the fleet being wiped out and few of the men returning home. Fighting in Greece broke out once more in 414 and the Spartans began to make headway, not only in Attica but also in Ionia in Asia Minor, where Alcibiades had made a military agreement with Tissaphernes, the Persian satrap. Alcibiades' purpose apparently was to make it apparent to both sides that the war was pointless. In 411 he convinced a number of Athenians that the alliance between Sparta and Persia could be broken if an oligarchic government, one less repugnant to Persia than the Athenian democracy, could be set up. As a result, in that same year a small group of citizens seized power at Athens. Alcibiades, who had been recalled, now led the Athenians to victories at Cynossema (411), Abydos (411), and Cyzicus (410), but when the Spartans asked for peace the war party at Athens refused, and once again the government reverted to a more democratic form. During an absence of Alcibiades (407), the Athenian fleet was defeated at Notium by Lysander, who had built a fleet with money received from the Persians; again Alcibiades fled, this time for good. Conon became chief of the Athenian military forces, and was defeated at Lesbos (406). The Athenians rebuilt their fleet and in the same year defeated the Spartans at Arginusae in a great naval battle. The Athenians at home, however, were shocked to learn that the commanders of the fleet had refused to stop their pursuit of the Spartan ships to pick up from the water their own shipwrecked sailors; eight of the commanders were tried and executed, thus removing most of the efficient leaders. What ensued was almost inevitable; at Aegospotami on the Hellespont, the Athenian fleet drawn up to shore was caught by the Spartans and annihilated (405). The supply route from the Euxine Sea was now in Spartan hands; Athenian communication with her allies was cut off. Sparta set up governments in the various cities of the Athenian allies and began a siege of Athens by sea and land. After eight months of negotiation, and the execution of Cleophon, who had persisted in his demands that Athens continue to resist, the Athenians surrendered in 404 B.C. The war resulted in the end of Athenian leadership in Greece. For a time Sparta replaced her, but by 370 B.C. the weakness of Spartan leadership in government brought about the loss of Spartan power and Thebes became the principal city of Greece. Thucydides' history of the Peloponnesian War, down to 411 B.C., is the principal and most accurate source. For the period from 411 B.C., when Thucydides' history breaks off, to the end of the war in 404 B.C., the only connected narrative history is the Hellenica of Xenophon, composed in imitation of Thucydides' style but without the latter's awesome authority.

Peloponnesus (pel'ō-pō-nē'sus). [Also: Morea, Peloponnesos, Peloponnese.] Leaf-shaped peninsula forming the S part of continental Greece. It is practically an island, attached to the mainland only by the narrow rocky Isthmus of Corinth, and separated from it by the Gulf of Corinth and the Saronic Gulf on the north. To the east is the Aegean Sea; to the west the Ionian Sea. It has an area of 8356 square miles, and measures about 160 miles in its greatest length. Sharp high mountains divide the parts of the peninsula one from the other and in ancient times communication was easier by sea than by land. The chief rivers are the Eurotas (or Iri) and the Alpheus. According to legend, when Pelops, son of Tantalus, was driven out of his land in Paphlagonia by barbarians he settled on Mount Sipylus in Lydia. But the Trojan king would not permit him to remain, and he came to the country of Oenomaus, ruler of Pisa and Elis in the Peloponnesus. He won Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus, in a chariot race and succeeded to Oenomaus' throne. His kingdom became rich and powerful, and he subjugated the surrounding country which he then renamed Peloponnesus (Pelops' island). In ancient times the principal divisions of the Peloponnesus were, in clockwise order, Argolis, Laconia, Messenia, Elis, and Achaea, all of which bordered on the sea. Arcadia, occupying the mountainous center of the peninsula, alone was without an exit to the sea. Of the ancient Pelasgian population of the peninsula, only that of Arcadia, which boasted of its pure race, remained relatively unmixed by successive invasions. The Achaeans and Aeolians moved into Argolis, Laconia, Messenia, and Elis. Danaus and Pelops represented invaders from Egypt and Asia Minor. The so-called Mycenaean civilization that developed in the Pelopon-nesus, centered about Mycenae, was equalled only by the earlier Minoan civilization of Crete. Under the rule of Agamemnon, grandson of Pelops, Mycenae dominated all of Argolis, most of the Peloponnesus and the islands, and extended its influence to continental Greece. Such was the influence of Agamemnon that when he sailed against Troy to recover Helen, princes from all over Greece rallied to his cause and joined his expedition. In succeeding generations, the Peloponnesus was invaded by the Epeans who came from Aetolia and of whom Augeas was a king, by the Caucones who spread out from Arcadia into Elis, and by Ionians, said to have come from Attica. About 1100 B.C. the Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus took place. This invasion by people from the north is also called the "return" of the Heraclidae. The basis of the claim of the Heraclidae to the Peloponnesus was that their ancestor Heracles had conquered large parts of it and left it in trust for his descendants. All of the Peloponnesus except Arcadia, which made an agreement with the Heraclidae, fell under Dorian domination. By the 7th century B.C. the Peloponnesus was divided into the city-states of Corinth, Sicyon, Argos, Sparta, Elis, and the 12 Ionian cities of Achaea. Arcadia, divided into independent cities, retained its homogeneity as a race. In the 7th century B.C. Argos was the dominant power. By the next century its power had been eclipsed by that of Sparta. For the next 300 years affairs in the Peloponnesus revolved around the activities of Sparta. After the downfall of Sparta at Leuctra (371 B.C.) the cities and states of the Peloponnesus united in various leagues, against Sparta, against Macedonia, and against the Romans. The Peloponnesus was conquered by the Romans, 146 B.C., and became the Roman province of Achaea.

Pelops (pē'lops). In Greek legend, a son of Tantalus and a grandson of Zeus. His sister was Niobe. Tantalus was on terms of great intimacy with the gods and dined at their table, but he betrayed their friendship by stealing the nectar and ambrosia upon which they fed, and gave it to his mortal friends so that they could enjoy the immortality it conferred. He also, in his pride, invited the gods to dine, and served them his son

Pelops, whom he had cut up and cooked to test whether the gods would recognize human flesh. All the gods except Demeter refused to touch the repast, being quite well aware what had been set before them. But Demeter, mourning for her lost daughter, inadvertently ate a piece of Pelops' left shoulder. Tantalus was horribly punished by the gods for his crimes. They then ordered Hermes to restore Pelops by cooking his flesh in the same cauldron, after which Rhea breathed life into the reformed body, and an ivory shoulder was substituted for the one Demeter had eaten. (Pindar was aghast at this revolting story. He claimed that Poseidon had fallen in love with the beauty of Pelops and had stolen him away. Pindar said the other story was a lie, and a reflection on gods and mortals alike.) Restored, Pelops was so beautiful that Poseidon carried him away to Olympus and fed him on ambrosia. He returned to his father's kingdom in Paphlagonia, but was driven out and went to Elis, where he sued for the hand of Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus. He won her, with the aid of winged horses and a golden chariot that could skim across the waves given to him by Poseidon, by defeating her father in a chariot race. Myrtilus, a son of Hermes and a charioteer of Oenomaus, accepted a bribe from Pelops to help Pelops win the race, and he removed a pin from the axle of Oenomaus' chariot and caused the death of Oenomaus. Afterward, Pelops hurled Myrtilus into the sea when he tried to collect his payment. As he fell, Myrtilus laid a curse on the House of Pelops which brought disaster to many of his descendants. The murder of Myrtilus also aroused the wrath of Hermes. Hephaestus purified Pelops for the murder and he built a temple to Hermes to appease that god. He then succeeded to the throne of Oenomaus and, "smiter of horses" as he was termed by Homer, made himself master of the whole region which he renamed Peloponnesus after himself. He was rich and powerful, and envied by all the princes of Greece. A sanctuary of Pelops, containing his bones, was dedicated to him at Olympia by his descendant, Heracles, and annually a black ram, roasted on a fire of white poplar-wood, was offered to him. His chariot, his golden sword, and the spear-shaped scepter made by Hephaestus, were preserved long after his death in various sanctuaries in Greece, and he was regarded by the Achaeans as their ancestor. The spear-shaped scepter was awarded to the people of Chaeronea who worshiped it as their most important deity, offering victims and a rich variety of food to it daily. Towards the end of the Trojan War, Helenus told the Greeks they must fetch the shoulder of Pelops, among other things, if they expected to defeat the Trojans. Agamemnon accordingly sent envoys to Pisa to secure the ivory shoulder. This ivory shoulder was first revealed to Pelops himself when he mourned the death of his sister Niobe by baring his breast. Incidentally, he was the only one to mourn that arrogant woman. According to Pausanias, the ship carrying the shoulder back to Greece, after the Trojan War, was sunk in a storm. Years later, when a plague was ravaging Elis, a fisherman pulled up the huge bone in his net, and according to instructions from the oracle at Delphi, gave it to envoys from Elis. The envoys returned with it to Elis and the plague was lifted. The fisherman was honored by being made custodian of the sacred bone. Among the many children of Pelops were Atreus, Thyestes, Alcathous, Pittheus, the bastard Chrysippus, who was his favorite and aroused the jealousy of Hippodamia, Copeus the herald, Sciron the bandit, and Astydamia, said to have been the mother of Amphitryon.

Pelops. According to some accounts, one of the twin sons Cassandra bore to Agamemnon. See Teledamas.

Pelorus (pe-lō'rus). In Greek mythology, one of the armed men who sprang from the earth when Cadmus sowed the dragon's teeth. His name means "Serpent" or "Dragon." See Sparti.

Pelusium (pe-lō'shi-um). In ancient geography, a city at the NE extremity of the Nile delta, Egypt, SE of modern Port Said, at what was called the Pelusiatic mouth of the Nile. It was a frontier fortress of Egypt toward Syria. Herodotus tells of an Egyptian king, Sestos, who was a priest of Hephaestus, who scorned and neglected the warrior class in Egypt, and took from them the rich land that had been granted to them. When, therefore, Sennacherib led a force of Arabians and Assyrians against Egypt, the warriors refused to respond to the call of Sestos for their aid. The king, in despair, entered the temple of Hephaestus and lamented. He fell asleep in the temple and dreamed that the god came to him and told him not to despair, to march against the Assyrians with whatever forces he could muster, and that the god would come to his aid. Sestos called together the traders and artisans and marched with them to Pelusium, relying on the god's help. The two armies encamped opposite each other. During the night an army of field mice attacked the camp of the Assyrians; they devoured the strings of their bows and ate the straps of their shields. Next day great numbers of Assyrians were slain as they had no weapons with which to defend themselves, and the rest fled. According to Herodotus, there was in his time a statue of Sestos holding a mouse in his hand, in the temple of Hephaestus, and bearing an inscription admonishing the beholder to look on him and "learn to reverence the gods." It was at Pelusium that Assurbanipal defeated Tirhaka of Egypt; and it was here that Cambyses, son of Cyrus, defeated the Egyptians under King Psammetichus, the last Egyptian king (525 B.C.), and reduced Egypt to a Persian province.

Penates (pē-nā'tēz). In ancient Roman religion, the two gods of the store-room, protectors of the food supply and guardians of the general welfare of the household. They were said to have been brought from Samothrace to Troy and from Troy to Italy by Aeneas. They were household gods who presided over families and were worshiped in the interior of every dwelling. They had their own place on every hearth where a fire was kept burning for them. Every household had its Penates, and there were also public Penates of the state, whose seat, originally at Lavinium, was in the temple of Vesta at Rome where they were served by vestal virgins. The Penates were associated with the Lares as household gods, and their names were sometimes used interchangeably. They were also associated with Vesta. Roman priests and other officers made annual offerings to the state Penates.

Penecius (pē-nē'us). See Peneus.

Peneleus (pē-nel'ē-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a leader of the Boeotians in the Trojan War. He thrust his spear through the eye-socket of Ilioneus, then cut off his head and raised it aloft on the javelin for all the Trojans to see. This is one of the few instances of brutality for its own sake in the Iliad. Later Peneleus slew Lycon, and was then himself wounded by Polydamas.

Penelope (pē-nel'ō-pē). In Greek legend, the daughter of Icarius of Sparta and the naiad Periboea. According to some accounts, at her father's command she was hurled into the sea, but purple ducks bore her up and conveyed her to shore, hence her name, which means "duck." Odysseus was one of her many suitors. He advised Tyndareus, foster father of Helen, how to choose a husband for his daughter without making enemies of Helen's disappointed suitors. In return for his advice, Tyndareus helped Odysseus to win a suitor's foot-race for Penelope in Sparta. Icarius protested when Odysseus set out with his bride for Ithaca, but Penelope signified her desire to go with her husband by drawing her veil over her face, and they proceeded to Ithaca. Telemachus, the son of Penelope and Odysseus, was only an infant when Odysseus left for the Trojan War. The war lasted ten years. Many more years elapsed after it was over and Odysseus did not return. Consequently, he was presumed dead by many in his kingdom and Penelope was besieged by suitors. She was described by Homer as a beautiful woman, with great charm and intelligence, and enormous character. Besides, she was the mistress of rich estates. Over 100 suitors, princes of the kingdom, sought to win her. They plotted to murder Telemachus, just coming to manhood, and seize the throne. Penelope, hoping Odysseus would return, refused to choose a husband from among her suitors. She said she must first finish a shroud she was weaving for her father-in-law, Laertes. Each day she worked at her loom; and each night she secretly unraveled what she had done. This went on for three years before her ruse was discovered. In the meantime, the suitors daily made themselves at home in the palace of Odysseus, eating up his flocks and herds, drinking his wine, seducing his servants, and wasting his substance. At the end of nearly 20 years, Penelope was hard-pressed by the wooers. Telemachus was not strong enough to expel them, and she did not know which way to turn, although Athena visited her frequently in one guise or another to encourage her. When she learned that Telemachus had secretly left for Sparta to seek news of his father and that the suitors planned to ambush and kill him on his return, she hid her fears and boldly chided the wooers for their evil designs. She reminded Antinous, the most insolent of them, that Odysseus had protected his father when he was harassed by enemies. The suitors replied with soothing words and increased their clamor for her decision as to which of them she would take as her husband. Telemachus, aided by Athena, escaped their ambush and returned safely. At the same time Odysseus at last came home. He appeared disguised as a beggar, and so complete was the disguise Athena had given him that no one recognized him. (He did reveal his true identity to Telemachus, and later, to two faithful servants.) Penelope heard that a stranger had come to the palace. She sent for the beggar, who had already observed her demanding bridal gifts from the suitors in the great hall and secretly applauded her prudence in getting what she could from them. She was immediately drawn to the beggar, and questioned him closely. He assured her that Odysseus lived, that he had seen him, and promised his immediate return. Penelope, hopeful but not convinced, ordered a servant to bathe and refresh the beggar. She told him a dream she had had, in which 20 geese, feeding in the yard, were attacked and destroyed by an eagle. The beggar said the geese represented the suitors, and the eagle represented Odysseus, who would come home and destroy them. In a state of sorrow and great uneasiness, Penelope told him she was being compelled to choose from among the suitors, and that she had decided to accept the one who could string her husband's great bow and shoot an arrow through the eye holes of 12 axes set up in a row, as her husband could do. The beggar urged her to carry out her plan at once, and the next day Penelope announced the contest. None of the suitors could even bend the bow to string it. Odysseus seized it and, as the suitors reviled him for his arrogance, Penelope left the hall. He strung the bow easily and turning on the suitors killed every one of them, aided by Athena, Telemachus, and his two faithful servants, Eumaeus and Philoetius. Euryclea brought the news that Odysseus had returned and destroyed the suitors, but Penelope was dubious. Odysseus had been gone so long, and she had grieved so much and had so many troubles, that her hope of good fortune was nearly killed. But Odysseus was not worried, and calmed his son, who was rebuking Penelope for her coldness. He told Telemachus there were certain signs, known only to the two of them, by which they would know each other. To test him, Penelope gave an order to have his bed moved. Odysseus was exasperated. No one could move his bed, he said, because he himself had carved it from a living olive tree that grew through the palace. Thus he proved that he was not an impostor and Penelope welcomed him warmly, apologizing for her previous coolness and doubts. Penelope is regarded as the model of the chaste and faithful wife, who bore her sufferings during the absence of her husband with great nobility and fortitude. She is pictured as a tender mother and a paragon of the domestic virtues. According to later accounts, Odysseus left her again to appease Poseidon, and Penelope ruled Ithaca in his place. Odysseus was mistakenly killed by his son Telegonus, the child of Circe, and Penelope then married Telegonus. Other accounts say that Penelope was not faithful to Odysseus, that she became the mother of Pan by Hermes, or as the result of consorting with all her suitors; as Pan was a very ancient god, long before the time of Penelope, these stories are obviously later embroideries.

Peneus (pē-nē'us). In Greek mythology, the river-god of the Peneus, a great river of Thessaly. He was the son of Tethys and Oceanus. By Creusa, a naiad, he was the father of Hypseus, king of the Lapiths. He was also the father of Daphne, whose plea for help as she fled from the embraces of Apollo he answered by transforming her into a laurel tree. He was the grandfather (some say, the Peneus. [Also: Peneius.] River in the Peloponnesus, Greece, sometimes also called the Castuni. It drains into the Ionian Sea.

Peneus. [Also: Peneius.] Principal river in Thessaly, Greece, sometimes also called the Salembria. It traverses the Vale of Tempe and flows into the Gulf of Salonika about 26 miles NE of Larissa.

Pentapolis (pen-tap'ō-lis). State consisting of five cities, or a group of five cities; the term was used in ancient geography in speaking of a variety of groups: 1) In Cyrenaica, Africa, a district comprising Cyrene, Apollonia, Barca, Arsinoë (near what is now Bengasi), and Berenice (or Hesperides; modern Bengasi), with their neighboring territories. 2) In Palestine, five cities including Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and one other. 3) Five cities of the Philistines: Ashkelon, Gaza, Gath, Ekron, and Ashdod. 4) Five Dorian cities in Asia Minor: Cnidus, Cos, Lindus, Camirus (on the island of Rhodes), and Ialysus. 5) Five cities in Italy: Rimini, Ancona, Fano, Pesaro, and Sinigaglia, with part of the exarchate of Ravenna; this, also called Pentapolis Maritima, was later included in the States of the Church (Papal States).

Pentelicus (pen-tel'i-kus). [Also: Brilessus, Mendeli.] Mountain in Attica, Greece, about 12 miles NE of Athens; noted especially for a variety of white marble resembling Parian, but denser and finer-grained, apparently inexhaustible quarries of which have from antiquity been worked in this mountain. The Parthenon, the Propylaea, and other Athenian monuments are built of it, and from it are carved the famous sculptures known as the Elgin Marbles. Elevation, about 3638 feet.

Penthesilea (pen'the-si-lē'a). In Greek legend, an Amazon queen. She left her home in Thermodon, fleeing the reproaches which followed the accidental killing of her sister Hippolyte, and came to the aid of the Trojans in the last year of the war, after Hector had been killed. Her arrival put new hope into the Trojans, and the flashing beauty which glowed in her face as she vowed to slay Achilles convinced them that she would do even as she said. Only Andromache, who had lost her husband to Achilles' spear, questioned the wisdom of such a boast. Clad in armor given her by Ares, Penthesilea led her 12 Amazon princesses into battle, but as Priam prayed for her success, an eagle clutching a dove in its talons flew screaming over his head; it was a gloomy omen. Penthesilea slashed about her mightily and the Greeks fled in panic. Achilles, mourning for Patroclus, at last heard the din of the fray and hurriedly joined the struggle. Penthesilea, whose path to death was strewn with the glory of killing many Greeks, leaped like a leopard to meet him. But her hour of glory was over. Her lance splintered on Achilles' magic armor. He wounded her in the breast with his sword, and as she debated whether to ask for mercy he impaled her and her horse with his spear. When she fell he gloated over her but when he removed her helmet and saw the wonder of her beauty, "like a child of Zeus sleeping," he fell wildly in love with her and was filled with remorse. Ares was so enraged by the death of his daughter that he would have killed Achilles, but was prevented from doing so by Zeus. Thersites mocked Achilles, who remained sorrowfully at Penthesilea's side, and roused the hero's wrath. Achilles dashed him to the ground. He permitted Agamemnon and Menelaus to restore Penthesilea's body to Priam and she was given funeral honors as a beloved daughter by the Trojans. She, and the Amazon princesses, were buried beside the bones of Laomedon.

Pentheus (pen'thūs). In Greek legend, a son of Agave and Echion and a grandson of Cadmus. He succeeded his grandfather as king of Thebes. When Dionysus arrived in Thebes and invited the Thebans to join in his revels Pentheus, who disapproved the extravagances of the new religion, forbade his people to take part. He seized and imprisoned the maenads who had come with Dionysus from Asia. However, the fetters which bound them dropped from their limbs, the doors of prisons opened of their own accord, and the prisoners were freed. Pentheus resolved to capture and imprison Dionysus himself, against the advice of Cadmus. The latter warned him not to despise the gods or resist their will. But Pentheus scorned the claim that Dionysus was a god. And he mocked the prophecy of the seer Tiresias that he would be torn limb from limb if he denied the divinity of the god. Dionysus allowed himself to be taken before Pentheus, and tried to persuade him to accept the new god. As Pentheus refused, and added his doubting comments on the divinity of Dionysus, the god resolved to punish him. He inspired Pentheus with madness, and under the pretext of sending him to spy on the revels of the women on Mount Cithaeron, he induced him to disguise himself as a woman. Pentheus then went to the mountain and climbed a tree from which he could view the revels. The women, among them his mother Agave, spied him in the tree. Frenzied with religious ecstasy, they mistook him for a wild beast. They shook the tree and finally tore it up by the roots. They then set upon Pentheus and, with Agave as leader, tore him limb from limb. Agave, still under a spell of madness, bore his head proudly back to the palace and exhibited it as the head of a young lion which she had overcome. The fate of Pentheus is often cited as an example, in ancient writing, of the swift fate which overtakes those who question, defy, or resist the gods.

Peparethos (pep-ā-rē'thos). [Modern name, Skopelos.] Island in the Aegean Sea, about 16 miles from Euboea, and SE of Thessaly. It was famous in ancient times for its wines. According to legend, the island was part of the realm of Rhadamanthys of Crete, brother of King Minos, and was bequeathed by him to Staphylus, son of Ariadne and Dionysus, god of wine.

Peplus or Peplum (pep'lus, -um). A richly ornamented, shaw-like upper garment worn by women. It was thrown over one arm and then wrapped around the body in various ways. It was frequently ascribed to female divinities, particularly to Athena, for whose statue in the temple of Athena a ceremonial peplus was woven every year by the high-born maidens attached to the person of the priestess of Athena, and presented at the Panathenaic festival.

Peraea (pē-rē'ā). In ancient geography, a maritime district on the coast of Caria, Asia Minor, opposite Rhodes.

Perdiccas I (pēr-dik'ās). King of Macedonia, the legendary founder of the Macedonian kingdom, active c650 B.C. Herodotus tells the following story concerning him: Perdiccas, a descendant of Temenus, the Heraclid who won Argos as his share of the Peloponnesus, fled from Argos with his brothers, Gauanes and Aeropus. They went first to Illyria, and then to Macedonia. Arrived in Macedonia, the three brothers hired themselves out as laborers to the king; one tended the horses, another the cows, and Perdiccas, the youngest, looked after the young stock. At this time even the kings were poor, and the king's wife prepared the meals. She noticed that each time she baked bread the loaf for Perdiccas swelled to twice its normal size. She pointed this phenomenon out to the king, who recognized it as an omen but did not understand what it meant. In fear he ordered the three brothers before him and commanded them to leave his kingdom. They agreed to go but first demanded to be paid their wages. At this the king was infuriated. The sun, shining down the chimney of the room in which they were standing, made a patch of sunshine on the floor. Pointing to this the king said, "There are the wages you deserve; take them." The two older brothers were stunned at this injustice, but Perdiccas took a knife and made a mark around the patch of sunlight and said he accepted the payment. Then he took the light of the sun on his breast three times, and the brothers departed. When the king learned of this last gesture, and was warned that it must have some meaning, he sent horsemen after the brothers, to slay them. But they had crossed a river, one revered in Argos, and when the horsemen came to the river its waters rose and swelled so that the horsemen dared not cross over and thus the brothers escaped. They went to Mount Bermius, which is so cold that no one can ascend it. Some say this mountain is near the wonderful rose gardens of Midas. From this mountain Perdiccas and his brothers gradually conquered all of Macedonia, and Perdiccas became king.

Perdiccas II. King of Macedon, c450–413 B.C. He was at one time an ally of Athens, but became an adversary and stirred up a revolt of the cities of Chalcidice against Athens (433–432 B.C.). He persuaded the inhabitants of the Chalcidian cities on the coast to abandon them and retire to the strong city of Olynthus to oppose Athens. It was largely owing to the maneuvering of Perdiccas that the Chalcidians invited the Spartan general Brasidas into the region. Perdiccas helped to defray the expenses of the Spartan army, and Mende, Acanthus, and Scione were won over to Sparta. Shortly afterward Perdiccas again changed sides. He abandoned Brasidas in a perilous position and helped Athens to prevent reinforcements from coming to his aid.

Perdiccas III. King of Macedon (364–359 B.C.). He was a son of Amyntas and a brother of Philip II of Macedon. With the aid of an Athenian fleet under Iphicrates, various pretenders to the Macedonian throne were crushed and Perdiccas secured it under the regency of Ptolemy Alorus. He assassinated Ptolemy, who had killed his brother Alexander and had married Eurydice, the mother of Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip. He then threw off the influence of Thebes and allied himself to Athens. Perdiccas was killed, 359 B.C., in battle against the Illyrians.

Perdiccas. One of the generals of Alexander the Great; assassinated in Egypt, 321 B.C. He was the son of Orontes, an independent prince of Macedonia. Before setting out to conquer Asia Alexander impoverished himself by giving away his estates, farms, and revenues to his friends so that they would have enough money and provisions to follow him in comfort. Perdiccas asked him what he had kept for himself. "My hopes," Alexander is said to have replied. Perdiccas then announced that Alexander's soldiers would be the partners in his hopes, and refused to accept the estate Alexander offered to him. After the death of Alexander (323 B.C.) Perdiccas became regent for Alexander's son who was subsequently born to Roxana. He wished to keep Alexander's empire intact, although he allied himself to Ptolemy, who wished to break it up, against Antipater and Antigonus. He set out to subdue Asia Minor and conquered Cappadocia, 322 B.C. Antigonus had refused to help him in the conquest of Asia Minor, and when Perdiccas set out against him he fled to Antipater and Craterus and asked their aid on the ground that Perdiccas intended to seize the throne. Ptolemy abandoned Perdiccas and joined them. Perdiccas moved to attack the allies but was unsuccessful in an attempt to cross the Nile at Pelusium and was defeated. His soldiers mutinied and murdered him.

Perdix (pèr'diks). In Greek mythology, the sister of Daedalus and the mother of Talos, who was also sometimes called Perdix. When Daedalus killed Talos, jealous because he rivaled him as a smith, Perdix hanged herself and was changed into a partridge. The name "Perdix" means partridge. She was also known as Polycaste (q.v.).

Pereus (pér'ūs). In Greek legend, a son of Elatus and Laodice, daughter of Cinyras. His daughter Neaera married her cousin Aleus and became the mother of Auge and several sons.

Perga (pèr'gā). [Also: Perge.] In ancient geography, a city in Pamphylia, Asia Minor, long noted for the worship of Artemis. A Roman theater here is one of the finest surviving.

Pergamos (pèr'gā-mōs). [Also: Pergamum.] Name given in the Iliad to the citadel or walls of Troy. Also, the Trojan citadel of Helenus in Epirus, which was made to resemble that of Troy.

Pergamum (pèr'gā-mum). [Also: Pergamus; modern name, Bergama.] The word appears to mean "citadel" or "stronghold." In ancient geography, a city in Mysia, Asia Minor, about 50 miles N of Smyrna. The city was raised to importance by the famous victory of Attalus I over the Gauls in the latter half of the 3rd century B.C. Attalus I celebrated this victory by dedicating a series of bronze statues on the acropolis of Pergamum, and later a second series at Athens. Of some of these statues marble copies survive: The Dying Gaul in the Capitoline Museum, Rome; the Ludovisi Gaul, and the head of a Dying Asiatic, in the National Museum (Museo delle Terme), Rome; another Dying Gaul and Dying Asiatic, and a Dead Amazon, in the National Museum, Naples; and others elsewhere. To the son of Attalus, Eumenes II, are due the great extension of the city as well as its architectural adornment, and during his reign occurred the remarkable development of Pergamene sculpture, on lines much more modern in spirit than the older Greek art. The same king founded a famous library here. His chief buildings were placed on a succession of terraces on the summit of the acropolis, which rises 900 feet above the plain, and on the other lower terraces immediately outside the powerful acropolis walls. The city remained prosperous under the Romans, and under the empire many fine buildings were erected on the acropolis, and beside the river below. In 1878 the Prussian government sent to the site an exploring expedition under Alexander Conze and Karl Humann. Their investigations were continued for several years, and to them are due the re-discovery of Pergamene art and the mass of information regarding later Greek architecture which together form one of the most remarkable archaeological acquisitions of that century. There are also a Greek theater, a Roman amphitheater, and remains of several temples. An Ionic temple of the finest Greek design is on the slope of the acropolis; the cella with its ornamented doorway remains unusually perfect. The temple of Athena Polias, a Doric peripteros of six by ten columns, of late Greek date, measuring $42\frac{1}{2}$ by 72 feet, occupied a terrace surrounded on two or three sides by a handsome stoa of two stories, Doric below and Ionic above, with a balustrade sculptured with warlike trophies in the second story. The Great Altar of Zeus, with its high-relief sculptures of the Battle of Gods and Giants, is one of the landmarks of Hellenistic art. The continuous frieze is seven feet high and 400 feet long. The temple of Trajan, occupying a large terrace toward the summit of the acropolis, was a Corinthian peripteros of white marble.

Pergamum, Kingdom of. Ancient Greek kingdom in Asia Minor. It rose to prominence under Attalus I in the 3rd century B.C. Attalus III died in 133 B.C., and bequeathed the kingdom to Rome. It was made a Roman province under the name of Asia. See Attalus I, II, III; Eumenes II; Pergamum.

Pergamus (pér'ga-mus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Neoptolemus and Andromache. After the death of Neoptolemus Andromache married Helenus and went with him to the new city he founded. When he died she went to Asia, according to some accounts, and took Pergamus with her. There he conquered the king of Teuthrania, in Asia Minor, and won the city, which he renamed Pergamum, after himself.

Perialla (per-i-al'a). A priestess of Delphi who was bribed by Cleomenes, king of Sparta, to say that Demaratus was not the true son of Ariston and was therefore not rightfully a king of Sparta. The fact that she had taken a bribe was later discovered and she was forced out of her office.

Periander (per-i-an'dér). Tyrant of Corinth (c625-585 B.C.). He was a son of Cypselus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Corinth. At first he ruled mildly, but became ever more harsh as time passed. According to Herodotus, he sent a messenger to Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, to inquire how best to secure his government. Thrasybulus took the messenger to a field of wheat. Without saying a word Thrasybulus walked through the field, knocking off and throwing away the ears of wheat that grew the highest. He then, still without replying to the question Periander's messenger had asked him, sent the messenger back to Corinth. Periander, on hearing of this performance from his messenger, understood that Thrasybulus was advising him to destroy all the leading citizens. He immediately set about to follow this advice, and went at it with great energy, slaying the leading citizens. One day he stripped the clothes off all the women of Corinth whom he had ordered to go to the temple of Hera, because a message from the Thesprotian oracle said that his wife Melissa, whom he had slain, was cold. She sent word that the clothes buried with her did not keep her warm because they had not been burned. He caused the clothes he now stripped from the Corinthian women to be burned in a pit. It was during Periander's reign, according to Herodotus, that Arion, the musician, was set upon by the crew of the ship in which he was returning to Corinth, and was compelled to cast himself into the sea. A dolphin took him on its back and bore him to Corinth. Periander disbelieved the story Arion had to tell him when he arrived in Corinth. When the ship on which Arion had set sail from Italy arrived Periander questioned the crew concerning Arion. They assured him that Arion was safe in Italy, enjoying great prosperity. Periander thereupon produced Arion, gave them the lie, and put them to death. By his wife Melissa Periander had two sons. When they were 17 and 18 years old respectively they were entertained by Procles, their mother's father. He treated them with great kindness and interest, and one day asked them if they now knew who had caused the death of their mother. The older boy, a dull youth, paid no attention to the question and later forgot that it had even been asked. Lycophron, the younger son, realized that it was his father who had slain his mother. When he returned to Corinth he refused to have anything to do with his father, and was cast out by him. Ultimately he found refuge in Corcyra. As Periander advanced in years he wished for the return of Lycophron. He realized that his older son was doltish and wished Lycophron to succeed him on the throne. Lycophron was at last persuaded to return when Periander agreed that he would withdraw from Corinth if Lycophron would return, but before Lycophron could depart the Corcyreans, angry at Periander because he had abducted 300 boys from the best families and sent them to Lydia to become eunuchs, seized Lycophron and put him to death. Thus an oracle, pronounced before the birth of Cypselus, father of Periander, was fulfilled. It was to the effect that Cypselus and his sons—but not his grandsons—would rule Corinth. Despite almost universal agreement on the despotism of Periander, he appears to have acted for the good of Corinth, establishing colonies to the north, promoting trade, extending Corinthian influence, and developing a program of public works. He is usually counted among the Seven Wise Men of Greece.

Periapis (per-i-ā'pis) or Periopis (-ō'pis). A daughter of Pheres. According to some accounts, she was the mother of Patroclus.

Periboea (per-i-bē'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Alcathous, king of Megara, and granddaughter of Pelops. She was Telamon's second wife, and the mother of Telamonian (or Great) Ajax.

Periboea. In Greek legend, the wife of Polybus, king of Corinth. Oedipus, exposed as an infant, was found by shepherds and brought to Polybus. He and Periboea, being childless, took him and brought him up, allowing him to think he was their own son. According to another account, Periboea found Oedipus in a chest that floated ashore and pretended to all, except her husband, that she had borne the child herself.

Periboea. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Hipponous of Olenus, who claimed she was with child by Ares and was sent by her father to Oeneus in Calydon to be destroyed. Instead Oeneus, having lost his wife and his son Meleager, married her and by her became the father of Tydeus.

Periboea. Named by Homer (Iliad) as a daughter of Aecessamenus, a king in Thrace. She was the mother, by the river-god of the Axios River, of Pelegon.

Peribolus (pe-rib'ō-lus). In Greek antiquity, a consecrated court or inclosure, generally surrounded by a wall, and often containing a temple, statues, etc.

Periclean (per-i-klē'an) Architecture. A classification under which are listed a number of marble temples and other buildings erected in Attica during the intellectual and aesthetic hegemony of Pericles. The period of Periclean architecture began with the eclipse of Cimon and Ephialtes in 461 B.C. and survived the death of Pericles (429 B.C.). At Pericles' instigation and under his close supervision, Athens embarked on a broad program of civic embellishment. A partial list of Periclean buildings, with their locations, style, architects, and approximate dates, follows: Temple of Hephaestus, formerly called the Theseum (Athens; Doric; the Theseum architect (q.v.); c449–c444 B.C.); Temple on the Ilissus (Athens; Ionic; Callicrates; c449 B.C.); Hall of the Mysteries (Eleusis; Doric; Ictinus and others; c450 B.C.); Parthenon (Athens; Doric; Ictinus and Callicrates; begun 447 B.C., dedicated 438 B.C.); Odeum of Pericles (Athens; architect unknown; after 450 B.C.?); Temple of Poseidon (Sunium; Doric; the Theseum architect; c444–c440 B.C.); Temple of Ares (Athens; Doric; the Theseum architect; c440–c436 B.C.); Propylaea (Athens; Doric; Mnesicles; c437–c432 B.C.); Temple of Nemesis (Rhamnus; Doric; the Theseum architect; c436–c432 B.C.). Buildings begun after Pericles' death continued the traditions he established: Temple of Athena Nike (Athens; Ionic; architect unknown, possibly Mnesicles; begun 421, finished 405 B.C.); Stoa of Zeus (Athens; Doric; architect unknown; last quarter of the 5th century B.C.). To this list may properly be added temples outside of Attica, by architects in the Periclean tradition: Temple of Apollo (Bassae; Doric; Ictinus; c450–c425 B.C.); Temple of Pericles (per'i-klēz). Athenian statesman, general, and orator, born probably c495 B.C.; died 429 B.C., of the plague, at Athens. He was a member of a powerful and influential family of Athens, of the tribe of Acamanthis. His father Xanthippus fought at the battle of Mycale (479 B.C.) and was prominent politically. His mother Agariste, a member of the Alcmaeonidae, and a niece of Cleisthenes, dreamed a few days before he was born that she had given birth to a lion. He received an excellent education. He studied music and politics with Damon, heard the lectures of the Eleatic philosopher Zeno, and was chiefly instructed and strongly influenced by Anaxagoras of Clazomenae, whose rationalistic philosophy and scientific approach freed his pupil and friend to a large extent from the superstitions of his age. As an example of the methods of Anaxagoras, it was said that a ram's head, from which a single horn grew, was brought to Pericles. Soothsayers said this meant that the two factions of Athens would unite under Pericles. Anaxagoras took the specimen, dissected it, and showed that the single horn was developed owing to physical causes. In the event, both Anaxagoras and the soothsayers were honored: Anaxagoras for his science; the soothsayers because Pericles did in fact become the head of a united Athens.

As a member of a powerful family and as a leader, Pericles was not immune to personal attacks. His head was long and pointed and the comic poets gleefully spoke of him as "Onion Head." To cover up the malformation of his head, statues and pictures of Pericles always portrayed him helmeted. His critics said he was vain, proud, and supercilious. However, he was a man of great self-control and patience, and pursued his course. This was, at first, to stay out of public life, for he feared that his many advantages—good looks, wealth, oratorical gifts, and powerful connections, might draw too much envy and lead to his ostracism. (Ostracism was a means to secure the exile of any man who might be a potential source of unrest, disorder, or danger to the state; it was not necessary for a man to have committed a crime, civic or otherwise, to be ostracized.)

After the disappearance of Aristides, Themistocles, and Cimon from public life, Pericles became prominent. His policy was to win the support and respect of the masses. This he did with money and by weakening the authority of the Areopagus, whose members came from the richest classes of the state. At the same time, he instituted democratic reforms. He reorganized state office-holding so that henceforth the office-holders were paid, thus making it possible for all citizens to accept office, and even to seek it. His personal life was simple, with limited social connections, and he made it a point not to make many public appearances or speeches. He was a speaker of such eloquence that he was called "Olympian," but he wisely realized that his eloquence would lose its golden lustre if people heard it too frequently. His chief rival at first was Cimon, whom he caused to be ostracized (c459 B.C.), but who was recalled later. After the death of Cimon, Thucydides emerged as a rival. Pericles wooed the masses with diversions, and sent out colonies—to the Chersonese, Naxos, and Sybaris, which had been destroyed three times and was now rebuilt as Thurii. Through these colonies he siphoned off some of the excess population of Athens, and at the same time strengthened the outposts of the empire. He sent envoys throughout the Greek world, calling for the fulfillment of the sacrifices that had been promised during the Persian War and for the rebuilding of the temples that the barbarians had destroyed. However, owing to Spartan resistance to it, this Pan-Hellenic project, of which Athens would have been the leader, failed. He declared that the rebuilding of the temples was a sacred duty, in gratitude for the help the gods gave the Greeks in the Persian War. To fulfill it, Pericles set about beautifying the city. His critics claimed he used the money of the Delian League for this purpose. The funds, contributed by the allies, had been kept in the Treasury at Delos. Pericles transferred the funds to Athens (454 B.C.) and justified the transfer on the grounds that Athens must fulfill her sacred duty to the gods, that Athens had earned it by keeping the Persians at bay during and after the Persian Wars as she had undertaken to do, and on the ground that it provided employment at home. made Phidias superintendent of all public building. Under his charge Periclean architecture was created; the Parthenon was built, a temple of Initiation at Eleusis was erected, the long walls between Athens and Piraeus were finished, a temple of Athena Nike was built on the southwestern side of the Acropolis, a temple of Hephaestus rose on the Hill of Colonus, and one of Poseidon was built at Sunium. The temples were adorned within and without by magnificent sculptured groups, as the pediments of the Parthenon, and images of the gods, notably the statue of Athena in the Parthenon, by Phidias. During the construction of the Odeum a workman was injured. Pericles cured him, thanks to the instructions the goddess Athena gave him in a dream it is said, and in honor of this cure he caused a golden statue of the goddess, made by Phidias, to be placed near the altar on the Acropolis.

With the ostracism of his opponent Thucydides (441 B.C.), Pericles became sole master of Athens. From then on, according to Plutarch, he was a changed man. He became much sterner with the people, and controlled them through the two-edged sword of hope and fear. At the same time, he was careful of the public good, and although he had great power and opportunity, he did not add a single drachma to the estate his father had left him. He maintained himself as undisputed master of Athens through his wisdom and his eloquence, and never lost sight of the fact that his acts were subject to review by the people at the end of each year. As it was, he was chosen one of the ten generals of Athens year after year and, in fact, he was the general among generals.

His policy of increasing Athenian power and influence on the Greek mainland met with little success. Aegina remained an unwilling ally, Megara and Boeotia were lost, a revolt in Euboea was quelled, and the Thirty Years' Peace was arranged with Sparta (446-445 B.C.). In the Sacred War (448 B.C.) he had seized the temple of Delphi, which had been handed over to the Delphians by the Spartans, and restored it to the Phocians. The Spartans had engraved on the left side of the bronze wolf, by the great altar, their privilege of consulting the oracle first. Pericles caused a claim for the same privilege for the Athenians to be engraved on the wolf's right side. However, the friendship with the Phocians was short-lived. As a result of these setbacks, he turned his attention to strengthening Athens as a sea power. In 448 B.C. peace was concluded with the Persians. He pacified the Chersonese and secured the Greek cities of the Pontus.

Pericles' wife bore him two sons, Xanthippus and Paralus, but the couple was so unhappy that they separated by mutual consent. She married another and he took as his mistress Aspasia, a beautiful, intelligent Milesian, who excelled at political discussion and was a friend of some of the leading thinkers of the day. She was attacked by the comic poets as the "new Omphale," Cratinus plainly called her a prostitute, others spoke of her as Deianira and Hera. Some said she wrote Pericles' speeches. It was said that she urged Pericles to wage war on Samos, to avenge her native city of Miletus. He conquered Samos (440 B.C.), and established a democracy, then sailed off, leaving a few ships behind. The Samians revolted, seized the Greek ships and branded their Athenian prisoners on their foreheads with an owl, symbol of Athens. Pericles returned to Samos, besieged it for nine months and forced its surrender. He razed the walls and levied a fine on the Samians. On his return to Athens he celebrated a magnificent funeral for the fallen and was chosen to make the funeral oration, a speech which won him much applause.

In 433 B.C. he sent a small fleet to observe in the war between Corcyra and Corinth. The fleet was to assist the Corcyraeans defensively. This was one of the incidents that marked the prelude to the Peloponnesian War, and was an excuse for the Spartans to claim that Athens had broken the Thirty Years' Peace. Pericles offered to submit all questions in dispute between Athens and Sparta to arbitration, but Sparta refused. Embassies went back and forth. The Spartans demanded that the Athenians drive out the curse of the goddess. This was a reference to the followers of Cylon, who (c632 B.C.) were slain after having been promised safe conduct if they would come out of the temple on the Acropolis where they had fled as suppliants after an abortive attempt to win control of the city. The curse was that the family of the Alcmaeonidae should be exiled from Athens forever. The Alcmaeonidae had returned to Athens and Pericles was the most prominent member, as well as the most powerful man in Athens. The Athenians replied with a demand that the Spartans drive out the curse of Taenarus, referring to the slaying of Pausanias, and the death of some suppliants at the temple of Poseidon at Taenarus. These were pretexts. The Spartans had decided on war as the only means of arresting the growing power of Athens.

After listening to their allies and ambassadors from Athens who sought peace, the Spartans declared that the Thirty Years' Peace had been broken and decided for war (431 B.C.). Pericles' strategy was to allow the Spartans to exhaust themselves by attacks on Athens, while Athens remained inside its walls. He remained unmoved by the pleas of many to attack the Spartans. He sent out a fleet to harass the Peloponnesus and the Spartans withdrew, but returned the next year. In that year (430 B.C.), plague broke out in crowded Athens. His enemies blamed it on Pericles. He manned a fleet, and was on board, ready to sail, when there was an eclipse of the sun. In spite of the unfavorable omen he sailed, but his expedition was not very successful, and when he returned he was deprived of his command and fined. He was now attacked by many, including his son Xanthippus. But the latter died of the plague, and Pericles withdrew with dignity, only losing his composure when his younger son also succumbed to the plague. A year later he was recalled to power in Athens by the people, but soon he too fell a victim to the plague and died, in 429 B.C.

The empire of which Pericles was the leader was composed of many unwilling states; they were ruled with an autocratic hand, were deprived of all control over their policies and destinies, and were compelled to contribute to the treasury at Athens. At home, his law (451-450 B.C.) that only those whose parents were legally wedded Athenians could be citizens was most undemocratic and limiting; the law rose to plague him in his connection with Aspasia the Milesian.

At the summit of power he had, naturally, many enemies. He was attacked indirectly through Phidias, who was accused of stealing the gold he was supposed to have used on his statue of Athena. This accusation was disproved, since Phidias had provided that the gold could be removed for weighing. Phidias was next accused of impiety, because he showed his own and Pericles' likenesses on the shield of the goddess. He was cast into prison and died, or as some say, he died an exile. Coming closer, the critics of Pericles attacked Aspasia as an alien, but he was able to protect her. In addition, his old friend and teacher, Anaxagoras, was accused of impiety and fled. Plutarch claims that because of these troubles Pericles was anxious for war. Other witnesses do not bear out this conclusion. Rather, war between the two most powerful states of Greece was inevitable since they could not agree, as Cimon had so devoutly hoped, on a course by which their powers would be united.

The contributions of Pericles to Athens and to the western world were great. He ended the Persian Wars, confirmed Athens as the leading sea power of Greece, and established democratic reforms that tended to strengthen Athenian democracy. He brought commercial prosperity to the city, which he so beautified that the period of his ascendancy came to be known as the Golden Age of Athens, and he encouraged art and literature. The funeral oration which he gave for the dead who first fell in the Peloponnesian War contrasts Sparta and Athens and is a testament of his ideas of and ideals for Athens. In it he describes the Athenian democracy as he sees it: an administration that favors the many rather than the few, whose laws provide equal justice for all, and whose offices are open to any one with capacity; an administration that is made possible and strengthened by public and private respect for magistrates and the law. To this is added: diversion for the spirit in the form of public games and sacrifices, beautiful buildings, and a flourishing commerce that brings the products of the world to Athens. In military affairs and foreign policy, Athens is a city open to the world, welcoming all, even at the risk of being observed by an enemy, because the native spirit of the Athenians is its greatest strength and protection. In developing these points he names Athens the school of Hellas, and proudly declares to the Athenians that we "have left imperishable monuments behind us."

Pericles the Younger. Athenian commander; executed 406 B.C. He was the son of Pericles and his mistress Aspasia. By a Decree of the People he was declared legitimate in 429 B.C. He was one of the Athenian commanders who defeated the Peloponnesians under Callicratidas in the sea fight at Arginusae (406 B.C.). In this battle, which was an Athenian victory, 25 Athenian ships and their crews were lost. For some reason, unknown, the other ships did not stop to pick up the men in the water. The Athenians felt that many of these men might have been saved, and anger over their loss raged against the commanders who had not ordered their rescue. Eight of the commanders were tried by the Athenian Assembly, rather than by constituted courts, for criminal negligence. The commanders were found guilty, their property was confiscated, and they were condemned to death. Pericles was one of six who were actually executed (406 B.C.).

Periclymenus (per-i-kli'mē-nus). In Greek mythology, the oldest son of Neleus and Chloris (or Meliboea, daughter of Amphion and Niobe). Poseidon gave him boundless strength and the power to assume whatever shape he wanted. Some time after the journey in the Argo, in which he took part, he attempted to defend Pylus, his father's kingdom, against Heracles. In combat with Heracles he changed himself into a lion, a serpent and a bee. Lastly he transformed himself into an eagle and tried to peck out Heracles' eyes, but as he flew away to dodge Heracles' club, the hero seized a bow and shot him.

Periclymenus. In Greek legend, a Theban, the son of Poseidon and Chloris, who was a daughter of Tiresias, the seer. He was a defender of Thebes in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and slew Parthenopaeus. He attacked Amphiarus, and would have killed him, but Zeus caused the earth to split open and Amphiarus, alive and in his chariot, was swallowed up.

Perieres (per-i-ē'rēz). In Greek legend, a son of Aeolus of Thessaly and Enarete. He became king of the Messenians, at their request, and married Gorgophone, daughter of Perseus. She bore him Aphareus, who succeeded him, and Leucippus.

Perigune (per-i-gū'nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Sinis the "Pine-bender." When Theseus encountered Sinis and struggled, successfully, to overpower him, Perigune, in terror of Theseus, ran and hid from him. He found her cowering among wild asparagus and rushes, appealing to the shrubs to hide her, and promising them that she would never burn or destroy them if they would protect her from Theseus. Theseus assured her that he meant her no harm, and so convinced her that she fell in love with him. He embraced her and in due time she bore him Melanippus. Theseus later gave her to Deioneus of Oechalia. The descendants of Perigune in Caria, who were called Ioxids because Ioxus, grandson of Perigune, led a colony to Caria, made it a practice not to burn the wild asparagus and rushes. Instead they revered these plants for their service to Perigune.

Perilaus (per-i-lā'us). In Greek legend, a son of Icarus. He was a cousin of Clytemnestra and some say it was he who accused Orestes and demanded vengeance for the murder of Clytemnestra from the Furies.

Perimedes (per-i-mē'dēz). In Greek legend, a son of Eurystheus. He was slain by the Athenians in the war which they waged against the forces of Eurystheus in defense of the children of Heracles, and also in defense of the right of the Athenians to give sanctuary to whomever they pleased.

Perimedes. In the Odyssey, one of the companions of Odysseus in his wanderings on the return to Ithaca after the Trojan War. He accompanied Odysseus on his visit to the Underworld.

Perimele (per-i-mē'lē). In mythology, a daughter of Hippodamas. The river-god Achelous fell in love with her and ravished her. Hippodamas was enraged with his daughter and hurled her into the sea, but as she was falling Achelous caught her and held her up. He prayed to Poseidon that she might be given a resting place or become a place, herself. His prayer was answered: Perimele was transformed into an island off the mouth of the Achelous River. She became one of the Echinades Islands.

Perinthus (pe-rin'thus). [Also: Heraclea Perinthus.] In ancient geography, a city in Thrace, strongly situated on a cliff on a peninsula on the Propontis about 55 miles W of Byzantium. It was part of the realm of Darius the Great, and revolted against him when he was on his expedition in Scythia. After the Persian Wars (479 B.C.) it became a member of the Confederacy of Delos, to which it paid tribute. The city made a successful defense against Philip II of Macedon in 340 B.C. Eski Ereğli is the name of the town now occupying the site.

Peripatetics (per'i-pa-tet'iks). Followers of Aristotle (384-322 B.C.). They were so called from his teaching while walking up and down or from "Peripatos," a covered walking-place in a school. Theophrastus and Straton succeeded Aristotle as leaders of the school and transformed Aristotelian philosophy into scientific research. After the 1st century, B.C., the Peripatetics wrote commentaries and expositions of Aristotle, thus preserving Aristotle's philosophical speculations in metaphysics and logic for later generations. The school became eclectic and eventually turned to Neoplatonism. In the Middle Ages the word was often used to signify "logicians."

Periphas (per'i-fas). According to some accounts, an ancient king of Attica, before the time of Cecrops. He was renowned for his justice and piety, and was called "Zeus" by men. For this presumption Zeus wanted to destroy him, but was persuaded by Apollo to change him into an eagle instead, and he became king of the birds.

Periphas. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Ochesius. He was called a giant by Homer, and named as the bravest by far of the Aetolians in the Trojan War. Ares slew him, when the god entered the battle at Aphrodite's request to help the Trojans, and stripped him of his armor.

Periphas. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Epytus. He was a Trojan herald, whose shape Apollo assumed in order to spur Aeneas on in the struggle for possession of Patroclus' body.

Periphetes (per-i-fē'tēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the only son of Copeus of Mycenae. His father had once served as messenger between Eurystheus and Heracles. While defending the Greek ships in a phalanx of shields against Hector, Periphetes tripped on his buckler and fell on his back. Hector thereupon ran up to him and thrust his javelin into his breast.

Periphetes. In Greek legend, a Giant. Some say he was a son of Poseidon, but others say he was a son of Hephaestus and Anticlea, and like Hephaestus, he was lame. He lived at Epidaurus, and was in the habit of attacking travelers with a huge iron club (he was sometimes called Corynetes, "Cudgel-bearer"). When he attacked Theseus, who was passing that way, Theseus seized the club from his hands and battered Periphetes to death with his own club. Ever after, Theseus carried the huge club and used it to good effect.

Periphetes. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Mysian ally of the Trojans. He was slain and stripped of his armor by Teucer.

Periplus (per'i-plus). Title of ancient reports of navigations of explorers, and manuals for the use of navigators. The oldest extant is by the younger Scylax of Caryanda in Caria, assigned to the time of Alexander the Great. There were also similar works by Nearchus, Agatharchides, Hanno, Timagenes, and others.

Peripteros (pe-rip'te-ros). A temple of which the cella is surrounded by a single range of columns.

Peristyle (per'i-stil). In architecture, a range or ranges of columns surrounding any part, as the cella of a Greek temple, or any place, as a court or cloister, or the atrium of a classical house.

Pero (pē'rō). In Greek legend, a daughter of Neleus, king of Pylus, and Chloris, daughter of Amphion and Niobe. She was the sister of Nestor. She had many suitors and her father promised her to the one who could bring him the cattle of Phylacus (or his son, Iphiclus). She was finally won by Bias, who with the help of his brother Melampus, a seer, got possession of the cattle. She was said by some to be the mother of the river-god Asopus, by Poseidon. She died young and Odysseus saw her shade when he visited the Underworld on his way home from the Trojan War.

Persephone (pèr-sef'ō-nē). [Also: Core, Kore, meaning "the Maiden."] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. Hades fell in love with her and sought permission from Zeus to make her his wife. Zeus neither gave his consent, for he knew Demeter would not want to lose her daughter in the Underworld, nor withheld it, for fear of offending Hades. One day as Persephone was gathering flowers in a meadow with her companions, Hades suddenly appeared in his chariot drawn by four black horses and seized her. As she struggled to escape, the earth opened and the chariot disappeared into the chasm bearing Hades and the unhappy maiden in it. Demeter was wild with grief over the loss of her daughter. She wandered tirelessly over the world searching for her. Some say Enna, in Sicily, was the place where Hades carried off Persephone; others say Colonus in Attica, Hermione or Lerna in Argolis, Pheneus in Arcadia, Nysa in Boeotia, a place in Crete, and various other places visited by Demeter in her search for her daughter were the scene of the abduction. But the priests of Demeter said she was carried off from Eleusis in Attica. Demeter learned from Hecate that Hades had abducted her daughter with the tacit consent of Zeus and carried her off to his realm to be his wife. In her wrath, Demeter withdrew her gifts of fertility from the earth; fields and vineyards ceased to bear. Zeus, fearing the destruction of mankind, sent Hermes to Hades with a command to restore Persephone to her mother, on condition that she had eaten nothing while in his kingdom. Persephone had eaten some seeds of a pomegranate—one, three, six, or seven—and for that reason was compelled to spend part of each year as Hades' wife in his kingdom, where she lived with him in a palace, had a grove of black poplars sacred to her, and exercised great powers. She allowed Heracles to restore Alcestis to earth when she had given her life that her husband might live; deceived by Sisyphus, she gave him permission to return to earth to make arrangements for his own burial, which he said had not been properly performed; and she accepted a myrtle bough from Dionysus in return for permitting him to take his mother Semele from Hades' kingdom to Olympus. Occasionally she was compelled to deal with a rival. She transformed the nymph Minthe into a mint plant when she observed Hades dallying with her. For the same reason, the nymph Leuce was transformed into a white poplar that stood beside the Pool of Memory in Hades. Variations on the story of Persephone were that she was the daughter of Zeus and the nymph of the river Styx in Hades; that she was the mother of Zagreus and Dionysus by Zeus. The annual disappearance from the earth of Persephone brought death to vegetation. When she appeared to spend the rest of the year with her mother the earth flowered in rebirth. Persephone and Demeter were worshiped as the Great Goddesses, the central figures of the Eleusinian Mysteries, from which a concept of immortality evolved. Persephone was also worshiped as "the Maid," whose name it was unwise to utter. Symbolically, Demeter and Persephone were interpreted as two aspects of the grain goddess, Persephone representing the new young grain, Demeter the ripened harvest. Persephone is also associated with the mother-goddess Aphrodite in the fertility myth regarding the vegetation-god Adonis. Adonis dwelt with Persephone under the earth for one-third of the year, and spent the other eight months with Aphrodite in the world. Persephone's cult name was Core, or Kore, "the Maiden," and in this aspect she figured in the Eleusinian mysteries. She was associated with Dionysus in the Eleusinian mysteries when, under the name Iacchus, he represented her brother, her son, or her bridegroom. In the Peloponnese she was honored with a festival of flowers, the Anthesphoria. In later times Persephone came to be identified with Hecate, a dread goddess of darkness and of spirits. As a virgin who dwelt with her mother, Persephone was represented as a beautiful maiden, and had a flowing cornucopia, a sheaf of wheat, and the cock as her attributes. As the stern queen of the Underworld, she held a torch or a pomegranate, symbolizing death and rebirth. The Romans called her Proserpina and made little or no change in the myth or its interpretation. She was especially worshiped in Sicily, which was sacred to Demeter and Persephone and where many festivals were held in their honor.

Persepolis (pēr-sep'ō-lis). In ancient geography, one of the capitals of the Persian Empire, about 35 miles NE of what is now Shiraz. It became the capital under Darius I, was captured by Alexander the Great c330 B.C. and subsequently burned, and is still noted for the ruins of its palaces. The most remarkable monuments are grouped on a terrace of smoothed rock and masonry, approximately rectangular in plan, though with irregular projections, measuring 940 by 1550 feet, and attaining in front the height of 43 feet, of fine polygonal masonry, while at the back it is dominated by the rock of the foothills behind. The chief buildings on the terrace were the Propylaea and the great hypostyle hall of Xerxes, the Hall of 100 Columns, attributed to Darius, and the residence palaces of Darius and his successors. In the palace of Darius carved reliefs of men fighting animals occur, based on Assyrian originals; in that of Xerxes the sculptures represent subjects pertaining to royal luxury. Great figures of bulls, often set up before the portals, recall the Assyrian practice. The chief explorations are due to Eugène Napoléon Flandin and P. Coste in 1840-41, and to F. Stolze and Andreas prior to 1882. In 1891 some excavations were made by Herbert Weld Blundell, and casts of the sculptures and inscriptions taken by a private expedition sent out from England. The site was carefully investigated in the 1930's by an expedition representing the University of Chicago and the University of Pennsylvania, under Ernst Herzfeld and Erich F. Schmidt.

Perses (pēr'sēz). In Greek mythology, a son of the Titan Crius and Eurybia, and the father of Hecate by Asteria. This Perses, or another of the same name, was said by some to be the son of Persa and Helius, and the brother of Aeëtes, Circe, and Pasiphaë. He seized Colchis from his brother, Aeëtes, and was afterward slain either by Medea or by her son Medeus, when Medea returned to Colchis from Greece.

Perseus (pēr'sūs, -sē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus and Danaë. He was born in a bronze underground chamber in which Acrisius had imprisoned Danaë to prevent her from having any traffic with men. He did this because he had been warned by an oracle that his grandson would kill him. But Zeus visited Danaë in a shower of gold and she bore him Perseus. Acrisius was reluctant to kill his own grandson, for fear of the wrath of the gods. He therefore placed mother and child in a chest and cast it into the sea. The chest floated to the island of Seriphus. There it was recovered by Dictys, a fisherman. He took Danaë and her son to his house and sheltered them; Perseus grew up under his care to be a fisherman. Polydectes, brother of Dictys and king of the island, saw Danaë and fell in love with her. By this time Perseus had grown to be a strong and handsome youth. Some say Perseus objected to the marriage which Polydectes tried to force on his mother. Others say Polydectes simply wanted to get rid of Perseus. At any rate, Polydectes summoned his friends to his palace and asked them to make contributions to him for a wedding present to Hippodamia, daughter of Pelops, whom he pretended he was going to marry. He asked his friends to give him horses. Perseus, a poor fisherman, could give no such gift. Instead he agreed to fetch the head of the Gorgon Medusa as his contribution. Some say he idly promised he would even fetch the head of Medusa to prevent Polydectes from marrying Danaë, and that Polydectes immediately accepted his offer. Others say Perseus, humiliated by his inability to give a horse as the others were promising to do, proudly offered to fetch the head of Medusa instead. This then was his mission, and Polydectes thought he had seen the last of him, for he expected him to be killed on this dangerous errand. Perseus sailed to Greece, without telling his mother of his daring plan, to consult the oracle at Delphi and learn where the Gorgons might be found. The oracle directed him to a land where the people eat only acorns. Perseus took this to mean Dodona, the site of the oracle of the talking oak trees. The priests of Dodona, however, could not tell him where to find the Gorgons. They did tell him that Athena and Hermes would help him. As he wandered about searching for information Perseus met Hermes and learned from him that only the nymphs of the North could tell him where the Gorgons dwelt, and that only the Graeae, who lived at the foot of Mount Atlas in Libya, could direct him to the nymphs. Hermes accompanied him on his journey to the Graeae. These shadowy old women shared one eye and one tooth between them and lived in a land that knew no sunlight. They were sisters of the Gorgons. As they came to the sisters, Hermes advised Perseus to steal their eye and their tooth as these were passing from hand to hand, and to keep them until the Graeae revealed the home of the nymphs. Perseus followed his instructions. The Graeae, compelled by their need for the eye which Perseus had snatched from them, told him how to find the nymphs of the North. He then set off with Hermes to find the nymphs, who lived in the far northern land of the Hyperboreans. The nymphs treated him kindly and gave him a wallet, winged sandals, and a cap of darkness. They also told him where to find the Gorgonis. Hermes gave him an unbreakable sickle. Athena gave him a polished shield. She told him not to look directly at the Gorgons, for they were so revolting and frightening with their snaky locks that whoever looked on them was instantly turned to stone. She showed him how to use the shield as a mirror so that he need not look directly at the Gorgons, and told him how he would recognize Medusa, the only one of the Gorgons who was not immortal. Perseus flew over the ocean on his winged sandals until beneath him he saw the Gorgons reflected in the polished shield. He swooped down and, using the shield as Athena had directed, cut off Medusa's head with one sweep of Hermes' sickle and put it into the wallet the nymphs had given him for this purpose. From the blood of Medusa sprang Pegasus, the winged horse, and Chrysaor. Her sisters woke up and pursued Perseus, but as he was wearing the cap of darkness he was invisible and they soon gave up the chase. Hermes and Athena now left him and he flew off, carrying the head in the wallet. Drops of Medusa's blood that fell on the land as he flew over it turned into serpents, and thenceforth this land was infested with poisonous snakes. Some say that Perseus, on his way to find the Gorgons, visited Atlas and asked his hospitality. Atlas, remembering a prophecy given him by Themis that the golden apples would one day be stripped by a son of Zeus, from the trees which he guarded, refused to entertain him. As Perseus returned with the head of Medusa, he again stopped at the house of Atlas, exhibited the head of Medusa and turned Atlas to stone to punish him for his inhospitality. There Atlas stands to this day, a mighty mountain called by his name. Continuing his journey, Perseus flew to Chemmis, the home of his ancestor Danaus in Egypt. He stopped there briefly to refresh himself. The Egyptians honored him with an image in the sacred precinct of the temple of Chemmis; they said that a huge sandal belonging to Perseus frequently is found, and that on the occasions when the sandal comes to light all Egypt prospers. The Egyptians worshiped Perseus with games in the Greek manner. Perseus next flew over the coasts of Aethiopia and saw a beautiful maiden chained to a rock on the shore. He fell in love with her at sight, and flew down to inquire the reason for her unhappy state. She told him she was Andromeda, daughter of Cepheus, king of Aethiopia. She was chained to the rock as a sacrifice to a sea-monster that Poseidon had sent to ravage the land. Perseus offered to slay the monster if in return Cepheus would give him Andromeda in marriage. Cepheus was delighted to agree. Perseus took the head of Medusa from the wallet and laid it on some seaweed, which instantly turned to coral, in case he should need it to kill the monster. But it was not necessary. As the beast emerged from the sea Perseus flew above it, swooped down and cut off its head with a single blow. He then raised altars and sacrificed to Hermes, Athena, and Zeus, and claimed his bride. At the wedding festivities Phineus, who some say was the brother of Cepheus and some say was a son of Agenor, burst into the hall and claimed the bride. Andromeda had been betrothed to him before the monster was sent by Poseidon, but when she was chained to the rock as a sacrifice Phineus had given up his interest in her. Now that all was safe, he reasserted his claim to her. Perseus refused to give up Andromeda. He fought off Phineus and his companions, killing many, but he was seriously outnumbered and must surely have perished if he had not exposed the head of Medusa and turned Phineus and his followers to stone. After this he departed with Andromeda for Seriphus. Arrived there, he learned that his mother and the kindly Dictys, whose wife had long since died, had been forced to flee because of the violent importunities of Polydectes. They had taken refuge in a temple. Perseus set off for the palace, where Polydectes and his friends were gathered at a great banquet. As he entered the banquet hall all eyes turned to him. He held up the head of Medusa and Polydectes and all his companions who had been unfriendly to Danaë were instantly turned to stone. A circle of lifeless boulders on Seriphus marks the site of this event. Now Perseus sought his mother and Dictys. He made Dictys king of the island, and with his mother and his wife he set out for Argos to find his grandfather. Acrisius, who had heard all about his glorious exploits, remembered the oracle that warned he would be killed by his grandson and fled to Larissa. Thither Perseus followed him. Some say he took part in funeral games at Larissa unaware that Acrisius was among the spectators. However that may be, in the discus throwing contest Perseus' discus was caught by the wind, struck Acrisius and killed him. Thus the oracle was fulfilled, as oracles invariably are. Perseus was reluctant to return to Argos after he had killed his grandfather, even though it was an accident. He exchanged his kingdom of Argos with his cousin Megapenthes for the kingdom of Tiryns. In his new kingdom he fortified Midea and Mycenae. Some say indeed, that Perseus founded Mycenae; that one day when he was thirsty a mushroom sprang up and provided water. He founded the city on this spot and named it Mycenae in honor of the mushroom (mykos). Perseus gave the sandals, wallet, and cap of darkness to Hermes, who restored them to the nymphs. He gave the head of Medusa to Athena. The goddess placed the head in the center of her shield, or aegis. Andromeda bore Perseus six sons: Perses, from whom the kings of Persia were said to have sprung, Alcaeus, Sthenelus, Heleus (or Aelius), Mestor, and Electryon, and one daughter, Gorgophone. As far as is known, Andromeda rejoiced in the undiluted affection of her lord, a rare occurrence for the wives of Greek heroes. Perseus was worshiped as a hero in Athens and Seriphus, and had a shrine on the road between Argos and Mycenae.

Perseus. Last king of Macedon, son of Philip V, whom he succeeded in 179 B.C. He began war with the Romans in 172 B.C. and defeated them in several engagements. The Romans elected Aemilius Paulus as consul and sent him to Greece to command the Roman forces against Perseus, whose army was encamped near Mount Olympus. Aemilius brought his forces up by an encircling movement and prepared to attack Perseus at Pydna (168 B.C.). On the eve of the battle an eclipse of the moon brought terror to the Macedonians, who took it as an omen of the eclipse of Perseus. Perseus had great treasure, but was so miserly he refused to pay his mercenaries and duped his allies. He kept his treasure but was soundly defeated by Aemilius Paulus at Pydna and fled to Pella.

From there he sailed to Samothrace and took refuge, with his wife and children, in the temple of the Dioscuri. His gold was stolen by Cretan sailors and the Macedonians, enraged by his flight, his oppressive rule, and by their defeat which they attributed to him, seized him and turned him over to Aemilius Paulus. Perseus begged to be spared the humiliation of being exhibited as a captive in a triumphal procession. Aemilius scorned him for his cowardice, and suggested that he could avoid the humiliation by committing suicide. Perseus could not bring himself to this step. With his children, his captured chariot and armor, he was paraded as a captive before the throngs of Rome (167 B.C.). In the end, some say, Perseus starved himself to death in prison. Others say the soldiers who guarded him prevented him from sleeping so that at length, worn out, he died.

Persians (pēr'zhānz, -shānz). Native inhabitants of ancient Persia. Their name is derived from the district which in antiquity was known as Persis, the modern Fars. They were originally nomadic immigrants who entered the region through Caucasia, mingling with and dominating the people already there. They were well established in the Persis region by the 6th century B.C., and under Cyrus and his successors continued to build a great empire. According to Greek legend, the Persian kings were descended from Perses, son of Perseus and Andromeda, from whom they took their name.

Persians, The. A drama by Aeschylus, produced 472 B.C. It concerns the disasters which overcame the might of Persia under Xerxes. The play can be read as a great patriotic eulogy of the outnumbered Greek forces which defeated the Persians at Salamis (480 B.C.). (Aeschylus himself fought at Marathon and probably at Salamis.) At the same time, it treats the punishment which the gods meted out to Xerxes for his presumption in defying divine law; a punishment which was delivered by human and natural forces.

The scene is in Susa, the home of the Persian kings. A chorus of Persian Elders enters. They speak of themselves as having been left in charge while Xerxes has gone off at the head of a mighty host to invade Greece. They are uneasy because they have had no news of the Persian forces. They name the leaders and allies who accompanied Xerxes on his march across the Hellespont by a bridge of boats, and seek to reassure themselves that the great Persian power is irresistible. Nevertheless, they are aware that the gods can, if they wish, make a mockery of the greatest power, and they are uneasy lest the gods have deluded Xerxes.

Atossa, mother of Xerxes, enters. She adds to their feeling of impending catastrophe by confessing to anxiety about her son's fate, and asks the Elders to interpret a dream she had that seemed to prophesy disaster for Xerxes. She dreamed two beautiful women appeared, one clad in Persian and the other in Greek dress. A feud broke out between the two; Xerxes resolved to settle it and yoked both women to his car. One of the women bore her situation proudly; the other struggled, broke the harness, and dragged the chariot violently, snapping the yoke. Xerxes was hurled to the ground. Darius, his father, came to commiserate with him and Xerxes rent his garments in grief. When she woke Atossa was disquieted. She prepared to propitiate the gods and pray them to avert evil from her son but hesitated to do so because of another omen: an eagle, pursued by a falcon, fled to the altar of Apollo for safety, but was overtaken and slain by the falcon. The Elders do not attempt to interpret her dream. They advise her to make sacrifices to the gods, offer libations to Earth, and pray to the spirit of her dead husband Darius to send blessings on Xerxes and Persia. Atossa accepts their advice, but first she would like to know something about these Athenians Xerxes has marched against. The Elders tell her where Athens is, that if Athens is subdued all Hellas will submit, that their wealth is in silver, and that they own no man to be their master. But here comes a messenger, the Elders say, and he will tell them how matters stand with Xerxes and his forces. The messenger rushes in. He cries out that disaster has overtaken the Persians at Salamis. To the questions of the Elders and Atossa he gives a list of the Persian leaders lost at Salamis, tells of the destruction of the Persian fleet in the narrow straits. To Atossa's question about the size of the Greek fleet that dared attack the Persians he replies that if numbers had counted the Persians must surely have won, for they greatly outnumbered the Greeks, but the gods sided with the Greeks. Not only was the fleet cut to pieces, he adds, but a picked body of troops who had been sent to a neighboring island to harry whatever Greeks fled there for safety had instead been destroyed by the victorious Greeks. Xerxes, watching the battle, tore his garments in despair and ordered a retreat. The Persian ships that were not destroyed put out to sea in disorder. The army, retreating overland, was harried by hunger and thirst, many perished, but the army suffered the greatest loss when they came to the Strymon River. It unseasonably froze over, and as the Persians crossed, the gods caused the rays of the sun to melt the ice and a great number were drowned.

Atossa and the Elders lament over these terrible tidings. Atossa fears for her son. The Elders fear for the nation; some now under the Persian yoke will rebel, so they think, when they hear how the might of Xerxes has been destroyed. Atossa and the Elders invoke the divinities of the nether world to send forth the spirit of Darius. The Elders, calling on the deities of Earth, eulogize Darius; they recall his wisdom and the benefits he brought Persia. The ghost of Darius is now seen to rise from his tomb. He asks why the earth groans, what is the unexpected evil that weighs down the Persians? As the Elders are reluctant to speak he addresses himself to Atossa. She tells him of the disasters the messenger has described and of the ruin of Xerxes' forces. Darius grieves that it was his son on whom these evils have fallen. He laments that Xerxes in his presumption thought he could triumph over the gods who had separated Europe and Asia by building a bridge across the Hellespont. Atossa defends her son: he had been taunted into making the expedition by constant reminders of how much his father had added to the empire. Darius lists the various rulers of Persia down through his own time and adds that none has brought such disaster to the empire as Xerxes has now done. He advises the Persians not to fight the Greeks, for though they have no such hosts of allies as the Persians, the land itself is their ally, inflicting famine and thirst on an invading army. Furthermore, Darius predicts that the picked body of troops still remaining in Hellas will be destroyed at Plataea. The Persians will now suffer their crowning disaster as punishment for their presumptuous pride and impious thoughts, for they ravaged the images of the gods in Greece and burned their temples. Because they wrought evil they will suffer an equal measure of evil. Zeus, he says, chastises overweening pride and corrects with a heavy hand. He advises Atossa to prepare to receive Xerxes, and the chorus to enjoy the day, even in the midst of troubles, for wealth is of no use to the dead. As the ghost of Darius departs, Atossa and the chorus of Elders lament. Atossa leaves for the palace to prepare for the return of her son. The Elders sing of the blessings Persia enjoyed under Darius.

Xerxes, in tattered robes, now approaches with a few of his followers. He laments the savage mood of Fortune that has brought him low, and wishes he had died with his men. The Elders question him, and learn that all the leaders for whom they inquire are dead. The most desolate picture of complete destruction of Persia's mighty army and fleet is painted by Xerxes. He advises the Elders to lift their voices in lamentation, beat their breasts, tear their hair, rend their garments, and give themselves up to mourning. The Elders respond with cries of woe for their fallen nation.

Persian Wars. In ancient Greek history, the wars between the Persians and the Greeks, commencing in 500 B.C. and ending c449 B.C. According to Herodotus, the enmity between Asia (that is, the non-Greek world beyond the Hellespont) and Greece stretched back into the mists of mythical antiquity. The Phoenicians, he says, went to Argos to trade and carried off Io along with other Argive women. Later the Greeks landed at Tyre on the Phoenician coast and stole Europa, more or less in retaliation. They then exacerbated the ill feeling between Asia and Greece by going to Colchis and carrying off Medea. In the next generation, Paris the son of Priam went to Sparta, eloped with Helen, and set off the long war that brought disaster to Troy. These were ancient causes. In 499 B.C. the Ionian Greeks revolted against their Persian overlords. The revolt was put down in 494

Persian Wars/

B.C., but not before Athenians and Eretrians had come to the aid of the Ionians and had burned the Lydian city of Sardis. Darius was so inflamed by this daring and insolent interference by the Greeks in Persian affairs that he had one servant whose sole duty was to remind him three times each day to "Remember the Athenians," and take vengeance on them. To punish them the Persians were provoked to attempt the conquest of European Greece. With this object in view, three grand expeditions were undertaken, each of which was repelled. In 492 B.C. Darius put Mardonius, his son-in-law, over all other generals and sent him out. Mardonius embarked at Cilicia, sailed along the coast, stopping along the way to remove the Ionian tyrants and establish democracies, and joined his land army at the Hellespont. From there he crossed into Europe with the intention of punishing Athens and Eretria. On the way he reconquered Thrace and Macedonia by land, and took the island of Thasus without a struggle. When his fleet was off Mount Athos a violent storm arose and destroyed many of his ships. Meantime, on land the army was attacked by Thracians, and though they were repelled and conquered, Mardonius was forced to return to Persia without fulfilling his mission of punishing Eretria and Athens. Darius was more than ever resolved on vengeance, but first he sent heralds throughout Greece demanding earth and water as token of submission to his rule. Many states and the neighboring islands submitted and gave up the tokens, but not the Athenians. Darius sent out a second expedition (490 B.C.) under Artaphernes (his young nephew), assisted by the experienced general Datis. The Persian fleet sailed from Samos. Naxos was taken on the way. Delos, from which the Delians had fled, was not only spared as a religious center, but gifts were made there by the Persians. Other islands were subdued and compelled to furnish men to the Persian army. The fleet advanced to Eretrian territory, besieged the fortress and took it through the betrayal of some prominent Eretrians. The Persians burned the temples, even as Sardis had been burned, and enslaved the populace. From Eretria the Persians proceeded to the plain of Marathon, guided thither by Hippias, exiled son of Pisistratus, who hoped to return to power in Athens by means of a Persian victory. At Marathon the Athenians, aided by the Plataeans, met them and, although vastly outnumbered, administered a resounding defeat (Sept. 12, 490 B.C.). The Persian fleet, which was relatively intact, sailed to the waters off Athens, then, without making an attempt on the city which was now defended by soldiers who had returned from Marathon, the Persians sailed away. Greece was safe for the moment. The valor and ability the Athenians had shown ennobled them among the Greeks and gave them the confidence to resist the Persians at a later date.

On hearing of the defeat of his army, Darius was more resolved than ever on the conquest of the Greeks, and set about preparing for a new expedition with great energy, but died before he could embark on it. Xerxes, his heir, was at first cool to the idea of war against the Greeks. He was persuaded by his cousin Mardonius that the Greeks must be punished and the prestige of Persian arms restored. Artabanus, his uncle, advised him against war, but yielded before the force of a dream which, according to Herodotus, both he and Xerxes had, and which commanded him to make war on Greece. In addition, exiles from Athens urged war, and the seer Onomacritus, who had come to Susa with the Pisistratidae, produced many oracles in favor of war, prudently neglecting to mention any which foretold disaster. Herodotus relates that after Xerxes had decided for war he had another dream: that he was crowned with olive branches, the boughs of which stretched to the ends of the earth, and suddenly the wreath upon his brow vanished. Soothsayers interpreted this to mean that his power would cover the earth and all men would become his subjects. For the next four years he continued his preparations for the war, so that in all, since the defeat of Marathon, nearly ten years elapsed before the third expedition was undertaken in 481-480 B.C. under Xerxes. This expedition is said to have consisted of an army of about 100,000 men, exclusive of European allies, and a fleet of 1000 ships. At the moment of departure of the expedition, the sun, in a clear and cloud-

less sky, was suddenly obscured; day became night. Xerxes was full of alarm at this omen, but the soothsayers assured him that the gods were simply foretelling to the Greeks the destruction of their cities, for it was the sun who spoke to the Greeks, whereas it was the moon who spoke to the Persians. Before the army crossed the Hellespont into Europe, spices were burned on the bridges they had constructed, and they were strewn with myrtle boughs. At sunrise Xerxes poured a libation into the sea from a golden goblet, prayed to the sun that evil would not overtake him in his conquest, and cast the golden goblet along with a golden bowl and a sword into the sea. After the whole army had crossed a prodigy occurred, says Herodotus. A mare gave birth to a hare. This signified that Xerxes would lead his great host against Greece with splendor and power but would have to run for his life to regain the spot from which he set out. But Xerxes ignored the prodigy and marched forward. His army forced the pass of Thermopylae, after a heroic defense by the Greeks under the Spartan Leonidas, for Leonidas chose to lead the fight and die himself that the oracle might be fulfilled, to wit:

Oh! ye men who dwell in the streets of broad Lacedaemon,

Either your glorious town shall be sacked
by the children of Perseus,

Or, in exchange, must all through the whole Laconian country

Mourn for the loss of a king, descendant of great Heracles. . . .

Xerxes marveled at the courage of the Spartans, and at the valor which impelled them to fight to victory or to death. He pushed on with his army and destroyed Athens (480 B.C.). But the Athenians had their own oracles and their own valor. They retired to Salamis. In the same year, 480 B.C., the Persian fleet fought the indecisive battle of Artemisium, and then tested the valor of the Athenians and their allies at Salamis. There they were completely defeated in a great sea fight (Sept. 20, 480 B.C.). Xerxes left Mardonius to prosecute the war and retreated to Persia. Mardonius fell at the battle of Plataea in 479 B.C., on the same day, according to some, that the Persian fleet under Mardontes was defeated at the battle of Mycale. Hitherto the Greeks had acted on the defensive; they now assumed the offensive, gaining the victories of the Eurymedon in 466 or 465 B.C. and of Salamis in Cyprus in 449 B.C. After the battle of Salamis negotiations for peace were opened, and, although no formal treaty was adopted, peaceable intercourse was gradually restored on the basis of existing political relations; this is known as the Peace of Callias, named for the Athenian ambassador to Artaxerxes who negotiated it. By some the name Persian Wars is restricted to the period between 500 and 479 B.C., inclusive, during which the Greeks acted on the defensive.

Persis (pēr'sis). In ancient geography, a country in Asia, lying SE of Susiana, S of Media, and W of Carmania. It was the nucleus of the Persian Empire, and corresponded nearly to the modern Fars.

Persius (pēr'shi-us, -shus). [Full name, Aulus Persius Flaccus.] Roman satirist; born at Volaterrae, in Etruria, 34 A.D.; died 62 A.D. He went to Rome when he was 12 years old and was educated there by eminent teachers of the day. His most revered teacher was Lucius Annaeus Cornutus, under whom he studied Stoic philosophy. He gave up early attempts at writing poetry and, influenced by the work of Lucilius and Horace, turned to the writing of satiric verse. His six satires, written in hexameters, are actually homilies advocating stoic ethical values; their language is obscure and strained.

Perugia (pa-rō'jā). Italian name of Perusia (q.v.).

Perusia (pè-rō'shā). City in C Italy, situated on hills above the Tiber River, N of Rome. The ancient city was one of the 12 principal cities of the Etruscan federation. The city submitted to Roman rule in 309 B.C. In 41 B.C. Octavian, the future Augustus, besieged and captured it; this is the Perusine War of the historians. Eventually becoming a colony, its name thereafter was Colonia Vibia Augusta Perusia.

Pervigilium Veneris (pēr-vi-jī'li-um ven'ēr-is). A bright and charming poem of love and springtime, the Vigil of Venus, written in trochaic meter by an anonymous but cultured pagan, perhaps in the 4th century A.D. (JJ) course, Aterno.] River in C Italy which flows into the Adriatic near the town of Pescara.

Pessinus (pes'i-nus) or Pesinus (pe-si'nus). In ancient geography, a city in Galatia, Asia Minor, situated near the Sangarius (Sakarya) River about 80 miles SW of what is now Ankara. It was long noted for the worship of Cybele.

Petalism (pet'al-izm). In ancient Syracuse, a mode of banishing citizens whose influence seemed dangerous, modeled on the ostracism at Athens, from which it differed in little except that the voter wrote the name of the person he recommended for banishment on an olive leaf and not on a tablet of earthenware, and that the stated period of banishment was five years, and not ten as at Athens. The law, which in any case was not in effect for long, was repealed 452 B.C., because it deterred the best citizens from taking part in public affairs.

Petra (pē'trā). In ancient geography, a city in Arabia Petraea. The site was early occupied on account of its proximity to the caravan route between Arabia and Egypt. From the 3rd century B.C. or earlier it was a stronghold of the Nabataeans. The site consists of a precipice-enclosed valley on the NE side of Mount Hor, approached only through narrow gorges. The sandstone rocks are brilliantly colored in many different hues, and are greatly worn by the action of water. Petra is famous for its rock-cut architectural remains, dating from after the establishment of Roman rule in 105 A.D. These remains have been looked upon by many as those of temples and palaces, but are merely the façades, many of them considerable in scale and elaborate in ornament, of rock tombs, with motifs borrowed from Assyrian, Egyptian, and Greek architecture. They gain in effectiveness by their situation and by the marvelous coloring of the rock. The buildings of the town are in an extreme state of ruin, except for the rock-cut theater.

Petronius Arbiter (pē-trō'ni-us ār'bi-tēr), Caius (also Titus). Companion of the emperor Nero, mentioned by Tacitus, Pliny the Elder, and Plutarch. An aristocrat who proved his talent and energy as governor of Bithynia, he was regarded at the emperor's court as the arbiter elegantiae or authority in matters of entertainment and good taste (hence his name). His influence, we are told by Tacitus, aroused the jealousy of Tigellinus, commander of Nero's body-guard, who falsely accused him of treason. When Petronius was placed under house arrest at his estate near Cumae he anticipated the death sentence by opening his veins. Surrounded by feasting friends, he died slowly and without the customary heroics (66 A.D.). The overwhelming majority of scholars identify Petronius with the author of the Satyricon, a novel that in its amused, somewhat cynical detachment from and satire of the contemporary scene chimes perfectly with Petronius' character. It deals with numerous topics, institutions and literary questions of the Neronian age, and in language and style shows very many parallels with Seneca. Preserved in fortunately extensive fragments, the Satyricon, while partly indecent by today's standards, is nevertheless an immensely entertaining work full of wit, satire, parody. A large part is formed by the Cena Trimalchionis (Trimalchio's Dinner), the satirical description of a banquet given by a rich and vulgar freedman. This episode comprises short stories about lycanthropy and witchcraft; other portions contain a brief epic, many poetic passages, a critique of rhetoric and art, the story of the Matron of Ephesus, and many other good things. Petronius is also the reputed author of a number of poems preserved outside the Satyricon that show genuine poetic talent and felicity of expression. (HS)

Phaea (fē'ā). In Greek legend, sometimes said to be the woman who reared the Crommyonian Sow (q.v.). This name was also applied to the sow itself.

Phaeacians (fē-ā'shānz). A legendary seafaring people who inhabited the island of Corcyra, or as some say, Scheria. According to some accounts they considered themselves to be of the blood of Uranus, because the sickle with which Cronus mutilated his father was flung into the sea by Cronus, either near their island or to form it, and its people were sprung from the drops of Uranus' blood on the sickle. Others say they were descendants of Phaeax, a son of Poseidon. And some say they emigrated to their island to get away from their noisy neighbors, the Cyclopes. As descendants of Poseidon, the Phaeacians were extraordinary navigators and mariners. Their ships traveled the seas without the aid of steersman or helm, knowing of themselves the course they must take. Muffled in misty clouds and darkness, they flew over the waters like birds. On their island the Phaeacians lived in the midst of splendid prosperity and happiness, remote from wars and often enjoying visits from the gods themselves. Traditionally they were extremely hospitable to other seafarers and never refused their aid in danger and shipwreck. The women, thanks to Athena, were as skilled in weaving as the men were in seamanship. Jason and Medea stopped among the Phaeacians, during the reign of Alcinous, and were hospitably received. Odysseus was cast ashore on their island when the raft on which he sailed from Calypso's shores was broken up in a great storm. Nausicaä, the daughter of Alcinous, encountered him on the beach and directed him to her father's magnificent palace of bronze, gold, and silver. There the Phaeacians clothed and fed him and after hearing his story promised to convey him to Ithaca in one of their ships. They gave him rich gifts and put him aboard a ship at night. While he slept the ship skimmed over the sea to Ithaca, and the sleeping Odysseus was gently put ashore. On the return to Phaeacia, Poseidon, enraged that the Phaeacians who were of his own blood had given aid, comfort, and rich treasure to his enemy, sought permission from Zeus to punish the Phaeacians. Zeus advised him to turn the ship into stone and to raise a mountain which would overshadow their island. Just as the ship was in sight of the harbor, on its way back from Ithaca, Poseidon turned it to stone, and there it can be seen to this day. On seeing this disaster Alcinous remembered that an oracle had foretold Poseidon's anger because they convoyed mortals. The Phaeacians therefore sacrificed to Poseidon, to appease him and to plead with him not to raise up a mountain over their city. Withdrawing into their battle-mentented island they resolved that henceforth they would no longer give safe escort to mortals who came to them from the sea.

Phaeax (fē'aks). In Greek mythology, a son of Corcyra and Poseidon. He was born on the island named for Corcyra and became the ancestor of the Phaeacians. Some say he piloted the Athenian fleet which carried Theseus and the other Athenian youths and maidens who were going to Crete as tribute to King Minos, because the Phaeacians were skilled pilots. And it was Phaeax who steered them away to safety after Theseus killed the Minotaur and the Athenians escaped to the ships. Theseus afterward established the Pilots' Festival in his honor.

Phaedima (fē'di-mā). A daughter of the Persian nobleman Otanes. She was one of the wives of Cambyses. After the death of Cambyses she was given as wife, as was the custom, to his successor. At her father's command she risked her life to discover that the man who was posing as Smerdis, son of Cyrus, was an impostor. She discovered this by feeling for his ears as he slept. But he had no ears, thus confirming the suspicion of her father that the man who was posing as Smerdis was really a Median magus who had had his ears lopped off as a punishment for a crime. Following the death of the impostor, Phaedima became one of the wives of Darius, who succeeded him. See Smerdis, False.

Phaedo (fē'dō) or Phaedon (fē'don). Greek philosopher, born at Elis, Greece, and active in the first part of the 4th century B.C. He was a disciple of Socrates. His name is given to a celebrated dialogue of Plato, which purports to be the last conversation of Socrates, with an account of his death.

Phaedra (fē'drā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Minos, king of Crete, and Pasiphaë. She was the sister of Ariadne. After the death of Minos, her brother Deucalion became king of Crete, and made an alliance with Theseus of Athens. To bind the alliance he gave Theseus Phaedra for wife. She bore him two sons, Acamas and Demophon. By Antiope the Amazon Theseus was the father of Hippolytus. He was a chaste and handsome youth. Theseus sent him to Troezen where he raised a temple to Artemis. Phaedra fell in love with him and followed him to Troezen. She built a temple to Aphrodite which overlooked the gymnasium where Hippolytus daily exercised. It is said that in her frustration at watching the unobtainable youth, Phaedra pierced the leaves of a nearby myrtle tree with the pin of her jeweled brooch, and that the leaves still bear the marks of her jabbings. Although she confided her feelings for Hippolytus to no one, her nurse, seeing that she ate little and slept less, soon guessed the truth. She encouraged Phaedra to send a letter to Hippolytus, confessing her love. Hippolytus, shocked to read such a letter, destroyed it and went to Phaedra to reproach her. She, fearing he might expose her, wrote a letter to Theseus in which she accused Hippolytus of actually committing the deeds she only wished he had done, and then hanged herself. Some say it was Aphrodite who caused Phaedra to fall in love with Hippolytus, because he had dedicated himself to Artemis, thus denying the power of Aphrodite, and Phaedra was the innocent victim implicated in the punishment of Hippolytus by Aphrodite.

Phaedrus (fē'drus). Athenian philosopher; born c450 B.C.; died c400 B.C. He was a friend of Socrates and is immortalized in the name of one of Plato's dialogues, the Phaedrus. In this, thought to be one of Plato's early works and noted as one of the most poetic, certain types of Greek rhetoric are attacked; the preëxistence and immortality of the soul are asserted; and the doctrine of the transmigration of souls is expounded.

Phaedrus. Roman fabulist; born c15 B.C.; died c50 A.D. Originally a Macedonian slave who was brought to Rome as a boy, he became a freedman of Augustus. His five books of fables in verse are apparently renderings of Aesopian fables current in his day. Phaedrus was the principal medieval source for the fables of Aesop (q.v.).

Phaenias (fē'ni-as) or Phanias (fan'i-as). Greek philosopher and historian; born in Lesbos; fl. last half of the 4th century B.C. He went to Athens where he was pupil and follower of Aristotle. Only fragments of his works on history and philosophy are extant.

Phaestus (fes'tus). [Also: Phaistos.] In ancient geography, a city of Crete, situated in the middle of the south side of the island, on a hill 300 feet above the plain of Mesara. To the N and W, Cretan Mount Ida, where some say Zeus was born, rises above the plain. The city is mentioned by Homer in the Iliad as one which sent men against Troy under the leadership of Idomeneus. It was one of the most ancient cities of Crete. According to legend it was founded by Minos, whose nephew Cortys, son of Rhadamanthys, later destroyed the citadel and added the area to his realm. Remains at the site show that there were three distinct periods of occupation. The first structures date from the neolithic age. In the second period, c2000 B.C., a palace was built on the site, remains of which indicate a highly developed and prosperous civilization. This palace was destroyed, or partly destroyed, c1700 B.C., by some catastrophe, either by earthquake, or by enemy raids. However, the interruption in the prosperity of Phaestus was temporary, and a second and larger palace was constructed on the ruins of the first. This too was destroyed by means unknown, c1400 B.C.; after this the site was relatively unoccupied and was ultimately crowned by a temple of the classical period. Among present remains are traces of the structures of all three periods. Work on the excavation of the site, begun in 1900 by the Italians under Federigo Halbherr and continued in subsequent years, is still proceeding. The palace, which lies on terraces of differing levels connected by large and small staircases, follows the general plan of that at Cnossus but on a smaller scale and with more refinement. The general plan of the installations on the site includes a large paved court where dances and games were held, a theater, rooms for the performance of sacrifices, with channels to collect the blood of victims, gypsum shelves for the exhibition of statues and cult objects, an ingenious system for supplying the area with water and an intricate drainage system. The palace itself, approached through a propylaeum, had a large central court with porticoes, at least on the east and west sides, a great colonnaded reception hall that was approached by a majestic stairway, megaron (central hall), guest rooms, baths, storage areas, and other chambers for the use of the royal family and those occupied in serving it. The women's quarters were separate from the men's. Only the king, by a private stairway, could pass the sentry who guarded the women's quarters. Remains of a bathroom and bath have been found. The bath was a sunken chamber, with steps leading down to it, surrounded by a balcony on which a maid might stand to pour water over her mistress. Some say, however, that such a sunken chamber had ceremonial significance, and was used for purification rites. As at Cnossus, careful and brilliant provision was made for insulating the palace against the hot sun of summer and the bitter winds that swept down from the north in winter. The plaster of the walls was mixed with straw to provide air spaces, even as is done today in the houses of the Cretan farmers. Two sets of doors, with an air space between them, protected the main chambers from drafts or heat. For light and ventilation the palace had light wells, covered at the top and with openings cut in the walls below the roof. Of the many finds at Phaestus, a clay disc that had been hardened and preserved in the fire that destroyed the palace was unique. On the two faces of the Phaestus Disc appear pictographic inscriptions in spiral form, which, according to a recent effort at decipherment, can be read as Greek, and list Cretan shrines to be visited by the pious traveler.

Phaëthon (fā'ē-thon). In Greek mythology, a son of Helius and Clymene. When his boasts that he was a son of Helius were jeered by his companions, he asked his mother to give him some proof of his paternity. Clymene advised him to go to his father's palace and question him in person. Phaëthon joyfully set out for the palace, which some say was in Colchis. On appearing before Helius he was assured that he was indeed his son, Helius even offering to grant him any boon he demanded as proof. Phaëthon immediately asked permission to drive his father's chariot (the sun) across the heavens. Helius, regretting his promise, tried to persuade Phaëthon to choose some other boon. He knew that Phaëthon would not be able to control the fiery horses that drew the chariot, and that such an expedition would end in disaster. But Phaëthon insisted and as Helius had given his oath he now sorrowfully fulfilled it. As Helius had foreseen, Phaëthon had not the strength to control the horses, nor was he familiar with the path the chariot must take across the heavens. Moreover he was frightened by the monsters—the Scorpion, Crab, Serpent, and others—that menaced the path. The horses, missing the firm hand that usually reined them in, charged about the heavens in a frenzy of freedom. They soared so high that the heat of the chariot did not reach the earth and earth shivered, but the North Star became warm. Then they swooped down, setting fire to the clouds and coming so close to earth that it burst into flames. Some say the brown people of Ethiopia got their color when the chariot came too close and scorched them. The heat of the chariot, skimming so close to the earth, dried up rivers and set the land afire. Zeus, to preserve the earth and to protect Olympus from burning, hurled a thunderbolt and struck Phaëthon. He fell, blazing, into the Eridanus River. The horses broke from the yoke and scattered across the heavens. Helius kept the earth dark for a day in his grief for his son, after which he corralled his horses and resumed his daily course through the heavens. Nymphs of the Eridanus buried Phaëthon and erected his tomb. His mother and sisters came weeping to the river bank. The sisters lamented so grievously that the gods in pity turned them into poplar trees which stand on the river bank, weeping tears of amber.

Phaëthon. In Greek mythology, a son of Eos. His father was Cephalus, whom Eos had loved at sight and carried away from his rightful wife, Procris. Aphrodite stole Phaëthon and carried him off to be an attendant in one of her most sacred temples. He was called Adymnus by the Cretans; the name meant the morning and the evening star to them.

Phaëthon. Named by Homer as one of the ever-young steeds that draw the chariot of the Sun.

Phalanthus (fa-lan'thus). According to tradition, a Spartan hero who founded Tarentum in Italy (traditional date, 707 B.C.). Before he set out he was told by the oracle at Delphi that when he felt rain under a cloudless sky (aethra) he would win both a territory and a city. He didn't give much thought to the oracle and set out for Italy in his ships. On the way he was shipwrecked, but rescued and borne to shore by a dolphin. As he won many victories over the barbarians of Italy but took no cities, he remembered the oracle. He thought it was impossible for rain ever to fall from a cloudless sky and that therefore the oracle meant he would never take a city. He thus despaired. His wife sought to comfort him. She took his head between her knees and began to pick lice out of his hair. Seeing him so unhappy she wept for him, and covered his head with her tears. Then Phalanthus realized the meaning of the oracle, for his wife's name was Aethra. On that very night he seized the city on the Taras river from the barbarians. This city was named Tarentum, after Taras, a son of Poseidon. Coins of Tarentum showed Phalanthus riding on the dolphin's back in memory of the divine protection that brought him to Italy.

Phalaris (fal'a-ris). Tyrant of Acragas in Sicily from c570 to c554 B.C., notorious for his cruelty (notably his human sacrifices in a heated brazen bull). The inventor of the bull was the first victim to be roasted alive. The spuriousness of some 148 epistles which passed under his name was shown by the classical scholar Richard Bentley in his Epistles of Phalaris (1697).

Phalereus (fa-lé'rös, fa-lir'ë-us), Demetrius. See Demetrius Phalereus.

Phalerum (fa-lir'um). [Also: Phaleron.] In ancient geography, a seaport in Attica, Greece, on a small bay S of Athens and E of Piraeus. According to legend, Theseus sailed from here on his way to Crete with the tribute of youth and maidens demanded by King Minos. Shrines of Nausithous and Phaeax, pilots of Theseus on this voyage, were erected in Phalerum, and the Cybernesia (Steering Festival) was held in their honor. It was from this port also that Menestheus set sail with his fleet for the Trojan War. In ancient times Phalerum was the port of Athens, but after the time of Themistocles it was abandoned as the port of Athens because he built up and fortified the Piraeus, a more advantageous and better protected location.

Phalerus (fa-lé'rus). In Greek legend, a son of Alcon, the skilled archer and companion of Heracles. Phalerus was also skillful in the art of archery. He joined Jason on the expedition for the Golden Fleece, and was the representative of Athens in the Argo.

Phanagoria (fan-a-gō'ri-a). In ancient geography, a Greek colony situated on the peninsula now called Taman, opposite the Crimea. Phanes (fā'nēz). An Orphic deity. According to some accounts, Phanes was born from a silver egg laid by Nyx, and afterward created the earth, sky, sun, and moon. Other accounts have him born from an egg fashioned by Cronus in the Aether. He is also called Eros, Ericapaeus, Metis, and Protogonus (First-born).

Phantasus (fan'ta-sus). According to some accounts, a child of Nyx (Night), and the brother of Hypnos (Sleep) and Thanatos (Death). Others say he was a son of Hypnos (Latin, Somnus). Phantasus is the god of dreams who causes dreams of inanimate objects. His brothers are Morpheus, Icelus, and Phobetor.

Phaon (fā'on). Legendary boatman of Mytilene, loved by the poetess Sappho. According to the legend, when old and ugly he carried the goddess Aphrodite across the sea and would accept no payment. For this she rewarded him with youth and beauty. Sappho is said to have leaped into the sea because her love for him was not returned.

Pharae (fā'rē, fār'ē). See Pherae.

Pharnabazus (fār-na-bā'zus). Persian satrap of Phrygia; fl. c400 B.C. After the complete failure of the Athenian expedition to Sicily (415-413 B.C.) Pharnabazus, with the idea of recovering the Athenian cities of Asia Minor for Persia, made an alliance with Sparta. He was a loyal and energetic ally, aiding the Spartans with men and above all, with money, and providing vigorous support to them to the end of the Peloponnesian War. Though he continued as a friend of Sparta he did not approve of the high-handed methods of the Spartan leader Lysander in Asia Minor and secured his recall. When the Spartans waged war against the Persian king Artaxerxes they treacherously turned on Pharnabazus (399 B.C.). King Agesilaus led an army against his satrapy and plundered it up to the walls of the city where Pharnabazus lived (395 B.C.). Pharnabazus asked for a meeting with Agesilaus. Agesilaus arrived first and sat down on the grass. Members of Pharnabazus' train came and began to spread rich rugs for their master, but when he saw that Agesilaus sat simply on the ground he took his seat beside him and waved away his minions with their

luxurious carpets. He addressed the Spartan king. He reminded him that he had ever been a loyal and generous friend of Sparta, that he had never betrayed his trust as other satraps had done, but had throughout helped Sparta in the war against Athens. Now the Spartans rewarded him by ravaging his province so that he could hardly get his dinner except by picking up the scraps the Spartans left. Was this, he asked with dignity, a fitting reward for the services he had rendered to Sparta? Agesilaus answered that since Sparta was at war with the Persian king she must harass and fight against all the parts of his empire, including the province of Pharnabazus. Agesilaus invited him to revolt against the king and to join the Spartans as an ally. Pharnabazus displayed the same loyalty to his king as he had shown as an ally of Sparta. If Artaxerxes, he replied, replaced him and put another in command over him as satrap, he would be glad to become the friend and ally of Sparta. But as long as he held a post of command under the king he would support him with all his strength and would fight against his enemies with all his might. Agesilaus was so impressed with his loyalty that he agreed to withdraw from the territory of Pharnabazus at once, and to respect it in the future. Afterward, Pharnabazus joined the Athenian admiral Conon to his fleet, and with him defeated the Spartans at Cnidus, 394 B.C. The following year he accompanied Conon with a fleet and attacked the shores of Laconia. On his return to his satrapy he left the fleet with Conon, and gave the Athenians money to rebuild the Long Walls and to fortify the Piræus. He opposed the King's Peace (387 B.C.), brought about by Spartan diplomacy, but accepted it on being given a daughter of King Artaxerxes in marriage. He attempted (385 and 373 B.C.) unsuccessfully to invade Egypt.

Pharnaces I (fär'na-sēz). King of Pontus (c185–169 B.C.). He conquered Sinope in 183 B.C., and unsuccessfully made war on Eumenes II of Pergamum.

Pharnaces II. King of Pontus (c63–47 B.C.); son of Mithridates VI (Mithridates the Great) of Pontus. On the suicide of Mithridates in 63 B.C., he revolted and made himself master of that part of his father's dominions lying along the Cimmerian Bosphorus. He afterward invaded Pontus, but was defeated by Caesar at Zela in 47 B.C. In the triumph celebrated at Rome for this victory, one of the chariots carried the inscription: "Veni, vidi, vici" (I came, I saw, I conquered).

Pharos (fä'ros, fār'os). An island in the mouth of the Nile, opposite ancient Alexandria. It was one of the legendary homes of the sea-god Proteus, and there he kept one of his herds of seals. Menelaus was becalmed on Pharos for 20 days on his way home from the Trojan War, and succeeded in leaving the island only after catching and consulting Proteus. Ptolemy I and Ptolemy II, Greek kings of Egypt, erected a celebrated light-house on Pharos, which was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world.

Pharsala (fär'sä-lä). See Pharsalus.

Pharsalia (fär-sä'li-a). Epic poem in ten books, by Lucan (Marcus Annaeus Lucanus), on the civil war between Pompey and Caesar.

Pharsalus (fär-sä'lus). In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, about 23 miles S of Larissa; the modern Pharsala. It is celebrated for the great battle fought near it, June 29 or Aug. 9, 48 B.C., in which Caesar with 22,000 legionaries and 1000 cavalry totally defeated Pompey and his army of 45,000 legionaries and 7000 cavalry.

Phaselis (fä-sē'lis). In ancient geography, a seaport in Lycia, Asia Minor, situated on the W shore of the Pamphylian Gulf (the modern Gulf of Antalya). According to tradition, the spear of Achilles was dedicated in the sanctuary of Athena here.

Phasis (fä'sis). [Modern name, Rion.] In ancient geography, a river of Colchis emptying into the Euxine Sea. Here the Argonauts anchored before approaching King Aëtes with a demand for the return of the Golden Fleece.

Phageus (fē'jūs). In Greek legend, a son of Alpheus. He was a king of Psophis. He purified Alcmaeon for the murder of his mother, Eriphyle, and gave his daughter Arsinoë to Alcmaeon for a wife. Alcmaeon betrayed Arsinoë and married Callirrhoë, without letting either Phageus or Arsinoë know of his new attachment. When Phageus learned of it he ordered his sons to kill Alcmaeon, and they did so before Arsinoë's eyes. She was still unaware of Alcmaeon's treachery, and would not listen to her father's explanation of it. She prayed that her father and her brothers would die before the new moon, to avenge the death of Alcmaeon. Phegeus gave her away as a slave. Meantime, Callirrhoe learned of the murder of Alcmaeon and prayed that her infant sons by him would grow up overnight and avenge their father's death. Her prayer was answered; her sons found the sons of Phegeus, killed them and Phegeus too, before the appearance of the new moon in the heavens. Thus the prayers of both betrayed wives of Alcmaeon were answered.

Pheidon (fi'don). King of Argos; fl. probably in the middle of the 7th century B.C. He reunited the practically independent Argive cities under his strong and able rule and Argos again played a prominent part in the affairs of the Peloponnesus. He marched at the head of an army across Arcadia to Olympia, seized the management of the Olympic Games from the Eleans, and presided over the festival himself. Afterward he restored control of the games to Pisa, in whose territory the sanctuary of Zeus at Olympia was, and who had presided over the games until Elis wrested control away from them. Pheidon also introduced a system of weights and measures into Argos which was adopted also in the Peloponnesus and in Athens. He is also said to have struck the first Greek coins in Aegina.

Phemius (fē'mi-us). In the Odyssey, a minstrel and bard, who entertained the suitors of Penelope during the absence of Odysseus. Odysseus spared him when he returned and destroyed the suitors, because Phemius had sung for them against his will, and because the person of a poet and singer was sacred.

Phemonoe (fē-mō'nō-ē). According to some accounts, the first priestess of Apollo at Delphi, and the first to sing in hexameter verse. She predicted the death of the dragon that guarded the sacred spring at Delphi at Apollo's hands, and his purification by the Cretans, in the following verses:

At close quarters a grievous arrow shall Apollo shoot

At the spoiler of Parnassus; and of his blood-guilt

The Cretans shall cleanse his hands, but the renown shall never die.

Pheneüs (fe'nē-us). In ancient geography, a city in N Arcadia, Greece, on a river of the same name. The river once flooded its banks, and marks on the surrounding hills showed how high the water had risen. Some say that before Heracles went to Thebes he dug two chasms at the base of the hills to draw off the river, and dug a ditch through the plain to drain the rivers flowing into the Pheneüs and to prevent flooding. The city was said to have been founded by Pheneüs, an Arcadian aboriginal for whom it was named. On the acropolis was a temple of Athena Tritonia. There was also an image of Poseidon Hippios and a sanctuary of Artemis Hippias (Horse-finder), both founded by Odysseus, who found in Pheneüs the mares he had lost and for which he had been searching all over Greece. Thereafter Odysseus pastured his mares in Pheneüs and left instructions for their care. The sanctuary of Apollo at Pheneüs was said to have been founded by Heracles in gratitude for his victory over Augeas and the Eleans. Iphicles, brother of Heracles, was wounded in the fighting. In a fainting condition he was brought to Pheneüs, where he died. His tomb is in Pheneüs, where he was worshiped as a hero. There was a sanctuary of Eleusinian Demeter at Pheneüs, wherein the ritual was the same as at Eleusis. The people of Pheneüs claimed that Demeter visited their city in her wanderings, that Damithales and Trisaules welcomed her, and that she gave to them all manner of pulse except the bean, which the Pheneatians considered to be impure. Above all, the Pheneatians worshiped Hermes, and celebrated the Hermaea in his honor. Behind the temple of Hermes in Pheneüs was the grave of his son Myrtilus. Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, was flung into the sea by Pelops. The Pheneatians said his body was washed ashore, that they recovered it, and brought it to Pheneüs, where he was thereafter worshiped as a hero in rites performed at night.

Pherae (fē'rē). In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, about 25 miles SE of Larissa. According to legend, it was the home of Admetus and Alcestis. In the 4th century B.C. it became an important power under the tyrant Jason, who united Thessaly under his command. The later revolt of Thessaly against the tyrants of Pherae presented Philip II of Macedon with an opportunity to extend his power into Greece.

Pherae or Pharae (fa'rē). [Modern name, Kalamai or Kalamata.] City in Messenia, on the Gulf of Messenia, said to have been founded by Pharis, a son of Hermes and Phylodameia, one of the daughters of Danaus. Pherae was one of the seven gift cities offered by Agamemnon to Achilles if he would compose his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to battle in the Trojan war. Diocles, prince of Pherae, sent his twin sons Orsilochus and Crethon to accompany the Greeks in the war against Troy. They were slain in battle by Aeneas. Diocles entertained Telemachus on his journey to Sparta to seek news of his father after the Trojan War. Following the death of Diocles, Nichomachus and Gorgasus, sons of Machaon and grandsons of Asclepius, succeeded to the kingdom. The Pheraeans raised a sanctuary to them, for they naturally had healing powers, and a temple of Tyche (Fortune). At Pherae there was also an oracle of Hermes, which was much consulted by the sick. The first chance words that were heard on leaving the oracle constituted the oracular answers to questions that had been asked of it.

Phereclus (fer'e-klus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Tecton. He was especially loved by Athena, who gave him great skill and cunning in all kinds of handwork. Phereclus was the builder of the ships which Paris used when he carried off Helen. In the war that was caused by this abduction, Phereclus was slain by Meriones.

Pherecrates (fēr-ek'ra-tēz). Greek writer of Attic comedy, an older contemporary of Aristophanes, who won his first victory in 437 B.C. He wrote on topical matters, such as the impudence of slaves and an attack on a new style of music; and he was also intrigued by the idea of a possible utopia. In his play Miners, now lost, he described a golden age that is taking place somewhere under the earth. His one political drama was an attack on Alcibiades. Fragments of his work survive.

Pherecydes (fer-e-sī'dēz). Greek chronicler, a native of the island of Lerus; fl. 5th century B.C. He lived at Athens, where he was a contemporary of Herodotus and Thucydides, and compiled a chronicle, in ten books, of myths connected with the early history of Attica. It was he who related how the infant Dionysus was nursed by the Hyades, and he, also, who told how Zeus hid Elara from Hera in a cave under the earth, where she bore him Tityus.

Pherecydes of Syros (sī'ros). Greek mythologist and cosmologist, born on the island of Syros and active in the middle of the 6th century B.C. He is sometimes reckoned among the Seven Wise Men of ancient Greece. Fragments of his work on the origin of the world and of the gods survive. He was an Orphic and is said to have originated the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. He was one of the earliest writers of Greek prose.

Pheres (fer'ēz). In Greek legend, a son of Cretheus and his niece Tyro. He was the brother of Aeson and Amythaon, and the uncle of Jason, whom he supported in his claim to the throne of Iolcus. Pheres was the founder and king of Pherae, in Thessaly. He was the father of Admetus, who succeeded him, and of Idomene and Periapis, who was sometimes said to be the mother of Patroclus.

Pheres. A son of Jason and Medea. See Alcimedea.

Pheretima (fer-e-tī'ma). Mother of Arcesilaus, king of Cyrene and descendant of that Battus who founded the kingdom. Arcesilaus was driven out of his kingdom by a revolt and fled to Samos. Pheretima went to Salamis in Cyprus for refuge, and asked King Evelthon who controlled Salamis to give her an army that she might restore her son. The king gave her many rich gifts which she accepted, saying each time that she did so that the gift was a good thing, but what she really wanted was an army. At last the king gave her a golden spindle and wool for spinning, and told her this, not armies, was the kind of gift he gave to women. Arcesilaus, however, managed to recover his throne and Pheretima returned to Cyrene with him. Then he flouted an oracle, was forced to flee, and was slain in the market-place of Barca whither he had gone. Pheretima this time fled to Egypt and demanded that the Persian governor there avenge her son's death. The governor turned over an army and a fleet to her. Herodotus, who tells this story, says the troubles of Pheretima were but a pretext for the expedition; the real reason was the desire of the Persians to conquer Libya. In any case, the forces of the Persians besieged Barca, and after nine months took it by a fraud. The leading citizens were handed over to Pheretima who crucified them and maimed their wives. But, ends Herodotus, Pheretima did not escape the anger which the gods hold for those who mete out over-harsh punishment. On her return to Egypt her body was infested with worms that ate her living flesh and so caused her death.

Phiale (fi'ā-lē). In ancient Greece, a flat, saucer-shaped vase used for pouring religious libations.

Phidias (fid'i-as). Greek sculptor; the son of Charmides. He was born probably at Athens, c490 B.C.; died c430 B.C. He studied with Hegias of Athens, and later with Ageladas of Argos, who may have come to Athens in the time of Cimon. He became later, under Pericles, a counselor in political affairs at Athens as well as chief sculptor, and was a sort of supervisor of public works. Among his first works were 13 figures at Delphi ordered by Cimon, son of Miltiades, to commemorate the victory at Marathon, in which Miltiades was represented among gods and heroes. To this early period are ascribed also the Athena Area at Plataea, and the Athena Promachus, or bronze colossus, on the Acropolis at Athens. This figure was probably more than 30 feet high, and could be seen for a great distance. The statue, made in 460-450 B.C., was the largest ever made in Athens. The pedestal was discovered in 1845. The statue of Olympian Zeus at Elis, his greatest work and described by Pausanias, is supposed to have been about 42 feet high, seated and holding a Nike (Victory) in his hand. The flesh was of ivory and the drapery of gold, with inlaid or inscribed decoration. The throne itself, which rose above the head of the statue, was elaborately carved and decorated. Both throne and statue were surrounded with statues and paintings. Ancient writers also selected for special distinction his Lemnian Athena, dedicated c450 B.C. By 444 B.C. Phidias must have been at Athens, and intimately associated with Pericles in his transformation of the city. All the great monuments of Athens, including the Parthenon, were erected at this time, within a period not longer than 20 years. The work of Phidias culminated in the Athena Parthenos, a chryselephantine (gold and ivory) statue of Athena in the cella of the Parthenon. It was finished and consecrated in 438 B.C. The figure was about 38 feet high, standing, and held a Nike in her right hand. The Varvakeion Athena at Athens (discovered in 1881) represents the statue, but inadequately. The enormous expense of these works, which was paid with money exacted from the allies of Athens, brought both Pericles and Phidias into difficulties. According to Plutarch, Phidias was accused of appropriating the gold devoted to the statue to his own use. The gold was removed, weighed, and found to be intact. He was then accused of sacrilege in representing Pericles and himself on the shield of the goddess. In one version he was condemned, thrown into prison, and died there, possibly of poison. The actual style of Phidias is best represented in the well-known fragments of the frieze of the Parthenon. Among the independent statues by Phidias was an Amazon at Ephesus which took second prize in competition with Polyclitus. This is supposed to be represented by the Amazon Mattei of the Vatican.

Phidippides (fi-dip'i-dēz). Athenian herald and athlete. When the Persians landed at Marathon (490 B.C.), he was sent as a courier from Athens to Sparta, asking the latter city's help against the invader. On the way he was met by Pan, near Mount Parthenius. The god asked him why the Athenians, to whom he had always shown himself friendly, neglected him, and promised to aid them in the coming struggle with the Persians. Phidippides continued his journey to Sparta, covering the 150-mile distance in two days, according to Herodotus. In Sparta he delivered the Athenian call for aid. The Spartans, highly sympathetic, promised to go to the assistance of the Athenians, but regretted that for religious reasons they could not set out until the full of the moon. When they did arrive the battle was over; the Athenians, with Plataean aid, had soundly beaten the Persians at Marathon. On his return to Athens Phidippides reported his conversation with Pan, and after the battle of Marathon the Athenians raised a sanctuary to the god under the Acropolis, for they considered that he had helped them as he promised, and caused the Persians to withdraw in panic before the Athenian onslaught.

Phigalia (fi-gā'li-ā). In ancient geography, a town in the SW corner of Arcadia, Greece. According to tradition, the town was founded by Phigalus, a son of Lycaon. Nearby, on Mount Elaius, was a cave, sacred to Black Demeter. The Phigalians said that after Poseidon in the form of a stallion ravished Demeter, who had taken the form of a mare to escape his attention while she was searching for her lost daughter in Arcadia, Demeter gave birth to a girl child, whom they called "The Mistress." She then clothed herself in black and shut herself up in this cave on Mount Elaius. Following this the crops throughout the land died, and none could find the goddess to restore fertility to the land. At last Pan, roaming through Arcadia, discovered her whereabouts and reported to Zeus. The Phigalians said Zeus sent the Fates to appeal to her and thus appeased her wrath. The Phigalians set up an image of the goddess in the cave where she had hidden. It was a figure of a woman seated on a rock, but instead of a woman's head it had a horse's head ("Mare-headed Demeter"), out of which grew serpents and strange beasts. In one of her hands the image bore a dolphin; in the other was a dove. In succeeding years the image was burned, which was a sign that the king himself would soon die. Thereafter the Phigalians did not replace the image, and they neglected the festivals of Deo, another name for Demeter. Barrenness then fell on their land and they consulted the oracle at Delphi. The priestess advised them to honor Deo.

After this the Phigalians resumed their care of Demeter's shrine and honored her more than ever. They caused the sculptor Onatas to make a new image. On the altar built before the cave, worshipers offered grapes, other cultivated fruits, honeycombs, and raw wool. Near Phigalia was a temple of Apollo designed by Ictinus. See Bassae.

Philammon (fi-lā'mon). In mythology, a son of Chione and Apollo, twin-born with Autolycus, whose father was Hermes. Philammon was noted for his singing and his playing on the lyre. See Chione, daughter of Daedalion.

Philemon (fi-lē'mon, fi-). See Baucis and Philemon.

Philemon. Greek poet of the New Comedy, born c360 B.C. either at Soli in Cilicia, or at Syracuse in Sicily. He died at an extremely advanced age at Athens, c262 B.C. He came to Athens early in life and appeared as an author in 330 B.C. The grant of Athenian citizenship to Philemon is known through inscriptions. His chief rival was the poet Menander, whom he eclipsed many times in the contests, as in his own age the sharp comedy of Philemon on subjects taken from ordinary life was more appealing than the delicate wit of Menander. It is said that he passed some time at the court of the king of Egypt. Of the 97 plays he wrote only fragments survive. He wrote the plays on which the Mercator, the Mostellaria, and the Trinummus of Plautus were based.

Philetaerus (fil'ē-tē'rus). Greek poet, son of Aristophanes; writer of Middle Comedy. Titles of 13 of his works survive.

Philetas (fi-lē'tas). Greek poet and prose writer; born on the island of Cos. He was a younger contemporary of Demosthenes and was active in the second half of the 4th century B.C. As a young student he was so thin that the comic poets said of him that he would have blown away if he hadn't carried lead in his shoes. He acted as tutor to Ptolemy II in Alexandria and to the poet Theocritus. Philetas was one of the first to write Alexandrian elegy. The love elegies he wrote for his mistress Battis, or Bittis, were much admired at Alexandria and Rome. Only fragments of them survive. He also wrote on Homer and wrote an epyllion (miniature epic) about the intrigue of Odysseus and Polymela.

Philia (fi-lī'ā). In mythology, a nymph of the island of Naxos. According to some accounts, she helped care for the infant Dionysus when he was sent to Naxos by Zeus for safe-keeping.

Philip I (fil'ip). Legendary third king of Macedonia. According to Herodotus, he was the son of Argaeus and the grandson of Perdiccas.

Philip I/Philip II

This Perdiccas was a descendant of the Heraclid Temenus, who fled from Argos to Illyria and thence to Macedonia which, with his two brothers, he brought under his control. Perdiccas was succeeded by Argaeus, who was in turn succeeded by Philip I.

Philip II. King of Macedon (359–336 B.C.), born 382 B.C.; assassinated at Aegae, the old capital of Macedonia, in 336 B.C. He was the son of Amyntas II and Eurydice, and the father of Alexander the Great. Philip lived some years as a youth at Thebes, whither he had been taken as a hostage (367 B.C.), and it was from the Boeotians, under the guidance of Epaminondas whom he knew and admired, that he received his military training. For some reason he was permitted to return to Macedonia (364 B.C.). The Macedonian kings, from their ancient fortress capital at Aegae, had power over all the area on the north and northwest coasts of the Thermaic Gulf (ancient Myrtoan Sea, modern Gulf of Salonika). Beyond this area of relatively complete control, their power extended to the borders of the Illyrians in the west and to those of the Paeonians in the north, but the tribes within the region, with the active assistance of the Illyrians and Paeonians, continually contested Macedonian rule. King Perdiccas, older brother of Philip, was slain (359 B.C.), in one of the frequent wars with the Illyrians. His son Amyntas, the legitimate heir, was a child. Philip became guardian of Amyntas and immediately undertook to overcome the domestic and foreign enemies of Macedonia. His first problem was to beat back the pretenders to the throne. He defeated an Athenian fleet that came to the aid of one of them. Out of respect and admiration for the Athenians, he released without ransom those whom he had taken prisoner. His other rivals were also repulsed. The Macedonian kings were of Greek stock and Philip's lifelong policy was to identify himself with Greece and Greek culture. Having secured his power at home he next subdued the Paeonians and the Illyrians (358 B.C.), thus clearly establishing his control over his troublesome neighbors. In the same year he made a secret agreement with the Athenians by which he undertook to recapture their colony of Amphipolis on the coast of western Thrace in return for the free city of Pydna, on the west coast of the Thermaic Gulf. He took Amphipolis (358) which commanded the gold mines of Mount Pangaeus in Thrace, deceived the Athenians and kept it. As they had been perfectly willing to betray Pydna they had no just grounds to cry treachery against Philip. This did not prevent them from doing so, however. He fortified Crenides, a gold-mining settlement on the coast of Thrace opposite the island of Thasus, and renamed it Philippi for himself. The capture of Amphipolis and the fortified settlement of Philippi gave him control of a gold-mining area which made Macedonia the richest state in Greece. About this time he abandoned the old inland capital at Aegae and moved his court to Pella, somewhat nearer the sea. He took Pydna and Potidaea and handed them over to the Olynthian Confederacy. Wielding supreme authority, he now set aside his nephew and took the title of king. The next year was devoted to consolidating his power and improving his army. Men of all tribes were put under arms and had constant practice in actual warfare. The Macedonian phalanx, so skillfully and successfully used by Philip and later by his son, was organized and drilled into a mobile, effective weapon. In 357 he married Olympias, daughter of a prince of Epirus, a stormy and mystic princess who ultimately caused his death. In 356 she bore his famous son Alexander. He captured Methone (c353), the last city of Athens on the Thermaic Gulf, and on the invitation of the Thessalians, he marched into Thessaly to take part in the Sacred War against Phocis. He was forced to withdraw by the Phocians, but the following year he returned and made himself master of Thessaly, having decisively beaten the Phocians who were in temporary control there. At Thermopylae (352) he was momentarily checked by a force sent by Athens, Sparta, and Achaea to oppose his descent into Greece. In the same year he carried on successful campaigns in Thrace.

By 352 B.C. Philip had organized a formidable army and secured his treasury by control of the gold mines on the coasts of Thrace. He had subdued the rebellious tribes on his borders and won control of the lands along the north Aegean from Thermopylae to the Propontis. His ambition was to unite all

Greece under the overlordship of Macedonia and to bring the Greek culture which he admired, and of which he considered himself an heir, to Macedonia. He admired Athens above all Greek states and would have preferred to win her friendship. But Athens rejected his friendly overtures. The city that had once been the leader of the Greek world hoped to recover her power in the Aegean and to bring down Macedonia. At about this period Demosthenes in Athens began delivering the speeches known as the Philippics, warning the Greeks that Philip would eventually conquer all Greece unless he were opposed. On the other hand, there were some who saw in Philip a potential uniter of the quarreling Greek states. Their view did not prevail. Athens took every opportunity, no matter how flimsy and dangerous to herself and her interests, to oppose Philip. In 349 Philip marched against Chalcidice to punish Olynthus, which had betrayed him in collusion with Athens. Most of the cities of Chalcidice submitted without a contest. Those that did not were taken by force and destroyed, as was Stagira, a city which he later restored and repopulated in honor of the philosopher Aristotle, whom he had invited to become tutor to his son Alexander. In 348 Philip took Olynthus and destroyed it completely. The orations of Demosthenes known as the Olynthiacs, whose purpose was to stir the Athenians to aid Olynthus, resulted in the sending of an Athenian force to the rescue of Olynthus. But the Athenians arrived too late. Olynthus had fallen; the city was razed and its citizens sold into slavery. Philip maintained his tolerant spirit toward Athens; envoys sent from there to Pella were courteously received. A peace was made but, thanks to the intransigence of Demosthenes, the terms were not so broad as to include the alliance between Athens and Macedonia, which Philip wanted. When, as a result of the Sacred War, Phocis was expelled from the Amphictyonic Council (346 B.C.), Macedonia took her place, and Philip presided over the Pythian Games held in the same year. In 342, by campaigns in Thrace, he made the Thracian kingdom a dependency of Macedonia and built the city of Philippopolis there as a center of Macedonian influence. In 340-339 he besieged Perinthus and Byzantium. Athens supported his enemies in the region, and without a fleet his sieges were unsuccessful. In 339 the Amphictyonic Council called on him for aid against the Locrians of Amphissa in a new Sacred War. Philip at once answered the summons. He captured Amphissa, and then went into Boeotia where Athens and Thebes, alarmed at his growing influence in Greece, had united to oppose him. He completely defeated their combined forces at Chaeronea (338 B.C.). He placed a Macedonian garrison over Thebes, but true to his policy of respect and friendship for Athens (which was very shabbily rewarded on the whole), he treated Athens leniently. He released the Athenian prisoners without ransom and gave Oropus to Athens, but compelled her to surrender the Chersonesus to Macedonia. He returned the Athenians who fell in the battle of Chaeronea to Athens for burial, under a guard of honor that included his son. The Athenians set up a statue of Philip in the agora in gratitude for his generosity. After this, Philip marched into the Peloponnesus which submitted without a struggle, except for Sparta, which suffered devastation at his hands for its obstinacy.

Philip was now master of all Greece. He summoned all the Greek states to a congress at Corinth. All except Sparta sent representatives. In the following year (337 B.C.) he was elected commander of the Greek forces to liberate the Greek cities of Asia Minor from the Persians, and to avenge the barbarous acts against the Greeks and their gods committed by the Persians in the days of Xerxes. An advance expedition was sent to the Hellespont under Parmenio, but Philip was assassinated before he could take the field. Despite his genius as a conqueror and administrator he could not keep order in his own household. His wife Olympias, whose reputation was not stainless (to such a degree that it was whispered that Philip was not the father of her great son Alexander), became inflamed at the infidelities of Philip. He had conceived a profound distaste for her when he found a serpent lying beside her as she slept. He had attachments with many women, some of whom were temporarily acknowledged as wives in the polygamous Macedonian court. He fell in love with

Philip III/Philistus

Cleopatra, niece of his general Attalus, and added to the fury of Olympias by definitely casting her aside to marry Cleopatra. At the wedding feast, Attalus proposed a toast and publicly hoped for a legitimate heir. Alexander dashed a cup of wine in the face of Attalus for the insult to his mother. Philip rose to slay his son with his sword, but tripped over a couch as he lunged at him. With scorn, Alexander pointed to his father as a "man who would pass from Europe to Asia but trips in passing from couch to couch." After this Alexander fled the court of Philip and went with his mother to Epirus. When a son was born to Philip and Cleopatra, Alexander feared lest his place in the succession be disturbed. The fire kindled in Olympias by her supposed wrongs had not in the least cooled. She found, with Alexander's knowledge, a tool for her longed-for vengeance. At the marriage of Philip's daughter to the king of Epirus, a pawn of Olympias named Pausanias rushed at Philip as he marched in the wedding procession and stabbed him with a Celtic dagger. Pausanias was caught and killed; Olympias, sister of the bridegroom, was avenged, as she thought, and Alexander's succession was assured. Philip's death fulfilled an oracular pronouncement. The oracle of Trophonius had warned him to beware of a chariot, and because of this Philip never entered one. But it was to no avail: on the ivory hilt of the dagger Pausanias plunged into his side was engraved the figure of a chariot. Philip had done what no Greek state was strong enough to do: he united Greece. His reign marks the end of the old city-state system in Greece and the growth of a Greek nation. By his organization of the army and his selection of generals, he prepared the way for Alexander's conquests.

Philip III (of Macedon). [Also: Philip III Arrhidaeus.] King of Macedon 323–317 B.C.; murdered 317 B.C. He was an illegitimate son of Philip II. He was proclaimed king by the troops after Alexander's death in 323 B.C. His own death was caused by Olympias, widow of Philip II and mother of Alexander.

Philip IV (of Macedon). King of Macedon; son of Cassander. He reigned for a few months c297 B.C.

Philip V (of Macedon). King of Macedon (220–179 B.C.); born 238 B.C.; died 179 B.C. He was a son of Demetrius II. His father died while he was still a child, and the kingdom was governed by a regent, a cousin of Philip's. Philip assumed complete power when the regent died, 220 B.C. He was at war with the Aetolian League (220–217), was allied with Carthage and at war with Rome (later also with the Aetolian League) 214–205 B.C., and began the second war against Rome in 200. He was defeated by Flaminius at Cynoscephalae in 197 B.C., and was thereafter at peace with the Romans, recognizing them as his masters and concentrating on his own Macedonian kingdom. Philip's reign marks the disappearance of Greece as a world power.

Philippi (fi-lip'i). In ancient geography, a city in Macedonia, about 73 miles NE of Thessalonica. It was founded by Philip II of Macedon in 358 B.C., and is famous as the site of the two battles in 42 B.C., in which Octavian and Mark Antony defeated the republicans under Brutus and Cassius. A Christian church was founded here by Paul, who addressed to the congregation the Epistle to the Philippians.

Philippics (fi-lip'iks), The. Group of orations of Demosthenes, directed against Philip II of Macedon. In these orations Demosthenes urges his fellow Athenians to resist conquest by Philip. They comprise the First Philippic, urging the sending of a military force to Thrace, delivered in 351 B.C.; three orations (also called the Olynthiacs) in behalf of the city of Olynthus (destroyed by Philip), delivered in 349–348; the oration On the Peace (346); the Second Philippic (344); the oration On the Embassy (343); the speech On the Chersonese (341); and the Third Philippic (341 B.C.). A Fourth Philippic has also survived. The name is also given to a series of 14 orations of Cicero against Mark Antony, delivered in 44–43 B.C. The word "philippic" has come, therefore, to mean any speech of caustic denunciation.

Philippides (fi-lip'i-dēz). See Phidippides.

Philistus (fi-lis'tus). Greek historian of Syracuse, born c432 B.C.; died 356 B.C. He held high office under the tyrant Dionysius the Elder, but then fell from favor for some reason and was banished by the tyrant. He went to Adria on the Adriatic coast and there occupied himself by writing a history of Sicily which was an important source of the history of Syracuse, especially of his own time. His work, in 13 books, covered the history of Sicily from the earliest times through the capture of Acragas (Agrigentum) by the Carthaginians (406 B.C.), the reign of Dionysius the Elder, and part of the reign of Dionysius the Younger, by whom he was recalled. In the reign of Dionysius the Younger he returned to Syracuse, but he was against the philosophical ideas of an ideal state with which Plato was seeking to inculcate Dionysius the Younger, and worked for the restoration of the tyranny. For a time he was successful, and Plato returned to Athens. When Dionysius the Younger was deposed by Dion (357 B.C.) and took refuge in the island citadel of Syracuse, Philistus brought a fleet to the relief of Dionysius. Philistus was defeated in a sea-fight and he was captured. According to Plutarch, the Syracusans subjected him to great cruelty as a defender of tyrants. He was dragged through the streets by one leg by boys while the Syracusans mocked and jeered him, recalling that he had once told Dionysius that "he must not run away from his tyranny on a swift horse, but wait until he was dragged from it by the leg." His head was cut off and his body was thrown into the quarries. Other accounts relate that he committed suicide when Dion defeated him in a naval encounter.

Philius (fil'i-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Friendly." In the sacred enclosure of the Great Goddesses (Demeter and her daughter), at Megalopolis in Arcadia, was a temple of Zeus Philius. The image in the temple was made by Polyclitus, and showed the god holding a thyrsus on which an eagle perched.

Philo (fi'lō). Greek sculptor of the time of Alexander the Great. Among his works was a statue of Alexander's friend Hephaestion and an image of Zeus that was set up at the entrance to the Bosphorus.

Philo. Athenian architect; fl. latter part of the 4th century B.C. He built the portico to the great temple at Eleusis for Demetrius Phalereus (c318 B.C.), and ship installations at the Piraeus. The latter were destroyed by Sulla (86 B.C.).

Philo or Philo Judaeus (jö-dē'us). [Also: Philo of Alexandria.] Hellenistic Jewish philosopher of Alexandria; born probably at Alexandria, c30 B.C.; died c45 A.D. He went to Rome (c40 A.D.) at the head of an embassy of five Jews, to plead with Caligula for the uninterrupted exercise of their religion, a privilege that had been suspended because the Jews refused to give the emperor divine homage. His philosophy sought to reconcile Hellenistic doctrines, such as Neoplatonism, with the teachings of the Pentateuch. His work had a great influence upon early Christian literature.

Philo of Larissa. Greek philosopher; fl. in the first half of the 1st century B.C. He left Athens during the Mithridatic Wars and went to Rome, where he became a teacher of rhetoric and philosophy. Cicero was one of his pupils.

Philochorus (fil-ō-kōr'us). Greek historian; fl. at Athens in the first half of the 3rd century B.C. He opposed Demetrius Poliorcetes and his son Antigonos Gonatas, who put him to death after Athens was taken. Of his Atthis, a history of Attica in 17 books, fragments survive.

Philocles (fil-ō-klēz). Greek tragedian, nephew of Aeschylus. Of the many tragedies he wrote in the manner of Aeschylus, only fragments remain. He is notable for having won the first prize over Sophocles' Oedipus Rex, but the play with which he won it is lost.

Philoctetes (fil-ok-tē'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Poeas, king of Meliboea in Thessaly. He was the only one who had the compassion and courage to set the funeral pyre of Heracles alight when that hero laid himself down and begged to be released from his suffering. As a reward, Heracles gave him his bow and arrows. Some say Heracles also made Philoctetes promise not to reveal his grave. When the Greeks assembled to sail against Troy to recover Helen, Philoctetes, as one of her former suitors, commanded seven ships. After the second mustering at Aulis the Greeks sailed to Tenedos. There, as they were sacrificing to Apollo, Philoctetes was bitten by a water-snake; some say Hera punished him in this manner for helping her enemy, Heracles. His wound did not heal, and became so repulsive that the Greeks put him ashore on the island of Lemnos and abandoned him. Some say however, that he was bitten on the small island of Chryse, near Lemnos, where for centuries an altar of Philoctetes, a bronze serpent, bow, and breastplate could be seen. The island had disappeared beneath the sea by the 2nd century A.D. Still others say Philoctetes was not bitten by a snake at all, but accidentally stepped on one of Heracles' poisoned arrows, and that this was a punishment for revealing Heracles' grave, by stamping on it meaningfully when he was questioned. In any event, on the advice of Odysseus he was abandoned on Lemnos and lived there in misery, clothing himself with the feathers of birds, eating what he could catch, and suffering horribly from his festering wound. After the death of Achilles the Greeks learned that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Heracles and hurriedly sent Odysseus and Diomedes to fetch Philoctetes from Lemnos. He would have slain them in his anger at their heartless desertion but, aided by Athena and the shade of Heracles, Odysseus persuaded him to accompany them to Troy. There he was healed by Podalirius (or as some say, by Machaon), and seemed like one reborn. He went immediately into battle, and one of his arrows killed Paris. He disapproved of the proposal to take Troy by the stratagem of the Wooden Horse, as he preferred to fight bravely in the open, but yielded and was one of those who entered the city by this means. At the end of the war Philoctetes returned to his home but was forced to flee from it by rebels. He went to the Campanians in Italy, and founded the cities of Petelia and Crimissa. Nearby he founded a sanctuary of Apollo the Wanderer, in which he dedicated the bow and arrows of Heracles. When he died he was buried beside the Sybaris River.

Philoctetes. Drama by Sophocles, produced in 409 B.C. It concerns Philoctetes, abandoned on the desolate island of Lemnos by the Greeks on their way to Troy because of a malodorous wound, and Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, who comes with Odysseus ten years later to fetch him to Troy.

Odysseus and Neoptolemus, accompanied by a chorus of sailors, land on the desolate coast of Lemnos. Neoptolemus, having found the cave where Philoctetes lives, is moved to pity by the bed of leaves, the crude cup, and tattered garments drying in the sun. Philoctetes is nowhere in sight. Now Odysseus reveals that Philoctetes hates him because he holds him responsible for his desertion on Lemnos. He must be tricked into accompanying them to Troy, since he cannot be taken by force. Neoptolemus, whom Philoctetes has never seen, must tell him that he has deserted the Greeks and is returning to Scyrus, because when he joined the Greeks at their urgent request, they refused to give him his dead father's armor, but gave it instead to Odysseus. The idea of lying and trickery, second nature to Odysseus, is repugnant to the straightforward son of Achilles, who prefers to trust in his strength and courage and would "rather lose by fair means than win by foul." Odysseus commends this sentiment, but says age and experience have shown him the necessity for cunning. Not only is Philoctetes invincible with his arrows, but Troy cannot be taken without him. As a good soldier, Neoptolemus must obey the commands of his leaders to return with Philoctetes. Odysseus hides, and the sailors comment on the desolate country and express sympathy for the sufferer compelled to live there. Philoctetes hobbles in, his foot raggedly bandaged. In his hand he holds the bow of Heracles. Joyfully he sees the strangers and longs to hear if they are Greeks. Neoptolemus says he is a Greek on his way home from Troy, and pretends he has never heard of Philoctetes. Commenting bitterly on the loyalty of the Greeks, Philoctetes tells how he was stung by a serpent and abandoned by his comrades as he slept, because they could not bear his noxious, incurable wound. Suffering from loneliness and pain, he could barely keep alive with the aid of his bow. Above all, he expresses his hatred of Odysseus and the Atreidae who forsook him. Neoptolemus truly sympathizes with him, yet he tells the story Odysseus prepared. Philoctetes believes him at once and eagerly asks for news of his comrades, but when Neoptolemus prepares to leave he begs to be taken with him. The sailors add their pleas, and Neoptolemus consents, even promising to take Philoctetes to his home in Oeta. At this moment two sailors, disguised as merchants, approach, and tell Neoptolemus they have just come from Troy, and that the Greeks are pursuing him. They say Odysseus and Diomedes have sailed to fetch Philoctetes, because they have learned from Trojan Helenus, captured by Odysseus, that Troy cannot be taken without these two. When the men depart Philoctetes begs Neoptolemus to put to sea at once, to escape pursuit, but Neoptolemus lingers. He asks about the bow, and if he may hold it. Philoctetes willingly gives it to him, because of his goodness, he says, and adds that no one else has ever handled it. In a moment he asks Neoptolemus to return it, and he does so, almost involuntarily, and thanks Philoctetes and calls him his friend. They go into the cave. Alone, the chorus sings of the misery of Philoctetes: even wicked Ixion did not suffer as does this good and innocent man. As they come from the cave, Philoctetes is overcome by a spasm of pain. The young man wants to help him, and Philoctetes hands him the bow. Neoptolemus promises that it will not fall into other hands. As the pain becomes more cruel, Philoctetes begs to be burned on a pyre, as he had ended the suffering of Heracles and been given the bow as a reward. Neoptolemus, deeply moved, promises not to leave him, as Philoctetes drops to the ground in an exhausted sleep. The chorus advises Neoptolemus to be off with the bow. He hesitates, and Philoctetes wakes, overjoyed to find his noble friend still there. Now as Neoptolemus prepares to help him to the ship he pauses. The complete trust Philoctetes has shown makes it even harder to carry out the trick Odysseus planned. He can betray neither a weak and wounded man who trusts him, nor his own instincts. He tells him the truth. Philoctetes is stunned. He refuses to go to Troy. He demands the bow he so trustingly handed over. Neoptolemus starts to return it, but Odysseus rushes up and forbids it. Philoctetes is beside himself as he understands that Odysseus has made Neoptolemus a stalking horse for this plot. Odysseus tries to calm him; his wound will be cured, he says, and he will have the glory of helping to conquer Troy; but nothing can persuade Philoctetes. He would rather die, and even attempts to leap from the rocks but the sailors hold him back. Seeing it is hopeless, Odysseus persuades Neoptolemus, who still has the bow, to leave. The sailors sympathize with Philoctetes, but they cannot help him in defiance of their leader and they hold him responsible if he chooses to die alone on Lemnos. Determined and hopeless, Philoctetes crawls back into his cave as the sailors leave. Neoptolemus returns. Despite the arguments of Odysseus he has decided to right the wrong he committed and restore the bow to Philoctetes. He calls Philoctetes from the cave, assures him that he is his friend, and gives him back his bow. Now he tries to persuade Philoctetes to go to Troy. He says his wound is a punishment from heaven because he invaded the sanctuary of Chryse, that it will never be cured unless he goes to Troy, where the sons of Asclepius will heal him and where, with his bow, he will bring about the destruction of Troy. All this the Greeks have learned from Helenus. But Philoctetes' hatred of Odysseus and the Atreidae is implacable; he will not rejoin them, instead, he reminds Neoptolemus of his promise to take him home. Neoptolemus pauses, makes up his mind, and says he will carry out his promise. As they turn to leave, the shade of Heracles appears. It is the will of heaven, he says, for Philoctetes to take the bow and go to Troy. He will be cured; he must kill Paris, and take part in the sack of Troy. To Neoptolemus, he says that Troy cannot be conquered unless he and Philoctetes are there. Philoctetes yields to the will of Heracles, bids farewell to Lemnos, and departs for Troy with Neoptolemus.

Philodemus (fil-ō-dē'mus). Greek Epicurean philosopher; born in Gadara, Palestine; fl. in the 1st century B.C. He was a contemporary of Cicero, who admired his poetic style but decried his manner of living. Thirty-four love epigrams by Philodemus have been preserved in the Palatine Anthology, and fragments of his prose works on various subjects were recovered in the excavation of Piso's villa at Herculaneum.

Philoetius (fi-lē'shus). In the Odyssey, a cowherd who remained faithful to his master, Odysseus, during his long absence at the Trojan War and the ten years following it. He was one of the few to treat Odysseus hospitably when he returned to his homeland disguised as a beggar, and showed by his conversation with his disguised master that he had taken faithful care of his cattle and was longing for his return. When Odysseus finally revealed himself to his faithful servant, Philoetius promised to help him destroy Penelope's suitors, and was one of the few who fought beside him in the great hall of the palace at the battle in which all the wooers were slain.

Philolaus (fil-ō-lā'us). Greek philosopher of the 5th century B.C., one of the chiefs of the Pythagoreans. Fragments of his works are extant.

Philomela (fil-ō-mē'la). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. She was the sister of Procne, and was transformed into a swallow by the gods. See Procne.

Philomele (fil-ō-mē'lē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Actor. According to some accounts, she was the mother of Patroclus.

Philomelides (fil'ō-mē-lī'dēz). In Greek legend, a king of Lesbos. It was his custom to compel travelers or guests to wrestle with him. He always won, and killed his opponents until Odysseus wrestled with him and defeated him when the Greeks stopped at Lesbos on their way to Troy, after the sacrifice of Iphigenia.

Philomelus (fil-ō-mē'lus). Phocian general of the 4th century B.C., who rallied his countrymen to resist the heavy fines that had been levied on them by the Amphictyonic League that charged them with impiety. He cited the Homeric verses from the Iliad, "Phocian warriors . . . Those who possessed Cyparissus and likewise Pytho the rocky." These verses he made the basis of a claim that Phocis rightfully owned Delphi (Pytho), and proposed to seize it. With the rich treasures of the sanctuary in their possession the Phocians could raise levies to resist the Amphictyonic League. The Phocians took Delphi and fortified the treasury with a wall. Philomelus wished the oracle to continue its prophecies, for he did not want to alienate the rest of the Greek world, but the priestess refused. He threatened the priestess and in alarm she told him to do as he liked. Taking this as permission, he availed himself of the treasures of the sanctuary. One of those said to have been taken by him was the great golden shield given to Delphi by the Lydian king, Croesus. Philomelus and the soldiers he hired with the proceeds of the treasures held off their enemies for years but at last suffered defeat at Neon, on the slopes of Mount Parnassus. Philomelus fought bravely but, covered with wounds, was driven to the edge of a cliff. There, rather than submit to capture, he hurled himself over it to his death.

Philon (phī'lon). See Philo.

Philonis (fil-ō'nis). A name sometimes given for the mother of Philammon and Autolycus. See Chione.

Philopoemen (fil-ō-pē'men). General of the Achaean League, called "the Last of the Greeks" because, so it is said, Greece produced no more illustrious men after him. He was born at Megalopolis, Arcadia, Greece, c252 B.C.; drank poison at Messene, Greece, 183 B.C. His father Craugis, an aristocrat, died in Philopoemen's infancy, and he was brought up by a Mantinean exile who lived at Megalopolis. He was well educated, and from childhood showed an interest in and aptitude for the military arts. In young manhood he occupied himself with hunting, tilling his lands, studying the philosophers, reading military histories, and studying the more warlike parts of Homer. He is described as of splendid physique, powerful, modest in dress and manner, frugal at table, and homely. Concerning his plain features, Plutarch tells that once, after he had become general of the Achaean League, he arrived as a guest at a house in Megara. His hostess who had never seen him before noted his simple dress and homeliness and thought he was a servant. She set him to work chopping wood, which he did without protest or explanation. When his host came home and found his distinguished guest performing the work of a servant he asked the meaning of it. Philopoemen gravely told him he was "paying the fine of my deformity."

In 223 B.C. Cleomenes III of Sparta made a surprise attack on Megalopolis at night and seized the market-place. Philopoemen escaped with a group of young men. He persuaded them not to treat with Cleomenes, as they were willing to do, but to go back and win Megalopolis by force of arms. He and his group joined with the Achaeans and Arcadians, and the Macedonians under Antigonus, and met and defeated the Spartans at Sellasia, 222 B.C. In the battle Philopoemen, a cavalryman, saw that the infantry would decide the battle. He voluntarily gave up his horse and joined the foot-soldiers. He fought with great bravery and skill. It is said that an enemy spear pierced both his thighs and pinned his legs together. In his determination to keep fighting, he sank to his knees and by a violent movement of his legs broke the enemy spear. Antigonus was filled with admiration for him and invited him to serve under him in Macedonia. Philopoemen declined. Instead he sailed to Crete as a leader of mercenaries and took part in a civil war there. When he returned to Megalopolis, after 11 years, he was named commander of the Achaean League. With authority and discipline he shaped his forces into a splendid fighting machine. The mettle of the forces was tested at the Larisus River (210 B.C.) when, with his allies, he defeated the Eleans and the Aetolians and killed their commander. He was now greatly admired and was given the opportunity to reorganize the infantry. He replaced their short spears and oblong wicker shields with long spears and round shields, and gave the foot-soldiers breastplates and greaves to protect their bodies. He was insistent that the soldiers keep their armor bright, that the glitter of shining armor might terrify the enemy. Following the defeat of the Eleans and Aetolians, he engaged the Spartan tyrant Machanidas at Mantinea (207 B.C.). The Achaeans seemed to have lost the battle, but Philopoemen regrouped his forces, chose new ground for his attack, and drew victory from defeat; Machanidas was slain and his severed head was exhibited to the Achaeans. Following the victory he went on and took Tegea, and marched into Laconia and pillaged it at will. After this he was so idolized that when the harpist at the Olympic Games began the ode:

Who to Greece gives the great and glorious jewel of freedom,

all eyes turned to Philopoemen, and the whole company burst into applause. His name alone inspired fear in his enemies: the Thebans withdrew from Megara when it was rumored that Philopoemen was coming to the aid of the city; Nabis, the new tyrant of Sparta, evacuated Messene (201 B.C.) on news that Philopoemen, no longer a general but a private citizen, had arrived before the city with the army; Philip V of Macedon so feared him he tried to have him assassinated. When his term as general was up Philopoemen went back to Crete. For this he was much criticized, as he left Megalopolis hard-pressed by its enemies. By request, he returned to his country some years later and again became commander of the Achaeans (altogether he was commander eight times). Philip V had been defeated by the Romans. Nabis of Sparta was at war with Rome and the Achaeans. Philopoemen defeated the Spartans, burned their camp at Gythium, compelled the Spartans to join the Achaean League (191 B.C.), and prevented the Romans from entering the city of Sparta. For this last the Spartans, having got rid of Nabis, offered him rich gifts, which he refused. In 184 B.C. the city of Messene revolted. Philopoemen sent Lycortas to quell the revolt, which was the second that had broken out in Messene, then, with a small band, he decided to go to Messene himself, unaware that Lycortas was already on his way back. In a skirmish Philopoemen was wounded in the head, taken captive, and carried off as a prisoner. According to Pausanias, the aristocrats clamored for his death, while the people, who called him the "Father of the Greeks" wanted to save him. Someone sent him poison, and rather than endure the shame of having been taken alive, he drank the poison. His bones were later returned to Megalopolis; many statues were set up to honor him for his successes against tyrants. One at Tegea described him as the "author of blameless freedom." Thirty-seven years after his death (146 B.C.) certain of the Romans wanted to destroy the statues. The Greek general and historian Polybius defended Philopoemen, and the Roman consul Mummius, noted for the barbarity with which he had ravaged Greece, refused to dishonor Philopoemen; the statues of the man who had reorganized the forces of the Achaean League and used them so effectively were allowed to stand.

Philotas (fil-ō'tas). Macedonian general, killed 330 B.C., in Drangiana, C Asia. He was the son of Parmenio, general who served Philip as well as Alexander. Under Alexander, Philotas commanded the heavy cavalry of the Macedonian forces. On the successful expedition into Asia great treasures were taken as spoils and distributed among the Macedonians. Philotas made an ostentatious display in gift-giving and indulged himself in the most arrogant extravagance and luxury. He is said to have boasted to his concubine, Antigone, who had been given to him as part of his share in the spoils, that the victories for which Alexander took credit were won by his father and himself. Antigone repeated his indiscreet and boastful words to his enemies, and they came at last to the ears of Alexander. While in Drangiana, a plot to kill Alexander was uncovered; Philotas was accused. Though boastful and arrogant, no proof that he was connected with the plot was brought forward. However, he is said to have admitted that he knew of the existence of a plot but had done nothing about it. The Macedonians, before whom his case was laid by Alexander, found him guilty, pierced him with their javelins, and killed him.

Philoxenus (fi-lok'se-nus). Greek dithyrambic poet, born in the island of Cythera, c435 B.C., died at Ephesus, 380 B.C. When Cythera was conquered by the Athenians he was taken as a prisoner of war to Athens and sold as a slave to Melanippides, the dithyrambic poet. Melanippides educated him and set him free. Philoxenus went to Syracuse to the court of Dionysius the Elder. Dionysius fancied himself as a poet, and when Philoxenus criticized his work, he sent him to work in the stone quarries. Philoxenus escaped from Sicily and traveled in Greece and Asia Minor, giving performances of his work. He avenged himself on Dionysius by writing a dithyramb which was his masterpiece. It was entitled Cyclops and parodied the unsuccessful love of the clumsy, one-eyed Cyclops for the nymph Galatea. Dionysius was blind, or partially blind, in one eye. The 24 dithyrambs of Philoxenus, fragments of which remain, were very popular with the ancients for their wit and variety of melody.

Philyra (fil'i-rā). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus. She lived on an island named for her. Cronus, in the infancy of Zeus, lay with Philyra, deceiving Rhea. When he was discovered by Rhea Cronus changed himself into a stallion. Philyra gave birth to Chiron, half-horse and half-god (or man), as the result of Cronus' transformation. She prayed to be relieved of her burden of nursing her unnatural child and was metamorphosed into a linden tree, the flowers of which came to be frequently used in medicine, and the bark of which was used in foretelling the future.

Phineus (fi'nūs, fin'e-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Agenor and Telephassa and the brother of Cadmus and Europa. After searching vainly for his sister Europa when she was abducted by Zeus, he settled down and became king of Salmydessus in Thrace. He married Cleopatra, daughter of Boreas, and had two sons. Then he abandoned Cleopatra and married Idaea, daughter of Dardanus. According to one account, he was blinded by Zeus because of his unerring prophecies—Zeus wanted the gods alone to know the secrets of the future—and was tormented by the Harpies who defiled his food so that he was perpetually on the verge of starvation. When the Argonauts, accompanied by Cleopatra's brothers Calais and Zetes, landed on Phineus' shores they promised to help him. As winged sons of Boreas (the North Wind), Calais and Zetes swiftly overtook the horrible creatures and would have slain them, but Iris was sent to forbid them to kill "the hounds of Zeus" and to promise that they would no longer torment Phineus. In return, Phineus gave them valuable advice for their journey. He told them how they could safely pass the Symplegades, or Clashing Rocks, how to drive away the birds of Ares so that they could land on the island of Ares, and predicted that Aphrodite would assist them when they arrived in Colchis. According to some accounts, Phineus was blinded by Zeus because he had blinded his own sons on receipt of false accusations against them from Idaea. As a punishment, he could choose between death or blindness. When he chose blindness, Helios sent the Harpies to torment him because of his impiety in choosing never to look upon the sun again. In this version, Phineus was killed by his sons, whose sight had been restored, and they became rulers of his kingdom.

Phineus. In classical mythology, a brother of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and the uncle of Andromeda, to whom he was betrothed. When Andromeda was chained to a rock as a sacrifice to a sea monster, to punish her mother for boastfulness, Phineus lacked the courage or ability to slay the monster and rescue the maiden. Perseus, on his way home from killing Medusa, slew the monster and won Andromeda for his bride. But Phineus, since the monster was safely dead, invaded the palace during the wedding feast with a mob and claimed Andromeda, saying she had been promised to him. With his followers he attacked Perseus. A fierce struggle broke out, in which many were killed, but Perseus won the battle and retained his bride by exhibiting the head of Medusa and so turning Phineus and his remaining companions to stone. In other accounts the man who claimed Andromeda and was turned to stone by Perseus was named as Agenor of Tyre.

Phintias (fin'ti-as). Attic potter and painter, active at the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 5th centuries B.C. His signature as painter appears on four extant vessels, as potter on three. A cup (Munich), c520 B.C., is inscribed "Deiniades made, Phintias painted." The inside of the cup has a Silen with a drinking cup. One side of the outside shows Heracles and Apollo struggling for the Olympic tripod; the other side shows Heracles slaying the giant Alcyoneus, as Hermes watches. The decoration is executed in the red-figure style. A hydria (Munich) c510 B.C., also in red-figure style, shows a music lesson, and on the shoulder, two hetairai playing the game of cottabus.

Phintias. See Damon and Pythias.

Phintias. Tyrant of Acragas in Sicily; fl. 280 B.C.; founder of the coastal city of Phintias, modern Licata. (JJ)

Phintias. [Modern name, Licata.] Greek city on the S coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the river Himera (modern Salso), between Gela and Acragas. It was founded c284 B.C. by Phintias, tyrant of Acragas, who in 282 B.C. settled there the refugees from the destruction of Gela by the Mamertines. (JJ)

Phlegethon (fleg'e-thon). In Greek mythology, one of the five rivers surrounding Hades. It was a river of fire which flowed into the Acheron.

Phlegræan Fields or Plain (flē-grē'an). [Italian, Campi Flegrei.] Volcanic district lying W of Naples, Italy, bordering on the Bay of Naples, where according to some accounts, the Battle of the Giants and the Gods was brought to a conclusion with the defeat of the Giants. According to other accounts, the battle was finished on the Phlegræan Plain of Chalcidice, in northeastern Greece, under the generalship of Athena.

Phlegyas (flej'yas). In mythology, a son of Ares and Chryse. He was king of the Lapithae and lived near Orchomenus in Boeotia. He was the father of Ixion and Coronis. When he learned that his daughter had born Asclepius to the god Apollo he violated Apollo's shrine at Delphi and was slain by the god. As further punishment he was condemned to Tartarus, the region of Hades reserved for the worst criminals—those who had sinned against the gods. There he stood beneath a rock which was forever on the verge of falling and was continually hungry because his food was contaminated by one of the Furies.

Phlias (fī'as). In Greek legend, a son of Dionysus. He dwelt near the springs of Asopus in Araethyrea and joined Jason on the expedition of the Argo to Colchis.

Phliasia (fī-ā'shi-ā). In ancient geography, a small district in the Peloponnesus, Greece, NW of Argolis, NE of Arcadia, and S of Sicyonia. According to legend, the first king of the land was the earth-born Aras, who named the country Arantia after himself and founded a city on the Arantine Hill. His son changed the name to Araethyrea in honor of his dead sister, and by this name it was known to Homer and mentioned in the Iliad as having sent men to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon. Finally, Phlias gave the land its third name of Phliasia and named the city Phlius. Some say this Phlias was a son of Dionysus and that he was an Argonaut. Others say he was a grandson of Temenus, one of the Heraclidae who successfully invaded the Peloponnesus. The Phliasians were Argives originally, but when the Dorians conquered the Peloponnesus they came to terms with them and became Dorian.

Phlius (fī'ūs). In ancient geography, a city in Phliasia, Peloponnesus, Greece, about 14 miles SW of Corinth, situated on the upper reaches of the Asopus River. It was founded by Dorians from Argos. The people of ancient Phlius had a very holy sanctuary of Hebe, or Ganymeda as they called her. One of the honors accorded to the goddess was that she could pardon suppliants. All who sought her in her temple situated in a cypress grove on the citadel won full forgiveness, and prisoners set free by her dedicated their fetters in her temple. There were also temples of Hera, Demeter, and Asclepius at Phlius. The rising of the constellation they called the Goat was accompanied by violent storms that did great damage to the vines. The people of Phlius had a bronze image of a she-goat in the market-place that they honored and adorned with gold to appease the constellation Goat and save their vines. Behind the market-place was a House of Divination. Here, they say, Amphiaraus, at that time an ordinary man with no special powers, entered and slept a night. Thenceforward he was endowed with the power of prophecy. Not far from Phlius was the Omphalos (Navel), the center of the Peloponnesus, they say. Heracles visited Phlius on his way back from the Garden of the Hesperides, and here Oeneus came from Aetolia to entertain him. It was on this occasion, they say, that Heracles in a fit of impatience accidentally killed the cup-bearer Cyathus. A shrine near the sanctuary of Apollo at Phlius commemorated this accident; in it was a stone image of Cyathus holding out a cup to Heracles. At nearby Celeae the Phliasians celebrated the mysteries of Demeter in Eleusinian fashion every fourth year. The Phliasians claimed that these mysteries were established in Phliasia by Dysaules, who, they say, was a brother of Celeus, driven out of Eleusis by Ion. Phlius, usually an ally of Sparta, drove out its oligarchs after the Peloponnesian Wars. The Spartan king Agesilaus reduced it by siege and forced it to receive a Spartan garrison (381-379 B.C.). Henceforth it was either allied to Sparta or remained neutral.

Phobetor (fō-bē'tôr). The name men gave to Icelus, the god who brought dreams of animals and birds. The name means "the Terrifier."

Phobus (fō'bus). In late Greek mythology, a son of Aphrodite and Ares, and an attendant of Ares, the god of war. He personifies the fear which terrifies whole armies and causes rout.

Phocaea (fō-sē'ā). In ancient geography, the most northerly of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia, situated on the Aegean Sea about 28 miles NW of Smyrna. The inhabitants were Phocians by descent. To commemorate Psamathe the Nereid, they put the figure of a seal on their earliest coins, because Psamathe had transformed herself into a seal to escape the embraces of Aeacus. Her efforts were unsuccessful; she bore Phocus, the ancestor of the Phocians in Greece. When the Phocians emigrated to Asia and colonized Phocaea they won their land by agreement with the natives and settled among them without warfare. Phocaea was admitted to the league of Ionian cities when the inhabitants accepted a descendant of Codrus, legendary king of Athens, as their ruler. The Phocaeans were great sailors and according to Herodotus were the first of the Greeks to explore the coasts of the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian Seas, and to set out colonies in that area. Phocaea was the mother-city of Massilia, later Marseilles, France. The Phocaeans even sailed to the shores of Spain. According to Herodotus, when they arrived at Tartessus, a colony founded by the Phoenicians in Spain, the ruler was so impressed by them that he invited them to leave Phocaea and settle in his country. When they declined his invitation he gave them money to wall their city in Asia. When Phocaea was attacked by Harpagus, general of Cyrus, in 540 B.C., their wall momentarily protected them, and they asked for a day in which to consider whether they would submit to Persian domination. This was granted them, and the Phocaeans, rather than submit to slavery, used their day of grace to load their families, and as much of their goods as possible, aboard their vessels and sailed away. Harpagus, on entering the city next day, found it empty. After a brief stop at Chios the Phocaeans decided to go to Cynrus (Corsica), where years before they had established a colony, Alalia, and settle there. Before they left, however, they sailed back to their own city, surprised the Persian garrison and put them to the sword. Then they dropped a huge mass of iron in the sea and swore they would not return to Phocaea until the iron floated to the surface. But some of the Phocaeans were so saddened at the thought of leaving their homes that they immediately broke their oath and deserted their comrades and returned. The remainder went to Cynrus and settled there for a time, but found it expedient to withdraw, following a sea-battle with the Carthaginians and Etruscans, to Rhegium. It is said that the Carthaginians landed the Phocaean captives they took in the sea-battle on the shore and stoned them to death. Afterward, men and animals passing the spot where the stoning took place were afflicted: their bodies became palsied or their limbs paralyzed. The people sent to Delphi to inquire about this matter and were told to honor the dead Phocaeans with funeral rites and games, a practice which was followed annually for many years. The

Phocion (fō'shi-on). Athenian statesman and general; born c402 B.C.; put to death 318 B.C. He was of a good Athenian family, and in his youth was a pupil of Plato and Xenocrates. As a young man he attached himself to the Athenian general Chabrias, whose admiration he won. Chabrias advanced him, and he commanded the left wing of the Athenian fleet in the sea-fight with the Spartans off Naxos in 376 B.C. that resulted in an Athenian victory. Even after the death of Chabrias, Phocion continued to honor him and showed his loyalty by his care for Chabrias' son, Ctesippus, an intractable and capricious youth. Once on an expedition Ctesippus harried him with criticism and advice. Phocion exclaimed, "Chabrias, Chabrias, surely I make you a large return for your friendship in enduring your son." Phocion early established a reputation for unimpeachable honesty, and won the admiration of the Athenians because no amount of money could tempt him. He was devoted to the interests of the state and impervious to public criticism. Of a kind and gentle nature, he was forbidding in appearance, and never hesitated to tell the Athenians wherein lay their errors. He was a forceful speaker, capable of putting great good sense into very few words. He never sought the favor of the people. On the contrary, he invariably publicly disapproved of their actions. Once, it is said, when he delivered an opinion and it was approved by all, he turned to a friend and asked, "Can it be that I am making a bad argument without knowing it?" The great object of his civil policy was peace with Macedonia, because Athens was not in a position to oppose her. He frequently exposed those who spoke in favor of war as being either unwilling or unable to fight. Demosthenes, the most fiery advocate of war, once said to him, "The Athenians will kill you, Phocion, should they go crazy." To which he replied, "But they will kill you, should they come to their senses." Although he was an outspoken advocate of peace, and although he never sought the office, he was appointed general by the Athenians 45 times. Because of his reputation for justice and honesty, he alone of the generals sent out by Athens to the allies was welcomed by them. In 348 B.C. he was sent to put down a revolt in Eretria, in the island of Euboea. The victory he won there consisted mainly in avoiding defeat. In 339 B.C. he was sent to the Hellespont to the relief of Byzantium, which was undergoing siege by Philip II. Chares, the Athenian who had preceded him, had accomplished little since the Byzantians so distrusted him they refused to allow him in their city, but for Phocion they threw open their gates. Philip was forced to withdraw and Phocion recovered some cities he had taken. Then, having sustained a wound, he returned to Athens. In 344-343 B.C. he answered an appeal from Megara for aid, and helped to build the long walls from Megara to her port. His immutable policy was peace, and he tried to persuade Athens to accept Philip's terms. Demosthenes urged war, but recommended that it be waged as far from Attica as possible. "My good sir," said Phocion, "let us not ask where we can fight, but how we shall be victorious. For in that case the war will be far away; but wherever men are defeated every terror is close at hand." The Athenians followed Demosthenes, and were disastrously defeated by Philip at Chaeronea (338 B.C.). Phocion recommended that the kindly overtures of Philip after the defeat be accepted. Philip trusted and admired him; Athens was granted peace on moderate terms and Philip returned the Athenian dead with a guard of honor. Phocion disapproved of the sacrifices of rejoicing that were proclaimed by the Athenians when Philip was murdered (336 B.C.), for, said he, the force that had defeated them at Chaeronea was diminished now by only one man. He opposed Demosthenes' speeches against Alexander, and after the destruction of Thebes (335 B.C.) strongly advised the Athenians to surrender the leaders of the war party, including Demosthenes, demanded by Alexander, because in Phocion's view they were responsible for bringing Athens low by their fiery speeches and their violent policies. Phocion was one of the envoys sent to Alexander. He advised him to end the war in Greece and, if he sought glory, to fight the barbarians. Alexander made him his guest and friend, and when he returned to Athens Alexander sent him a gift of 100 talents because, "Alexander judges that you alone are a man of honor and worth." Phocion refused to accept the gift. Alexander was angered because he would not accept anything from him. Thereupon Phocion asked for the release of four men who had been taken. Alexander released them. Later (324 B.C.), Alexander offered him the revenues of any one of four cities. Phocion again refused the gift. When the Athenians murmured against Alexander he told them, "Either be superior in arms or be friends with those who are superior." After the death of Alexander and the defeat of the Athenians at Crannon (322 B.C.) by Antipater, Phocion went to Antipater at Thebes as an envoy of Athens. The terms imposed by Antipater were harsh, but Athens had no choice but to accept them. Phocion won the confidence of Antipater as he had of Philip and Alexander, and became virtual ruler of Athens under him. Antipater said he had two friends at Athens: Phocion, whom he could not persuade to take anything, and Demades, to whom he could never give enough. On the death of Antipater, Philip Arrhidaeus, the imbecile half-brother of Alexander, was king under the control of Polysperchon. Polysperchon was an opponent of Cassander, son of Antipater. He persuaded the Athenians to try Phocion, now a very old man, on a false charge of treason. In a frenzy of madness, as Demosthenes had predicted, the Athenians refused to hear his defense and condemned him. He drank the hemlock in May, 318 B.C. As an added indignity, he was at first denied burial, but a friend took his body and burned it. His wife gathered his bones and buried them under his own hearth. Very soon the Athenians regretted their madness. They gave his bones public burial and raised a statue to him in the market-place.

Phocis (fō'sis). In ancient geography, a region in S central Greece. It was bounded by Locris on the N, Boeotia on the E, the Corinthian Gulf on the S, and Doris and Locris on the W. It was colonized by Phocus of Corinth, the son of Ornytion, and was named either for him or for Phocus, the son of Aeacus, who went there with his followers from the island of Aegina. Phocians played their part in the Trojan War under the command of Schedius, son of Iphitus. Orestes was sent to King Strophius in Phocis after the death of Agamemnon, according to some accounts, to protect him from Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. Before the Persian invasion of Greece the Phocians fought against the Thessalians. They buried empty water jars just beneath the surface of the ground, and when the Thessalian cavalry charged, their horses, falling into the jars, were lamed or crippled and the cavalry was thrown into complete confusion. Enraged, the Thessalians gathered a large army to hurl against the Phocians. The latter consulted the oracle at Delphi and were told:

"I will match in fight mortal and immortal,
And to both will I give victory, but more to the mortal."

Puzzled by this equivocal response, the Phocians sent 300 picked men against the Thessalians. All perished. Terrified, the Phocians gathered their women, children, and valuables and made a huge pyre. They left 30 men to guard it and gave them orders to set it alight and cause all to burn if the Phocians should lose in the battle they were about to engage in with the Thessalians. This gave rise to the expression "Phocian despair," for a forlorn hope. With the picture of their women and children before their eyes, the Phocians attacked desperately, and won. Thus the oracle was fulfilled, for the watchword of the Thessalians was "Itonian Athena," and the watchword of the Phocians was "Phocus," a mortal's name. In gratitude, the Phocians sent offerings to Delphi. In a later attack, the Phocians smeared themselves with chalk and put on white armor. When they appeared at night the Thessalians thought they were spirits, not their enemies from Phocis, and the Phocians slaughtered them wholesale. When the Persians made their successful way into Greece the Phocians were compelled to join them, but they deserted as soon as possible and afterward took part in the Greek victory at Plataea (479 B.C.). The Phocians had periodically controlled and lost Delphi. In 357 B.C. they seized it again. The Thebans fought against them for ten years until at last Philip of Macedon intervened on the pretext of restoring order to Greece and put an end to the war, 348 B.C. This war was called the Phocian War and also, the Sacred War. The cities of Phocis—Lilaea, Hyampolis, Anticyra, Parapotamii, Panopeus, and Daulis—were captured and destroyed. Only Abae, whose citizens were free from impiety, was spared as it had not shared in the seizure of the sanctuary. The Phocians now lost their share in the sanctuary and in the assembly. Their votes in the Amphictyonic League were given to the Macedonians. In the following years some of the cities of Phocis were rebuilt. The Phocians allied themselves with Athens and took part in the disastrous battle of Chaeronea where the allies were defeated by Philip. In the 3rd century B.C., when the Gauls attacked, the Phocians fought savagely in order, some say, to defend Delphi and atone for their earlier crimes against the sanctuary. The region is mountainous and contains Mount Parnassus. As a region it was especially important because of its chief place, Delphi.

Phocus (fō'kus). In Greek mythology, a son of Aeacus and the Nereid Psamathe. He was a great favorite of his father and his skill in athletic contests aroused the jealousy of his half-brothers, Telamon and Peleus. To avoid a conflict with them he left Aegina, the island home of his father, and settled in Phocis with his followers. According to some accounts, Phocis was named for him. On a visit to Aeacus he was challenged to a contest by his brothers in the course of which they killed him. He was the father of the twins Crisius and Panopeus.

Phocus. In Greek tradition, a son of Ornytion of Corinth. He colonized the region around Delphi in Phocis and according to some accounts this area is named Phocis after him. He purified Antiope, who had wandered to his land maddened by Dionysus for the death of Dirce, and later married her.

Phocylides (fō-sil'i-dēz). Greek poet of Miletus, in Ionia, who lived in the latter part of the 6th century B.C. He wrote witty gnomes (maxims or epigrams), a few fragments of which remain. Nothing is known of his life.

Phoebe (fē'bē). In Greek mythology, a Titaness, the daughter of Uranus and Gaea. According to some accounts, Eurynome gave her dominion over the Moon. By Coeus she was the mother of Leto, and thus the grandmother of Artemis and Apollo. Some say she at one time controlled the oracle at Delphi but gave up her powers to her grandson Apollo. The name Phoebe became synonymous with the moon in later writings, and hence synonymous both with Artemis and the Roman Diana, as identified with the moon.

Phoebe. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Leucippus. She was a priestess of Athena. With her sister she was carried off by Castor and Polydeuces. See Leucippides.

Phoebe. According to some accounts, a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and the sister of Clytemnestra, Helen, Castor, and Polydeuces. This extra, little-heard-of sister, is sometimes also known as Timandra.

Phoebus (fē'bus). In late Greek mythology, Apollo in his aspect of sun god and dispenser of light. As Phoebus, Apollo took on many of the attributes of the older sun god, Helios, but never the chariot.

Phoenicia (fē-nish'a). In ancient geography, the strip of land on the coast of S Syria, between Mount Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea. It was about 200 miles in length, and its width did not exceed 35 miles at the maximum; area, about 4000 square miles. But the rivers (fed by the snows of Lebanon) which irrigated it, and the energy and enterprise of its inhabitants, made this narrow tract of land one of the most varied in its products, and gave it a place in history out of proportion to its size. The principal rivers were the Leontes (Litani), N of Tyre, and the Orontes (Nahr el Asy) in the N. The cedars of the mountains furnished building material; the coast furnished sand for glass and the purple snail for dyeing; and the inland plains were covered with orchards, gardens, and grain fields. Though the coastline was not deeply indented, the skill of the inhabitants secured them harbors. The ancient inhabitants of Phoenicia, the Phoenices of the classical writers (Poeni or Puni designating the Carthaginians), are now considered by many scholars to have been Semites of the Canaanites, and their country Canaan. In Greek legend, the Phoenicians are counted as the descendants of Phoenix, the son of Agenor and Telephassa, and the brother of Cadmus and Europa. When Europa was carried off he went, at his father's command, in search of her. He traveled westward from his native Canaan, to what later became known as Carthage, whose people took the name Punic from him. But since he did not find Europa he returned to Canaan, after his father's death, and the land was named Phoenicia in his honor, and its people Phoenicians. According to classical writers, the Phoenicians emigrated from the Erythrean Sea. This would favor the assumption that the Phoenicians were identical with the Puntis of the Egyptian monuments. The language of the Phoenicians was closely akin to Hebrew. They worshiped as principal divinities Baal and Astarte, besides the seven planets under the name of Cabiri. Phoenicia never formed a single state under one head, but rather a confederacy of cities. In the earliest period (1600-1100 B.C.) Sidon stood at the head of Phoenician cities; c1000 Sidon lost the hegemony to Tyre; in 761 B.C. Aradus was founded in the N extreme of the country; and from these three cities Tripolis (the modern Tripoli in Lebanon) was settled. South of Tripolis old Byblos was situated, while Berytus (Beirut) in the N did not become prominent before the Roman period. To the territory of Tyre belonged Akko or Acco (Acre), later called Ptolemais. Separated from the rest of Phoenicia lay Joppa (Jaffa), on the coast of Palestine, which the Maccabees united with Palestine. The constitution of these Phoenician townships was aristocratic, headed by a king. The earliest king of Tyre mentioned in the Old Testament was Hiram, a contemporary and friend of David and Solomon. After Hiram six kings are supposed to have ruled until Ethbaal or Ithobal, the father of Jezebel, wife of Ahab. Under Ethbaal's grandson, Pygmalion, contentions about the throne led to the emigration of his sister Elissa (Dido in Vergil) and the foundation of Carthage, the mighty rival of Rome. In the middle of the 9th century B.C., Phoenicia shared the fate of Syria at large. After the battle of Karkar (853 B.C.) it became tributary to Assyria. It made a struggle for independence under Shalmaneser IV, but was brought to submission by his successor, Sargon. In 609 B.C. Phoenicia came for a short time into the hands of Necho II, king of Egypt.

Tyre was besieged for 13 years (585-572 B.C.) by Nebuchadnezzar. Cyrus brought Phoenicia with the rest of the Babylonian possessions under Persian supremacy. But, owing to their skill in navigation, the Phoenicians retained an independence of sorts. In 351 B.C. Sidon was destroyed by Artaxerxes III. The same fate befell Tyre at the hands of Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. In 64 B.C. Phoenicia was annexed by Pompey to the Syrian province of the Roman Empire. Less original and productive in the domain of thought and higher culture, the Phoenicians excel other members of the Semitic family in contributions to material civilization. They were the merchants and manufacturers of antiquity. They were the most skillful shipbuilders and boldest navigators. All along the Mediterranean, even beyond Gibraltar, they established colonies. They sent colonies to Cyprus, Crete, and England, and it is not improbable that they worked the tin mines of Cornwall. They even ventured to circumnavigate Africa. The principal articles of their commerce were precious stones, metals, glassware, costly textiles, and especially purple robes. Their skill in architecture was exhibited in the temple of Solomon. Their alphabetic writing became the parent of all the European alphabetic systems now in use. According to the Greek legends, the alphabet was brought to Crete by Cadmus, when he was searching for Europa, and from there to Greece. The Phoenicians also transmitted a knowledge of mathematics and of weights and measures to other nations. Of the Phoenician literature only a few fragments in Greek translation have come down to us. Among the numerous Phoenician inscriptions, the most important is that of the sarcophagus of the Sidonian king Eshmunazar (who reigned in the 4th century B.C.), found in 1855, and now at Paris.

Phoenician Maidens, The. A play by Euripides, c409 B.C. It treats the myths and legends attached to the city of Thebes. The play is named for its chorus, a band of Phoenician maidens dedicated to the service of Apollo at Delphi. They stopped at Thebes on their way to Delphi and were detained there by the siege of the Seven against Thebes. The Phoenician maidens, from the land of Cadmus, founder of Thebes, observe and comment throughout the play, and describe, in vivid choral odes, the history of Thebes and of the descendants of its founder.

Oedipus blinded himself in horror when it was revealed to him that the oracles from which he had sought to flee had been fulfilled: unaware of his own parentage he had killed his father, married his mother, and fathered two sons and two daughters by her. In Euripides' version of the Oedipus story, Jocasta does not kill herself when she learns that the man who became king of Thebes after killing the Sphinx, and to whom she was given in marriage by the grateful Thebans (her husband Laius having been killed by an unknown murderer), is her own son. She and Oedipus remain in the palace at Thebes, where their sons, Eteocles and Polynices, seek to conceal their father's disgrace by keeping him hidden, and neither honor nor love him. In anger, Oedipus curses them: ". . . that they should divide their inheritance by the sword." Eteocles and Polynices think to avert the curse by alternately ruling Thebes. Eteocles, the elder, rules first. At the end of a year he refuses to give up the throne as he had agreed to do, and banishes Polynices. Polynices goes to the court of Adrastus, king of Argos, marries the daughter of Adrastus, and returns with an army of Argives, led by seven chieftains, to win his inheritance by force of arms. Jocasta seeks to reconcile her sons, and thereby avoid a war that would ruin them and the city. She arranges a parley between them, while the Argive army is gathered before the walls of Thebes. But her efforts are fruitless. To the demand of Polynices that the kingdom be turned over to him in accordance with their agreement, Eteocles replies that he will not give up his power, that having been king he will not now submit to being subject to Polynices. Polynices returns to the Argive camp. Eteocles arranges the defense of Thebes with his uncle Creon, Jocasta's brother. Before he leaves to appoint the Theban champions to defend the seven gates of Thebes against the seven Argive leaders, he consents to the marriage of his sister Antigone to Creon's son Haemon; bequeaths Thebes, in the event of his death, to Creon; and commands Creon not to allow the burial of Polynices on Theban soil if he too should fall in battle. Creon consults the blind Theban seer Tiresias concerning the fate of Thebes and learns that only the death of Creon's son, Menoeceus, can save the city from the Argives. According to Tiresias, it is Ares' will to avenge the earth-born dragon that was killed by Cadmus when the city was founded with the death of a descendant of one of the Sown Men (Sparti). Creon refuses to sacrifice his son to save the city, and orders him to fly before Tiresias' oracle becomes known and the people demand his death. Menoeceus agrees to do as his father commands. But instead, he goes to the ramparts and nobly takes his own life to save Thebes. The Argives attack and are driven back. As Jocasta, informed by a messenger, rejoices that her sons still live and that Thebes is safe, she is told that Eteocles and Polynices, to avoid further bloodshed, have agreed to settle their conflict by a duel. She rushes off to prevent the duel but arrives too late: the brothers have slain each other. In despair, Jocasta kills herself on her sons' bodies. Creon, seeking the comfort of his sister in his grief for his dead son, learns that she is dead, and Eteocles and Polynices as well. He announces that he is now king and forbids anyone, on pain of death, to bury Polynices. Antigone, who hears this command, vows she will defy Creon and bury her brother. She calls her father from the palace. Blind Oedipus is led forth, hears that his curse on his sons has been carried out, and is banished by Creon, who says Thebes can never prosper as long as Oedipus remains. Antigone promises to bury Polynices and to accompany her father into exile. She and her father leave together to go to Athens, where Oedipus has learned from an oracle that he will die.

Phoenix (fē'niks). According to some accounts, a son of Agenor of Canaan (afterwards Phoenicia) and Telephassa. He was the brother of Cadmus, Cilix, Thasus, Phineus, and Europa. When Europa was carried off by Zeus in the form of a bull, Phoenix, with his brothers, was sent by Agenor to find her. He journeyed beyond Libya to what afterwards became Carthage in his search for her. After his father died he returned to his own country and became king there. It was renamed Phoenicia in his honor, and he came to be regarded as the ancestor of the Phoenicians.

Phoenix. In Greek legend, a son of Amyntor and Cleobule. At his mother's request he seduced his father's mistress, and was denounced by her to Amyntor. To punish him, Amyntor blinded him and put a curse on him: that he should never have a son of his own. Phoenix fled to the court of Peleus, where he was kindly received. Peleus persuaded Chiron to restore his sight, and then made him ruler of the Dolopians. He became the preceptor and foster father of Achilles, son of Peleus, and thus the curse of childlessness was to some extent overcome. He accompanied Achilles to the Trojan War. Phoenix tried, unsuccessfully, to persuade Achilles to give up his wrath at Agamemnon over the captive Briseis. Later he, as one whom Achilles loved and respected, was one of the ambassadors to offer him rich gifts and the restoration of Briseis if he would give up his quarrel and come to the aid of the Greeks. When Achilles rejected this attempt to settle the quarrel, Phoenix elected to remain with him. He commanded a group of the Myrmidons under Patroclus when that hero prevailed on Achilles to loan him his armor and his men so that he, at least, could go to the aid of his countrymen. After the death of Achilles he was one of the envoys to Scyros to fetch Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, to the war. At the end of the war he left Troy with Neoptolemus but died on the way home to Greece.

Phoenix. [Also: Phenix.] Greek name for the ancient Egyptian mythological bird, the bennu, a bird of great beauty which, after living 500 or 600 years in the Arabian wilderness, the only one of its kind, built for itself a funeral pyre of spices and aromatic gums, lighted the pile with the fanning of its wings, was burned upon it, but from its ashes rose new and young. The Phoenix was the Egyptian symbol for the rising sun and the hieroglyph for the sun. In Christian symbolism the Phoenix represents resurrection and immortality. The story exists in Arabia, Persia, and India. It is mentioned in the Old Testament (Job, xxix. 18). In heraldic symbolism the Phoenix is always represented in the midst of flames.

Pholus (fō'lus). In Greek legend, a centaur who lived in a cave on Mount Pholoë and guarded the wine given to the centaurs by Dionysus. Heracles visited him and, in accordance with the oracles, Pholus opened the wine of Dionysus to serve to him. The other centaurs were attracted by the aroma of the wine and maddened by its fumes. They attacked Heracles. Their mother sent a torrential rain to help them—as they were four-footed they could fight in the mud whereas Heracles, with only two feet, was continually slipping and falling. Nevertheless, Heracles killed many of the centaurs and drove the rest away. Pholus, his friend, in extracting an arrow from a fallen centaur marveled that such a slender weapon could be so deadly. It fell from his hand and pierced his foot slightly. Heracles tried to save him from succumbing to the poisoned arrow, but since it had been dipped in the venom of the Lernaean Hydra its effect, even in the slightest wound, was deadly and Pholus died. Heracles buried him on the mountain and named it after him, Mount Pholoë.

Phorbas (fôr'bas). In Greek legend, a son of Lapithes. He freed the Rhodians from a plague of serpents, and was honored by them as a hero. He was placed in the heavens as the constellation Ophiuchus (the Serpent-holder). Another Phorbas was a famous boxer, who challenged pilgrims en route to Delphi to contend with him, killed them, and eventually was slain by Apollo.

Phorbas. Named in the Iliad as a wealthy cattle owner, beloved of Hermes. His only son Ilioneus was slain by the Boeotian, Peneleus, in the Trojan War.

Phorbas. Named by Homer in the Iliad as a leader of the Phrygians, allies of Troy. He was slain by Telamonian Ajax in the struggle over possession of the body of Patroclus.

Phorcids (fôr'sidz). [Also: Phorcides, Phorcyads, Phorkyads.] In Greek mythology, the children of Phorcys and Ceto: Ladon, Echidna, the Gorgons, the Graeae, and according to some accounts, the Hesperides.

Phorcys (fôr'sis). [Also: Phorcus, Phorkys.] In Greek mythology, a son of Gaea and Pontus (Outsea) or Nereus. He was a sea-deity, a leader of the Tritons, and was the brother and consort of Ceto (a sea-goddess) and father of the Phorcids (especially the Graeae) and the Gorgons, and in some accounts of the Sirens and Scylla also.

Phorcys. A harbor on the island of Ithaca on the shore of which the Phaeacians left the sleeping Odysseus when, after an absence of 20 years, he was at last restored to his homeland.

Phormio (fôr'mi-ō). Athenian admiral; fl. last half of the 5th century B.C.; died probably c428 B.C. He went with reinforcements to the blockade of Potidaea (432) and helped to surround the city. In 430 B.C. he commanded a fleet of 30 ships that captured Amphilochean Argos on the Ambracian Gulf, sold the Ambraciots, who had taken the city, into slavery, and restored the Amphilochean inhabitants. He then went to Naupactus and guarded the western entrance to the Gulf of Corinth. The following year he twice defeated superior Spartan fleets sent against him in the Gulf of Corinth.

Phormion (fôr'mi-on). According to Greek tradition, a Spartan who acquired the house once lived in by the Dioscuri. When they came to him as strangers he regretfully denied their request to sleep in their old room, because his daughter was occupying it. Next day the maiden and everything belonging to her had vanished. Only images of the Dioscuri and a table on which was some silphion (a medicinal herb) remained in the room.

Phormis (fôr'mis). Greek comic poet in Syracuse; fl. early in the 5th century B.C. Titles of seven of his works survive.

Phoroneus (fôr-ō'nē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Inachus and the ash nymph Melia, and the brother of Io. He was the first to found a market town; its original name, Phoronicum, was later changed to Argos, and he is regarded as the founder of Argos. In the contest between Hera and Poseidon over Argos, Phoroneus was a judge. According to some accounts, he was the first man, and the one who discovered the use of fire, after Prometheus had stolen it. He established the worship of Hera, who had won in the contest for Argos, and is generally credited with being the originator of civilization in the Peloponnesus. According to some accounts, he married the nymph Cerdo and was the father of Iasus, Agenor, and Pelasgus, who divided the Peloponnesus between them. Others say his wife was Teledice, and his children were Apis and Niobe.

Phoronicum (fôr-ô'ni-kum). A city in the Peloponnesus, founded by Phoroneus, brother of Io. Its name was later changed to Argos. It was said to have been the first market town, and the first in the Peloponnesus to establish the worship of Hera.

Phosphorus (fos'fô-rus). In Greek mythology, the morning star; a son of Astraeus and Eos. It is also the name of the planet Venus when seen in the early dawn. Phosphorus is sometimes depicted as a youth carrying a blazing torch.

Phreattys (frē'at-is). In ancient geography, a place near the sea at Piraeus. Here exiled men, against whom some new charge had been brought, stood on a ship at sea and defended themselves while the judges listened from the shore. In the same manner, Teucer defended himself before Telamon, when he returned from the Trojan War without his half-brother Ajax, and before him, Telamon had defended himself to his father Aeacus on the charge of murdering his brother Phocus.

Phrixus (frik'sus). In Greek legend, a son of Athamas, king of Orchomenus in Boeotia, and Nephele, a cloud-born woman whom Athamas married at Hera's command. Phrixus was falsely accused by his aunt of making amorous advances to her. Actually, he had honorably scorned her approaches to him. In addition, Athamas' new wife, Ino, wished to remove him as an heir of Athamas so that her own children could inherit the kingdom. She therefore arranged a famine in the land and bribed messengers to bring word from the oracle at Delphi that only the sacrifice of Phrixus to the gods would lift the famine. As Athamas was about to put the knife to his throat a winged, golden-fleeced ram, sent by Hermes, arrived at the altar. Phrixus and his sister Helle leaped on the ram's back and were borne away through the skies. Helle fell off over the strait which now bears her name, Hellespont. Phrixus was carried safely to Colchis. There he was kindly received by the king, despite the Colchians' reputation for unfriendliness, and sacrificed the ram as he had been instructed to do. Its golden fleece, guarded by a dragon, was fastened to an oak tree in a grove sacred to Ares. In Colchis, Phrixus married Chalcioppe, daughter of King Aeëtes. On his death he was denied proper burial. His ghost haunted Pelias, who had seized the throne of Iolcus, demanding proper burial rites and the return of the Golden Fleece to Hellas. This provided a ready pretext when Pelias sought to get rid of his unwelcome nephew Jason. See Argonauts, Jason, Medea.

Phronima (fron'i-ma). According to Herodotus, a daughter of Etearchus, a king in Crete. Her stepmother made false accusations of improper behavior against her and convinced Etearchus that her charges were true. Etearchus asked a guest in his house, one Themison, to swear that he would perform whatever service Etearchus required of him. Themison, having sworn that he would do so, was requested by Etearchus to take Phronima and hurl her into the sea. Themison was indignant at the trickery which compelled him to do such a deed. He took Phronima and sailed from Crete. When the ship was at sea he lowered her over the side by a rope and, when she had been thoroughly immersed, hauled her aboard again, little the worse for her ducking. On arriving at the island of Thera Themison gave Phronima to Polymnestus, to whom she subsequently bore a son, Battus. This Battus later, at the bidding of the oracle at Delphi, founded Cyrene in Libya.

Phrontis (fron'tis). In Greek legend, a son of Phrixus and Chalcioppe, and the grandson of Aeëtes, king of Colchis, and Athamas, king of Orchomenus. With his brothers he sailed from Colchis with the intention of going to Orchomenus to claim their inheritance from Athamas. On the way they were shipwrecked and rescued off the island of Ares by Jason and the Argonauts. Phrontis and his brothers, Argus, Cytissorus, and Melas, returned to Colchis with the Argonauts.

Phrontis. Named by Homer as the wife of the Trojan Panthous. She was the mother of Euphorbus, Hyperenor, and Polydamas.

Phrygia in the interior, bounded by Bithynia and Paphlagonia on the N, the Halys River on the E, the Taurus Mountains on the S, and Mysia, Lydia, and Caria on the W. Later the Galatians settled in the NE part. The inhabitants (Phrygians) were of undetermined origin, but are believed to have come from Europe. The country was overrun by the Cimmerians in the 7th century B.C., and was ruled later by Lydia, Persia, Macedon, and Rome. Gordius, who tied the Gordian knot, and Midas, his son, who possessed the golden touch, were legendary kings of Phrygia. Named by Homer as the "land of the vineyard," it was the home of the pious and devoted couple, Baucis and Philemon; the oak and linden tree growing from one trunk, into which they were changed as a reward for their hospitality to Zeus, could be seen there. Phrygia was invaded by the Amazons in the years preceding the Trojan War, and in the war the Phrygians allied themselves to Troy.

Phryne (frī'nē). [Original name, Mnesarete.] Boeotia-born, 4th century B.C. Athenian courtesan. She is supposed to have been the model of the picture Aphrodite Anadyomene by Apelles, and of the statue of the Cnidian Aphrodite by Praxiteles. According to legend, she was defended on a capital charge by her lover Hyperides; and when he failed to move the judges by his oratory, he bade her uncover her bosom, after which they voted her acquittal.

Phrynichus (frin'i-kus). Attic poet, son of Polyphradmon. An older contemporary of Aeschylus, he was active early in the 5th century B.C. He is credited with several innovations, such as using an actor in addition to the leader of the chorus, and placing female characters on the stage. Titles of nine of his works on mythological and contemporary subjects survive. One of these latter, Capture of Miletus, caused the audience to burst into tears, because it reminded the Athenians of what they considered their own misfortune, the fall of Miletus (494 B.C.) to the Persians. Phrynichus was fined and a law was passed that this drama should never be produced again (the first case of censorship on record). Another of his plays, Phoenissae (Phoenician Women) won first prize for him. It took its name from the wives of the Phoenician sailors who formed part of the navy of King Xerxes in the Persian War. The scene was at the Persian court where the elders were awaiting news of the war. Themistocles, Athenian hero of the war, was patron of the chorus. The drama is said to have been the model for the great Aeschylean tragedy, Persians. Only fragments of the work of Phrynichus survive, but the songs he wrote were popular long after his death.

Phrynichus. Greek poet of the Old Comedy, contemporary and rival of Aristophanes. In 405 B.C. his comedy, Muses, took second prize when Aristophanes won with The Frogs, but in general he was not a very formidable rival. Fragments of some of his plays survive.

Phthia (thī'a). In Greek mythology, mother by Apollo of Dorus, Laodocus, and Polypoetes.

Phthia. In Homeric legend (Iliad), the concubine of Amyntor. Phoenix, son of Amyntor, seduced Phthia to please his mother. Phthia accused him to Amyntor, and in a rage the latter blinded Phoenix and laid a curse on him that he should never have children of his own. It was because of his father's hatred that Phoenix fled to the court of Peleus and became the beloved tutor and companion of Achilles.

Phthia. In ancient geography, a district and town in Thessaly. According to Greek legend, Peleus was the king of the region, to which he fled from Aegina after the murder of his brother Phocus. It was also the home of Aristaeus before he went to Ceos, and was the native town of Achilles.

Phthiotis (thī-ō'tis). In ancient geography, a region of Thessaly, bordered on the E by the Maliacus Sinus (Gulf of Lamia). It was in ancient times a home of the Achaeans.

Phylacus (fi'la-kus). In Greek mythology, a descendant of Ares. He was a son of Deion and Diomedes, and was the king of Phylace. He owned a fine herd of cattle which he prized above all things except his son, Iphichus. Melampus tried to steal the cattle for his brother Bias, who needed them to win a bride, but he was caught by Phylacus and imprisoned. After a year Melampus convinced Phylacus of his prophetic powers and was freely given the cattle in return for curing Iphiclus of sterility.

Phyle (fī'lē). In ancient geography, a fortified place in Attica, on Mount Parnes, commanding the shortest route between Athens and Thebes. It was one of a series of fortresses that guarded the mountainous border of Attica. When (404 B.C.) the Thirty Tyrants ruled Athens Thrasybulus, who had sought refuge in Thebes, resolved to overthrow the tyrants. With 70 partisans he left Thebes and seized the fortress of Phyle. The tyrants sent a force against him and prepared to force his surrender by a blockade of the fortress. However, a snow-storm compelled the attackers to withdraw. Some months later another expedition was sent against Phyle but they were ambushed by Thrasybulus and suffered heavy losses. From Phyle Thrasybulus marched to Piraeus, seized Munychia, and succeeded in overthrowing the Thirty (403 B.C.).

Phyleus (fī'lē-us, -lūs). In Greek legend, a son of Augeas, king of Elis. He witnessed Heracles' oath to cleanse the Augean stables in one day and his father's oath to pay Heracles one-tenth of his cattle if the task was performed on time. When Augeas refused to fulfill his part of the bargain, claiming he had never made it, Phyleus reminded him that he had been a witness to his oath. Augeas angrily banished his son and he went to Dulichium. Phyleus, father of Megeſ, was a famous horseman beloved of Zeus.

Phyleus. In Greek legend, a king of Ephyra in Thesprotia. He was the father of Astyocheia, who was carried off by Heracles when he attacked Ephyra and slew Phyleus.

Phylus (fī'li-us) or Phyllus (fī'lī-us). In mythology, the beloved friend of Cynus who faithfully carried out the tasks of taming wild birds and a lion to prove his love, but refused to give Cynus a bull which he won as a prize. Cynus flung himself over a cliff and was transformed into a swan.

Phyllidas (fī'lī-das). Theban patriot; fl. in the first half of the 4th century B.C. He plotted with the Theban exile Pelopidas to overthrow the pro-Spartan polemarchs of Thebes who were sustained by a garrison of 1500 Spartans in the Theban citadel. Phyllidas was the secretary of the polemarchs. He arranged a great banquet, supposedly in honor of the polemarchs, for the day following the secret entry into the city of Pelopidas and his six fellow conspirators. Phyllidas lured the polemarchs to his banquet by promising them the company of some beautiful noblewomen whom they desired. In the course of the feast the polemarchs asked for the promised women. Phyllidas said they would come only when the polemarchs were alone. The attendants were dismissed and the women entered, heavily veiled. When the polemarchs requested them to raise their veils and expose their beauty the "ladies" plunged daggers into the bodies of the polemarchs and the few friends who had remained with them, for according to plan, the "beautiful women" were Pelopidas and his six colleagues in the plot to free Thebes. As a result of the deaths of the polemarchs and other political murders which immediately followed, the Spartan garrison withdrew from the citadel (378 B.C.) and the Thebans regained control of their city.

Phyllis (fī'līs). In Greek mythology, a princess of Bisaltia in Thrace. On his return from the Trojan War, Demophon, son of Theseus, landed at Thrace. Phyllis fell in love with him and married him, and he became king. After a time Demophon wished to return to Athens and, after promising Phyllis that he would return within a year, he made ready to leave. Phyllis gave him a casket which she said contained a charm, and told him not to open it until he had decided he would never return to her. At the end of the year Demophon had not returned. Phyllis invoked Rhea to curse his name, took poison, and died. At the same time, Demophon decided to open the casket. The sight of its contents (which remained forever unknown) is said to have driven him mad and caused his death. Another Thracian Phyllis fell in love with Demophon's brother Acamas, who had stopped in Thrace on his way to the Trojan War. When she learned of the fall of Troy she made eager visits to the shore to welcome him on his return, but as days passed and he did not come (storms had delayed him), she died of grief and was transformed into an almond tree by Athena. The next day Acamas arrived. He embraced the trunk of the almond tree, whereupon it instantly burst into flower. The Athenians performed dances annually in honor of Phyllis and Acamas.

Phyllis. In ancient geography, a river of Bithynia, passed by the Argonauts on their way to Colchis.

Phyllis. In ancient geography, a mountain of Thessaly, the source of the Apidanus and the Enipeus Rivers.

Phylo (fī'lō). An attendant and handmaiden of Helen at the court of Menelaus.

Phylomache (fil-om'ā-kē). According to some accounts, a daughter of Amphion, and the wife of Pelias, by whom she was the mother of Acastus and Alcestis.

Phylonome or Philonome (phil-on'ō-mē). In Greek legend, the second wife of Cynus of Colonaē. She falsely accused Tenes, her stepson, of making advances to her and produced witnesses to attest to her lies. Cynus banished his son. When Cynus later learned that she had lied about Tenes he buried Phylonome alive.

Phytalus (fit'ā-lus). In Greek mythology, one of the inhabitants of Eleusis who received Demeter when she was searching for Persephone. As a reward for his kindness to her Demeter gave him the fig tree and taught him how to cultivate it. His sons later purified Theseus for the murders he had committed on his way to Athens.

Phyteus (fit'ē-us). In Greek mythology, Apollo as the Pythian god, i.e., as killer of the dragon, Python, and specifically as god of the Delphic oracle.

Phyxius (fik'si-us). Epithet of Zeus, naming Zeus as a protector of fugitives. Deucalion sacrificed to Zeus Phyxius (God of Escape), when he landed safely after the great flood sent by Zeus to destroy impious men. Phrixus sacrificed to Zeus Phyxius, when he arrived safely at Colchis, the golden-fleeced ram on which he had escaped from Boeotia.

Piacenza (pyä-chen'tsä). See Placentia.

Piazza del Campidoglio (pyät'tsä del kām-pē-dō'lyō). Open square on the Capitoline Hill at Rome, the Area Capitolina of the ancient city. Until 1477 it was the general market of the city and remained the center of civic life after the market was removed to another location. The Senatorial Palace or city hall is mentioned as early as 1150. In 1538 the equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius was placed here, and in 1559 a plan was made, under the direction of Michelangelo, according to which the present arrangement of the buildings has been carried out: the Senatorial Palace in the center, the Palace of the Conservatori on the right, and the Capitoline Museum on the left.

Picenes (pī-sē'nēz). Specifically, the people of Picenum in ancient Italy, ethnologically and linguistically related to the Illyrians. The term is also a generic regional and cultural term, however, for all the people E of the Apennines from Rimini to Vasto. The Picenes were a warlike merchant people, practiced earth burial, and had many amber and ivory ornaments and carvings, and bronze figures and bowls.

Picenum (pī-sē'num). In ancient geography, a territory in Italy, lying between the Adriatic Sea and the Apennines. It was bounded by Umbria on the NW and W, the Sabines on the SW, and the Vestini on the S. It was reduced by Rome in 268 B.C., and took part in the Social War against Rome in 90 B.C. Capital, Asculum Picenum.

Pictones (pik-tō'nēz). Ancient Gallic people, mentioned by Julius Caesar as living on the coast of what is now France, along the S bank of the Loire River. Their ancient town of Limonum is the modern Poitiers, to which they gave their name.

Picumnus (pi-kum'nus) and Pilumnus (pi-lum'nus). In Roman religion, two fertility gods associated with marriage and especially with childbirth. When a birth was about to take place they prevented the forest-god Silvanus from entering the house by beating the threshold with ax and pestle. Offerings were made to them after a delivery.

Picus (pī'kus). In ancient Italian mythology, a god of agriculture. According to Ovid, he was a son of Saturn and was a king in Italy. He was also said to have been the father of Faunus. He was a handsome and athletic youth, a trainer of horses, a mighty hunter, and a seer. Nymphs pursued him, but he scorned them all except Canens, reputed to be a daughter of Janus. He married Canens and they were devoted to each other. One day while he was hunting boars Circe saw him from afar and fell in love with him. She sent a phantom boar across his path, which he instantly pursued and so was separated from his companions.

As he searched alone in the forest, Circe approached him and declared her love. But Picus announced his unshakable love for Canens and spurned Circe. To punish him, she invoked her magic and transformed him into a handsome bird, a woodpecker. His companions, who came upon her and accused her of foul play toward their young leader, were changed into wild beasts. Some think, however, that the story of Picus is a rationalization of the sacred bird of Mars, the woodpecker.

Pielus (pī'e-lus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Andromache and Neoptolemus, son of Achilles. Alexander the Great traced his descent from Neoptolemus and Andromache through this Pielus, one of whose descendants, they say, was Olympias, mother of Alexander and sister of King Neoptolemus of Epirus.

Pieria (pī-ir'ī-a). In ancient geography, a district in N Thessaly, Greece. Apollo pastured his herd of cows here, and it was from here that they were stolen by the child Hermes. It was the legendary birthplace of Orpheus and of the Muses. Mount Olympus was in the district.

Pierides (pī-ir'ī-dēz). In Greek mythology, the Muses. They were so named from Pieria in Thessaly, their reputed birthplace.

Pierides. In Greek legend, nine maidens of Pieria, in N Thessaly. They were so proud of their numbers and of their voices that they challenged the Muses to a contest on Mount Helicon. River-nymphs were selected to be the judges. When, not unexpectedly, the Muses were adjudged the winners, the Pierides hurled abuse on them. It was for this reason, not because of their arrogance in challenging the Muses, that they were turned into magpies with endless power to chatter and scold. The Pierides were so named and the incident thus reported by Nicander of Colophon, a poet of the 3rd century B.C. They are also said to be the daughters of Pierus, a king of Macedonia.

Pietas (pī'e-tas). In Roman mythology, the personification of piety, dutiful respect, and family affection. Her symbol is the stork. A temple was built in her honor in Rome, in 191 B.C., by Acilius Glabrio. The occasion for the building of the temple was said to have been in honor of a daughter who had saved her father, condemned to starvation, by feeding him from her own breast.

Pillars of Heracles, or Hercules (her'kū-lēz). In ancient geography, the two opposite promontories Calpe (Gibraltar) in Europe and Abyla in Africa, situated at the E extremity of the Strait of Gibraltar, at the outlet from the Mediterranean into the Atlantic. According to some accounts, a land bridge once joined the two continents and Heracles carved it apart to let the waters of Ocean mingle with those of the inner sea. Others say the waterway between the two continents was once much wider and Heracles narrowed it to keep ocean monsters out of the inner sea. Still others say that he set up the stone pillars to commemorate his successful voyage to the island of Erythea to fetch the cattle of Geryon. Whatever his reason, all agree that it was during his journey on this errand that he erected the Pillars.

Pilumnus (pi-lum'us). A Roman fertility god, sometimes thought to have been the inventor of the idea of crushing grain with a pestle. See Picumnus.

Pimplea (pim'plē-a). In ancient geography, a city and fountain in Pieria sacred to the Muses.

Pimpleides (pim-plē'i-dēz). A name of the Muses, from Pimplea in Pieria.

Pincian Hill (pin'shi-an). [Latin, Mons Pincius.] Hill in the N part of Rome, extending in a long ridge E from the Tiber River. It was not one of the traditional Seven Hills, though separated by but a narrow interval from the Quirinal. In antiquity, as at the present day, it was noted for its beautiful gardens. The view from it toward Saint Peter's is famous.

Pindar (pin'dar). Greatest of the Greek lyric poets (518-438 B.C.). He was born in Cynoscephalae, near Thebes in Boeotia, to an aristocratic family, the Aegidae, who traced their ancestry to Aegeus and before him to Cadmus of Thebes. From childhood he showed great aptitude for and interest in music. He learned to play the lyre and flute at home, then went to Athens to learn music and how to train choruses from Agathocles (or Apollodorus of Athens). By the time he was 20 he had achieved a reputation as a poet. According to tradition, he was once beaten in a contest by the poetess Corinna,

who also advised him to lay on the mythological adornments to his poems with a lighter hand. While still in his twenties he wrote for the princes of Thessaly and the nobles of Aegina. He wrote for and visited the leading families of Rhodes, Tenedos, Athens, which he especially loved, as well as King Alexander of Macedon, and the tyrants Theron of Acragas in Sicily, and Hiero of Syracuse, at whose court he lived for a time (476-472 B.C.). He was known and honored on every hand for his genius and for his piety. He was an ardent supporter of traditional religion, had special privileges at Delphi, and after his death his ghost was supposed to feast annually with Apollo. A Dorian aristocrat, he was as proud of his ancestry as he was of his genius, and considered himself the equal of any man with whom he might associate. The myths with which he embellished his work were often what he considered to be part of his family history. His morality was indissolubly linked to the Dorian aristocratic tradition—the heroic tradition of Heracles and the Aeacids. Best of all he loved to write, for their descendants, of the glorious exploits of Heracles and the Aeacids. Although he lived during the Persian War he did not offer his gifts to further the cause of the Greeks against the Persians, for he was purely a poet, inspired to commemorate an earlier age. He wrote widely, in many modes, including Hymns (to Persephone, to Fortune, and the like), Paeans (to Apollo of Delphi and Zeus of Dodona), Choral dithyrambs to Dionysus, Processional songs, Choral songs for maidens, Choral dance-songs, Encomia (laudatory odes), Scolia (festive songs to be sung at banquets by a comus or festive troop), and Dirges (to be sung to the flute, with choral dance). Of all these only fragments survive. His 44 Epinicia (Victory Odes) to the winners of the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games have come down to us almost in their entirety. In the victory odes for the winners of the games Pindar mentions the victor himself only in passing, as it were. The burden of the poems concerns the locale from which the victor came and such mythological adornments concerning it as Pindar could work in, with occasional sharp philosophic comments. The myths of which he wrote he believed in implicitly, as Stesichorus before him had believed that the myths were actual history, but like Stesichorus, Pindar corrected the stories when he felt that was in order. For example, it was incredible to him on religious grounds that Tantalus would have served up his son Pelops as a feast for the gods, and that Demeter would have absent-mindedly eaten the shoulder of Pelops at the feast before she realized on what flesh she was feeding. Pindar would not admit that the immortal gods would permit such shocking barbarity, or that Tantalus would have committed it. In his account therefore, he said that Pelops was carried off by Poseidon, and that in his absence the horror story that he had been served up to the gods was invented. With his strong affection for and pride in the Aeacids, Pindar bore a resentment against Odysseus who brought such torment to Ajax, and said that it was to Homer that Odysseus owed his great reputation, that actually Odysseus was nothing but “a supple liar.” But Pindar did give Homer full credit for telling the whole story of the glorious prowess of Ajax. Pindar wrote in the Ionic dialect, in a style that was almost archaic, rich in imagery, and difficult. So truly a poet of the dialect was he that he comes through only imperfectly in translation. The music he composed, and to which his poems were sung, has been lost. He lived to a great age and died in the theater in Argos. So revered was his name that Alexander the Great, more than a hundred years later, spared his house and his descendants when he captured and sacked Thebes.

Pindus (pin'dus). Range of mountains in Greece, between Thessaly on the E and Epirus on the W. Greatest elevation, about 7665 feet.

Pirae (pī'rē). The name of a village between Formia and Minturnae on the Via Appia, mentioned once by the Latin author Pliny the Elder, who describes it as deserted in his time (1st century A.D.). It has been identified with a substantial fortification of polygonal limestone at the modern seaside village of Scauri, five miles W of Minturnae. The existence of a town of this name in the 1st century B.C. has been confirmed by the Minturnae excavations, in whose inscriptions

Piraeus/Pirithous

the name of a slave owner Pirana or Peirana, "woman from Pirae," appears four times. (JJ) Piraeus (pī-rē'us). [Also: Peiraeus, Peiraieus, Peiraievs, Piraeus.] Seaport of Athens and the chief port of Greece, situated on the Saronic Gulf about 5 miles SW of Athens, on the west side of the Munychian peninsula. The ancients believed the Piraeus was once an island, and its name is taken to mean "land across the water." In ancient times Phalerum, which could be seen from the Acropolis, was the port of Athens, but Themistocles recognized the advantages of the Piraeus with its three harbors, even though it was farther away from Athens than Phalerum, and built it into a formidable port. The three harbors of the Piraeus were the great harbor on the west side of the peninsula, and the smaller, circular harbors of Munychia and Zea on the east side. Because of these harbors Themistocles thought the Piraeus even more important than Athens himself, and perhaps if he had been a tyrant would have compelled the Athenians to give up their city and move to the port. He advised them if they were ever hard-pressed to withdraw to the Piraeus, but they never did. During his archonship (493-492 B.C.) he fortified the harbor and built it up as a port. In c450 B.C. Hippodamus of Miletus remodeled the city, laying out the streets in squares or rectangles, the so-called gridiron system. The great ship sheds there were one of the glories of Athens. Among the artifacts found on the site of the ship sheds are marble plates, with a great eye painted on them. These plates were fastened to the bow of the ships, providing an eye so that the ship could see where it was going. The port was connected to Athens by long walls, and ultimately the whole area, Athens, Piraeus, Munychia and Zea, was enclosed in a single fortification. At the end of the Peloponnesian Wars (404 B.C.), the Spartans destroyed the fortifications. They were rebuilt in 394 B.C. by Conon, who also founded a sanctuary of Aphrodite near the SE rim of the great harbor. Sulla destroyed the fortifications (c86 B.C.) and they were never rebuilt. At the Piraeus there was a sacred precinct of Athena Savior with a bronze image of the goddess holding a spear; and there was a precinct of Zeus Savior with a bronze image of the god holding a staff and Victory. Annually a public sacrifice was offered to Zeus Savior with a public festival, boat races, and a procession. Those who had been saved during storms at sea made offerings at the sanctuary of Zeus Savior. Themistocles founded a sanctuary of Aphrodite at the NE extremity of the Piraeus. There were, among other religious sites, at least two theaters of Dionysus there. The bones of Themistocles, who died in Magnesia in Asia, were brought back to Greece by his sons and buried at Piraeus.

Piren or Peiren (pī'rēn). In Greek mythology, a son of Glaucus, and the brother of Bellerophon. According to some accounts, Bellerophon was compelled to flee from Corinth because he had accidentally killed Piren. Others say he killed Bellerus, the tyrant of Corinth.

Pirene (pī-rē'nē). A daughter of the river-god Achelous, or of the river-god Asopus and Metope. Her son by Poseidon, Cenchrias, was accidentally slain by Artemis. Pirene wept so copiously that she was metamorphosed into a fountain, which was located at Corinth.

Pirene Spring. A spring behind Aphrodite's temple on the Acrocorinth, the citadel of Corinth, or one just outside the city gate. Some say it was caused to flow to supply Corinth with water forever by the river-god Asopus. He did this in return for information supplied him by Sisyphus about the fate of Aegina, a daughter of Asopus, who had been carried off by Zeus. Others say the spring gushed forth when Pegasus, the winged horse, struck the ground with his hoof. It was while Pegasus was drinking at this spring that Bellerophon slipped the golden bridle over his neck and captured him. American archaeologists have found what is undoubtedly the Pirene Spring of the classical period within the city, just off the agora.

Pirithous (pī-rith'ō-us). [Also: Peirithous.] In Greek legend, a Lapith prince, the son of Ixion and Dia, daughter of Eioneus, or, as some say, a son of Zeus and Dia. He heard of the great exploits of Theseus and resolved to find out whether he could live up to his reputation for strength and courage. To carry out his resolve he invaded Attica and made a raid on a herd of cattle near

Marathon. Theseus pursued him, whereupon Pirithous turned in his tracks to confront him and test his mettle. But when he saw Theseus, who showed every sign of his reputed valor, he had a change of heart. Instead of fighting him he admitted his wrong and put himself in Theseus' hands, to ask of him whatever recompense he desired. Theseus answered that the only recompense he wanted was the friendship of Pirithous. They then swore an oath of friendship which both kept until death. Pirithous married Hippodamia, daughter of Butes. He invited Theseus and many noted guests to the wedding, at which the centaurs were also present, but he did not invite Eris and Ares, and they determined to punish him for the slight. The centaurs became unruly as the result of taking too much wine, which in their ignorance they had failed to dilute with water, and attacked the bride. Pirithous, with the ready assistance of Theseus, fought them off and drove them from the wedding festivities. Pirithous was a member of the hunt for the Calydonian Boar and some say he accompanied Theseus on his expedition to the land of the Amazons. He had a son, Polypoetes, by Hippodamia, who later fought in the Trojan War. When Hippodamia subsequently died, Pirithous determined to seek a daughter of Zeus for a wife. He made a compact with Theseus by which they agreed to abduct Helen, the supposed daughter of Tyndareus, and draw lots to see which would win her. They bound themselves by oath that the winner would assist the loser to gain the bride he might seek. On the successful abduction of Helen, Pirithous lost in the drawing of the lots. He chose Persephone as the wife he would seek, and in spite of the efforts of Theseus to dissuade him he insisted that no other woman would suit him. Theseus, bound by his oath, descended to Tartarus with him and demanded Persephone from Hades. Hades, who received them courteously, invited them to be seated. Unwittingly, they took seats on Chairs of Forgetfulness, and instantly the chairs grew about them. They were unable to move. They sat there for years. Heracles, on a mission to fetch Cerberus from Tartarus, found them and answered their pleas for help. He wrenched Theseus from his chair but Pirithous, whose impious idea it was to invade the world of the dead and steal Persephone, remained fast to his chair, and there he sits through eternity.

Pirous (pī'rō-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Imbrassus. In the Trojan War he was a captain of the Thracians, allies of Troy. They were described by Homer as top-knot wearers. He felled Diores with a huge stone and then stabbed him. In his turn he was slain by the javelin of Thoas.

Pisa (pī'sā). The name of Oenomaus' realm in Elis. It was said to have been founded by Pisis, a son of Perieres and a grandson of Aeolus. The mound of the murdered suitors of Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus, was here, and after he married Hippodamia and became king of Pisa in place of Oenomaus, Pelops sacrificed to them annually. When Pelops died his bones, according to some accounts, were placed in a chest and kept in a small building near the sanctuary of Artemis Cordax in Pisa. The Pisans were hostile to the Eleans. In 748 B.C. they brought in a tyrant of Argos and held the Olympic Games with him. In 668 B.C. they again took control of the games from the Eleans with an army. The Eleans did not recognize these games held under the auspices of the Pisans, and called them Non-Olympiads. In the 6th century B.C. the Pisans made war on the Eleans and were destroyed with their allies. Henceforth, the name of Pisa was Olympia.

Pisa (pē'sā). [Ancient name, Pisae.] City in C Italy, situated on the Arno River. Ancient Pisae, on the same site, was only two miles from the sea, but deposits in the delta of the Arno have so built out the land that the city is now six miles from the Mediterranean Sea. The ancient city was one of the 12 federated towns of Etruria. It became a Roman colony in 180 B.C., and was important for its location on the Aemilian Way and as an outpost against the Ligurians.

Pisae (pī'sē). Ancient name of Pisa, city in C Italy.

Pisander (pī-san'dér). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Maemalus. He was a captain of the Myrmidons sent out by Achilles with Patroclus, and was a man who excelled at fighting with the spear.

of the 7th or 6th century B.C. He was a native of Camirus in Rhodes, and wrote an epic, Heraclea, in two books, only fragments of which survive. It is thought that he was the first in literature to describe the labors of Heracles and fix their number as 12, and that it was he who gave to Heracles the attributes of the lion skin and the club.

Pisatis (pī'sa-tis). In ancient geography, a region in the NW of the Peloponnesus. It became a part of Elis.

PISCES

Pictured according to ancient descriptions

Pisces (pis'ēz). The twelfth sign of the zodiac—the Fishes—which the sun enters about February 19. Also, a zodiacal constellation, supposed to represent two fishes united by a ribbon attached to their tails. One of the fishes is E, the other S, of the square of Pegasus.

Piscis Australis (pis'is âs-trā'lis). An ancient southern constellation—the Southern Fish. The figure represents a fish which swallows the water poured out of the vase by Aquarius.

Pisidia (pi-sid'i-a). In ancient geography, a territory in Asia Minor. It was bounded by Phrygia on the N, Isauria and Cilicia on the E, Pamphylia on the S, and Lycia on the SW, and was traversed by the Taurus Mountains. It was conquered by Rome.

Pisistratidae (pī-sis-trat'i-dē). Hippias and Hipparchus, the two sons and successors of Pisistratus.

Pisistratus (pī-sis'tra-tus). [Also: Peisistratus.] Tyrant of Athens, 561–527 B.C. (with intervals). He was born c605 B.C., the son of Hippocrates, a descendant of Neleus, and was named for Nestor's son Pisistratus. He was a relative of Solon with whom, in spite of political differences, he remained on friendly terms to the end of Solon's life. At a time of civil strife between two factions in Athens Pisistratus seized the opportunity, at the head of a third party of agricultural followers whose support he won by the promise of liberal land laws, to gain power for himself (c561 B.C.). According to Herodotus, he achieved power in the following manner: He gashed himself and his mules, then drove his chariot into the market place of Athens. Displaying his wounds, he asked for a guard to protect him, reminding the Athenians of his brave exploits when he led an army against the Megareans (c570 B.C.) and recovered Salamis for the Athenians and captured the Megarean port of Nisaea as well. The Athenians granted him a guard armed with clubs. With this, Pisistratus revolted, captured the citadel, and secured power in Athens. Having established himself in power, however, he made no upsetting changes in the laws or offices but administered the government according to the established usages and was a wise ruler. Only a short time passed before the leaders of the other two factions, the aristocratic parties, Megacles and Lycurgus, composed their differences and drove Pisistratus out (c560 B.C.). He went into exile. The harmony between Megacles and Lycurgus was short-lived. Megacles sent a herald to Pisistratus and offered to restore him to power on condition that Pisistratus marry his daughter. He agreed. But the problem of how his restoration was to be accomplished had to be overcome. The device used was, according to Herodotus, extremely silly in view of the fact that the Athenians were reputed to be the cleverest of the Greeks, but it worked. Pisistratus found an unusually tall and beautiful woman, dressed her in armor, and drove her in a cart to the city. Heralds preceding the procession proclaimed that this was the goddess Athena, and that it was her wish that the Athenians restore Pisistratus. The Athenians accepted the hoax and he regained power (c559 B.C.), and then married the daughter of Megacles. Pisistratus already had grown sons, and as the Alcmaeonidae, of which family Megacles was a member, were under a curse for breaking their oath in regard to the followers of Cylon, Pisistratus resolved not to have any children by his new wife. Megacles learned that the childlessness of his daughter was deliberate and was roused to anger against Pisistratus. He again composed his differences with the party of Lycurgus and plotted to expel Pisistratus, but he, learning of the plot, fled to Eretria (c556 B.C.). He spent the next ten years scheming how to regain power in Athens. He and his sons Hippias and Hipparchus collected money, armed mercenaries and allies who were in their debt, and set out to return to Athens. They landed near Marathon and were joined by many who, as Herodotus says, "loved tyranny better than freedom." But others say the rule of Pisistratus was not unpopular, and that it was on the whole beneficial. At first the Athenians ignored the movements of Pisistratus, but when they realized he had left Marathon and was approaching the city with an army they gathered forces to resist him. The two forces encamped opposite each other. An Acarnanian soothsayer announced to Pisistratus:

Now has the cast been made, the net is out-spread in the water,

Through the moonshiny night the tunnies will enter the meshes.

Pisistratus understood the saying and instantly acted on it. He fell upon the Athenian army just after they had finished their midday meal and were relaxing in their camp, and put them to rout. He now became ruler of Athens for the third time (c544 or 541 B.C.), and this time he took vigorous measures to secure his power. The Alcmaeonidae fled the country. Pisistratus took land from his enemies and gave it to his agricultural followers. He made peace with the neighboring states. He oriented Athenian diplomacy towards Ionia in an effort to make the Aegean Sea the area of Athenian hegemony. He took the city of Sigeum from the Mytilenaeans by force of arms and established his bastard son Hegesistratus as tyrant there. He beautified the city of Athens, gave his support to the art of poetry, encouraged the dramatic representations that were given at the festivals of Dionysus, and changed the character of the Panathenean festival to give it a national rather than a local flavor. In the latter years of his rule he commissioned a learned body to establish a definitive text of the Iliad and the Odyssey. This version, which collated and set in order the many bits and sections recited by the rhapsodists, is the one from which all subsequent texts of Homer are derived. Under his just and beneficent rule Athens was strong, prosperous, and at peace. At his death (527 B.C.), Pisistratus left his sons Hippias and Hipparchus in control of the city.

Pisistratus. In the Odyssey, one of the sons of Nestor. He welcomed Telemachus when he arrived in Pylus in search of news of his father, and accompanied Telemachus on his journey to Sparta to see what news Menelaus could give him.

Piso (pī'sō), Calpurnius. Name of a family of the Gens Calpurnia distinguished in Roman history. Among the members were the following: Lucius, a censor, consul (133 B.C.), and author; Lucius, a politician, father-in-law of Julius Caesar, consul in 58 B.C., and later a member of the party of Mark Antony; Cnaeus, governor of Syria under Tiberius—according to some accounts he poisoned Germanicus at the request of Tiberius, but when he returned to Rome and showed documents as evidence of Tiberius' complicity, Tiberius destroyed the documents and disavowed him, and he was sentenced to death by the Senate; Caius, the leader of an unsuccessful conspiracy against Nero in 65 A.D. who committed suicide when the plan fell through; and Lucius, the successor of Galba for four days, put to death by Otho (69 A.D.).

Pistor (pis'tôr). In Roman mythology, an epithet of Jupiter, meaning "the Baker." When the Gauls were besieging Rome Jupiter advised the Romans to bake bread and throw it to the enemy, thus deluding them into thinking that the Romans had plenty of provisions.

Pistoxenus (pis-toks'e-nus) Painter. See Euphronius, painter and potter.

Pitana (pi-tā'nā) or Pitane (-nē). In Greek mythology, a nymph, mother by Poseidon of Evadne. She concealed the fact that she was to bear a child, and when it was born gave it to Aepytus, son of Elatus, to bring up.

Pithecosa (pith-e-kū'sā) or Pithecusae (-sē). [Also: Aenaria.] In ancient geography, a volcanic island in the Tyrrhenian Sea, situated about 16 miles W of Naples. The name, given it by the Greeks, means "Apes' island." According to legend, Zeus became disgusted with the Cercopes, a people notorious for their lying and cheating habits. He changed them into apelike animals covered with long yellow hair, deprived them of speech so that they could no longer plague humanity with their lies, and exiled them to this island which bears their name. Modern name of the island is Ischia.

Pittacus (pit'a-kus). Greek politician and poet, born c650 B.C., in Lesbos; died c569 B.C. He was chiefly responsible for the overthrow of the tyrant of Mytilene (c611 B.C.). He won the confidence of the people and was elected by them to be their ruler for a term of ten years. He restored order in Mytilene by banishing the nobles who resisted his power, among them the poets Alcaeus and Sappho, and he secured domestic peace by the enactment of wise laws and a firm rule. At the end of the ten years for which he had been chosen he voluntarily relinquished his power. After his death he was enrolled as one of the Seven Wise Men of ancient Greece.

Pittheus (pit'thūs). In Greek legend, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was king in Troezen, a city which he named after his brother and which he dedicated to Athena and Poseidon, and was said to have been the wisest man of his time. He founded an oracle of Apollo in Troezen, dedicated an altar to Themis, and was a teacher of oratory and rhetoric. He gave his daughter Aethra to King Aegeus, who was paying him a visit, and reared and instructed their son Theseus, in Troezen. Later he adopted Hippolytus, son of Theseus and Antiope, and made him heir to the throne of Troezen.

Pityocampes (pit-i-ō-kamp'tēz). The name given to Sinis, meaning "Pine-bender." See Sinis.

Pitys (pi'tis). In Greek mythology, a nymph who fled from Pan and was changed into a fir tree. Pan used the branches of the tree for a garland for his head.

Pityusa (pit-i-ū'sā). [Modern names, Spetsai, Petza, Spetzia.] Island in S Greece, at the entrance to the Gulf of Nauplia, about 28 miles SE of Nauplia. Length, about 5 miles.

Pius (pī'us), Metellus. See Metellus, Quintus Caecilius (died c64 B.C.).

Placentia (pla-sen'shā). [Modern name, Piacenza.] City in N Italy, situated on the Padus (Po) River E of its junction with the Trebia (Trebba) River, about 40 miles SE of Mediolanum (Milan). Founded by the Romans in 218 B.C. as a fortress against the Gallic tribes, it served as a place of retreat for the remnants of the Roman army after the defeat at the Trebia (218 B.C.) by Hannibal. In 205 B.C. Hasdrubal unsuccessfully besieged it; in 200 it was burned by the Gauls; and in 190 B.C. it was recolonized, and a few years later was made a terminus of the Aemilian Way. In the time of Augustus part of the ancient city was named Julia Augusta.

Planctae (plang'tē). "Wandering Rocks," perhaps referring to the shifting channel between Sicily and Italy. When the Argonauts on their roundabout way home from Colchis reached the Planctae, Thetis and her Nereids lifted the Argo in the air, carried it past the Planctae, and set it in the water safely on the far side of the dangerous shifting rocks.

Plancus (plang'kus), Lucius Munatius. Roman soldier, orator, and consul (42 B.C.). He served under Julius Caesar in the Gallic and civil wars, and attached himself successively to Brutus, Anthony, and Octavian (it was he who proposed in the Senate that the title of Augustus should be bestowed on the last-named). Horace addressed to him Ode vii, Book I.

Planet. The word means "wanderer." The ancients observed that, in addition to the fixed stars in the sky, there were seven light-giving bodies which wandered among them, and which they accordingly called "planets." These were the sun and the moon, and the five which we now speak of as the visible planets, named after Roman gods, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. To these were ascribed magic or even divine powers, and from the belief that their positions relative to each other, or to the signs of the zodiac, had favorable or disastrous influence upon human fortunes arose the pseudo-science of astrology, whose practitioners pretend to interpret these aspects as prophetic of outcomes and as guidance in future undertakings.

From the seven planets came the seven days of the week, each with a god in charge. The days of the seven-day week, with their Latin names and the French, Italian, and English derivatives, are Plataea (plā-tē'a). [Also: Plataeae.] In ancient geography, a city in Boeotia, Greece, situated at the foot of Mount Cithaeron, about 30 miles NW of Athens. Some say that the original inhabitants were sprung from the earth, and that the city was named for the nymph Plataea, a daughter of the river-god Asopus; there was a hero-shrine of Plataea in the city. The Plataeans knew of only two kings in their history: Cithaeron for whom the mountain was named, and Asopus for whom the river separating Plataea from Thebes was named. Plataeans were among many Boeotians who accompanied the Greeks in the Trojan War. The Plataeans played a valiant part in the Persian War. They helped the Athenians defeat the Persians at Marathon (490 B.C.). The part they played in the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.) was so glorious they were awarded the meed of valor after the defeat of the Persians. With their share of the booty from the victory they raised a temple of Athena Areia (Warlike), and in it placed a wooden image of the goddess, with head, hands, and feet of marble, said by some to have been made by Phidias. On the walls of the temple was a painting by Polygnotus, showing Odysseus after he had slain the suitors, and a painting by Onasias which depicted the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. Because of their valor at the battle of Plataea the Plataeans were excused from all further contributions to the war against the Persians, and undertook to celebrate the anniversary each year. Annually deputies came from all parts of Greece to sacrifice to Zeus Savior. No slaves were allowed to take part in this ceremony that was sacred to the memory of men who died for liberty. On the day of the celebration a trumpet call to battle was sounded at dawn. Immediately, a procession was formed, in which chariots laden with myrtle boughs were followed by a black bull and young men carrying wine and milk for libations. The procession marched to the entrance of the city where the graves of those who fell in the battle were located near an altar of Zeus, God of Freedom. There the archon washed the little pillars on the monuments of the dead with water and rubbed them with oil and perfumes. Then the black bull was slain and the archon called on the shades of the dead to come and feast on its blood. Next he poured wine from a bowl and presented it to the men who had died for the liberty of Greece. This ceremony was performed annually at least until the 1st century A.D. Every fifth year games, called Eleutheria, were celebrated in honor of Zeus Eleutherios (God of Freedom), in which races by men in armor were the most important contest. The Plataeans also celebrated the festivals known as the Great and Little Daedala. Plataea was unsuccessfully attacked by the Thebans in 431 B.C., besieged by the Spartans and their allies in 429 B.C., taken and destroyed by them in 427, and restored in 387 B.C. In 373 B.C. the Plataeans, wary of the Thebans, went out of their city to the fields only when they knew the Thebans were meeting in assembly and would not attack. The Thebans, learning of this policy, went to their assembly armed, marched out of it, and attacked Plataea while the inhabitants were at work in the fields. They took the city, destroyed all but its sanctuaries, and barred the gates against the Plataeans, so that though they lost their city they at least kept their lives, and many of them went to Athens. They were restored to their own city and rebuilt it after Philip of Macedon conquered Thebes and her allies at Chaeronea (338 B.C.). Plataea, Battle of. When Mardonius occupied

Plataea, Battle of

Attica for a second time, the Spartans sent out Pausanias, in command of a force of Spartans, to aid the Athenians (479 B.C.). On learning that the Spartans were on the march Mardonius withdrew from Attica, which was unfavorable terrain for the operation of his cavalry, and went to Thebes whose people were allied to the Persians. Pausanias arrayed the Spartans, Tegeans, Athenians, and all the other allies (according to Herodotus, a force of over 100,000) near Plataea. The Persians who faced him under Mardonius numbered, again according to Herodotus, 300,000. (Most modern historians consider these figures much too high.) Both armies offered sacrifices and the victims in each case foretold victory if they stood on the defensive, but not if they began the attack or if they crossed the Asopus River which separated them. Owing to these circumstances neither side wished to begin the attack, and for ten days the battle was delayed, although the Persian cavalry made harassing raids from time to time. In the meantime the Greek forces were daily augmented by soldiers flocking in. In the interval Aristides, who commanded 8000 foot-soldiers under Pausanias, sent to Delphi for an oracle. The response from the priestess was: "The Athenians shall be victorious if they address their prayers to Zeus, Hera of Cithaeron, Pan, and the nymphs Sphragitides; if they sacrifice to the heroes Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Damocrates, Hypsion, Actaeon, and Polyidus; and if they fight only in their own country, on the plain of the Eleusinian Demeter and of Persephone." All the conditions of the oracle were satisfied except the last ones, since the Athenians under Aristides were not fighting on their own soil nor in the plain of Eleusinian Demeter. Because of this, Aristides thought the Greeks should withdraw to Attica and meet the Persians there. However, while the matter was debated, the Plataean general Arimnestus was visited by Zeus in a dream, and was told by the god that the Greeks had misinterpreted the oracle, that there was a plain of Eleusinian Demeter nearby if they would look for it. On learning of the dream Aristides searched the area, and found a very ancient sanctuary of Demeter, which was well situated for battle. The Plataeans removed the boundary of their territory and gave the land to the Athenians, so that, in accordance with the oracle, the Athenians would fight on their own soil, in the plain of Eleusinian Demeter. On the eleventh day that the Greeks and Persians faced each other across the Asopus River, the Persians had a consultation. Some Persian chiefs were in favor of withdrawing to the fortified city of Thebes, where provisions were available, and by means of bribes buying up the Greek chiefs one at a time, and so ending the war without a battle. But Mardonius, proud of his army, sure that his superior numbers would overcome the Greeks, and worried by diminishing provisions, decided to ignore the advice of his generals and the warnings of the victims, and attack on the next day. That night Alexander of Macedon, who was of Greek descent, rode to the Greek camp and warned of the impending attack, because, he said, he did not want to see Greece exchange freedom for slavery. He asked the Greeks, if they should be victorious, to secure his freedom, then rode back and took his place in the Persian line. The following day the Persian cavalry attacked and grievously harried the Greeks. During the night the Greeks withdrew according to plan, but the Spartans and Tegeans, their faithful allies, were delayed in their withdrawal by the intransigence of a Spartan general who misunderstood the reason for the withdrawal and considered it a disgrace. He proposed to remain with his forces and fight. While Pausanias reasoned with him the Athenians and the other allies withdrew, and the Spartans and Tegeans were left alone to face the Persians. The Athenians to whom they sent for help were unable to come up immediately as they had been set upon by the Greek allies of Persia. Pausanias ordered his forces to hold their line but not to fight until he had obtained favorable omens from sacrificial victims. The omens were unfavorable and he ordered new victims. Meanwhile the Persians were nearing the immobilized forces and hurling weapons against them, so that some were killed without making any resistance, in accordance with the command of Pausanias. As the omens were still unfavorable and the Persians were rushing on, Pausanias lifted his eyes, streaming with tears, to heaven and implored Hera to grant that if they must be unsuccessful in the coming fight they might at least acquit themselves with valor. According to Herodotus, who tells us this story, at that moment the sacrificial victims gave favorable omens, and he ordered his line into action. The Tegeans rushed against the Persians; Pausanias attacked the Persian line of wicker shields. When the line was pierced a furious struggle took place near a temple of Demeter. Both sides fought with the utmost courage. As long as Mardonius was alive and led a body of picked men, the Persians attacked tirelessly. But when Mardonius was slain the Persians took flight and Pausanias with his Spartans and Tegeans won a glorious victory against enormous odds. Herodotus says that though the battle was fought close to a sacred grove of Demeter, as the oracle of Delphi had commanded, not a single Persian died on the sacred soil, while around it, in unconsecrated ground, great numbers were slain. He concluded that the goddess herself kept the Persians out of her sacred grove. The Spartans and Tegeans pursued the fleeing Persians to the rampart they had built in Theban territory and besieged it. With the aid of the Athenians, who had shaken off their attackers and now came up, they breached the wall of the rampart and slaughtered the Persians inside. Herodotus gives the number of Persians and their allies who were lost as over 250,000. Others say that though the slaughter was undoubtedly great, Herodotus exaggerated the number here as he did the number on both sides in this battle. According to Plutarch, the Greeks lost 1360 men. Legend says the successful battle of Plataea (479 B.C.) took place in the morning of the same day that saw, in the afternoon, the defeat of the Persians at Mycale in Asia Minor.

Platanistius (plā-tā-nis'ti-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "God of the Plane-tree Grove."

Plato (plā'tō). [Original name, Aristocles.] Greek philosopher, who was born, some say, on Apollo's birthday, 428 or 427 B.C., at Athens. He died at Athens, 348 or 347 B.C. He was an associate of Socrates ("my elderly friend") until the latter's death, and was the founder of the Academic school, of
